Within this body of mediating thought, however, there is one rather nice distinction not always clearly perceived, but worth careful attention. It is suggested by the two words "unity" and "union." Unity, we are often told, we all desire and may all attain. It rests upon such a deep and complete conviction of the real nature of Christianity that all differences of form and expression become of no importance. Provided only that the true Christian spirit be preserved, the varieties of creed and of organization are of no account. They are only the natural outcome of those diversities in human nature that save it from stagnation and decay. "All very fine," replies the other wing of the mediating party, "but where are you to get a definition of this abstract unity? How are we to know when any single body of persons has attained thereto, much less the whole multitude of those who confess themselves and would like to be called 'Christians'?" There must be some outward signs by which this unity can be recognized. In other words, there must be some form and some degree of union to give a tangible body to what is otherwise only a vague and impracticable ideal.

We once heard the very liberal pastor of an American church abroad give an invitation to the celebration of the Lord's Supper which, for breadth and inclusiveness, left nothing to be desired, had he not seen fit to conclude with the request that his hearers "would partake with ungloved hands." It was only the other day that the Episcopalian Bishop of New York publicly reproved a clergyman subject to his direction for lending his church building for the purpose of a political discussion. The offense lay, not in providing a room for discussion nor in the nature of the opinions expressed, but in the desecration of a building specifically consecrated to a religious purpose. It is not long since a building thus consecrated was sold to worshipers of another communion and, before it was handed over, solemnly *de*consecrated. The principle of unity is very apt to break down at the critical point and the emphasis to shift over to some tangible kind of union in outward form.

These reflections are suggested by the appearance of a little volume* bearing the modest title of "Approaches Toward Church Unity." It contains a group of articles by four clergymen, three Congregationalists and one Episcopalian. Its declared aim is not to lay down any one definite programme of action, but rather to suggest various possibilities of helpful effort toward the end of unity. It is not consummation but "approach" that we are asked to consider. Two leading motives are followed: one, the historical, another, the speculative or ideal. The former is the subject of the first article, in which Professor Walker, of Yale University, deals with the infinitely vexed question of the development of "officers" within the body of the early "charismatic" Church.

On the nature of these officials Dr. Walker speaks with no uncertain voice. He reviews in the light of the best information we have, meagre as this is, the emergence of an official class from the simple charismatic leaders of the first generation to the monarchical parish (not diocesan) episcopate of the Ignatian letters. He concludes that here is no trace of an apostolic succession, but rather evidence of a leadership resting upon personal quality. If Dr. Walker is right, and we think he is, the whole structure of claims to church authority resting upon apostolic succession falls to the ground. No chain is stronger than its weakest point, and, if the defective link in a chain of evidence occurs at the very beginning of it, we need not concern ourselves greatly about the rest.

The historical "approach" is continued by Dr. Raymond Calkins, a Congregationalist minister of Cambridge, Mass. His contribution here takes the form of an exhortation to all apparently opposing branches of the Christian family to study the history of great dividing epochs, notably in the Church of England, and thus to reach such an understanding, each of the others' points of view, that they may come to think of their own peculiar ideas and practices as of no account compared with the great aim of realizing the ideal of the One Holy Catholic Church. He thinks that some approach can and ought to be made to Canon Rawlinson's dictum that real unity of church worship "can not take place until the Pope of Rome appreciates and values the Methodist prayer-meeting or until the Puritan learns to worship with insight and devout intelligence at Mass in St. Peters." Dr. Calkins would say "and until" rather than "or until," but he does not seem to realize that if ever this gorgeous ideal could be reached both Pope and Puritan would long before have disappeared. His historical approach only demonstrates that after two thousand years of struggle the Protestant, even "though he be educated in church history," still wants to be a Protestant and the Catholic wants to be a Catholic, but that neither wants to be both.

Dr. Calkins does not hope that "this or that experiment of reunion shall succeed" but only that these two forms of the Church shall "understand each other." He has faith that out of such mutual understanding there shall arise the one Church, etc., but he seems to forget that one of the postulates of this whole volume is that the one Church already exists and only seems to be divided because its varied aspects have, in fact, worked out into those differing forms which reflect the happy varieties of human nature itself. What is going to happen when this much-prayed-for understanding is reached does not appear, and we suspect that our authors have only the vaguest idea of this themselves. We incline to think that the wicked people to whose infirmities of temper Dr. Calkins attributes the divisions of the Reformation period had a great deal clearer understanding of the meanings of their partisan conflicts than we have, or than our successors educated in the doctrine of development are likely to have. The heat of their partisanship came largely because they understood what was involved in their controversies, and we are profiting both ways from the steadfastness of their faith.

Where Dr. Calkins's real sympathies lie seems to be rather more clearly disclosed in another article on Creeds. He shows quite accurately that creeds are historical formulations, not metaphysical inventions. His special concern, however, is not to have them preserved for defensive purposes, but to have them frequently repeated as a means of edification and as reminders of the unity of all Christians. That the creeds contain positive affirmations of belief in things which the rational sense of our time knows to be impossible does not trouble him. "Say them over often enough" is the obvious inference from his words "and you will come to believe them in some sense that is good enough for the one supreme end of unity." The virgin birth, the descent into hell, the physical resurrection—these all mean something "more" than they say, and what this something may be every individual "believer" is at liberty to determine for himself. Dr. Calkins says "this is not to toy with language," but there will be readers who will think that it is toying with things more important than language, with honesty of thought and the sanctities of true belief. The church that says "No matter what you believe so long as you are willing to say you believe what other people say they believe" is planting the seeds of its own damnation.

*APPROACHES TOWARD CHURCH UNITY, edited by Newman Smyth and Williston Walker. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Dr. Newman Smyth's chief contribution is in several short articles on the general thesis of biological analogies in the life of the Church. It is a method rather suggestive than positively constructive. The Church is an organism with a development going on from the beginning and destined to go on forever. Schism, which Dr. Smyth seems to agree is a sin, is not so much the lopping off of one limb from an otherwise perfect organism as it is a separation between members equally responsible for the maintenance of unity and, therefore, equally guilty of the sin of division. The application of this idea to the modern Church is obvious. There is no single tribunal that can decide in the matter of schism. It is the duty of all the churches, frankly admitting their sinful state, to "get together" under the guidance of the one spirit they all profess to follow.

Bishop Brent, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in a chapter of three pages, expresses general good will toward any workable project of church unity. He makes also a hopeful, but non-committal, reference to a scheme of approach to this end by a conference of Episcopalians and Congregationalists. Dr. Smyth, too, prepares us for a study of this scheme by a selection of cases illustrating the possibility of episcopal ordination in addition to that already received from some other source. The scheme itself is given in the Appendix, and we can not escape the impression that here we have the "nub" of the whole matter so far as this volume is concerned. The essence of the proposals here contained is, that any minister who has not received episcopal ordination, with the approval of "the ecclesiastical authority to which he is subject," may under certain conditions receive ordination from a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church without, however, ceasing to be a member of the communion to which he already belongs. Here is obviously the danger of a conflict of jurisdiction, but this is cannily provided for in advance. In case this luckless servant of two masters be "charged with error of faith or of conduct," he shall be tried according to episcopal procedure and sentenced by a bishop, with due notification to the other communion and acceptance of its findings as "evidence of facts."

This scheme has been accepted by men calling themselves Congregationalists, but to the unregenerate it looks like a very one-sided bargain. It seems to him that the principle of episcopacy would be gaining a practical recognition from that body of Christians which has been most distinctly opposed to it, and that the principle of congregationalism would in fact be surrendered. Now these two principles are not reconcilable. Any working arrangement between them would be possible only by trimming away from each all that makes it valuable in the adaptation of the Church to the varied needs of various types of men. If ever that trimming process shall be completed the sham unity that will result will not be worth having. The real and fortunate diversities of human nature will then proceed to re-assert themselves, and the ancient struggle of liberty against uniformity and of honesty against wordy compromise will begin again. The only true unity is that unity of the spirit which thrives upon diversities utilizing them for its highest ends.

THEOLOGIAN.

Drama

Percy Mackaye's "George Washington" and St. John Ervine's "Jane Clegg"

At the Lyric Theatre last week I saw Percy Mackaye's "George Washington" received with moderate approval by an audience whose size hinted only too plainly that the play's weeks, if not its hours, were numbered. Washington is the first, or second, of our men of state, and Mr. Mackaye's name is bright on the roster of our active men of letters. Rumor says that Mr. John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" has been known to earn six thousand dollars a week at the Cort Theatre, and the emptiness of two-thirds of the seats in the Lyric orchestra gapes for explanations. One might begin by suggesting that Mr. Drinkwater's relation to "Abraham Lincoln" is that of chaplain; the relation of Mr. Mackaye to "George Washington" might be defined in the word "herald." Heralds had their solemnity in the old Roman and mediæval days, and Mr. Mackaye is studious, solicitous, and earnest in his fashion. But in Mr. Drinkwater the design and the temper are equally grave; in Mr. Mackaye the design is graver than the temper. Both plays with entire wisdom omit formal story, but the theme of Lincoln has offered Mr. Drinkwater rich compensations in character and atmosphere. Washington has not been quite so generous to Mr. Mackaye.

In history I think one has the sense that Washington does not quite embody Washington, that there is a sheath or glaze about the man which resists the passage of the soul outward. In life he seems already monumental. Now Mr. Mackaye, whose gift is "buxom, blithe and debonair," might have seemed to be nature's own appointee for the task of enlivening and diversifying a slightly heavy theme. What has been the issue? Mr. Mackaye has added the condiment freely, but he has forborne to stir it in; and the result is that part of the dish is overseasoned, and part of it is relatively savorless. For example, the madcap George, in his very first appearance, frightens an old negress out of her wits by masquerading as a feathered Indian. Plainly, we are to have a live George; I am thankful for a live George; but I could have spared this particular guarantee. Moreover, I have a feeling that the liveliness has a certain resemblance to the Indian feathers in the ease and completeness with which it falls off, leaving us, for long periods at least, to the expected and accustomed sobrieties.

The Washington is acceptable, but scarcely noteworthy, and there is still another point which raises mild remonstrance in the critic. The play begins in fantasy, and there are three whimsical people, Quilloquon and his boy and girl, who, always on the stage and never in the play, and proving by their saucy charm how soon the superfluous can become the indispensable, never allow the play to escape from the realm of the fantastic. This is all very well in certain parts, but what can fantasy do at Valley Forge or Trenton? Elfland surely does not skirt the Delaware. In one scene Mr. Mackaye makes Washington play the flute in the rigors of Valley Forge. The flute at Valley Forge—in a sort it is symbolic of the play. Mr. Mackaye's diction, which is hardly surpassed in its kind, afforded me the customary pleasure; I could only regret the apparent blindness of the audience to the fireflies that shone and darted in his verse.

Mr. Walter Hampden took the part of George Washington. There is something of the Roman, of the magistrate, in Mr. Hampden as in Washington himself, and the rigidity which is felt in both is both a help and an impediment to Mr. Hampden. It enables him to produce without trouble a respectable Washington; it hinders him in the suggestion of that Washington whom Washington himself could not reveal. The emotion, when it arrives, is mannered; the personage obscures the man.

Mr. St. John Ervine's "Jane Clegg," which the Theatre Guild is now presenting at the Garrick Theatre, is a real play and a good play. It is less moving than "John Ferguson." The note of "John Ferguson" was an intense family solidarity; the note of "Jane Clegg" is a family division so profound as almost to make the characters impervious to joy or sorrow from each other. It is the story of the relation of a husband and a wife. That relation, tacit at the beginning, is explicit at the close; at its depths the play is stationary. On the surface, however, there is motion enough; the means by which this tacit relation becomes explicit is a compact, crisp, and energetic drama. Another point of interest is that the dramatic force of the separation in the last act lies less in the rupture of a tie worn so thin on both sides that it parts without a snap than in the originality of the conditions under which this division is accomplished. Husband and wife both want the same thing, a concord which is sometimes thought to stifle drama. But agreement may now and then be dramatic if the agreement itself be in conflict with expectation and the normal course of things. In exactly the same way a quiet curtain (of which there are three in Jane Clegg) may be dramatic, if it is quiet enough to make its quietness surprising.

The play is very simple in its mechanism. The scene is immovable; the action includes three days and fills three evenings; the transaction is single. Of the scant cast of seven characters, two, the children, are entirely useless, and a third, the grandmother, is nearly so. The actors in the play reduce themselves to four, the lying, bullying, and whining husband, the grave, unfaltering, clear-sighted wife, the cashier of the bank which the husband has robbed of one hundred and forty pounds, and the bookmaker who presses the husband for the settlement of a racing bet. Behind this group there lurks in the shadow the other woman, for whose sake the husband is prepared to rob his employers, to desert his family, and to flee to Canada, and whose existence is disclosed in the final act by the vengeance of the unpaid bookmaker to the laconic, Draconic, and unswerving wife. The bookmaker, who in his last scene, as elsewhere, is a mere utensil, is allowed by Mt. St. John Ervine to make rather more clatter than a utensil should. The closing passage between husband and wife, in which the wife sends him off or lets him go, is of a delicate originality and a rare penetration. A fine moment arrives when the husband is shocked at the wife's failure to be shocked by the misdeeds which he grossly commits and delicately deprecates. The play is essentially a play of character without obvious thesis; one of those wise plays in which the plot is to the characters what the scenery is to the plot. Some day I shall read the play to test my present impression that the grandmother is memorable among the figures of the contemporary stage for the mixture of crackbrainedness, shrewdness, cynicism, languor, peevishness, mawkishness, and self-complaisance.

The performance was equally remarkable for vigor and symmetry. Mr. Dudley Digges as Henry Clegg was good, though the human nature in the auditor writhes a little at the exhibit of its own dishonor. Miss Margaret Wycherly's Jane Clegg was the prolongation of one note, but that note was judicious and imposing. Mr. Henry Travers was excellent in the whip-cracking part of the bookmaker. Mr. Erskine Sanford as the cashier was really subtle in the circumspect, circuitous and deprecatory manner which cloaked, yet could not hide, the undeceivable and unflinching man of business. Miss Helen Westley's portrayal of the old grandmother left admiration groping for words.

O. W. Firkins

Music

David Bispham's Memoirs

A Quaker Singer's Recollections. By David Bispham. New York: The Macmillan Company.

A SINGER who can write with ease and style is rarer than that rare bird, the black swan. One artist of the kind is David Bispham.

For thirty years and more David Bispham has been prominent, here and abroad, as a baritone of note, a singing actor, and an advocate of the use of English speech in opera. In these recollections he has packed into one volume the record of a long and busy life—a life of many strange and varied experiences. Unlike most men who have their hour in opera, he has had his in society. He has traveled far and wide, and mixed with people who were worth knowing and far-famed in many ways. To this it may be added, unreservedly, that he has more than an instinctive turn for setting down, in plain but vivid words, what he would tell. He writes attractively of art and men and things. And if at times he dwells at undue length on minor matters (such as his family crest and ancient Norman lineage), we can forgive him.

On both his father's and his mother's sides he comes of Quaker stock, tracing back his ancestry to the Biscops and the Biscophams of Lancashire and the English Lake District. The descendants of those English Quakers settled in Pennsylvania; and it was there, in Philadelphia, that the future singer was born into a rather weary world. From his early childhood he was strongly drawn to drama and music. It seemed uncertain for some years to which of these he would devote his life. He did well enough in amateur theatricals. But his taste leaned much more strongly towards singing. While still quite young, he visited Europe and some parts of the Near East, heard Verdi's operas in Italy, and halted in Athens. Thence he was taken to Constantinople, where he had glimpses of Dancing Dervishes. He saw Fechter, Barry Sullivan, and Adelaide Neilson, and lost no chance of reading all the dramas, new and old, he could lay hands on. Then, after a few brief commercial interludes, he devoted himself to oratorio and studied hard for a time under the best teacher of the day in England, William Shakespeare. His Quaker friends soon looked on him as lost. They prophesied that little good would come to a young man who was always "fooling around after music." But, sometimes in Boston and his home town, sometimes in Europe, he persisted in singing. In Europe, at the outset of his career, he met many celebrities; among them, Salvini, Irving, Cellier, Gilbert, Sullivan, Meredith, Watts, Ellen Terry, Sargent, "Ouida," Browning, Mrs. Burnett, Booth, and Barrett. At the advice of various friends, he extended his activities from the concert hall to the opera house, and, at the age of thirty-two, made his first bow in opera, as the Duc de Longueville, at the Royal English Opera House (now known as the palace), in "La Basoche" of the French composer, André Messager.

"Planchette," which anticipated the now popular "ouija board," then took a hand in David Bispham's art life. At a dinner given in London, the young baritone sat down to consult the spirits. When his turn came, but, as he assures us, before he had touched the planchette board, he read these words: "Opera, by all means." It was the answer to a question he was about to formulate. Planchette next urged him strenuously to study "Verdi and Wagner"—more particularly "Aïda," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Die Meistersinger." Going further into detail, Planchette bade him learn the parts of Amonasro, Wolfram, Kurvenal, and Beckmesser. To his great surprise, he was soon after engaged by Sir Augustus Harris, of Covent Garden, to sing all those rôles.

It was to Mr. Maurice Grau, when temporarily director of Covent Garden, he owed his engagement at the Metropolitan, where he repeated some of the successes he had scored abroad. He made his New York début as Beckmesser, in "Die Meistersinger," with Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Pol Plançon, and Emma Eames.

Americans had not yet fought their way on to the opera boards. Indeed, at one time David Bispham was the only male American in opera. He gave more care than most, too much as some have thought, to the dramatic aspects of his interpretations, even at the sacrifice of vocal urgencies. He agreed in theory, no doubt, with "Jean," who invariably reminded himself that opera was neither pure drama nor pure music, but a compromise, and that acting in opera should, for that reason, be largely conventionalized.

Like Maurice Renaud, the French baritone, and Saléza, the French tenor, David Bispham was too prone to overstrain in order to interpret thoroughly. Had he been less devoted to the acting art, he might have stayed some years longer on the opera stage. He cut a wide swath, none the less, in opera before leaving it for the concert field. Among other parts in which he gained distincton may be mentoned Wolfram, Wotan, Vanderdecken, Kurvenal, Alberich, Falstaff, Amonasro, Beckmesser, and Gomarez (in Floridia's "Paoletta").

These recollections abound in pertinent anecdotes. They are handsomely, lavishly illustrated. Above all, they are well and brightly written.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

To meet an obvious demand for the discussion of educational matters, the Review plans with this issue to set up a special department. There is no intention of entering the province of technical journals; the aim will be, rather, to discuss questions of fundamental interest to the citizen as well as to the professional teacher. "Everyone," writes one of our readers, "is now thinking about educational matters as he never did before, and very few are thinking with much clearness." It is the purpose of the Review, by discussion of those problems about which "everyone is thinking," to serve the clear and constructive elements in educational thought. It is worth noticing, too, that the word "Education" has come to embrace legitimately a great many enterprises wholly separate from academic control. The work of the American Library Association, the organization of schools at the plants of large industries, and the amazing development of propaganda are significant instances. Notices, with editorial comment, of those phases which seem of national importance will appear from time to time in the Review. Obvious adjuncts of these notices and comments will be book reviews and occasional articles on educational questions of wide interest.

The wise man who said that "it takes two to make a teacher" has received possibly more praise than he deserves. He did not mention the parent and voter, who in his double capacity produces both child and revenue. At no time has this third "party" been of greater importance than now, for he has opinions and, with negligible exceptions, he suffers no inhibitions in the expression of them. The benefits which may accrue from his quickened interest in education are many. He is calling the schools and colleges to a practical demonstration of their effectiveness. Retroactively, he is realizing more and more that growth of mind and spirit can not be accomplished by a purely utilitarian course, that intellect is, after all, more important than intelligence, that capacity without character is not the end of life. He may even come to see that an underpaid teacher is an undesirable teacher. But the dangers which spring from the same cause are formidable. Sometimes the good man, whether he is a teacher or not, mistakes notions for opinions, and a clear distinction between principles and prejudices is rarely his affair. In the lively and rather muddy stream of thought which has accompanied the emergence of education from academic groves, the word "education" has come to be as loosely used as "democracy" itself. When it is employed to describe a "process which stimulates productive growth," it allows astonishing variations; but the definition is a good one for general purposes; since it reminds us of the essential nature of education. When the word is used, however, simply to describe a process, neither productive nor growth-stimulating—worse yet, to describe something which does not even proceed—it amounts to a mere dissipation of energies. Thinking on educational questions probably ought not to be returned to private control; certainly the parent and voter can not and will not be put back into the isolated modesty or indifference of his forbears. He has taken education and the future of the nation to be his province—what is he going to do about it?

Dead Culture and Live Business

A "FORMER college professor," writing in the Century for January on "Why I Remain in Industry," gives, among other reasons for his decision, the discovery that "culture and broad-mindedness" are more commonly to be found in the industrial world than in the university. "Ideas, instead of being confined to text-books and class-room lectures, are in a constant state of flux and competition with one another. The result is a certain mental alertness, a readiness to credit the other man's viewpoint, and an openness to new plans and ideas, no matter how unusual, which are unknown in academic life."

The arraignment of the university may not be wholly fair; the definition of culture, implied if not actually stated, may leave much to be desired. The professor's conclusion, however, supports a general feeling that certain traditional notions need radical revision. One meets plenty of businessmen who bear the marks of culture, as well as other businessmen and many college professors who bear no such marks. Do the college men lack them in spite of the atmosphere in which they constantly dwell? Did the businessmen who bear the marks acquire them at college and do they preserve them, forever indestructible, in the "sordid" atmosphere of their dollar-chasing? Or, as the professor suggests, does the world of industry, rather than the college, produce that "accessibility to ideas" which Matthew Arnold insisted on as the sine qua non of culture?

The poor word culture has been much abused. One might perhaps disregard as trivial the most obvious misuse of it, if that misuse were not common, even among "educated people." To a great many the word unfortunately carries the vague meaning of an intellectual adornment, accompanied by a mild disdain for things which have cash value. It is commonly used in only a negative sense, to cover a condition which is not utilitarian. Working from this conception of it, many have argued, by the facile process which used to get called ignoratio elenchi, that studies which are in no sense utilitarian must serve it—as, for example, reading Shelley or reciting a Latin verb; and whole courses of study have been built on the dreary fallacy. The "man in the street," who has too often been told that something of this sort is culture, has long been suspicious of its having any value, spiritual or other; it may fairly be called dead, if indeed it ever lived—that is, dead as culture, but still living, though moribund, as a cult.

(Continued on page 292)

CROCKER-WHEELER MOTORS
"Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power"

Quality the Keynote—

For over 30 years quality has been the one and dominating purpose of the C-W institution.

That is why Crocker-Wheeler motors are the unvarying choice of experienced manufacturers and engineers.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

have just published a remarkably interesting book in

A Cloud of Witnesses
By ANNA DE KOVEN (Mrs. Reginald de Koven) $2.50

A record of personal experience which has given Mrs. de Koven such extraordinary and indisputable evidence of spirit communication that she has felt it her duty to the world to declare the facts. Dr. James H. Hyslop, the distinguished psychist, in an Introduction vouches for the good faith and the seriousness with which the experiments recorded were undertaken.

IMPORTANT BOOKS ON PSYCHIC MATTERS.

Voices from the Void
By HESTER TRAVERS SMITH $2.00

A record, the result of six years' study of automatic writing. Mr. Henry Holt writes: "I am tempted to say that the one hundred best pages written on psychical research are in this little book."

On the Threshold of the Unseen
By Sir WILLIAM F. BARRETT $2.50

"The best book of its kind in English." "The standard text-book on matters connected with the borderland of the unseen," say those who know.

The Reality of Psychic Phenomena
By W. J. CRAWFORD $2.00

A record of experiments with delicate physical apparatus which foreshadow radical modifications of the accepted theory of matter and spirit.

IN PREPARATION.

Proofs of the Spirit World
By L. CHEVREUIL Ready very shortly

A lucid analysis of representative reports of Psychical Societies, etc., which aims to determine if the evidence of survival is decisive.

Obtainable from any bookseller, or may be ordered direct from
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

(Continued from page 290)

Few, but more worthy of notice, are those who adhere to Matthew Arnold's view of culture—"the acquainting ourselves with the best that has been known and said in the world, and thus with the history of the human spirit." Such acquaintanceship should produce what our "former college professor" calls "a readiness to credit the other man's viewpoint, and an openness to new plans and ideas." But it means a sense of values, too; an instant distinction between things significant and things insignificant, essential and accidental; a sort of intellectual chastity. The point is illustrated by a remark attributed to a well-known Greek scholar when some one. eulogizing Bernard Shaw, said triumphantly, "Well, you must admit that Shaw says a lot of true things." To which the scholar replied: "Any man who allows no inhibitions in his thinking can not fail at times to strike the truth. If he thinks everything, he must include some true things. But the value of his mind depends only on the order among his ideas."

It is this unerring sense of values which perhaps more than anything else marks the man of culture. Our "college professor" found in the leaders of industry a progressive mental alertness which he had not found in the academic circle—not merely a quick intelligence in regard to things that "pay," but "a readiness to credit the other man's viewpoint," with the strong implication of at least a potential sense of values. Evidently, if he was right, culture may flourish in a factory while it languishes in a college. Mr. Lowes Dickinson says ominously, speaking of culture, "The things we do to maintain it might kill it; the things we do to kill it might preserve it."

The fact is, we have grown, since Arnold, to think of culture as a condition or state of being, and in so doing we have oftener than not treated it as dead at the start, with the result that our college courses established to maintain it have too frequently amounted to a sort of solemn obsequies. Yet this passive use of the word culture was apparently unknown before the nineteenth century. Cicero, though he used the word figuratively—that is, to speak of culture of the mind—never did so, we are told, "except with strong consciousness of the metaphor involved"; and the same consciousness of metaphor appears not only in Bacon's "Culture and manurance of minds," but in the use of the word by other writers till recent times. To be sure, the condition which we now call culture existed, happily, and was constantly being produced by cultural processes, long before men got to thinking of the condition itself, passively, as culture. Nowadays we may go the length of saying that "culture of the mind produces culture," but, instead of doing anything so foolish, though it might wholesomely remind us that a vital process is involved, we say, "the study of Latin produces culture." Culture thus becomes a full-fledged state of being, not a process; and we have only to teach Latin in any one of a dozen wrong ways to kill culture outright—if we have not already destroyed it by the very act of crystallizing it into a condition.

For it is significant that, together with the growth of the conception of culture as a condition, a state of mind, grew also the notion first alluded to, that it could have nothing to do with things of practical value. The men of culture a few generations ago studied for the most part things which had no utilitarian value, but so did everybody who went to college—so did those who acquired no culture whatever; a fact which ought to have raised the suspicion that the practical usefulness or uselessness of a subject in no way indicated its cultural value. Instead, the few sons of light were piously observed, and the classical tradition, already strong because of its "disciplinary" value, was now invoked as the handmaiden of culture. The thing was demonstrable—or nearly so. Did not the classics contain much of "the best

(Continued on page 293)

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP and ECONOMIC WELFARE

By JACOB H. HOLLANDER, Ph.D., Professor of Political Economy in the Johns Hopkins University

132 pages, 16*mo*, $1.25

Professor Hollander examines the present duty of the American citizen in securing and enlarging the economic well-being of the country. This involves a frank review of the current obligations of the citizen (a) as producer, (b) as employer and (c) as taxpayer.

The Life and Stories of the Jaina Savior Pārçvanātha

By MAURICE BLOOMFIELD, Ph.D. Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in The Johns Hopkins University

255 pages, Octavo, $3.00

The Jainas are one of the most important of Hindu sects, both on account of the uprightness of their lives and the acute sensitiveness of their moral or religious tenets. Very little is known in America of the Jaina religion or the vast literature of the Jainas. This literature combines religious teaching with illustration by story, a combination familiar elsewhere, but brought by the Jainas to a degree of perfection not quite equaled even by the Buddhist Scriptures.

HENRY MILLS HURD

The First Superintendent of the Johns Hopkins Hospital

By THOMAS STEPHEN CULLEN, M.B.

145 pages, Crown Octavo, $1.50

This is a short account of Dr. Hurd's medical activities, and yielding to the insistant requests of his friends, Dr. Hurd has added "Random Recollections" of his early life.

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS
BALTIMORE, MARYLAND

THE REVIEW

$5 a year

140 Nassau St., New York

Sample Copy for Your Friend Upon Request

ANNUITIES TAX EXEMPT

Age 45 . . Yield 6¾%
Age 50 . . Yield 7¼%
Age 55 . . Yield 8¼%
Age 60 . . Yield 9½%
Age 65 . . Yield 11½%
Age 70 . . Yield 13½%

INCOME FOR LIFE GUARANTEED BY ONE OF THE STRONGEST FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS IN THE WORLD

Booklet and Details upon Application

ROBERT A. SASSEEN
115 Broadway, New York

Just Off the Press

BELGIUM BY A BELGIAN

A SHORT HISTORY OF BELGIUM

By LÉON VAN DER ESSEN, of the University of Louvain

It is a fascinating and authoritative account of the past of this country from 57 B.C. to the end of the Great War. The author tells how the nation balked German might and "stood the test in the hour of the Great Trial."
Red-blooded Americans will read this vivid narrative with pleasure.

$1.50, postpaid $1.65.

INTRODUCTION TO THE PEACE TREATIES

By ARTHUR PEARSON SCOTT,
Assistant Professor of History,
University of Chicago

This book will give you an understanding of the causes of the war, the aims of the belligerents, the peace proposals, and the framing of the Treaty of Peace. It is also a comprehensive explanation of the League of Nations and the location of new national boundaries. The author has made available information of vital importance to every American citizen.

Ready in May. $2.00, postpaid $2.15

The University of Chicago Press
5786 Ellis Avenue, Chicago, Illinois

(Continued from page 292)

that has been known and said in the world?" Where, if not in them, was to be found the intellectual chastity which the wayward generation needed? All sorts of students were, therefore, put through the process, students who in due time grew into such apostate professors as the contributor to the Century. Culture in colleges was nearly dead; the thing which was done to maintain it was killing it.

While the classics, properly taught, might have established contact with "the best that has been known and said in this world," they accomplished, except in a few notable cases, small signs of culture. It was then that the college champions of the classical tradition fell back on the last infirmity of their noble minds and made much of the fact that, though only a few—the children of sweetness and light—might attain unto the fullness of the stature of culture, the "vast residuum," if they did not get culture, at least got mental discipline out of the classics. A doctrine which thus set culture apart, a thing to be enjoyed only by a small and rather precious group, was calculated to hasten the process towards atrophy. Even professors became apostate.

Yet culture did not really die. Under such conditions it merely seeks pastures new, wherever its chief food, ideas, sets up a cultural process—in colleges, but perhaps in science laboratories, perhaps also in those classical courses which have broken with the formula; also in business, in the very stronghold of cash values.

It should be instructive in this connection to recall the activities of men during periods of productive culture. What wrought the desired state of being in Erasmus, in Bacon, in Milton? Certainly not the classics, which had a plain cash value. What was the process before Erasmus and the classical tradition? Latin in the Middle Ages was as hopelessly utilitarian as French is to-day. And what shall be said of Phidias and Praxiteles, to whom Greek was the necessary mother tongue? How does it come that Michelangelo and Leonardo, products of an age born of the revival of the classics, should have been so incurably utilitarian as to build fortifications and invent wheelbarrows? Was it not that they, just because of a vital culture, a culture that was still a process, were filled with creative energy, as are to-day the diggers of canals and the builders of railroads—men of vision and ideas? A good many champions of dead culture seem to have forgotten that the Renaissance, their fortress and their strength, was directly responsible for a quickened interest in this world, an interest which in time produced modern science. Science

(Continued on page 294)

SOME EARLY 1920 BOOKS

JANE AUSTEN

By O. W. FIRKINS
Dramatic Editor of The Review

This book is different from the voluminous biographies and few critical estimates of her character and imperishable work, and fills an important niche long vacant. The author preeminently treats Jane Austen's work as it appears to our contemporary taste. $1.75

THE TURN OF THE TIDE

By Lieut.-Col. JENNINGS C. WISE

The author of "The Long Arm of Lee," "Gunnery," etc., writes from intimate knowledge of the action of our troops in which he himself took part. Later he was attached to the Historical Section of the General Staff. $1.50

THE WORLD'S FOOD RESOURCES

By J. RUSSELL SMITH
Author of "Commercial and Industrial Geography"

The war has suddenly made the world think about its food and use care in its selection and use. This book discusses such questions as the future of man's meat supply, the means of increasing grain crops, the development of great untouched regions and the cultivation of new plants to yield men food. It gives a vivid account of the history and distribution of the main sources of food. Illustrated. $3.50
"Amazingly complete."—New York Tribune.

MORE CHAPTERS OF OPERA

By H. E. KREHBIEL

A continuation of "Chapters of Opera," by this dean of American music critics. Not only is the main subject fuller in this second book, but he makes interesting excursions into such matters as "A Critic's Duty to his Art," "Translations," "The Russian Dancers," etc. With over 40 illustrations from portraits, repertories and full index. $3.50
"Invaluable for reference . . . entertaining to all lovers of opera."—New York Evening Post.

MASKS

By GEORGE MIDDLETON

This sixth volume treats of a wide range of subjects shown in varied moods. Masks is a satirical study of a great dramatist forced to work in a commercial theatre; the other plays are Jim's Beast, Tides, Among the Lions, The Reason, and The House. $1.60
"A master of the one-act play."—New York Tribune.

MANY, MANY MOONS

By LEW SARETT

For ten years Sarett worked in the North Country among the Indians as a guide and woodsman and was adopted as a brother by the tribes. Out of the tall timber of the land of K'cheegamee he has come with these poems of the wilderness. $1.50

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
19 WEST 44th STREET, NEW YORK

(Continued from page 293)
worked havoc with their comfortable ways of thinking; they pronounced the non-utilitarian doctrine to maintain their precious culture, and so killed it; and culture went to live among the idolaters!

The trouble is not with culture, plainly, nor yet with the classics. It lies in the crystallizing of culture into a state of being and the development of a ritual to serve it—in losing that "strong consciousness of the metaphor involved" in Bacon's "Culture and manurance of minds." Business is "live" because it is vital, and as such it may produce ideas, may even produce order among ideas. But it is not cultural just because it is utilitarian, any more than the classical formula is cultural because it is non-utilitarian. Few, if any, ideas have had such transforming power as those contained in the classics. There is a strong case for them, though not the case most commonly presented—as there is a strong case for other studies which reveal man's search for truth—if their guardians will bear steadily in mind, whatever the consequences to "immemorial" prejudices, that the condition of culture has ever been produced by the process of culture, that mental pruning shears alone will not make the student grow, that there must also be "manurance of minds." Culture will flourish wherever significant ideas are brought to birth; and significant ideas are more likely to be brought to birth where men are building Parthenons and Pennsylvania Terminals than where they are repeating, with ghostly insignificance, the rituals of a perished superstition.

WALTER S. HINCHMAN

Delays Pay No Interest

but a deposit account opened with this Company today yields you a return from the start. You will find here individual service and careful attention to details which will render the transaction of your banking business a satisfaction rather than a care. Small accounts receive the same attention as large ones.

FOUR OFFICES IN MANHATTAN

55 Cedar Street
Broadway at 73rd St.
Madison Ave. at 75th St.
125th St. at 8th Ave.

Customers of one office have at their disposal the facilities of all offices.

UNITED STATES
MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY

Capital and Surplus, $6,000,000

IT is worth noticing that the Board of Education of Massachusetts plans to give this spring a course in "Methods of Teaching English in Secondary Schools." This course, which will be organized as a series of conferences of English teachers, will focus its attention particularly on the question of College Entrance English. Such an effort, after the publicity that has recently been given this much-mooted question, should have practical results and should prove of interest and value outside of Massachusetts. Not only have the discussions in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin shown that everyone is not satisfied with admission requirements as they now stand, but the recent flooding of the universities of Minnesota and Iowa with inadequately prepared students under the "accrediting" system has revealed that everyone is not satisfied with admission requirements as they now fall. At the November meeting of the National Council of Teachers of English, Miss Breck, of Oakland, California, urged the colleges to rely on the judgment of the high schools—to open wide their doors and have faith. The question is not merely one of English requirements, nor yet burning solely in Massachusetts; it concerns the whole question of admission requirements and is of national importance.

An honestly liberal view can not adhere exclusively to either the radical or the ultra-conservative ideas. Is a college education desirable for more than a small percentage of high school graduates? Will they really profit by the opportunity if the doors are thrown wide open? Are those who can profit really shut out by examination bars? Will the psychological tests recently set up by Columbia solve the problem? If the colleges are to become advanced high schools, where are the instructors to be found? These questions have not yet been adequately answered, but the issue between the accrediting system and the old examination system is fairly joined. The importance of the outcome of this issue must be appreciated by all who are interested in educational matters.

Books Received

POETRY

Brereton, C. Mystica et Lyrica. London: Elkin Mathews.

Lindsay, Vachel. The Golden Whales of California. Macmillan. $1.75.

Sassoon, Siegfried. Picture-Show. Dutton. $1.50 net.

Turner, W. J. The Dark Wind. Dutton. $2 net.

Books and the News

Woman Suffrage

WITH woman suffrage by Constitutional amendment all but an accomplished fact, to name a list of books upon the subject may seem superfluous. But both as a current question and for the historical interest in the long struggle, it is not inopportune to refer to the stories of the pioneers, and the arguments of the "pros" and of the "antis."

The whole question of "women's rights" from the days of Augustus to the present, is described by Eugene A. Hecker (a "pro") in his "Short History of Women's Rights" (Putnam, 1910). Anna H. Shaw, in her "Story of a Pioneer" (Harper), tells of campaigns, early and late, in America. Another American leader's work is told in "Julia Ward Howe and the Woman Suffrage Movement" (Dana Estes, 1913), by her daughter, Florence H. Hall.

The suffragists are well represented by Mary Putnam Jacobi's "'Common Sense' Applied to Woman Suffrage" (Putnam, 2nd ed., 1915) and by Carrie Chapman Catt's compilation, "Woman Suffrage by Federal Constitutional Amendment" (National Woman Suffrage Pub. Co., 1917). Helen L. Sumner, the author of "Equal Suffrage" (Harper, 1909), made an investigation of conditions and results in Colorado, and reports favorably. Josephine Schain's "Women and the Franchise" (McClurg, 1918) is brief; it states the arguments against equal suffrage, but is itself pro-suffrage. "What Women Want" (Stokes, 1914), by Beatrice F.-R. Hale, is "an interpretation of the feminist movement," in which the question of votes occupies only a fraction of the space.

On the other side, should be read Grace D. Goodwin's "Anti-Suffrage; Ten Good Reasons" (Duffield, 1913). A remarkable monograph is Sir Almroth Wright's "The Unexpurgated Case Against Woman Suffrage" (Constable, 1913). Molly Elliot Seawell wrote wittily, on this side of the question, in "The Ladies' Battle" (Macmillan, 1912).

"The Woman Voter" (Stokes, 1918), by Mary Sumner Boyd, is a handbook about the history of the woman-suffrage movement, together with information for the woman voter. Henry St. G. Tucker's "Woman's Suffrage by Constitutional Amendment" (Yale Univ. Press, 1916) is an important legal study; without expressing an opinion of the right or wrong of woman suffrage, he attempts to show that for the country to adopt it in the manner which is now being done is subversive of the spirit of the Constitution. Samuel McC. Crothers's "Meditations on Votes for Women" (Houghton, 1914) is a humorous and pleasing essay.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

296

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 46 New York, Saturday, March 27, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 295

Editorial Articles:

The Wreck of the Treaty 297

Campaign Arguments 299

The Farmers' Questionnaire 299

Kapp's Ballon d'Essai 301

Behind the Financing of China. Part I. By Charles Hodges 302

Experimental Allegiances. Part II. By W. J. Ghent 303

The Transportation Problem in France. By André Rostand 305

Correspondence 306

Book Reviews:

Public Service in the Days of Roosevelt 308

A Modern Greek Poet 309

First Youth 310

The Run of the Shelves 310

Drama:

Arnold Bennett's "Sacred and Profane Love"—John Barrymore in "Richard III." By O. W. Firkins 312

Books and the News: Sea Stories. By Edmund Lester Pearson 314

HAD we not grown so accustomed to the idea, the situation in which the country finds itself with the treaty's failure in the Senate would be regarded as intolerable. No practicable way of arriving at a real settlement is in sight. A mere declaration that the war is over would leave everything at loose ends, even if it could be made effective without the consent of the President, which is at least doubtful. The one resource which does remain open is a return of the treaty to the Senate by the President, with a suggestion from him of some basis upon which ratification may be obtained. But it seems certain that Mr. Wilson entertains no thought of doing anything of the kind. It is still in his power, however, by a single stroke to reëstablish himself in the regard of those who so short a time ago were his devoted admirers, and to win the approbation of millions of others. All he has to do is to recognize the duty which circumstances place upon him. If he should rise to the occasion now, nobody will begrudge him the satisfaction of claiming that he was right all along, that he had fought to the last ditch for what he held to be essential, and that, in accepting less at last, he was yielding only to the compulsion of absolutely demonstrated necessity.

ON the evidence presented, the jury at Grand Rapids promptly brought in a verdict of guilty against Senator Newberry and sixteen of the leading agents in the collection and expenditure of the funds used to procure his election. The result is of the highest public importance as an example of the powerlessness of wealth and social standing and political influence to paralyze the arm of justice. Judge Sessions imposed upon Senator Newberry and two others the maximum penalty of two years in the penitentiary and $10,000 fine. The verdict was based on conspiracy to violate the law imposing a specific limit on allowable expenditure. Senator Newberry's complicity was established by letters over his own signature to the manager of his campaign, showing that he had full knowledge of the large sums used, and gave constant advice as to their expenditure. A stay of sixty days was granted, within which papers will be prepared for an appeal. The case will be fought on the validity of the law itself, and not on the question of its violation. The possible escape of the present defendants on some technical defect in the legislation under which they were convicted would only deepen the public feeling that the expenditure of money to control the results of primaries and elections needs stringent regulation.

THE newspapers have given only fragmentary reports of the evidence in the case. Enough has been printed, however, to show that the wealth of Mr. Newberry himself, his family, and his friends was lavishly used in violation of the law and of political decency. This is not to say that Senator Newberry reached his seat by what is usually denominated as bribery. But we are coming to realize that less visibly criminal forms of attaining one's ends in politics may be more corrupting, more dangerous to the safety of the state, than direct bribery. The expenditure of large sums of money in election campaigns is not wrong merely because there happens to be a law setting a comparatively low limit, and establishing a penalty for its transgression. The moral condemnation of the practice was emphatic and general long before it found its way into the statute books. It is practically impossible to keep such lavish expenditure free from actual bribery, but even if this could be done there is ample reason for restriction. To allow the man of wealth to spend without limitation is to put a tremendous handicap on the man of small means who aspires to public office.

ACCORDING to the Freeman, which made its initial bow to the reading public last week, the one far-off divine event into which mankind is to evolve, with the husks of political organization stripped away, is to be simply "the idea of Society." The aristocratic state has passed, the middle-class state is hurrying towards the brink; the proletarian state is coming, but not to stay. In fact, the very word stay is an offense to the whole scheme of modern progress. Did not Cicero appeal to Jupiter *Stat*or to stay the hand of Catiline and his fellow progressives in their efforts to change the e*stab*lished order of the Roman republic? Why centre our politics around an old Græco-Roman root like that, with all kinds of reactionary ideas clinging to it? Let us away with things static, and give full swing to the kinetic. The mere "idea of Society," uncorseted by stays of any description, is certainly fluid enough to make of life no dull museum of the magna chartas, constitutions and other establishments of the past, but one grand movie, with no police regulations, no censor, no war tax, and no reserved seats. Doubtless the architects will be able to arrange some plan by which each and all of us may have the very best seat, the one thing necessary to save the stateless future from that friction of inequality supposed to be fatal to any possible form of state.

NEITHER the Danes nor the Germans are satisfied with the results of the plébiscite in Slesvig. The former are bitterly disappointed by their defeat in the Second Zone, which includes the important town of Flensburg; the Germans, on the other hand, complain of the inclusion within the First Zone of such preponderantly German towns as Tondern, where the vote was 2,385 for Germany and 733 for Denmark, and of Hoyer, where 581 German and 219 Danish votes were cast. The German Government has presented a note to the Plébiscite Commission demanding a frontier line which would leave a section including these towns and some territory belonging to Flensburg's hinterland to Germany, and in Denmark a strong chauvinistic movement is on foot for a Danish Flensburg, in spite of an overwhelming majority having voted against incorporation with Denmark. The plébiscite as a panacea for frontier disputes is sadly discredited by this experiment, which leaves both parties dissatisfied and insisting on a revision.

THE refusal of England and France to recognize Prince Feisal as King of Syria has promptly been answered by the new monarch with the declaration of a boycott against countries occupying territory of Arabs. The British policy of encouraging a Pan-Arab propaganda was an excellent weapon against the Turk when military forces could not be spared in sufficient numbers to defeat him without the aid of his rebellious subjects; but now the rebels, being subjects of the Turk no longer, are naturally disinclined to acknowledge themselves subjects of any Western Power. "Freedom and independence are rights of Syria," proclaim the posters displayed on the walls of Damascus; and the Arab's origin from Ishmael, "more ancient than Moses, Christ, or Mohammed," buttresses his claim to these rights. Without strong reinforcements it will be difficult for France to maintain her position of mandatory Power, but it is doubtful whether, at the present juncture, with Germany in a turmoil, she will be able to spare any troops. For a country so exhausted, and deprived of a large percentage of its manhood, it seems a dangerous policy to sacrifice its energy, badly needed for reconstruction at home, to a scheme of colonial expansion. Winston Churchill admitted in the House of Commons the impossibility of policing Mesopotamia permanently at the cost of at least $15,000,000 a year. How, then, could France afford to keep up her protectorate over a country which strongly objects to being protected? But Churchill has suggested a remedy for this high cost of colonial living: as a modern Prospero he will send out his Ariels to guard, in inexpensive flight, the old Garden of Eden.

NO merchant fleet has suffered severer losses during the war than that of France. They amount to 930,355 tons, or 40 per cent. of pre-war tonnage. The Compagnie de Navigation sud-Atlantique, in a recent publication, gives a very pessimistic view of the country's chances of recovering its sea-trade. Only by purchasing, at fabulous prices, old or badly built wooden ships, has France been able somewhat to make up for her loss. But neither the number nor the seaworthiness of these new acquisitions suffices to enable the country to compete with its allies and the neutrals in the conquest of the world-market. The import of the chief necessaries of life is carried on largely by foreign freighters, for which the country has to disburse an annual amount of four billion francs to foreign steamship companies. Experts estimate the country's need of tonnage at 5½ million tons, which is about twice the amount before the war. No wonder the French press insists on retention of the 500,000 tons of German ships now in the hands of the French Government, of 200,000 of which the Wilson-George agreement would deprive the French.

IN his able criticism of Keynes and Dillon in last week's issue of the Review, Professor Lovejoy expresses the belief that "M. Clemenceau seems to have fought with all his skill, resourcefulness and pertinacity" for the French demand that all German territory on the left bank of the Rhine should be separated from the German Empire. As the former French Premier is held responsible by common opinion for all the demands which, though but partly conceded, have made the Versailles peace an execrable document to the Keyneses and Dillons, it seems only fair to M. Clemenceau that a different version of his share in the proceedings with regard to this point of vital interest should be brought to the knowledge of our readers. Stéphane Lauzanne, the chief editor of the Matin, vouches for the truth of this diverging account. Foch and Poincaré, according to him, were advocates of the Rhine as the strategic frontier. "Foch wrote his eloquent memorandum of January 10, 1919, which could not be suppressed; Poincaré composed an admirable note, which can not be suppressed for good, and will, one day, have to be published." But he demanded that it should, at least, be handed to Wilson and Lloyd George. They refused to concede it, "and," exclaims Lauzanne, "how could they be expected not to refuse, seeing that the French delegation shared their standpoint! In vain Poincaré addressed a personal letter to Wilson and Lloyd George to win them over to his views. But how many letters would he have had to write to convince Clemenceau, Pichon, and even Tardieu!" Only Tardieu let himself be persuaded, at last, to change his mind and became an ardent supporter of Foch and Poincaré after his conversion. It was he who, even after France had received, as an alternative guarantee for her security, the promise of special treaties with England and the United States, insisted on a temporary occupation of the Rhineland as a guarantee for the fulfillment of the peace terms by Germany.

IT is very encouraging to be told by the Restaurant Men's Association that the price of food is coming down. From such a source it is so much more encouraging than if the hope were held out, say, by a Government official, or a mere economist. We have noticed that when the dealers in clothes or the dealers in gasoline, or the dealers in anything, say that the price of their commodities is going up, go up it does. As prophets, they never make a mistake. For that reason, when they say that prices are coming down, we are prepared to extend to them, and to them only, the fullest credence.

ANOTHER hopeful sign of the times is given forth by the New York Custom Cutters' Club, which, apparently, is charged with responsibility for setting the styles of men's clothes. Tight-fitting clothes must go, and the easy, natural-fitting coat of pre-war days will be the mode. Since pretty much everybody who is thoroughly honest and of good taste is still wearing a coat that was made before the war, concerning the lines of which it may at least be said that they are easy, perhaps the decision of the Custom Cutters is just as well.

THE attack of the New York City Commissioner of Accounts on William T. Hornaday, as director of the New York Zoölogical Park, is a matter which deserves the attention of every lover of wild life. If the Commissioner has found points in which the account-keeping of the Park could be improved, no one who knows the character of Mr. Hornaday will doubt that a proper presentation of them would receive respectful and immediate attention from him. But the tone and substance of the attack bears every mark of a desire to remove the Bronx Zoölogical Garden from the care of the New York Zoölogical Society and throw it into the hopper of city politics. This would not only strike a heavy blow at the value of the "Zoo" itself, as a place of recreation and education for the millions of New York City, but would seriously cripple the working facilities of a man who has done perhaps more than any other man that ever lived to promote an intelligent interest in wild life, and secure both legislative and private measures for its protection. It is inconceivable that public sentiment will allow the wolves of spoils politics to drive William T. Hornaday out of the "Zoo."

"I FOUND myself deeply interested," said Professor McAndrew Cantlie, "in the present effort to socialize the traffic in New York's Fifth Avenue. I regret that I had not more time in which to study its manifold bearings. It was at once plain to me, however, that whatever significance they might have in the troubled lives of the drivers of motor cars, the complicated system of lights and other signals possessed no interest for mere pedestrians. The pedestrians, indeed, do not even need to watch the incredibly numerous policemen who are strategically disposed along the thoroughfare. The pedestrian is watched by the policeman; and let him so much as start to cross the street when, as it were, he would be moving out of his turn, and a vigilant officer firmly and promptly restores him to an insecure footing on the edge of a crowded curb. When at a signal the vigilance of the police relaxed, the crowd streamed across the avenue with an unwonted sense of utter safety. At that moment—it seemed to be perfectly understood by those who were managing the game, but it most certainly was not understood by the crowd—the motors turning from Forty-second street into the Avenue began to crash into them. It was most interesting to see the crowd endeavoring, and not always with perfect success, to recover its blunted sense of individual responsibility. Here," said the Professor, "I fear we have the perfect type and example of paternalism."

The Wreck of the Treaty

WHEN President Wilson laid the Treaty of Versailles before the Senate, he knew, and all the country knew, that there would be a more or less serious struggle over its ratification, and that this would turn entirely on the issue of the League of Nations. It soon became apparent, too, that the lines would be drawn not upon acceptance or rejection of the League, but upon the issue of reservations designed to lessen the force of some of the obligations involved in the treaty, especially those contained in Article X. That the treaty would be accepted in some form was not only the almost universal wish and hope, but the almost universal expectation, of the people of the United States. A large proportion of them desired it because of their high hopes of the League as a permanent preventive of war; and all of them, with the exception of a small though not an unimportant contingent, desired it because rejection of the League meant rejection of the treaty, and rejection of the treaty meant failure of the United States to do its share in the restoration of the world. It was felt that even any considerable delay in the completion of the settlement would be a calamity of appalling magnitude, with Europe in the throes both of revolutionary upheaval and of dire economic distress.

In those first days of the treaty debate, the gloomiest of pessimists would not have dared to forecast the actual story which these nine months have presented. We have lived through month after month of dreary wrangling, relieved by hardly a single inspiring feature, and ending in melancholy failure. For this failure, while there have been many causes, President Wilson must bear incomparably the heaviest load of responsibility. He chose to adopt from the beginning, and to maintain to the end, the attitude of one who was not called upon either to pay a decent respect to the opinions of those who differed with him in judgment, or to take into serious account the power of those who, in the exercise of their Constitutional functions, were in a position to defeat his purpose. From the first moment to the last, it seems never to have occurred to him that the higher that purpose was, the more imperatively was the duty laid upon him of striving for it, not by staking everything on a gambler's chance of winning by sheer obstinacy, but by adopting such a course as was reasonably calculated to attain so much of it as could be attained. No plea of high ideals can avail to absolve him from the guilt of having failed in that clear duty. How lamentably he did fail, a calm retrospect suffices to show.

For the outstanding feature of the whole story is that the President's hold on public sentiment has steadily diminished, from week to week, from month to month. He started out with the advantage of that almost unanimous desire for a speedy settlement to which we have referred. Moreover, his party in the Senate was solidly behind him, while the opposing party was split into three sharply marked divisions. The "mild reservationists" showed, in those early days, more anxiety in behalf of the treaty than in behalf of their reservations. These reservations themselves were couched in language which carefully avoided all appearance of unfriendliness to the broad purposes of the League. It was evident that what these men offered, and offered at the cost of arraying themselves against their party's leaders, was the utmost that could be attained. Some of the most ardent advocates of the League of Nations—men who had been devoted to the idea of it long before Mr. Wilson had taken it up—recognized this at once; others of them, like Mr. Taft, recognized it before long. The President had absolutely no reason for believing otherwise. Had he felt that sense of responsibility for the result which marks the true statesman—yes, the true man—he would have welcomed the aid of the "mild reservationists." He might not have accepted their proposal; he might have fought for more, so long as there was any hope for more; but he would have exhibited a certain degree of friendliness to those who were striving to save all they could of his programme. Instead of that, he left them out in the cold; the Democratic Senators, acting under his directions, refused to enter into any kind of understanding with them; in a word, the only hopeful element in the whole situation was deliberately reduced to a nullity.

We have said that the President had "absolutely no reason" for thinking that the treaty could be put through without reservations. In one sense this statement is not altogether correct. He did have one reason, which to his peculiar type of mind was sufficient. He thought that he could swing the country into line in a whirlwind speaking tour. No amount of experience seems to suffice to pry this notion of personal omnipotence out of Mr. Wilson's head. His speaking tour did not fail because of his physical breakdown. It was a pitiful failure from the beginning. And it was to the credit of the American people that it was a failure. Long before he began the tour, it had become manifest that the people had come to realize that there were serious reasons for misgiving about the country pledging itself unreservedly to so momentous a departure from its traditions as was involved in Article X. Instead of meeting the actual difficulties of this question Mr. Wilson simply dug himself in. Exhortation, denunciation, assertion—these were the staple of his speeches. They rested essentially on the assumption that whoever opposed his programme was actuated either by a low standard of public morality or by partisan or personal malice; and at the end of his speechmaking the League was weaker than at the beginning of it.

Apart from all this, however, the last trace of possible doubt as to the character of the situation was removed when the Senate voted on ratification four months ago. There might still be differences of opinion on specific points; but that the treaty could not be adopted without substantial reservations was then proved beyond peradventure. The President would still have been justified, nevertheless, in an endeavor to have the reservations made as inoffensive as possible; but not a finger did he stir in this direction. When he emerged from his long silence in his Jackson-Day letter, he dashed all the hopes of the friends of the treaty by adhering to his position of no compromise. In his very last word—his recent letter to Senator Hitchcock—he went even further than ever before by explicitly putting upon the mild reservationists the same brand as upon those who had been responsible for the most obnoxious proposals. The consequence has been not only the defeat of the treaty, but a practically unopposed course for a miscellaneous assortment of mischievous proposals such as the preposterous reservation concerning Irish independence. When all proposals are indiscriminately doomed to futility, there can be little energy in the effort to save the best and reject the worst. How different the result would have been if the President had not laid his paralyzing touch upon the situation may unhesitatingly be inferred from the fact that, even as it was, one-half of the Democratic Senators felt it their duty to vote for the treaty with all the sins of the Lodge programme, and more besides, on its head.

We do not by any means wish to absolve others of their share of the blame. Senator Lodge has shown himself neither a large-minded statesman nor a competent party leader; and he has given countenance to many abominable moves in the game. On the Democratic side there has been a lamentable want of manly self-assertion. In the face of a responsibility so awful in its nature that one might have hoped it would call forth on all sides a loftiness of spirit and a largeness of mind befitting the occasion, there has been a long succession of petty manœuvres. But the situation of others was complicated by the fact of divergencies to be reconciled or combinations to be effected; upon the President alone there rested a clear and simple duty and an undivided responsibility. The responsibility he shouldered with unhesitating assurance; but to the duty he has been consistently and perversely blind.

Campaign Arguments

ONE consideration must have tempted even the "irreconcilables" to yield on the treaty. The thought of the campaign arguments, with the treaty still an issue, is horrible to contemplate. An indication of what they will be like, even when prosecuted on a supposedly high plane, is given by Mr. Walter Lippmann's attack on General Leonard Wood in the New Republic.

Two laudatory volumes on General Wood gave Mr. Lippmann his chance. A part of this material was fair game, no doubt, though even here Mr. Lippmann shows himself to be a pretty old young man in taking exception to the use as argument of certain details which were calculated to catch the admiration of youth. For, other things being equal, Wood's athletic prowess at college and his marked success in organizing college teams might be supposed to excite approval. Truly, our youth have rapidly aged if they now regard the captain of the football team as quite like other mortals! Not so long ago even old men were rather pleased to remember Teddy's skill as a boxer and the fact that he had once floored a big bully in the primitive West.

The point would not be worth stressing if it were not involved in the broad implications of Mr. Lippmann's arguments. It unfortunately tends to discredit the advantages of vigorous manhood and carries the reader back to that whole body of doctrine sponsored by the phrase "too proud to fight." Is one of the best American instincts to be challenged anew during the campaign?

One is not pleased, either, by Mr. Lippmann's polite sneer at General Wood's proud American ancestry. In biographies it is fitting to introduce facts of birth and antecedents, and Mr. Lippmann's singling out of these for criticism reminds one of the recent tendency of representatives of other races in this country to minimize the Anglo-Saxon strain and traditions. Of such urgency is the cause of internationalism!

These are preliminary details. What matters in the writer's argument is General Wood's qualifications for President. After listening to perfunctory praise of his work in Cuba, which is shown to signify little as to his possibilities as a statesman, we are permitted the conclusion: he has not been "an administrator by voluntary coöperation like Hoover." Waiving the established fact that Wood had remarkable success in obtaining the good will of the Cubans, Mr. Lippmann's comparison can not pass without challenge. If he is referring to Mr. Hoover in his capacity as United States Food Administrator, his remark ill befits one who has for some years preached the supreme power of economics in regulating world affairs. While we do not wish to detract one jot of the praise due to Mr. Hoover, it is only fair to recognize that with his hand on the great food reservoirs of this country he held over Europe a weapon mightier than a general's sword.

"For the ulterior objects of this war he [Wood] cared nothing in particular, but for war, efficiently and triumphantly conducted, he cared a great deal. Roosevelt and he focused and organized sentiment chiefly among the upper strata of society in the big cities, in the colleges, and among the intellectuals. The mass of the people they did not convert—that was done by the President with his democratic formulas." There is a curious upsidedownness in Mr. Lippmann's reasoning. He contends, in effect, that the persons of presumably higher intelligence drew upon their instincts in order to see the light; whereas the masses were not convinced until vouchsafed the Fourteen Points. Which is to say that a farmer in Kansas withheld his son until assured that Albania was to be freed and Poland guaranteed access to the sea! What the upper strata saw and felt was, of course, the outrage perpetrated upon civilization. To infer that they had no hope of a better order of things coming out of the war is merely stupid. Stricter logic would have made Mr. Lippmann see that what the President really did was to confuse simple persons by setting their minds at work on the details of the future world settlement when they should have been focused on the central issue of right and wrong. To admonish us to be neutral in our thoughts on a question upon which no right-minded, discerning person could possibly be neutral tended to delay a popular judgment which any leader with his heart in the cause might have obtained promptly.

But to hold Mr. Lippmann down to strict logic would be hardly fair. Our new President is to be an executive in a "new world" in which even logic may be supposed to show new manifestations. What qualities he should have is not clear even to the radicals. The Nation, also a "new worlder," condemns the New Republic's choice, Mr. Hoover, because he is not what he professes to be, a "progressive independent." He is not progressive, it seems, because he clings to those hoary institutions, private ownership of railroads and competition in industry. If a man with "progressive" ideas is desired, let it be remembered that Mr. Wilson had those in abundance. One of the real dangers just now is the fact that the world is deluged with ideas, most of them too unwieldy for mortals' brains. The man of the hour is he who can reorient us safely and solidly. It is well for the chances of Hoover and Wood that they do not measure up to, or down to, the tests implied by Mr. Lippmann's campaign arguments.

The Farmers' Questionnaire

ONE is somewhat at a loss, these days, without a Who's Who of farmers' organizations. Here, as elsewhere, one has to be on the lookout for camouflage, for it is no more true that everyone who wears the "blue jeans" has ever held the plow handle than that every American girl who walks the streets of Lucerne with a rucksack slung over her shoulder and an alpenstock in her hand has climbed, or intends to climb, Pilatus. We have no reason to suppose, however, that the National Board of Farm Organizations, which has drawn up a questionnaire for presidential candidates, does not have its roots actually in the outdoor soil, rather than in some politician's private hothouse.

The questions which these men have put are conveyed with no offensive threat, nor do they involve any temptation to an honest candidate to stultify himself, or sacrifice the interests of the whole, in order to secure the vote of a class. The candidate who does so will not be driven by superior force from without, but will be displaying his own inherent instinct for the demagogue's way of approach. The candidates are first asked to pledge themselves to work towards a more direct dealing between farmers and consumers, both sides to share in the resultant saving from undue expenses between farm and kitchen. There is no demand to abolish the middleman altogether, no railing at him as always and everywhere a profiteer, but merely a reasonable proposal to cut down intermediate expenses by such means as may be found available. The second point aims to secure to all farmers and consumers "the full, free and unquestioned right to organize and to purchase and sell coöperatively." Coöperation is not "socialism," nor is there any denial of the right to private property in the fact that a large number of individuals choose to use a part of their private property in such a combination. In claiming every such movement as an irretraceable advance towards an inevitable "socialism," the advocates of that "ism" do not state a fact, but merely illustrate their lack of mental balance.

The third question pertains to representation of farmers on general boards and commissions in whose membership various interests are recognized, even though the work involved might be only indirectly connected with agriculture. Believing that this was not intended as a mere request for a share in "patronage," we do not believe that any candidate would improve his chances by pledging himself, if elected, to place some man direct from the farm on each and every "general" board or commission constituted during his term. What is wanted is a reasonable consideration of the agricultural interest, wherever directly or indirectly involved, and this can be both promised and delivered without demagoguery or class favoritism. The next question concerns the qualifications of the Secretary of Agriculture, and suggests nothing extreme or unwise. In asking for a Secretary "satisfactory to the farm organizations of America," we do not believe that the satisfaction in mind is of the sort referred to when one speaks of a Democratic revenue collector at the port of New York, or a Republican postmaster in Philadelphia, as "satisfactory to the organization." The request for an investigation of "the great and growing evil of farm tenancy, so that steps may be taken to check, reduce, or end it," may well have an affirmative reply, without committing the candidate to the assertion or belief that tenant farming is always an evil. The real evil is the descent from ownership to tenancy; but tenancy is sometimes an intermediate station for men moving in the opposite direction.

We are not quite certain just what is referred to in the question whether the candidate will work to secure to coöperative organizations of farmers engaged in interstate commerce "service and supplies equal in all respects to those furnished to private enterprises under like circumstances"; but all right-thinking men should agree that the federal power ought to prevent discrimination of the kind, if it exists, at any point falling within its jurisdiction. The candidate is further asked whether he will favor the reopening of the railroad question "if at the end of two years of further trial of private ownership the railroads fail to render reasonably satisfactory service." We do not take it that the men who drew up this question meant to say, "Satisfactory service within two years, or Government ownership!" The candidate who should pledge himself to a hard and fast programme of that kind would hardly find that he had sensed the present temper of American farmers as a class.

"Will you use your best efforts to secure the payment of the war debt chiefly through a highly graduated income tax, or otherwise, by those best able to pay"? Here is a question on which a candidate might easily trip himself up, if at all inclined to be a demagogue in matters of taxation. A graduated income tax may be a reasonable recognition of varying degrees of ability to aid in bearing the public burdens; on the other hand, it may be a vicious attempt to hit at wealth merely as wealth. We predict that the candidate who is not afraid to call attention to this truth, and to pledge himself only to what shall appear fair and wise, will have no trouble with the farmer. The candidate who will not pledge himself, in accordance with the next question, to uphold the policy of the conservation of our natural resources and to work for some effective check to deforestation, will have trouble with others as well as farmers. Any right-minded candidate can also afford to pledge himself to do his best to secure and enforce "effective national control over the packers and other great interstate combinations of capital engaged in the manufacture, transportation, or distribution of food and other farm products and farmers' supplies." The Board of Farm Organizations wisely refrain from setting forth a detailed programme of legislation for this purpose. All they ask is a candidate determined to make as effective as possible a course of action to which the Government has long been committed.

And finally, "Will you respect and earnestly try to maintain the right of free speech, free press, and free assembly?" There is no assertion here that these rights have no limitation. Any candidate may well say to the American farmer, "I will go as far as you, perhaps even a little farther, in granting, under the head of the rights mentioned, anything that does not strike dangerously at the moral health of civilized society, or the continued existence of orderly government." The revolutionary radical will give the farmer up as hopeless when he reads this questionnaire; and herein the Review finds justification for the belief which it has expressed more than once, that the American farmer is, as a rule, a makeweight on the side of stable progress.

Kapp's Ballon d'Essai

FROM the various, often contradictory, reports that have reached us from several parts of Germany, one important fact stands out sufficiently clear to admit of some tentative conclusions being drawn from it as to future developments. The failure of Dr. Kapp and his associates to maintain the power which they had seized without any apparent difficulty was not due to their Government being paralyzed by the general strike or the refusal of the Reichsbank to honor their orders for money. They failed because of the freezing lack of response from the bulk of the nation. Even the immediate success of the coup, obtained without bloodshed, could not rouse the people to an impulsive declaration of loyalty to the new Government. On that the usurpers had reckoned, and realizing, after four days of anxious expectancy, that their calculation had been wrong, they saw no other way out than to surrender. More amazing than the briefness of their rule is that ignorance of the people's real state of mind which made their misreckoning possible. Prussian officialdom, trained to a high degree of efficiency in working the state machine, has always ignored the human elements of will and passion that generate the power by which the mechanism is driven. The bureaucrat Wolfgang Kapp imagined that, as soon as the expert officials of the old régime had resumed their posts at the machines in the state's engine-room, the business would revive and prosper as before. That the generating station would supply the power was to them a matter of course.

It would be over-hasty to conclude from the events of last week that the German nation has finished with monarchism and is, for good and all, republican in conviction and sentiment. Two other causes account for its having turned a cold shoulder to the herald of the restoration: the general apathy and mental lassitude prevailing among all classes except the extreme wings of Communists and "Kaiser-treuen," who, being the opposition parties, are stimulated by hatred and by hope of an upheaval; and, more important still, the lack of political thinking in the average German citizen, which makes him slow to act in a crisis of this kind. The old régime taught its subjects not to reason but to obey, and so long as their material welfare was secure they little objected to a rule which spared them the mental difficulty of choosing and deciding for themselves. But now that prosperity is gone, and with it their absolute confidence in the wisdom and infallibility of those in power, they have turned skeptical and despondent, and are helpless because of that lack of political training which is their heritage from the old régime. One circumstance only could have induced the bulk of the nation to acclaim the Government of Kapp and Von Lüttwitz: its lasting success. But as this success could not be secured by force of arms, but was itself dependent on the support of the people, the enterprise ran a fruitless course in a vicious circle.

The daring coup of the extreme right having ended in disaster, the extreme left is likely to pluck the fruits of its failure. The Independents are not strong enough to seize power, but they possess the means to make the resumption of it by Herr Ebert's Government a difficult task. The general strike, employed by the Majority Socialists as a weapon against the usurping Government, was turned by the Independents against the lawful one. The agreement between Ebert and the Federation of Trade Unions is an undeniable surrender to the Independents. The immediate socialization of all industries, involving, of course, the nationalization of the coal and potash syndicates, is a far-reaching concession to make for a Government in which both the Centre and the German Popular party have their representatives. It is to be seen whether these bourgeois parties will give their sanction to the compromise. The wisest course for them would be to accept it without demur, as their rupture with the Majority Socialists would cause the latter to swing still farther to the radical left and help to strengthen the forces of Independents and Communists.

The French may be right in distrusting the official German reports of Communist risings as a means of frightening the Entente into concessions as to the number of troops that the Empire may retain. Noske's excuse for tarrying with the reduction of the army is far from convincing. The real danger is not in the local successes of scattered Communist forces, but in a development of the political situation which should leave the Majority Socialists no other choice than to compromise with the German section of the Third Internationale. And in a compromise between opportunists and doctrinairians experience suggests that it is the former who give and the latter who take.

The failure of the reactionary coup d'état has not resulted, therefore, in a firmer reëstablishment of the Ebert régime. It has regained power at the risk of its stability. It vacillates towards the radical left, and not only the Communists but also the reactionaries will see their advantage in unsettling it still further. The reaction would see its time arrive when undiluted Socialism had make the nation realize the stern blessings of the proletariat's rule. That the late coup is to remain the only attempt of the old régime to return to power is very unlikely. The ballon d'essai, which probably Ludendorff sent up, with Dr. Kapp and von Lüttwitz as pilots, will doubtless be followed by better-equipped political aircraft when the clouds that darken the nation's destiny bring on the storm in which it can secretly manœuvre to better advantage.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Behind the Financing of China

(IN FOUR PARTS—PART ONE)

THE consummation of a $20,000,000 gold loan to China by the Allied banking groups brings to the fore the most dangerous situation in the East to-day.

China's economic potentialities at the present time are greater than those of any other country. Yet the Chinese Republic constitutes a tremendous international liability, instead of being a stabilizing asset in a war-stained world; the blame for a state of affairs where her expenditures exceed her income by $100,000,000 annually lies between China herself and the frenzied finance of the Powers. For some time now, this deficit has been an almost fatal overload, eating up the country's resources and thwarting its development. From the first foreign obligations incurred in 1875 to the deluge of Japanese loans recklessly resorted to for running expenses during the Great War, the Chinese people have been the victims of hard international circumstances and have seen one burden after another piled upon them at the most difficult period in their four thousand years of national life.

Take it as you will, China is no longer a going concern. Almost too late, the Powers have become cognizant of conditions which threaten the peace of the world; foreign offices, it is now clear, realize that only far-reaching efforts on their part can save us from developments in the East as extensive as the breakdown of Russia.

Internally, China's position has been like that of an ancient business house using until recently obsolete methods and forced to compete with establishments running on the costs system and scientific management. Up to the Manchu conquest, the Chinese Emperors had somehow made both ends meet by levying what they could and expending what conditions obliged them to disburse. The complicated system of taxation operative during the Manchu régime accomplished little more, yet it was sufficient until the T'aiping Rebellion ravaged the heart of the Empire and tried China's resources to the limit at the moment (in the 'fifties) when the Western nations were resorting to force of arms to open the country to foreign intercourse. This initiated a series of calamities most costly to China. The war with Japan in 1894-95 carried in its wake the Boxer Outbreak of 1900, to be followed in 1911 by the Chinese Revolution and the fall of the Manchu dynasty. Republican China tried to get itself on a business basis in 1912, but ran into domestic difficulties which the Great War aggravated by its flare-back on the Orient.

Along with this went a saddling of the country with external obligations. The Chino-Japanese War left costs aggregating more than $375,000,000 gold. With this came the scramble of the Powers for "concessions," as a result of the conviction that China's hour of partition had arrived; the Boxer troubles were the direct product of the vicious circle of demands made on China for "spheres of interest," as European diplomats euphemistically called the process of provisional dismemberment. The cost to the Chinese for the rash popular protest was a new series of loans to cover an indemnity of $337,500,000. Coincidently, the Powers employed their financial diplomacy to obtain railway loans, aggregating $230,000,000, and to develop strategic ends in China.

These years saw the European rivalries which culminated in the Great War playing their part in the economic conflict of the Far East. While diplomacy had its hands full with the frictions in the West, China's troubles were naturally left unconsidered. After all, they were assets in the hands of European statesmen, and we were too detached from the game to count. European statesmen eagerly followed the leads of their foreign offices. United States bankers really played no large part, because they had neither that capability which comes from experience nor the continuous diplomatic support necessary to essay such an international financial rôle as the situation demanded if China's spoliation was to be stopped.

It was laissez-faire with a vengeance in China, haphazard financing subordinated to state purposes of a dubious sort. The sum-total of all this has put China under the following burden:

Debt outstanding from Japanese War, 1894	$ 150,000,000
Indemnity of 1900	240,000,000
Communications Loans	200,000,000
Japanese Loans during Great War	300,000,000
General Loans	225,000,000
Short Term Loans	85,000,000
	$1,200,000,000

The service of this debt, sinking fund and interest charges, costs China about $56,000,000 annually, or more than half of the deficit confronting her. Though China's running expenses have been met in part by borrowed capital, throughout all her troubles she has met her foreign obligations without default. But so far as the national balance-sheet is concerned, she is on the verge of bankruptcy.

China, however, is too large and too important a country to permit of a receivership in the interests of any one Power or group of Powers. In comparison with her tangible resources, China is not insolvent but in need of large-scale reorganization. The fact that she has in the past raised funds from every possible source on every kind of security at exorbitant rates does not mean desperate need and low security. Neither is the payment to reputable bankers of a commission of 6 to 9 per cent. on national loans the sign of failing credit. The truth is, as might be suspected from a glance at the list of external obligations, that China has been milked by the predatory finance of the Powers. It has been the drive of the Government-backed pound sterling, ruble, and franc; the yen diplomacy, the dollar diplomacy, which has cornered China.

What but the fears of Manchester steel mills and Osaka spinning interests for their foreign markets has made them invoke every diplomatic means to strangle China's infant industries? What nations, down to 1918, balked every Chinese attempt to secure more revenue, vetoing every plan to increase the five per cent. tariff arranged by treaty sixty years ago, though the enumerated articles increased more than four times and the volume of trade eighteen? What interests at the Shanghai Conference in 1918 made every attempt to prevent even a nominal increase in tariff revenue? It was the same forces which have made China at every turn, thanks to international high finance, accept the most onerous banking terms on record.

With the exception of Japan, these interests have overplayed their hands, for none of them can afford to have a foreclosure on China carried out. Largely responsible for China's international straits to-day because of the handicaps placed on her by them in the past, the Powers are now turning to the problem of salvaging their capital investments on a scale which would not have been necessary had there ever been constructive finance in the East. The Frankenstein of their greed frightens them.

They see a region greater than Europe still lacking the needed trunk lines, for the political railways now serving parts of China are disconnected systems personifying the national interests behind them from couplings to goods vans and bridge spans. They see a country with a population over three times that of the United States possessing but the railroad mileage of California; in China there are 107,000 people for every mile of railway built, while in the United States it is 3,800 people to each mile of line. Wheat at eleven cents a bushel exists in China's west, whereas a thousand miles away, on the lower Yangtsze, millions starve. There is not a mile of railway operating in Szechuan, a Province exceeding pre-war Germany in size, population, and basic natural wealth.

It is recognized that constructive financial coöperation in China must succeed the former practices of international bankers, who hunted in a pack only because it was easier to crowd China and then divide the spoil. Transportation and production are the foundations of the modern state; it is the problem of the new finance to bring these to China. The financial stabilizing of China means the end of maladministration aided and abetted for diplomatic objectives; then the Land Tax, which now yields $90,000,000, will increase to five times that sum; the Wine and Tobacco Administration, it is estimated, can equal the reorganized Salt Administration's $70,000,000; and so on down the list.

Just two nations are in a position to furnish the sinews for this financial renovation of China. It is a question whether Japanese yen and American dollars will devote themselves to a decade of reconstructive coöperation or will prefer to bring China into a new welter of financial imperialism.

CHARLES HODGES

Experimental Allegiances

(IN TWO PARTS—PART TWO)

GROUP Autonomy is hardly the fearsome thing darkly hinted by Mr. Lippmann. As an idea it is sufficiently heretical and revolutionary to provide ecstatic thrills for the most ardent parlor radical; but as a movement or tendency with an appreciable threat to democracy it awakens few tremors of alarm. It has had its day, even among the trade-unions of France. Certainly the I. W. W. have built their structure and doctrines around the idea; and it goes without saying that the I. W. W. are generally regarded as a menace. But it is not because of the idea itself that they are so regarded; it is because of their proneness to certain pluralistic activities such as the starting of bogus free-speech fights, the destruction of hop-fields, the wrecking of buildings, and the breaking up of trade-unions. Though over these activities the New Republic and the Nation are now and then wont to shed the halo of indulgent toleration, to the general public they are unendurable and call for suppression.

Group Autonomy is as Group Autonomy does. Under the apostleship of Kropotkin it took on the seeming of a vague but not unbeautiful dream. Under Johann Most it carried a fiery message of universal revolt; and the days of Most, though many, were full of trouble. Under Emma Goldman, the least intellectual but one of the most energetic and aggressive of its prophets, it lapsed into quite unintelligible vagueness; and, needless to say, it was not her group-autonomistic pleas that brought her into conflict with the law. Group Autonomism may be, as Mr. Lippman avers, a "powerful heresy," but unless its propaganda is accompanied by certain overzealous incitements and activities, the "heresy-hunters" of Mr. Lippman's apprehension are unlikely to set up the hue and cry.

For the thing has never, since mankind grew out of it, taken an enduring hold. Men do indeed look back upon it, now and then, as upon a long-abandoned home, a sort of universal Zion of the race, which might serve as a refuge from the irksome and troublous present. But this is a matter for the imagination, and not for the workaday world of effort. Sometimes, moreover, for a brief period, the idea inspires a movement; but the reaction follows as the night the day. The one unique opportunity for its translation into the actualities of modern life has been Soviet Russia. One finds there, instead, a rigorous, unitary, political, sovereign state in which autonomous groups have been relentlessly crushed, or, as in the case of the coöperative societies, permitted to live only under a constant persecution. There, if it had something of that vital and persistent force ascribed to it by Mr. Laski, Mr. Croly, and Mr. Lippman, should have been the place of its beginning. It should have triumphed over Bolshevist tyranny and firmly established itself. It was unable to do so, and the unitary state was its victor.

Still, new light may have been brought to bear upon the subject; and here are recondite pages and columns aplenty in which to search out answers to obstinate questionings. Is this pluralism of the state a proposed, a projected thing, or is it an inherent thing somewhat obstructed in the functioning? Mr. Lippmann (N. R., April 14, 1917, p. 316) calls attention to the fact that Mr. Laski has just published a book, "The Problem of Sovereignty," which contains the "courageous assertion that the state is not absolute but plural." I fear that the answer embodies a confusion between is and ought to be, for I find in other places the most severe arraignment of the state as a unitary concern that must give way. But I pass on. How much "dispersion of power" should there be; what degree of federation; what limitation of the power of final decision by a central authority? Further, and most to the point, are there now observable tendencies in the United States toward this "dispersion of power"; toward a loosening of the reins of the central government; toward the creation of autonomous or quasi-autonomous bodies which, federated, may supplant the central authority?

I turn to Mr. Laski. "Even in America," he writes (A. M. S., p. 384), "the classic ground of federal experiment, it is a new federalism that is everywhere developing." He mentions the Federal Reserve System and the Rural Credits Board, and he refers to an article by Mr. Croly in the New Republic for further light. I turn to Mr. Croly (N. R., Dec. 16, 1916, pp. 170-72) and find an article entitled "The Failure of the States." Though it is unsigned, no doubt Mr. Laski knew who wrote it. But what I find herein is, strangely enough, a declaration, not that centralization is declining, but that it is everywhere developing. The article is a severe arraignment of the inefficiency, backwardness, selfishness, capriciousness, irresponsibility, wrongheadedness, "social obscurantism," and corruption, along with a number of minor evils, on the part of the forty-eight American State Governments. Constitutional federalism, it would appear, has broken down. But the outstanding fact is the increasing centralization of power in Washington. "Symptoms of the tendency toward centralization," he writes, "are showing themselves in every region of political activity," and he gives what appear to him to be instances. He is apparently unsatisfied to have the declaration rest upon his own assertion, and so he cites a competent authority. This authority is none other than Mr. Laski. "No wonder," writes Mr. Croly, "an English observer of American political processes inquires, as Mr. Harold J. Laski does, in another column, whether the American democracy is not consenting to the erection in Washington of an ominous and autocratic mechanism of centralized control."

I turn to Mr. Laski, in the same number (pp. 176-78), to find the confirmation of Mr. Croly's statement; and then I turn back to Mr. Croly to find the confirmation, suggested in Mr. Laski's book, of the evidence of the developing "new federalism." The evidence cited is exceedingly tenuous. There is the Federal Reserve System—nothing more—and there follows the prediction that similar bodies are sure to be organized. But the amazing part of this pluralistic argument is the insistence (or seeming insistence) upon central political control. The illuminating passage follows:

> The Federal Reserve system, for instance, combines regional banks, which preserve a sufficient measure of local self-government with central political control. Similar examples of regional independence subject to national determination of general policy will almost certainly be adopted when the work of reorganizing essential national industries, such as the railroads and the food and fuel supplies, are seriously undertaken.

So all the brave words about the "dispersion of power," "the neutralization of the state," "the abdication of sovereignty," "the coördination and federation of allegiances"; the dark hints of the explosive revolutionism in this tremendous new idea —all soften down into an approval of boards and bureaus under the sovereign control of the national state. M. Jourdain has been talking prose all his life without knowing it. If this be Administrative Syndicalism we have most of us been Administrative Syndicalists all our lives. The parlor radical can not but feel that he has been cruelly hoaxed, and that he must transfer his allegiance to some more thrilling proposal.

I turn back to Mr. Laski for further evidence of the "new federalism." He says (A. M. S., pp. 384-85):

> There is a clear tendency upon the part of industrial and professional groups to become self-governing. Legislation consecrates the solutions they evolve. They become sovereign in the sense— which, after all, is the only sense that matters—that the rules they draw up are recognized as the answer to the problems they have to meet. They are obtaining compulsory power over their members; they demand their taxes; they exercise their discipline; they enforce their penal sanctions. They raise every question that the modern federal state has to meet, and their experience is, governmentally, a valuable basis for national enterprise.

So, it appears, you may have it both ways: the extension of administrative service under the control of the sovereign state is Pluralism; and the totally opposite thing, the functioning of bodies which decline to recognize the state (if there be any), is also Pluralism. It is hard to be patient with such a mass of preposterous assertions as are contained in the passage quoted. If Mr. Laski can furnish a single instance of a group that has become self-governing (or is in the way of becoming self-governing) in the sense required by his implication, he will do far more for his argument than by citing innumerable passages of irrelevancy from De Maistre or Lamennais. If he can show how the "consecration of solutions" by legislation is an evidence of coördination of power, he will do yet more for his argument. By a reckless manipulation of words—by the use of "taxes" where he means "dues"; "penal sanctions" where he means "rules regarding fines and suspensions"; "compulsory power" where he means a very restricted control over certain activities in a single field—he has made a showing for autonomism as an existing force. By representing it as a specifically modern phenomenon (which it is not) and as a force which is constantly developing (an assertion exceedingly dubious) he has heightened the picture; and he has capped and crowned it with the statement that these voluntary bodies "raise every question that the modern federal state has to meet." All this is too painfully absurd for comment. But one can not pass this amazing summary without a look at the meaning of the third sentence. If sovereignty, in "the only sense that matters," is the power, for instance, of the trade-union to determine the conditions under which its members will work, then the whole structure of Pluralism as a rival of the existing state cracks and falls into fragments.

I trust that there is more to be said for it than this; for though I hold to the unitary state and am even unable to think of organized society in any other terms, I can yet wish that a theory (or more correctly, a social passion) which has captivated so many beings should be presented at its best that it might be fairly judged. It may be that this theory (or whatever it is to be called) is, as Mr. Lippmann says, "widely and deeply resented." But I choose to think that the resentment has a different object. I think it is directed not at the theory but at the manner of propaganda. A part of the prevalent resentment arises, I fear, from the arrogant and sweeping censure of system, codes, institutions, and individuals in the name and on behalf of the theory by exponents who can not intelligibly explain it even to themselves.

W. J. GHENT

The Transportation Problem in France

THE recent abortive strike of the railroad workers, the second since the signing of the armistice, has once more drawn attention to the transportation problem, one of the gravest confronting the French Government. Since the previous attempt of July 21, 1919, the condition of the railroads has steadily deteriorated, partly through the extension of the personnel with thousands of inefficient hands, partly through the growing lack of rolling stock and coal. A few months after the July strike of last year, the Chamber of Deputies, desirous to avert the spread of Bolshevism by meeting the ever-growing demands of railway men and other industrial workers, passed the eight-hour working-day law, which compelled the railroad companies to increase their personnel by 140,000 men. These had to be recruited from various industries by the lure of high wages, although they were untrained hands who had to be taught their work from the beginning. The experienced staff, moreover, suffering from the strain of four or five years' overwork during the war, gave way to a pardonable longing for leisure and laziness, a natural reaction from the hardships they had bravely withstood in the hour of danger.

The condition of the rolling stock was little better. The pre-war average number of engines under repair amounted to eight per cent.; it has now risen to twenty. The number of passenger cars under repair has gone up from nine to twenty-six per cent., that of freight cars from four to seventeen. The engines which Germany has handed over are mostly out of condition, and the adjustment of American engines to their new work has only recently been accomplished.

As a consequence of this decrease in labor output and lack of rolling stock, several passenger trains had to be taken off. But even that restriction could not bring the freight traffic up to its normal volume. And, which is worse, even if the transportation system could be restored to its efficiency and comprehensiveness of six years ago, it would not answer the requirements of new agricultural and industrial conditions created by the war. A complete reorientation and reorganization is necessary for the railroads to meet the exigencies of entirely altered circumstances.

The destruction, first of all, of the factories in the north and the east of France, a loss which it will take many years to repair, has thrown the currents of traffic out of their accustomed course. The materials which are necessary for a given industry are, in a great many cases, no longer to be found in those parts from which they used to come. The devastated provinces, which formerly were great producers, are only consumers now. And, in the second place, the abnormal proportion between export and import, the former having decreased to the lowest level ever known in the history of France, is another factor which makes for disturbance and disorganization of railroad traffic.

But the gravest problem the railroads have to cope with is the severe lack of coal. Even before the war home production remained far short of the country's needs. Now a great number of mines are ruined, and years will pass before they will have recovered their former productivity. And the output of those mines that can be worked has been considerably reduced by the introduction of the eight-hour working day. Hence France has to import her coal from abroad. But Belgium, where similar abnormal conditions prevail, can not spare her much; the export from Great Britain has been severely curtailed by repeated strikes in the mining districts, and Germany, which, under the terms of peace, had to indemnify France for her ruined pits, has failed up to now to supply the stipulated amount.

As a result of these deplorable economic conditions the railroads are faced by a financial débâcle. The amount of wages paid to their personnel has increased from 800 to 3,000 million francs, their coal expenses, from 350 to 1,500 million francs; the total cost of exploitation from 1,250 to 4,750 million francs. What return can security holders expect for the money invested in a railroad business? Two and a half million Frenchmen have placed their confidence in what, a few years ago, appeared to be a safe investment. Most of these people are small holders, the average amount of their capital thus invested not exceeding 7,000 francs. A railway strike that threatens to ruin outright a by no means prosperous concern in which one of every fifteen Frenchmen is financially interested is, therefore, bound to be unpopular.

The obvious remedy for this precarious situation is to raise the fares. On February 23, a new, greatly increased tariff went into effect. Another effective measure is the priority granted, under the freight-carriage regulations, to essentials such as foodstuffs, agricultural implements, etc. However, these remedies are only makeshifts. The whole system, which is based on a scheme drafted as far back as 1883, no longer answers present exigencies and should be put on quite a different footing. "Nationalize the roads," is the Socialists' cry; whereas the capitalists of the old régime fear nothing but disaster from any change whatever. The country, however, will not listen to either extreme. It looks to M. Noblemaire, one of the new members of the Chamber of Deputies, for a solution of the problem. He is the son of a former manager of the great P. L. M. company; his brother manages the Compagnie des Wagons-Lits, and he himself is on the board of the P. L. M. As he proudly said in the speech in which he unfolded his scheme before the Chamber, he knows what he is talking about. Seldom did the Chamber listen to a speaker so intimately acquainted with the matter under discussion; he made a strong impression on his audience by an absolute freedom from prejudice, by an honest appreciation of modern ideas concerning social coöperation, and by his expert discussion of the remedies for an evil which he has been better situated than any living Frenchman to observe and study closely. M. Noblemaire envisages the fact that the problem is not exclusively economic, but has its moral and social aspects as well. This scheme involves an entire revision of actual conditions. He advocates a strong concentration of the leading organization, together with local decentralization, guarantees granted to the security holders by the state, and coöperation between the managers and the professional syndicates. But it is a long way from the enacting of a new railway law to the blessed state of things which it is meant to inaugurate. Will life, during that long and anxious time, keep on pulsating through the arteries of the country's organism?

ANDRE ROSTAND

Paris, March 4

Correspondence

The Theory of Purchasing Power

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

William James once showed me a review of a book on ethics in a protectionist journal which declared that it was as impossible to construct a theory of conduct without religion as to expect prosperity without a protective tariff. From the bed-rock of the tariff it was possible to reason direct to the Kingdom of God. With like confidence it would seem as if the believer in the quantity theory of money relied on the sacerdotal character of the doctrine that the more money there is in circulation the greater the demand and the higher the level of prices. Believing that this dogma is neither true in principle nor workable in fact, I beg the courtesy of your journal for a brief consideration of the matter.

Purchasing power, either in the offer of money, or of checks drawn on a deposit account (the result of a credit transaction) is the mechanism through which demand operates. But economics knows no doctrine—so far as I am aware—that demand alone determines the price of anything (1). We do have a principle of demand and supply which affects price. In short, buyers may express their desire for an article through effective demand; that is, through acceptable purchasing power; but that is only one-half the problem. The price is also as much—if not more—determined by all the conditions affecting supply (2). When a millionaire contractor wishes a hammer (a type of freely reproducible articles), does he forget the state of the arts, the efficiency of modern industry in producing hammers, and make an offer at a price independent of the production-costs for hammers? (3). If he did, he would soon be out of business. The supply comes forward in competitive industries under conditions affecting expenses of production, such as prices of materials, wages, and taxes. No competent buyer pays more for goods than the price at which his rival can buy, no matter how much credit he has at the bank (4). Just because he is a successful man of wealth and has credit we have the reason why he is likely to know what a fair price should be under existing conditions of supply. What holds the price above a given level at any time is the production-costs (5). Demand and purchasing power are adjusted to them. In fact, demand varies with the price, generally falling off as price rises and increasing as price falls (6). That is, demand is always demand at a price. Production-costs are conditions influencing demand. Does not every one know that to-day, in spite of an intense desire for our goods in Europe, the demand for our exports is falling off because prices as increased by the unfavorable rates of foreign exchange are high?

But, so far, we have had in mind only the great mass of freely reproducible articles. There are goods, however, which can not be quickly supplied as demand varies. Until supply can come forward, a strenuous demand may keep prices above production-costs. This is the explanation of possible profiteering. In such cases, it is not the offer of purchasing power which is dominant in setting the price, but the scarcity of the goods; for as soon as scarcity disappears (even under a strong demand) price falls to some relation to production-costs. Of course, under absolute monopoly, supply has no effect, and demand is decisive. That is what monopoly means. On the prices of such goods changes in the quantity of money and credit are not material.

For sake of brevity, purchasing power has so far been referred to as consisting usually of money. But when loans are made on the sale of staple goods to purchasers, the bank first grants the borrower a deposit account. Thus by a credit operation, A, for instance, selling shoes, has his goods coined into purchasing power. So does B, who is selling clothing; and C, who is selling plows; and so on throughout the whole range of all our industries. That is, A's purchasing power is met by the purchasing power of B, C, . . . Y, Z, offered for A's goods. Therefore, why should A's purchasing power, arising from normal credit, raise the prices of the other's goods when met by an equalizing demand? Demand by normal credit does not come out of the blue against all goods; it is a form of a reciprocal demand of goods for each other, offered through banks and clearing houses. In its essence, normal credit acts only as a medium of exchange like money, and is not an initial cause of demand; it is only a mechanism through which goods coined into a means of payment are exchanged against each other. The initial cause of the demand is the possession of bankable goods.

But the logic of Alice in Wonderland is left far behind by the argument that the more dollars there are the more will be offered for goods. Why a sober business man with large means should suddenly act like a spendthrift and be obliged by some unseen force to expend to-day all the purchasing power he has for such goods as he may at the moment want, is beyond any intelligence but that of Sir Oliver Lodge (7). There is no such impelling economical force. Worst of all, this necessary expenditure of a man's purchasing power is supported by the amazing assumption that because of the competition of purchasers there is no limit to the ensuing rise of prices (8). But what has happened to the competition of sellers and producers? To argue as if prices were fixed solely by buyers is to assume that the whole world of suppliers are sick with influenza or have gone to each other's funerals. To talk as if sellers had no effect on price is to suppose that goods come into existence by incantation or by rubbing Aladdin's lamp (9).

When men can not follow such reasoning, they are supposed to be under the delusion that "gold is a fixed standard of value." In the first place, it is one thing to say that our currency is to-day redeemable in gold, and quite another thing to say that "gold is a fixed standard of value." The latter is impossible, and for a very good reason. Price is the ratio of exchange between any article and a given standard, like gold. A change on either side of this ratio will change price. If the production-costs of steel or shoes increase (because of the rising prices of materials, labor, etc.), their prices will rise; which is the same thing as saying that gold has fallen relatively to steel and shoes. Now the quantity theorists one-sidedly insist that only causes affecting the money side of the price ratio affect prices, utterly oblivious to what happens to the expenses of producing goods. But if driven to this point, they contend that materials and labor could rise in price (and thus raise production-costs) only because there was more money or credit in circulation offered for them. This fallacy, however, entirely ignores the influence of scarcity of materials and labor. I have already dealt with that matter above. Moreover, before we entered the war and before prices rose materially, scarcity conditions caused a higher price for materials and labor. Why ignore the supply side of demand and supply?

Then the curious point is made that, even if production-costs did rise, that "has absolutely nothing to do with the question of the relation between prices and the supply of money" (10). That is, if the question at issue—that only an increase of money raises the price of anything, labor or materials—is granted, then production-costs do not influence the selling prices of goods (11). Of course, no economist in his senses could grant this for a moment. But to the quantity theorist this method may be as necessary as for the protectionist to argue from the bed-rock of the tariff to the existence of religion.

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN

Boston, February 28

[The foregoing letter by Professor Laughlin is in reply to the editorial on "Prices and the Gold Standard" which appeared in the Review for February 21. For the sake of brevity and clearness we have indicated by numbers the points upon which it seems desirable to comment, thus avoiding the necessity of repeating Professor Laughlin's remarks.

1 and 2. Nobody that we know anything about has said or implied that "demand alone determines the price of everything," or has denied that the price is as much determined "by all the conditions affecting supply."

In the very article to which Professor Laughlin is replying, we said:

> The quantity theory of money perfectly recognizes that high prices are quite as capable of being brought about by diminution of productivity as by increase of the monetary medium. In so far as productivity has diminished in these last years, it accounts for the rise of prices. How serious that diminution has been, nobody knows. But everybody knows that there has been enormous increase in the monetary medium; and all that the quantity theory says is that this increase has caused a corresponding rise of prices.

3. The price offered by anybody for hammers is of course not "independent of the production-costs for hammers." But the relation of the price of the hammers to the production-costs is a relation not to those costs as measured in hours of labor and quantity (by weight or volume) of raw materials consumed, but to those production-costs as measured in money. Reference to rise of production-costs, therefore, only shoves one step back the question of the rise of prices, and leaves the nature of the question just the same as before.

4. This is quite true; but if both the buyer and his rivals have command of a larger amount of credit in dollars than they had before, while the supply of the commodity for which they are bidding has not increased, they will, unless there is a combination among them, bid more in dollars for it in the endeavor of each to have his full share of the business.

5. This has been treated under 3.

6. Demand does "fall off as price rises, and increase as price falls," if the monetary supply is not altered; but demand does not fall off as price rises if the rise of prices simply keeps pace with the increased volume of the monetary medium at the command of purchasers.

7. In the editorial to which Professor Laughlin is replying we referred to the fact that "some very intelligent persons experience a certain difficulty" in this matter, though we had not supposed that any professors of political economy were included among these persons. What we said with a view to clearing up their difficulty was as follows:

> Merely because I have more dollars, they ask, why should I pay a higher price for what I want? But the reason is very plain. Anybody who has more dollars than he had before wishes to do something with the extra dollars; he wishes either to spend them or to save them. Now if the things to be bought for the dollars are no more abundant than they were before, then, at the old scale of prices, he would be getting more of the things than he got before, and somebody else would have to go without. Accordingly somebody—either he or somebody else—will pay a higher price rather than forgo the satisfaction of his desires; and in this competition of purchasers prices are raised. Nor is the case different if he prefers to save instead of spending. People do not in our time put their extra money into a stocking. They invest it so as to draw interest. But to invest means, directly or indirectly, to engage in some form of production or trade; and this, in turn, means to buy either commodities or labor needed for the carrying on of that production or trade. Thus the extra money is put to just the same kind of use as the old money—the purchase of commodities or services. And if the aggregate quantity of those commodities and services remains the same while the number of dollars available for the purchase of them is doubled, the average price of them will be doubled also.

8. Nobody says that "there will be no limit to the ensuing rise of prices;" the limit to which prices naturally tend (conditions other than those affecting the monetary volume remaining the same) is that which would make the rise in the general price-level proportional to the increase of the monetary medium.

9. Nobody talks as if "sellers had no effect on price."

10 and 11. We have already referred to the matter of production-costs, under 5. But to make it plain that we said nothing that could possibly be interpreted as meaning that "production-costs do not influence the selling prices of goods," and that we did not beg the question at issue, we will reproduce here the whole of what we said on that point:

> Mr. Laughlin's idea is that the prices of commodities are high because, under the pressure of war need, high wages were paid to workingmen, both in manufactures and agriculture, in order to stimulate production, and that this had the effect of raising the prices of all commodities. But this is only another way of saying that the first thing that rose in price was labor, and that other things followed suit—which may be perfectly true, but has absolutely nothing to do with the question of the relation between prices and the supply of money. If commodities had risen first, and wages had risen afterwards in order to meet the increased cost of living, the thing that made the rise possible all round would still have been the same—the increased supply of money. As a matter of fact—and indeed of notorious fact—the events have taken place sometimes in one order and sometimes in the other. The new supply of money may flow in the first instance to any one of a hundred different points; but to insist that because it flowed first to one point rather than another, therefore the flow of money had nothing to do with the case, is suggestive of the logic of Alice in Wonderland rather than of the reasoning of political economy.—Eds. THE REVIEW.]

The Work of the South in Women's Education

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

A copy of the REVIEW containing the article "The Women's Colleges" has come into my hands, and I note with regret that there is no mention of what the South did in those early days for the education of women. I, therefore, give you a brief sketch of Wesleyan College, Macon, Ga.

The Legislature of Georgia granted a charter and gave the power to confer degrees to Wesleyan College in 1836, but the college was then named "The Georgia Female College." On January 7, 1839, the doors of the college were opened and ninety students entered. The curriculum was practically that of the colleges for men. On July 16, 1840, eleven young women were graduated and they received the A. B. degree, the first degrees ever given to women in the world. The first name on the list was that of Catherine Brewer, who married Richard A. Benson, and became the mother of Admiral W. S. Benson.

Harvard, the first college for men, was founded in 1636, and two hundred years later, in 1836, Wesleyan College, the first college for women, was founded. Neither Oberlin nor Holyoke was able to give degrees until some years later than Wesleyan. There were some excellent seminaries in the South, and the college drew its first students largely from them. It is thought by some that the reading of the work that Emma Willard was trying to do in the North put into the minds of some of our Southern men the idea of doing better things for the women of the South. Wesleyan has gone steadily onward and upward, its doors have never been closed, and it has sent out a great number of cultured, broad-minded, educated women whose power has been felt in this country and abroad.

LILLIAN P. POSEY

Macon Ga., March 20

Book Reviews

Public Service in the Days of Roosevelt

George von Lengerke Meyer, His Life and Public Services. By M. A. De Wolfe Howe. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

MR. ROOSEVELT was a believer in the amenities and civilities of public as well as private life. He had a very alert and correct sense of "form." It was one of his strongly marked traits, though little dwelt upon by his many biographers. He gathered about him while he was in the White House many agreeable, pleasant, civil-spoken men whose chief apparent qualification was a distinct social background and tradition. They were not grubby, workaday persons at all, but rather men who had found the world a charming place of sojourn largely because their fathers and grandfathers had provided a solvent for the bread-and-cheese problem. For the most part they were the very best butter and acquitted themselves creditably. George von Lengerke Meyer was one of these men.

The current fiction about Washington in Roosevelt's time that sought to account for the circumstance that Meyer held one good job after another was that he was kept in by the potent influence of Senator Lodge. The amusing theory was that unless a gilded place was found and kept for Meyer his ambition for public service would lead him to make a race for Congress against Augustus P. Gardner, Mr. Lodge's son-in-law. It is true, at any rate, that Mr. Meyer was giving serious consideration to his chances as a Congressional candidate when he accepted President McKinley's offer of the Ambassadorship to Italy. It was Mr. Gardner who went to Congress.

All men in public office should keep a diary of their formal and informal contacts. It insures a measure of permanence to the memory of their activities. So few measured opinions are of value, but in any honest impression artlessly set down always inheres the distinct flavor and quality of truth. Meyer kept such a diary, and it has been skilfully used by his present biographer. Some quotations from it here will serve best to give a taste of the man's quality.

During Meyer's residence in Italy (1900-1905) the German Emperor was showing much attention to Americans, especially to rich Americans. The Emperor managed, not only at that period, but in later years, to see a great deal of our Ambassador. Meyer was of German descent; both his paternal grandfather and grandmother were German born. It is apparent that he was flattered by the Emperor's attentiveness. He has set down fairly long and detailed accounts of what happened on the several occasions he lunched and dined with the Kaiser and had long, uninterrupted, and unhurried talks with him. After Meyer had come home from Europe and was Postmaster-General in Roosevelt's Cabinet he sets down in his diary:

> The President in [Cabinet] meeting turned to me and said that he had Imperial information that I was not quite satisfied or contented being in the Cabinet, and that he, the Emperor, would be very pleased to have me come as Ambassador to Berlin; reminded the President that he had sent Speck to please him.

On another and earlier day Mr. Meyer records that one of the newspaper correspondents came to him to ask if he was going to Berlin, saying that he had heard the story at the German Embassy, where it was intimated that the appointment would be very agreeable to the Kaiser.

In January, 1905, while still Ambassador at Rome, he received a letter from President Roosevelt notifying him that he was to be transferred to St. Petersburg and also stating, with characteristic vigor, Roosevelt's conception of the functions of an Ambassador:

> I desire to send you as Ambassador to St. Petersburg. My present intention is, as you know, only to keep you for a year as Ambassador; but there is nothing certain about this, inasmuch as no man can tell what contingencies will arise in the future; but at present the position in which I need you is that of Ambassador at St. Petersburg. St. Petersburg is at this moment, and bids fair to continue to be for at least a year, the most important post in the diplomatic service, from the standpoint of work to be done; and you come in the category of public servants who desire to do public work, as distinguished from those whose desire is merely to occupy public place—a class for whom I have no particular respect. I wish in St. Petersburg a man who, while able to do all the social work, able to entertain and meet the Russians and his fellow-diplomats on equal terms, able to do all the necessary plush business—business which is indispensable—can do, in addition, the really vital and important things. I want a man who will be able to keep us closely informed, on his own initiative, of everything we ought to know; who will be, as an Ambassador ought to be, our chief source of information about Japan and the war—about the Russian feeling as to relations between Russia and Germany and France, as to the real meaning of the movement for so-called internal reforms, as to the condition of the army, as to what force can and will be used in Manchuria next summer, and so forth and so forth. The trouble with our Ambassadors in stations of real importance is that they totally fail to give us real help and real information, and seem to think that the life-work of an Ambassador is a kind of glorified pink tea-party. Now, at St. Petersburg I want some work done, and you are the man to do it.

Within two months of his arrival at St. Petersburg it fell to the American Ambassador to conduct in person the negotiations with the Czar which led to the Peace Conference at Portsmouth and the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese war; a little more than two months later he secured from the Czar, again in person, the agreements upon terms which brought about the signing of the treaty. He observed closely the beginning of the internal disturbances in Russia and watched the unpropitious opening of the Duma. He wrote regularly to Roosevelt. His letters and diaries written in Russia in 1905, 1906, and 1907 picture a government and a social condition now passed beyond recall. His own records of this period are more complete than those of any of his other services.

The anecdotal, gossipy record of his contacts and minor adventures in Washington, where he came in 1907 as Postmaster-General in the Roosevelt Cabinet, is heartening to read at this time, when Washington seems disorganized and demoralized. Mr. Roosevelt did bring interesting men to Washington and the governmental machine was well administered and cared for during his time. The diary reflects many of the lighter, intimate aspects of the Roosevelt official household. Here is a new T. R. epithet: At a Cabinet meeting the President said, "Notwithstanding our exact information as to Japan's preparation there were certain 'sublimated sweetbreads' who closed their eyes to any chance of trouble with Japan." And when the anti-Japanese feeling came to the surface in California, Roosevelt "regretted it because the State was too small to become a nation and too large to put into a lunatic asylum." This was also said in the close privacy of the Cabinet.

We quote at random a few other bits of the diary:

> May 11.—Ride with the President, Root, and Lodge; go way out on the Potomac. The French Ambassador and Madame Jusserand were out in the park near the hurdles. The President put his horse over the 3-foot stone wall and the 4-foot hurdle. Then he turned to me and said that we would jump them together, which we did. Lodge said my horse jumped in much better form. He was carrying, however, about 30 pounds less. After that, without realizing what effect it would have on the President, I put my horse over the 5-foot jump. I had no sooner done it than the President went at it. His horse refused, so he turned his horse, set his teeth, and went at it again. This time the horse cleared it well forward, but dragged his hind legs. Lodge was very much put out that the President has taken such a risk with his weight. I appreciated that it was my fault, for the President said, "I could not let one of my Cabinet give me a lead and not follow."
>
> October 25.—First Cabinet meeting since last June, Taft and Straus absent. President tells a story why Root, according to a certain general, is the greatest Secretary: "The trouble with Taft was that he had once been a Judge, and if he came up against the law in a policy which he wanted to pursue, he had such a respect for the law that he gave in, while Secretary Root was such a great lawyer that he always could find a way to get around it."
>
> February 16.—The President said to Root, "George Meyer, when I ask him to go to walk, refuses, but with an air which is as much as to say, 'I have been several times and I am able to do it, therefore I can refuse!'" The President told this with one of his smiles which showed all his fine teeth.

March 20.—Cabinet meeting. All present. Decide to accept the invitation from Japan to have the fleet visit their ports. Attention was brought to the publication of a Socialist journal in Paterson. The President much incensed. It urged the use of dynamite to destroy the troops and the police. Under instructions from the President, I am to stop the transmission through the mails.

March 27.—Cabinet meeting. The Attorney General informed the Cabinet that, under the strict construction of the law, I probably had not the authority to keep certain anarchistic papers out of the mail, as the Courts had previously defined what "immoral" was.

I informed the Attorney General that it had already been done, and the President added that we had public sentiment with us, and that he should continue this policy towards the papers which threatened life and property until the Courts stopped us.

Taft telephones me to meet him at the Union Station at 3:30. Get there just as he is getting out of his automobile. We sit down on a bench in the Union Station and the secret service men [form] a cordon about us. I find he wants me to consider Beekman Winthrop for Assistant Secretary of the Navy, which is agreeable to me. He tells me Hale said to him that a resolution would be introduced, if I were appointed Secretary of the Navy, investigating my relations with the Fore River Engine Co. I told him that I never owned a share or bond in my life.

March 2.—Final Cabinet meeting. Mr. Roosevelt said, "Before we take up any business, as this is our last meeting, I want to say to you that no President ever received more loyal support from his official family than I have received. The work that you have done I have received the credit for—credit must go to the general in command. The only reward you receive is having the knowledge of doing your work well. I refuse to allow you to reply;" but Garfield said, "Whatever we have done has been inspired by your example."

While he was Secretary of the Navy in Mr. Taft's Cabinet, Mr. Meyer, singularly enough, kept no diary. That is unfortunate, for it would have made an interesting contrast.

EDWARD G. LOWRY

A Modern Greek Poet

KOSTES PALAMAS: LIFE IMMOVABLE. Translated by Aristides E. Phoutrides. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

MR. PHOUTRIDES, a Harvard doctor of philosophy, who has recently accepted a professorship at the University of Athens, is undertaking the task of mediating between the souls of a native and an adopted country. He is proceeding with a tact, modesty, and good taste that are in refreshing contrast with the style of a more widely advertised interpreter who proclaims his mission in this strain: "This book reveals America to herself by interpreting Europe. I stand in symbolic relation to both Hemispheres —having navigated unknown seas of German psychology."

Dr. Phoutrides' translation of the chief work of the modern Greek poet Kostes Palamas is also of a very different literary quality from that of the volume of grotesque renderings from German poetry put forth a few years ago under the auspices of one of the most eminent representatives of German science in America:

> Naught else he loved above it,
> He emptied it every meal,
> And so he used to love it,
> The tears from his eyes would steal.

There are no niaiseries of this sort in Dr. Phoutrides' book. Estimates of its value as absolute poetry may vary. But there is nothing to offend the taste or provoke the smiles of a reader bred in the purest traditions of English poetry. One apparent possible exception,

> The lilies grew of marble witherless, would be remedied by a comma after "marble." The original has—

> Bgainoun amarant apo marmaro ta krina

Omitting the rhymes and the double rhymes as too difficult to reproduce, he has given us in correct rhythm, and in singularly pure and often truly poetical English, a faithful transcript of what the Greek poet tries to say and what the strange language in which he writes will not let him say to more than a few score readers in all the world.

Mr. Phoutrides will probably not concur in this estimate. But he will pardon the sincerity that raises a most interesting psychological problem. He is able to keep in separate chambers of the mind his proved and competent appreciation of classical Greek poetry, the purity of his English taste with his mastery of English poetical diction, and his patriotic enthusiasm for the quaint language which a poet of modern Athens is driven to employ. He is not troubled by the mixture of clipped popular forms, commonplace literary modern Greek, and poetic compounds suggested by the older language and sometimes emulating its happiest audacities in which Palamas embodies his genuine if slightly Byronic inspiration of sentiment and reflection. But for all, save the very few who are capable of such division of the records of the mind, Mr. Phoutrides' version is far better than the original. It is better for me. In the sestet of the second sonnet on the lagoon city of Missolonghi I can read with pleasure unalloyed by the shock of any admixture of incongruity:

> There stands Varsarova, the triple-headed;
> And from her heights, a lady from her tower,
> The moon bends o'er the waters lying still.
> But innocent peace, the peace that is a child's,
> Not even there I knew; but only sorrow
> And, what is now a fire—the spirit's spark.

But in spite of two winters spent in Athens I can not read the original so. It is not that I am unable to construe it. But my pleasure is baffled by the san apo purgou doma, the sta olostrata nera, the mia photia echei genei and other aberrations from the haunting nouns that preoccupy my mind.

I can not in feeling harmonize them either with the delicacy of the poetical sentiments or with the sophistication of the compound epithets, some of them hardly intelligible to readers who would require sta and san and the like. Emerson somewhere says that the single word "Madame" spoils an entire page of Racine for him. I have outgrown that particular prejudice. But what Anatole France feels as "those exquisite lines" of Baudelaire—

> Et dès que le matin fait chanter les platanes
> D'acheter au bazar ananas et bananes still, in spite of my better knowledge and belief, affect me somewhat in this fashion:

> And when dawn thro' the plane trees the morning breeze fans
> To buy at the bazar pineapples and "banans."

And this gross caricature, though not in strict logic a parallel, may serve to illustrate the chief obstacle to the appreciation of modern Greek poetry by English speaking scholars—the obtrusion and conflict of incompatible associations. This does not interfere with the enjoyment of the Klephtic ballads. They are too simple, too far removed from classical Greek, to invite the fatal comparison—"simia quam similis." But ordinary modern Greek verse with its disregard of quantity, its perpetual suggestion of French, English, or German idiom, the teasing approximations of its polysyllabic and often beautiful compounds to classical Greek, and its sudden lapses into what from this point of view are barbarisms and solecisms requires for its enjoyment a more agile and open mind than most of us with the utmost goodwill can achieve. The French critics who salute Mr. Palamas as the greatest living European poet are not, I suspect, more intimately familiar with modern Greek, but only less sensitive to these disparates, if I may borrow a word from their own language. They estimate Mr. Palamas by their sympathy with his poetical ideas—his gallicized criticism of life and letters, his twentieth-century questionings of destiny, his Wordsworthian religion of nature and tranquillity, his neo-Hellenic patriotism blended with Childe-Haroldian meditations on the departed glories of a Greece whose olives are still as green as when Minerva smiled:

> For I stood on the end of the sea, and thee I beheld from afar,
> O white, ethereal Liokoura, waiting that from thy midst
> Parnassus, the ancient, shine forth and the nine fair sisters of song.
> Yet, what if the fate of Parnassus is changed! what if the nine Fair Sisters are gone?
> Thou standest still, O Liokoura, young and forever one.
> O thou muse of a future Rhythm and a Beauty still to be born.

All these things Mr. Phoutrides' versions give us with perfect faithfulness and in a sufficiently poetical English diction entirely free from the disharmonies that thwart our endeavors to do justice to the original. His book, with its thoughtful, well-written introduction, will give much pleasure to the quiet lovers of the quiet poetry of meditation and sentiment. There are still a few such left in spite of the noisy vogue of Miss Amy Lowell's "Grand Cancan of St. Mark's or the Four Horses of the Acropolis." (I quote from memory.) In the words of our author:

But still more beautiful and pure than these,
An harmony fit for the chosen few
Fills with its ringing sounds our dwelling place,
A lightning sent from Sinai and a gleam
From great Olympus, like the mingling sounds
Of David's harp and Pindar's lyre conversing
In the star-spangled darkness of the night.

PAUL SHOREY

First Youth

PIRATES OF THE SPRING. By Forrest Reid. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

COGGIN. By Ernest Oldmeadow. New York: The Century Company.

THE BURNING SECRET. By Stephen Branch. New York: Scott and Seltzer.

JEREMY. By Hugh Walpole. New York: George H. Doran Company.

QUAINT enough now seems the time when a child was looked upon as a sort of unsuccessful or at best incomplete grown-up. Yet it survived by some centuries the John Evelyn who boasted that there had been "nothing childish" about the son who died of Greek and other unchildish complaints before reaching the age of five. Not until our own generation has childishness ceased to be looked upon as a blemish, and childlikeness come to be perceived as a quality in itself venerable. It has remained for us not merely to yield the infant his place in the sun, but to pay him tribute as a prophet; or at least as a celestial stranger whose undimmed vision of our makeshift world may be of value. Very recently we have been giving serious study to the tragi-comedy of adolescence.

In an earlier novel, "The Spring Song," Forrest Reid achieved a remarkable interpretation of a child who, somewhat haplessly, carries over his childish sensitiveness and imaginativeness into the years of boyhood. It is a touching portrait of an Ariel among the Stalkys. "Pirates of the Spring" belongs frankly to the Stalky-realm. Its four schoolboys are typical and inclusive rather than exceptional, very British, very much in the recognized public school manner. For the thousandth time we are here inducted into the privacies of the English school for young gentlemen, with its gentlemanly masters, its scholarly head, its cricket, its construing, its chicane. A point of novelty is that our four boys are day-scholars, a race commonly discredited in British school-fiction. The central figure is Beach Traill, son of a charming and well-to-do widow. From the schoolmaster's point of view, he is the dullest of the four. There is little for him in the insides of books, and he keeps his place in school by the merest foothold. But he has character and a kind of sturdy charm, an instinct for the right kind of people and the right way of conduct in a larger sense. For Beach's friendship the other three in their different ways contend. He has one blind spot, the result of his boyish feeling for a younger boy Evan. It is not quite an infatuation, but one of those innocent if not altogether wholesome leanings of youth to youth which are so common during the period of adolescence. Evan's beauty and half-feminine weakness are lures to the stalwart older boy. We are largely concerned with his gradual release from what threatens to become an unhealthful relation. The moral, I say, is ruthlessly British. Beach Traill and Palmer Dorset and Miles Oulton are essentially all right; (because) they are of good stock, well-housed and well-bred. The villain, Cantillon, is a bounder and a cur, and the handsome Evan is at bottom a cad and a coward; (because) they have lacked like advantages of birth and breeding. By way of offset—and, so far as we can see, without the knowledge of the author—Evan's mother, that amiable Philistine and faultless skipper of the domestic bark, is infinitely superior to Beach's pretty and well-bred mother in character as well as in personality.

She is a far more real person than the mother of "Coggin," who is held up for our admiration in the tale of that name, as a lady of low degree. Though British, Coggin is one of nature's gentlemen as well as a genius—a hard compound to swallow for the conventional novel-reader. For it seems to be generally agreed that a genius is almost always a cad, even with all possible advantages of birth and rearing. Coggin is not a cad; but he is, to tell the truth, a fearful prig, and the reader must have a patient way with priggish and humorless virtue to bear with him till the end of the present narrative. The story is told with a certain skill and polish; but it is not very clearly worth the telling, for all that. Even if you believe in Coggin, he remains little short of a bore; and the tale ends in a smother of religious emotionalism centring in the not very well-balanced parson, who is supposed to have been turned mysteriously into a sort of pseudo-Christ (what more popular figure in recent fiction?) by contact with Coggin. Coggin's merit, I take it, is that he is without guile, integer vitae; but surely he needn't have been an ass? He is the virtuous prodigy about whom there is nothing that is childish, and, alas, little that is human.

"The Burning Secret" is, perhaps, a "novelette" rather than a novel; the study of an episode in its bearing upon various lives—two lives really. The scene is a foreign mountain resort in a country unnamed. The persons are a Jewess on the verge of overmaturity, wife of a prosperous lawyer of "the metropolis"; her twelve-year-old son Edgar; and a woman-hunting young baron. The Jewess is the baron's only promise of sport at the time and place. As a first move in the game he makes up to the boy, who responds with passionate gratitude. But he soon finds himself pushed aside; then begins his awakening. It is he who saves his mother from her folly, and in the process leaves childhood behind him. Not altogether unhappily, for now he dimly perceives the mysterious charm of the future reaching out to him: "Once again the leaves in the book of his childhood were turned alluringly, then the child fell asleep, and the profounder dream of his life began." The story has a compactness and distinction comparable to, say, Mrs. Wharton's "Ethan Frome," or Mr. Swinnerton's more recent "Nocturne," It is not, of course, a "pleasant" story.

I confess to having found Mr. Walpole's "Jeremy" hard reading. It is a circumstantial and doubtless faithful chronicle of the nursery life of an English household some thirty years ago. It sedulously refrains from having any special point or "idea." It records in pitiless detail the egotism, the whimsicality, the grubbiness, the fancies, the predilections of an average sort of family of children. It represents a kind of thing which has been very much done of late, and is a solid piece of work in that kind. But it adds nothing of great account to our lore of youth or to our debt to Mr. Walpole. And Jeremy is too neutral and "average" a youngster to absorb attention for his own sake.

The Run of the Shelves

MISS ELLEN FITZGERALD has translated for Doubleday, Page the French Volume of "Walt Whitman: The Man and his Work," published by M. Léon Bazalgette in 1908. Miss FitzGerald teaches English in a normal college, and her own English is a melancholy proof of the growing insensibility of educators and publishers alike to their obligations as curators of the language. M. Bazalgette is not a critic; he is a biographer, or, better, a portrait-painter, or, better still an indweller who invites the reader to share his domestication in the tenement of Whitman's personality. Personality in this case, includes and stresses the physique. There are moments when we feel disposed to say that the subject of this biography is the person of Walt Whitman. The author can not take his hands off his poet's frame; when he is not feeling his pulse, he is testing his muscle.

The book has been prepared with some care. Every fact of weight is supported by a reference—the only means by which the exhibitor of a foreign theme can protect both himself and his readers. There are parts of Whitman's life, notably the period before 1855 and the finalities of his decline, which the devotion and perseverance of the biographer make rather vivid for us. But M. Bazalgette is inseparable from his subject; his jubilee from page 1 to page 355 is uninterrupted. Now a biographer who has chosen a subject is a good deal in the position of a man who has married a wife. Devotion is the presumable motive in both acts, but henceforth a certain chariness or continence in praise is enjoined by the publicity of the relation. When the author is too lavish of exclamation points the reader parries with the question mark. Whitman was a man who might be said by a reckless figure to bathe in humanity, as he bathed in rivers or the sea, and this book is designed after a sort for bathers in Whitman. But much of the tonic effect of the robust plunge is lost when M. Bazalgette insists on heating the water for use in his private tank.

In one sense the book is very thorough; it leaves no phase of Whitman's life untouched. The reader, however, may be reminded of a delightful pleasantry which, according to a recent article in the Century, was uttered to General Pershing in Mexico by some person lowly enough to be impertinent: "Well, General, I think we've surrounded Villa—at least on one side." It is in something of the same fashion that M. Bazalgette has encircled Whitman.

There is much more than antiquarian interest—though much of that, too, of an absorbing character—in Frederic J. Wood's "Turnpikes of New England" (Boston: Marshall Jones), a handsome volume of which both author and publisher have reason to be proud. A detailed history of each of the many turnpike companies, such as is here furnished, offers a great deal to interest the engineer, and, from one point of view, summarizes the economic development of the country from the close of the Revolution to the middle of the nineteenth century. To all these varied appeals of his subject Major Wood is fully and discriminatingly responsive.

The turnpikes were built by the first of the public service corporations. Scarcely one of them, though the public continued to subscribe for stock with an enthusiasm that is a little difficult to understand, ever collected enough tolls to pay even a decent interest return on the investment. Before many years, long before the competition of the railroads began to be felt, the corporations were glad to turn their highways over to the town or the county, which in turn were seldom glad to assume the responsibility. But, thanks to private enterprise, and in spite of public hostility to the payment of tolls at all and to the tendency of the corporations to lay their roads in a straight line, no matter who was inconvenienced, communication between town and town was made, what it had hardly been before 1800, a practicable every-day affair. The book is furnished with excellent maps and many photographs.

There is one community in Palestine which must be watching the Zionists with more than trepidation. As old a feud as any that exists in the whole world is that between the Jews and the Samaritans, and age has not abated its vigor. The Moslems and Christians may view the Jews as the Canaanites did the invading army of Joshua, but these can fairly take care of themselves. With the tiny body of Samaritans it is different, and only archæologists are interested in them as a strange bit of social and religious fossilization. It is, therefore, to their advantage to have their very strangeness recognized. As museum specimens, if not as a viable people, they may be saved. So every book about them helps, and especially one like Dr. J. E. H. Thomson's "The Samaritans, Their Testimony to the Religion of Israel." (London: Oliver and Boyd), for it is full of vivid antiquarian detail. He evidently likes the Samaritans as he has known them, and he has known them quite intimately. He has recast, in his mind, the whole history of Israel round them and their problems—their ritual, their history, their theology, and their sacred texts—and has gained thereby some most interesting ways of looking at that history. There is much to be said for this method of shaking the kaleidoscope of the world, and Dr. Thomson has used it skilfully. As he says himself, he has come out with conclusions which agree neither with traditional orthodoxy nor with the orthodoxy of the dominant critical school; and that is a distinct gain. The more dominant schools, orthodox or so-called critical, are criticised, the better it is for them and for everybody. When their conclusions pose as "the assured results of modern science" they invite new thunderbolts, and there are several celestial flashes in this book.

"Home, Then What?—The Mind of the Doughboy, A. E. F." (Doran) consists of thirty short essays submitted by American expeditionary soldiers in a prize competition. Able the essays are not, if one reflects on the aggregate of brains and of literary ability, tried or untried, which the conscription of the entire young manhood of an enlightened people must have sent to France. Diversified the essays are not. Mr. John Kendrick Bangs, in the uncritical benevolence of a sunny "Foreword," begins his first paragraph with the assertion that it would take a thousand pens with a thousand nibs apiece to set down the variety of thoughts in the minds of two million doughboys. He begins his second paragraph by saying that their minds ran in grooves. The likeness of men to each other is modified surprisingly little by that cult of individuality in the universal praise of which we assert our difference and prove our unity. The feelings, the purposes, in these papers are exemplary. This is partly the outcome of the conditions. A prize competition is an inspection or dress parade, and it is only natural that the ideas and sentiments which appear in it should be beautifully groomed.

All this is true; but its truth has no quarrel with the other truth that lovers of America might replenish their faith in its destiny by a perusal of these manly, modest, sane, and patriotic essays. A year in military service has altered the stuff of the ideals of these young men very little, but it has done for their ideals what it has done for their persons—made them erect and robust. It is curious to observe that in these writers there is no visible mark of any lasting effect upon their spirits of the horrors and squalors to which their relation has been so intimate and painful. Not one of them finds his present world ugly.

Mr. Humphrey Milford, of the Oxford University Press, has recently issued for the British Academy two pamphlets: "Shakespeare and the Makers of Virginia," and "Sir James Murray." The first, the annual Shakespeare lecture for 1919, is the work of Sir A. W. Ward, a fellow of the Academy, who speaks in most complimentary fashion of "Shakespeare and the Founders of Liberty in America," by Professor C. M. Gayley, of the University of California. The second pamphlet is interesting to Americans because it has to do with the learned editor of the Oxford Dictionary, Sir James A. H. Murray, who, it will be remembered, died in 1915, before the completion of this great work. This interesting biographical sketch is written by Dr. Murray's principal coadjutor, Dr. Henry Bradley, who truly says of his chief that "it is to Murray far more than to any other man that the honor of this great achievement will belong."

Drama

Arnold Bennett's "Sacred and Profane Love"—John Barrymore in "Richard III"

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT'S "Sacred and Profane Love," which is aiding Miss Elsie Ferguson to pack the Morosco Theatre, is a play of which I do not clearly grasp the purport. An outline of the plot may serve to explain my difficulties, if it explains nothing else, to the inquiring reader.

In the first act an inexperienced young girl, Carlotta Peel, gives herself to a celebrated pianist, Emilio Diaz, on the urgency of feelings implanted by an hour's acquaintance. This takes place in a house of timid and even peevish respectability, and Mr. Bennett's excuse for the dramatic impropriety is puerile. Whatever our view of the morality of the act —Mr. Bennett's unconcern about its morals is Olympian—surely we can not but feel that, on the part of two persons of the first order of human capacity, its precipitation is clownish. The mere sense of artistic process which inhibits the beginning of a symphony with its finale or a novel (the girl is a novelist) with the concluding chapter should have interposed its quiet veto. The girl, however, becomes frightened and distrustful, and the hurry of her tremulous flight in the chill of the reproachful provides a brief scene of novel interest. Afterwards she repents, but—and here lies the pith and marrow of the play—what she repents is not the deed, but the departure. She had failed in faith.

Act II discovers Carlotta Peel, after a lapse of seven years, accumulating fame and fortune by the composition of heart-probing novels in a suburb of London. The main plot is almost motionless, but there is a curious interlude in which Carlotta finally declines an elopement with a married publisher to whom she had confessed her attachment and vouchsafed a kiss. The import of this outbreak of virtue is not clear unless Mr. Bennett means to suggest that the persons who yield magnificently can magnificently renounce.

The third act finds Carlotta Peel at the door of Emilio Diaz, whom the morphine habit has expelled from concert halls and decent hotels, and condemned to the ignominies of a degenerate life in an evil district of forgetful Paris. Diaz is brought to accept the companionship and nursing of Carlotta at the end of a long scene, which is somewhat bloodshot and disheveled for the author of "Clayhanger," and which, lying inside the story, lies outside the theme. Indeed the theme and story in this play remind one of those fellow-travelers who rejoin each other after frequent separations.

Act IV, in contrast to Act III, might almost be described as an element in the theme, but an interlude in the story. The return of Diaz to London, where, in the confidence of returning health and skill, he plays, amid resurgent plaudits, in an overflowing concert-hall, is of course essential to the narrative. But the real point of Act IV is the momentary revival of Carlotta's old insecurity as to the faithfulness of Diaz, an insecurity which is finally dispelled by his utterance of the tranquillizing words: "I drink to our marriage."

What does all this mean? Trust, says Mr. Bennett. Yes: but trust where and when? Are men as men to be trusted in illicit ties? The male record is discouraging. Are artists as such to be trusted in like relations? The artistic record is disquieting. If Mr. Bennett means that in illicit relations trust is doubly imperative, because the securities for the permanence of such unions are all internal, his point is sound. But a retort would be promptly forthcoming to the effect that the failure of so devoted and courageous a woman as Carlotta Peel to attain or maintain that unfaltering trust is proof of the inherent brittleness of such connections. The mischief of unauthorized relations is that their maintenance demands more character than human nature can supply. A woman should not flee from her great moment. Possibly not. But will Mr. Bennett undertake to provide the woman with some clear tests for distinguishing the really great moment from those imitations of great moments by which her sisters have been cruelly and irreparably deceived? His man and woman marry in the end—accept an external security. Trust in God, but keep your powder dry.

Miss Elsie Ferguson's success as Carlotta Peel is only moderate. Her voice in plain speech is dry and a little hard, and when she needs an emotional voice, her only expedient is to open sluices. It then becomes a rainy voice, a wading voice, sometimes a drowned voice, and the hearer is irritated by Carlotta's insistence that he join her in the celebration of her sorrow. Mr. Jose Ruben gave a life-like presentation of a Diaz in whom perhaps the original is a little lightened and reduced.

"Richard III," in which Mr. Arthur Hopkins presents Mr. John Barrymore in a notable performance at the Plymouth Theatre, is a play of restless energy and brilliant episodes. But it suffers from the fact that it is a chronicle-play in form, a character-play in essence; and, since the chronicle-play is inevitably the regulative force, the result is an exposition of character that is prolix, scattering, repetitious, and unclimaxed. Richard himself is never dull but I should have liked better a Richard who was more subtle and less complex. The complexity begins in the division of the hero into two men. There is Richard, and there is—Dickon. Richard is the dissembler, the contriver, the Jesuit; Dickon is the grotesque, the imp, the sneerer, the scoffer, the Mephistopheles. Richard and Dickon are more than once at cross-purposes; Dickon would speak when Richard craves his silence; in the fantastic scene in Act I where Richard wins the heart of Lady Anne by methods which insult both her heart and her intelligence, the derision really nullifies the subtlety.

But the division between Richard and Dickon is not the end of the complexities; Richard himself is complex. Among his brutal compeers he is not the fox among lions; he is only the lion with a vulpine streak. His policy succumbs to his wrath, as it bends to his impishness. His rage dispenses with Buckingham whom his cunning would have anchored to his side. In the crisis of his fate his craft disappears, and he is thrown back upon that valor and ferocity which was the common heritage and stronghold of his race.

Such a nature is evidently complex. It is too complex to excel in subtlety. In a man who is lion and ape as well as fox, the fox will never be perfected. Shakespeare in Richard sought to give us the artist in crime; what he gave was the criminal, but not the artist. Shakespeare's age was nowhere more artless than in the view it took of artfulness; a perfect willingness to lie and kill seemed an ample equipment for successful villainy. Richard murdered unwisely, his methods are often blunt and crude, he is quite as much the juggler or sorcerer as the tactician (see his handling of Anne and Elizabeth), and Shakespeare has not spared him the crowning humiliation of taking from Buckingham the hint for the prayer-book and churchmen scene, almost the only scene in which he bears himself with incontestable astuteness.

What does Mr. John Barrymore do with a Richard of this kind? He does a great deal, and much of what he does is fine. To begin with a detail or two, Mr. Barrymore knows how to listen; as the Lady Anne scene clearly shows he can make listening an act. Again, he has hit upon the art of soliloquizing; the "winter of our discontent" speech was admirable in the leisurely tentativeness, the obvious search of the mind for the next thought, which alone can justify or extenuate soliloquy. But the great original beauty of his work was that the Richard he portrayed was mainly thoughtful, with a mind not quick or springing, but ruminative, a self-infolding, self-embosomed mind, looking out from its covert with a curious, contented, relishing sagacity at the world and its own conduct

(Continued on page 314)

Time Tested Motors

The experienced engineer and manufacturer refuse to speculate with untried equipment. They pin their faith to Crocker-Wheeler Motors because the endurance, reliability and economy of these motors have been tested by time.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

RECOMMEND AS OUT-DOOR BOOKS OF UNUSUAL CHARM

W. H. HUDSON'S Books

Birds in Town and Village

"It is no dull catalogue of bird sounds and bird habits. It is rather a series of beautiful and poetic descriptions of ramblings about English and Cornish villages, in which various sorts of birds are set like jewels. Stories and legends and quiet little humorous incidents are interwoven with natural history and with moods and appreciations delightful to read in themselves."—North American, Philadelphia.

Illustrated in color from plates by E. J. Detmold, $4.00.

Far Away and Long Ago

Is an extraordinarily interesting record of the response of a finely sensitive spirit to the appeal of the fascinating South American life which he describes with such vivid color and reality. Strange, gaudy birds and butterflies, animals of the oldest types, and men of strange adventures figure in the every-day experiences through which he reveals himself simply and with rare sincerity.

With portrait, net, $2.50.

By DOROTHEA CONYERS

Sporting Reminiscences $6.00

Delightful informal recollections of horses, of hunting, of all that creates the atmosphere of following the most famous packs through the Irish hunting counties. The book is full of racy humor, and of an Ireland, happy and loved.

By GARDNER TEALL

A Little Garden the Year Round $2.50

Full of that special pleasure of the spring, the joy that comes from planning the garden, and full of helpful suggestions.

Obtainable at any bookstore, postage extra, or direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

(Continued from page 312)

in the world. His best speeches had the effect of distillations, distilled venom, it is true, but extracts and concentrations nevertheless. There were other parts of his work that seemed to me raw beside this beautiful and satisfying ripeness. He blustered sometimes, and his bluster struck me as no better than that of the ungifted actor; indeed, bluster would seem to have the property of reducing all artists to a level. The trait has its warrant in the drama, but the half-animal element in Richard, which I can not but think that the tradition of the stage has imposed on a reluctant Shakespeare, was brought out by Mr. Barrymore with a success that set a premium upon failure. I had no pleasure in the laugh, the leer, or the guttural noises, and in what might be half symbolically described as the licking of the chops after some act of blood. I felt only another recreancy to the high ideals which ruled the greater and the graver sections of his work.

The support, while respectable in the mass, was scarcely provocative of hyperboles. The settings of Mr. Robert E. Jones, on the contrary, were a support and an alleviation to the play. To a period in which history shades off into fiction at its borders, Mr. Jones was wise enough to give a legendary setting, a setting in which vivid centres fade away into marginal indistinctness. He gave meaning and animation to the Middle Ages without dispelling the twilight into which their actualities have receded.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books and the News

Sea Stories

THE National Marine League and the American Library Association are craftily inciting readers and writers to choose the best ten books of the sea. It should not be difficult to start the argument; most of us, like Hamlet, will fight upon this theme until our eyelids will no longer wag. It is inherited, perhaps, from far-off ancestors, like the love for wood fires, and though we be the mildest and least sea-faring persons going, we can hold strong opinions about nautical writers. I have always sympathized with that strange mariner, Captain Parker Pitch, in Carryl's ballad:

> His disposition, so to speak,
> Was nautically soft and weak;
> He feared the rolling ocean, and
> He very much preferred the land.

For he summed it all up:

> Says Captain Pitch: "The ocean swell
> Makes me exceedingly unwell."

And so, though I put to sea with misgivings, I am as ready as others to say which seem to me the best books about the sailor and the ocean. Here they are:

Janvier. "In the Sargasso Sea."
Clark Russell. "List, ye Landsmen!"
Clark Russell. "My Shipmate Louise."
Hamblen. "On Many Seas."
R. L. Stevenson. "The Wrecker."
Bullen. "The Cruise of the Cachalot."
Slocum. "Sailing Alone Around the World."
Kipling. "The Seven Seas."
W. W. Jacobs. "Many Cargoes."
Southey. "Life of Nelson."

Janvier, in his story of the young sailor, caught in that vast tangle of old wrecks in the mythical Sargasso Sea, not only tells a fine tale of adventure, with all the magic and wonder of the sea, but he concentrates his reader's attention upon the lonely experiences of one man, in a fashion hardly equalled since Robinson Crusoe. Clark Russell is still, to me, the first among his kind, and no psychological Mr. Conrad can equal him. It is customary to recommend his first success, "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," but the two which I have named, in spite of their sentimental titles, are better examples. Both contain, though it is irrelevant to their excellence, his always amusing and eminently correct treatment of that difficult situation: the unchaperoned young lady and the resourceful hero. Mr. H. E. Hamblen, writing under the pseudonym of "Frederick Benton Will-

"EVERYDAY LIFE" BOOKS

INSPIRATIONAL - DEVOTIONAL

Compact, handy, pocket edition volumes, printed on thin paper, bound in art leather cloth, round cornered. INSPIRATIONAL, DEVOTIONAL books, with brief, daily Scripture passages, an invigorating message for each day, and stimulating weekly comment—built around some central theme.

BUILDING ON ROCK
HENRY KINGMAN

Seeks to meet the demand of our day for reality in religion by studying what Jesus showed to be essential to a life built on eternal foundations. Arranged for daily reading and study during ten weeks. .90

MARKS of a WORLD CHRISTIAN
DANIEL JOHNSON FLEMING

An analysis of "the mind which each Christian should bring to bear upon the world," in these days when we need to realize that we must be world Christians if Christians at all. Arranged for daily reading and study during nine weeks. .90

Meaning of Prayer, .90
Meaning of Faith, 1.10
Manhood of the Master, .90

Harry Emerson FOSDICK'S "Everyday Life" books which continue their phenomenal appeal.

Shall we send you a complete list of "Everyday Life" books, and a catalog of "Books with Purpose"?

Ask your book-store or write to us ASSOCIATION PRESS
347 Madison Avenue, New York

THE REVIEW
$5 a year
140 Nassau St., New York

Sample Copy for Your Friend Upon Request

iams," made of his "On Many Seas; the Life and Exploits of a Yankee Sailor," a capital book of yarns, a sort of latter-day "Two Years Before the Mast." It is presented as fact, not fiction. Not all of Stevenson's "Wrecker" is upon the sea; but the ocean chapters are pure gold, as a murder story its horror is unsurpassed, and as a mystery only the actual events of the cruise of the "Marie Celeste" can be quoted with it.

Of "The Cruise of the Cachalot; Round the World after Sperm Whales," Mr. Kipling said all that is needed: "It is immense—there is no other word. I've never read anything that equals it in its deep-sea wonder and mystery." Captain Slocum's "Sailing Alone Around the World" is unique—humorous and extraordinary. You have only to hunt for quotations about all the phases of ocean life and adventure to prove that there are more apt ones in Kipling's "Seven Seas" than in any other single volume of poetry. For humorous short stories of the sea, and along shore, Mr. Jacobs leads all the rest; his "Many Cargoes" contains some of his best tales. Southey's "Life of Nelson" is not apt to be displaced as a readable biography; greater accuracy, or greater fullness of historical detail may, of course, be found. Nobody has yet done so well for our naval hero, Paul Jones. The scientific historians have made it unlikely that anyone ever will.

The omission of Mr. Conrad from such a list will cause more objection that anything else. Like Meredith, he has his warm admirers and he has those who simply can not read him. The former look upon the latter as Mr. Tumulty is said to look upon Republicans; simply as boll weevils. I think that Mr. Conrad's sincere admirers have been reinforced through clever advertising — through spreading the idea that one must like him for the sake of intellectual distinction. But to those who do not find his characters interesting—and there are many such—it matters not about the beauty of his descriptions, nor the thrilling quality of some of the incidents. Quarter-deck and forecastle alike, in Mr. Conrad's novels, look to me like psychological clinics. Though I can fancy and tolerate Jesse James and his brother in a ship's crew, I do not expect to meet—I do not care to meet—Henry James and his brother, William, there.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Bowen, Majorie. The Burning Glass. Dutton.
Dreiser, Theodore. Hey-Rub-A-Dub-Dub. Boni & Liveright. $2 net.
North, Anison. The Forging of the Pikes. Doran.
Orczy, Baroness. His Majesty Well-Beloved. Doran.
Oyen, Henry. The Plunderer. Doran.
Parrish, Randall. The Mystery of the Silver Dagger. Doran.
Pedler, Margaret. The Hermit of Far End. Doran.
Sadler, Michael. The Anchor. McBride. $1.75 net.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Bacon, Sir Reginald. The Dover Patrol, 1915-1917. 2 Volumes. Doran.
Hobbs, W. H. Leonard Wood—Soldier, Administrator, Citizen. Putnam.

DESCRIPTION AND TRAVEL

Edwards, A. H. Paris Through an Attic. Dutton. $3 net.
Kent, Rockwell. Wilderness: A Journal of Quiet Adventure in Alaska. Putnam.
Kobrin, Leon. A Lithuanian Village. Transl. by Isaac Goldberg. Brentano's.

EDUCATION

Mackie, R. A. Education During Adolescence. Introd. by G. S. Hall. Dutton. $2 net.
Patterson, W. R. Colloquial Spanish. Dutton. $1.25 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Ade, George. Hand-Made Fables. Doubleday, Page.
Inge, W. R. Outspoken Essays. Longmans, Green. $2.25 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Barron, Clarence W. A World Remaking or Peace Finance. Harper. $1.75 net.
Clark, Champ. My Quarter Century of American Politics. 2 volumes. $6 net. Harper.
Current Social and Industrial Forces. Edited by L. D. Edie. Introd. by James H. Robinson. Boni & Liveright. $2.50 net.
Duguit, Leon. Law in the Modern State. Introd. by Harold J. Laski. Huebsch. $2.50.
McCaleb, W. F. Present and Past Banking in Mexico. Harper. $2 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Ullman, A. E. "The Line's Busy!" Stokes.
Williams-Ellis, Clough and A. The Tank Corps. Introd. by H. J. Elles. Doran.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Carpenter, Edward. Pagan and Christian Creeds. Harcourt, Brace & Howe.
DeKoven, Mrs. Reginald. A Cloud of Witnesses. Dutton. $2.50 net.
Hoernte, R. F. A. Studies in Contemporary Metaphysics. Harcourt, Brace and Howe.
Lodge, Sir Oliver. Man and the Universe. Doran.
Lodge, Sir Oliver. Reason and Belief. Doran.
Royce, The Late Josiah. Lectures on Modern Idealism. Introd. by Jacob Loewenberg. Yale University Press. $3.
Tridon, Andre. Psychoanalysis. Huebsch. $2.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Kennedy, Charles R. The Army with Banners. Huebsch. $1.50.
Welles, Winifred. The Hesitant Heart. Huebsch. $1.

SCIENCE

Hudson, W. H. Birds in Town and Village. Dutton. $4 net.
Lorentz, H. A. The Einstein Theory of Relativity. Brentanos.
Marsh, A. Z. Home Nursing. Blakiston. $1.25 net.

The New York University Press

The Ground and Goal of Human Life

By CHARLES GRAY SHAW, Ph.D., Professor of Ethics in New York University.

Cloth, xii+594 pages. Price, $3.50

An attempt by means of Individualism to elaborate a super-scientific and super-social view of human life.

"The book bears throughout the evidence of Professor Shaw's forceful individuality, and will certainly have a distinct field of usefulness."—Prof. W. E. Hocking, Harvard.

"Full of erudite reasoning and cogent thought."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"In the background, Professor Shaw presents a rich landscape of literary experience."—The Dial.

"A valuable work, and in the right direction, teaching good, sound doctrine much needed today."—Prof. W. H. Sheldon, Dartmouth.

Values, Immediate and Contributory, and Their Interrelation

By MAURICE PICARD, Ph.D., lecturer in Philosophy in Barnard College. In press.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS
32 Waverly Place New York City

Some Nason Publications

James Shirley, Dramatist: A Biographical and Critical Study

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Ph.D.

Cloth, xvi+472 pages. Choicely illustrated. Price, $5.00.

"A very thorough contribution to the history of our drama, and fills a gap that needed filling."—Sir Sidney Lee.

"A delight to the eye and hand of any book-lover."—Prof. A. L. Bouton.

"A model in method, showing evidence of careful scholarship on every page. A final study of its subject."—Prof. F. H. Stoddard.

"Gives the fullest and most careful account of Shirley's life now in existence."—Prof. R. S. Forsythe.

Old Hallowell on the Kennebec

A study in the culture-history of a typical New England town.

By EMMA HUNTINGTON NASON (author of "Old Colonial Houses in Maine," etc.).

Cloth, xvi+360 pages. 64 full-page illustrations. Price, $3.50.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS
(Selling Agents)
32 Waverly Place New York City

The Business trend of the World

—developments in exports and imports —changes in prices of raw material —transactions in stocks and bonds —business legislation and prospect are comprehensively reviewed in

THE ANNALIST

By Charts, Graphs, Tables, by pithy articles and concise reviews, this magazine makes visible to executives the movements that affect business.

For executives, every issue is worth more than the year's subscription price.

Annual Subscription Rates:
By mail, postpaid, United States and Possessions, $5.00
Canada, $5.50. Foreign Countries, $6.00

ADVERTISING RATES ON APPLICATION.

THE ANNALIST

A Magazine of Finance, Commerce and Economics

Published by The New York Times Company,
Times Square, New York

THE ANNALIST, Times Square, New York
Enter my subscription for The Annalist, and send bill for one year.
Name...
Address...

38-3-27

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 47 New York, Saturday, April 3, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 317
Editorial Articles:
The Anomaly at the White House 319
Labor and the Industrial Conference 320
The Centralia Murder Trial 321
France and England 322
Behind the Financing of China. By Charles Hodges 324
Constantinople and the Turks. By D. B. Macdonald 325
The Third Internationale. By A. J. Barnouw 328
Correspondence 329
Religious Revivals—Old and New. By Stanley Went 332
Book Reviews:
Three American Labor Leaders 333
Reality and Antidote 334
The Cockpit of Christendom 335
Spanish America 335
Poetry: These Dead Have Not Died. By Harry T. Baker 336
The Run of the Shelves 337
Drama:
"Medea" at the Garrick—the "Piper" at the Fulton. By O. W. Firkins 338
Music:
"Eugene Onegin"—Pushkin and Tschaikowsky. By Charles Henry Meltzer 340
Books and the News: The Candidates. By Edmund Lester Pearson 340
Educational Section 342
America's Foreign Loans. By Thomas F. Woodlock 344

A NUMBER of prominent citizens, all of them "devoted friends of the League of Nations," have addressed to the President a respectful but urgent appeal. They ask him to accept the treaty on the best terms now obtainable, and leave to subsequent endeavor the task of securing any modifications of the terms upon which we take part in the League. The request is eminently reasonable. Had it been made in a disputatious form, it might have cited the President's own former declarations as to the desperately urgent necessity of putting the machinery of the peace, and of our participation in it, into immediate operation. What they do say, and what we are certain is the feeling of an overwhelming majority of the American people, is that the only sure way to save the treaty is to save it now. A subsequent appeal might be made to the nation in behalf of the President's own programme; an appeal which could be made "without subjecting the vital question of our becoming a part of the League of Nations to the uncertainties and perils of a partisan political campaign in which, by entirely unforeseen influences, all may be lost." That the evident cogency of this view will make any impression on the President, we are not so sanguine as to expect; but at least the effort is worth making, and it is stated that the petition will have the backing of thousands of representative citizens in all parts of the country.

HAVING "got" the Kaiser in the interests of humanity, a good many former members of the armed forces of the United States are once more in the field, thank you, to get a little something for themselves. They propose to begin where the G.A.R. left off—not compensation for disability, but a little something for everybody who wore a uniform, and the more the better. Call it not a bonus; it is "adjusted compensation," an attempt to put into the ex-service man's pocket some of the money he might have made if, instead of going to war, he had staid home to profiteer. If war is sometimes profitable to somebody, should not a fair share of the profit accrue to the men who bore directly the hardships and dangers of war? But the fight over this question within the American Legion is not yet ended. If more of the leaders in that organization will display something of the courage of George Brokaw Compton, Chairman of the New York County Committee—fight to the end, and then resign if necessary—a grave danger may yet be averted. The danger was foreseen when the Legion was organized. Responsible men chose to run the risk of it in order that the many possibilities for good inherent in such an organization might have a chance of realization. Now that the organization gives promise of destroying at the outset its possibilities of usefulness by its insistence on cash in advance, it is the patriotic duty of the leaders who can not control their creation to good ends, to destroy it if they can, and while there may yet be time.

WHAT that danger is may be made clearly to appear by glancing at the four proposals, very modestly and decently expressed by Franklin D'Olier, the Legion's National Commander.

> First, land settlement covering the purchase of farms in all States.
> Second, home aid to encourage the purchase in all States of either rural or city homes by ex-service men.
> Third, vocational education for all ex-service persons.
> Fourth, adjustment of compensation or extra back pay based on length of service.
> The committee unanimously decided that the ex-service men should be given the choice of the four features proposed.

The first and the third of these suggestions are reasonable propositions. There is a natural limit to the number of men who will want farms or the benefits of technical education, and there is a limit to the amount of these things which will be wanted by those who want them. For a return of this kind a man who had offered himself to his country might reasonably look. But the second proposition, which is not clear but looks like a disguised form of the fourth, and the fourth itself, are essentially different from the others. In any group of men there will be almost none who will refuse a gift of profitable real estate or of cash, once they have persuaded themselves that they can accept it without loss of dignity, and there is no limit beneath the heavens to the amount of such "easy money" that they will find themselves willing to accept. If they accept a bonus ranging from $50 to $1,000 to-day, they will accept more the day after. The choice which the committee offers to the ex-service man is not a fair one. And the ex-service man, in shouting for his "bonus," is not playing fair. He is presuming on the weakness of Congress, which rarely has the strength to reject the easy course of granting money when votes are in sight. And he is presuming on the natural desire of the public to see their own soldiers and sailors honored by being duly helped where help is needed. Whatever Congress may do—and it might do much if the influence of the Legion were brought to bear in such matters as the rehabilitation of disabled men, the facilitation of the entrance upon the better sort of agricultural or industrial work of any who desire it, the tying up of all those loose ends which have left many ex-service men with a feeling that "the Government is not doing its part"—whatever Congress may do, the public is not going to look with complacency upon another G.A.R. before which the ghost of the old one will stand amazed at its own moderation; the public is not going to be pleased with the spectacle of men of whom it longs to be proud scrambling in the gutter for coppers.

"WHEN McKinley was shot down," exclaims Senator John Sharp Williams, addressing the Mississippi Legislature, "when Garfield was shot, was there a Democrat but expressed sorrow? Has any one seen words of sympathy for the President in any Republican paper?" Does it not occur to Senator Williams, however, that neither McKinley nor Garfield was engaged in ruling the country —not to speak of the world—with a rod of iron from his sick-bed? The country can hardly be asked to submit to the dictatorship of a sick man who, even when well, was distinguished for almost unparalleled self-will; and if he is to be resisted, it would be more offensive for his opponents to be constantly expressing solicitude over his illness than to pass it over in silence.

THE real situation in Germany is more clearly revealed by the list of Ministers in the new Cabinet than by any dispatches concerning the movements and local successes of Communist forces. The inclusion of members of the Centre and Democrat Parties in Herr Hermann Müller's Government may be taken as evidence of the failure of the radical left to impose their will on the men in power at Berlin. Ebert's recent compromise with Legien, it is true, binds the new Cabinet to a plan of socialization which will make its members the executives of the Independents' instructions. But when the Red revolt, which the French were obviously right in declaring exaggerated, has subsided into its former state of brooding discontent, the work of legislation will gradually decrease both in speed and radical tendencies, under the pressure of those elements which are for moderation in reform. Bauer's Cabinet fell far short of the expectations even of his own friends, the Majority Socialists; and Hermann Müller, unless he proves to be a stronger man than he is believed to be, is not likely to carry through legislation which will satisfy the Independents. There is a wide chasm between his undertakings and the chances of their fulfillment, and his failure to bridge it, which seems next to certain, will mark the beginning of a new period of domestic upheaval and revolt.

SHORTLY after the Paisley election, the Daily Chronicle, Lloyd George's speaking trumpet, made an attempt to claim Mr. Asquith for the Coalition—on the ground of his having received the votes not only of the Liberals, but also of a great many Unionists, because of his opposition to nationalization. Besides, the journal opined, there was hardly any difference in the policies of the two. The Premier himself repeated this bid for the support of the Independent Liberals when he called upon all the old parties to unite against their common enemy, the Bolshevist spirit of Labor. Mr. Asquith has made a reply to these approaches which precludes any reconciliation between the two leaders. He denounced Lloyd George's call to arms against Labor as an "appeal for class cleavage and the most mischievous thing that has been done"; and in order to leave no doubt as to the cleavage between Mr. Lloyd George's policy and his own he repeated, in the strongest terms, his condemnation of the Irish bill, calling it "the greatest travesty of self-government ever offered a nation." This outspoken language will have its beneficial effect upon British politics. It traces with unmistakable distinctness the lines which divide true Liberalism from the false variety of the Coalition, and may help many a Liberal who went astray in this "transient era of organized insincerity" to find again his lost bearings.

A SPECIAL Federal grand jury, sitting in Indianapolis, has returned indictments against 125 coal miners and operators for violations of the Federal conspiracy laws. The exact nature of the charges, and the evidence on which they were based, have not yet been given to the public. Comment on the validity of the indictments is of course out of place until the trial develops the character of the evidence which the prosecution has in hand. The fact that both employers and employees have fallen into the net of the law together, however, furnishes proof that the grand jury was actuated by no animus against the miners and their organization in its enquiry. If operators have violated the law, they must take their punishment. Under the circumstances, the case may surely be allowed to proceed to its conclusion, whatever this may be, with no attempt to inflame public opinion in one direction or the other in advance.

THE word "soviet" has a little more to do than ordinary labor union standards would seem to allow, even if kept strictly within its own limits. An untold quantity of printer's ink and paper, and some editorial energy to boot, was wasted last week in applying it to a temporary wave of student horse-play in a Kansas college.

Ebullitions of the kind, where masses of young men are gathered together, are as old as human history, and the colleges have less serious trouble with them to-day than they have had in days gone by. In times when events of real importance are crowding the mails and wires beyond the limits of the paper supply for printing, the news agencies may well allow tales of college "soviets" to pass unheralded into the oblivion which, at least in the place of their origin, would swallow them up in a week. Isn't the exploiting of college mare's nests growing just a little stale for real newspapers?

THE Review is very glad to give space to the Interchurch World Movement of North America to tell its own story. In its campaign for a third of a billion dollars it will undoubtedly be successful. But the very magnitude of its assured accomplishment, the very ease of it, once the efficient machinery is put in action, give rise to more doubts than can fairly be disposed of in a paragraph. In the first place, a third of a billion is a large sum of money; if that amount is needed to enable the churches to do the work they ought to do, so much is not too much to ask for and to receive. But is there any assurance that it will not fall into the hands of leaders who are energetic and resourceful rather than well-balanced and mindful of the vital importance of pursuing only right methods and appropriate objects? Will the church, with this great increase in material prosperity, steadfastly refuse to aim at political power? Will it cling to its spiritual treasures and avoid the temptation—which has been alluringly placed before it by sentimental radicals having their own notions as to what a regenerated church may accomplish—to become the clearing-house of industrial disputes? On the answer to such questions hinges the success or failure of this enlarged programme. It is not impertinent to remind the ministers of religion that their own estate is subject, in this period of change, to the same dangers that beset the body politic.

The Anomaly at the White House

THE question of what constitutes "inability" of the President to perform the duties of his office, which greatly exercised the public mind a few weeks ago, ceased to be acute when the marked improvement in Mr. Wilson's health set in. This improvement appears to be maintained. It is manifested both by his occasional appearances in the public streets, and by a number of vigorous acts in relation to great public questions. Even at the worst, there was a marked absence of pressure for action of any kind on the subject, and now nobody is thinking of disturbance of his executive powers during the remainder of his term of office. There is even serious thought of his candidacy for a third term.

Nevertheless, the situation at the seat of government is in the highest degree abnormal. The mighty power of the Presidency is being wielded, and there is every prospect of its continuing to be wielded for eleven months more, by a man apparently in full possession of his mental vigor, and certainly in possession of a will of extraordinary inflexibility, but almost completely withdrawn from all those influences and aids which are supposed, as a matter of course, to be indispensable to the wise and safe exercise of those faculties in the direction of that tremendous power. There is abundant reason to believe that, even if the President were by nature as much inclined to take advice as in point of fact he is disinclined to do so, the state of his physical health would forbid this being burdened by the consideration of the complex, troublesome, and often intensely trying developments of a situation of unexampled difficulty and seriousness. Unless it be supposed that the judgments at which he arrived many months ago are infallible guides for his conduct in the present and in the future—subject neither to revision on their merits, nor to modification on account of the emergence of new facts and new problems—we have before us the spectacle of the ship of state being steered by a helmsman who gets but meagre indications either of its position or of the state of things by which it is surrounded. The discharge of Secretary Lansing on the ground that he called the Cabinet together in informal meetings has not been followed by the holding of Cabinet meetings, either formal or informal, at the call of the President. The access to him of public men, whether from the Cabinet or from Congress, is so slight as to be practically nil. Senators of his own party, who had faithfully stood by him through months of struggle over the treaty, are as much in the dark as anybody else concerning his intentions on that subject, as well as on all others.

In his insistence upon carrying on the Government after this fashion, Mr. Wilson is violating no provision of the Constitution. But for the wholesome working of any system of government, something more is required than observance of the positive injunctions upon which it is based. Great as is the inherent power of the Presidency, and comprehensive as its expansion has been, owing to the ever-increasing scope and importance of governmental functions, such an exercise of that power as we are now witnessing has never been contemplated as possible. It is, indeed, a distinguishing feature of our system, as contrasted with the parliamentary régime of which the British Government is the great model, that the American chief executive is absolutely independent of any outside control. Our history has furnished many notable instances of the aggressive and inflexible exercise of that independence. Andrew Jackson in his uncompromising determination to destroy the United States Bank, Grover Cleveland in his unflinching stand for sound money, are outstanding examples of adamantine firmness on the part of American Presidents. But these were assertions of executive power relating to single definite issues of fixed policy, by Presidents who maintained normal relations with their Constitutional advisers and who were in normal touch with the events and with the influences of their time.

They involved no arrogation by the President of the right to wield supreme power without those safeguards for its proper exercise which are prescribed not only by the spirit of our Constitution, but by the obvious principles of rational government.

It may be objected that it is idle to make these criticisms when nothing can be proposed by way of remedy. But surely the recognition of a grave and unexpected evil is one of the first requirements of intelligent public opinion among a free people. Nobody knows what the coming eleven months may bring forth. The oversight of our foreign relations has lately been transferred from the hands of a trained and seasoned public servant, and placed in charge of a man not marked out for the post either by experience or by personal qualifications. At any moment the most crucial decisions may be taken without proper consideration either in the State Department or at the White House. There is no reason to expect that, when such a question arises, there will be that grave consideration, that effective taking of counsel, which is supposed to be the special function of important meetings of the Cabinet. In sweeping aside everything which, in the course of our history, and indeed as a result of the most elementary principles of human relationship, has grown up as a mitigation of the absolutism of the Presidency, Mr. Wilson has opened up possibilities of danger in our system of government which no previous experience had given reason to apprehend. Against the possible aberrations of a self-willed sick man, entrenched in the seclusion of the White House and wielding without abatement the immense power of the Presidency, our Constitution and laws furnish no protection. If we can not count on the good will of the incumbent and on his recognition of the undefined, but nevertheless universally recognized, obligations of such a situation, we are helpless. Whether anything can be done about it or not, it is manifestly the duty of the American people to recognize the fact and to take account of the possibilities which it discloses.

Labor and the Industrial Conference

To understand what the Industrial Conference at Washington has done it is essential constantly to bear in mind two vital points—one relating to the general conditions of industry, the other to the settlement of disputes.

In its treatment of the general problem of improved industrial conditions, the Conference confines itself to recommendations the efficacy of which will depend solely on the weight that the report of the Conference may have in swaying the minds of employers and employed, either directly or through the influence of public opinion. No mechanism whatever is provided for putting into effect any of the general recommendations of the Commission which deal with the normal relations between employers and employed. Whether the subject be employee representation, profit-sharing, gain-sharing, or hours of labor, all that the Conference report does in discussing it is to express its estimate of the degree of importance to be attached to the matter, of the prospect of its advancement as indicated by past experience, and of the means which it would be wise to adopt in promoting the object in question. On the particular question of "employee representation"—shop-councils and the like—the report does not content itself with the absence of any governmental proposal, but explicitly says that "it is not a field for legislation, because the form which employee representation should take may vary in every plan." That is a good reason, but there is a deeper reason, as the Conference is doubtless fully aware; the fact being that it refrains from proposing legislation not only on this point, but on any of the points relating to the actual conduct of industry.

In regard to the settlement of disputes, the Conference does propose the establishment of an elaborate system of governmental machinery; but compulsion is no part of the purpose of that machinery. Every effort is directed towards making resort to the mechanism almost inevitable if composition of the trouble by the parties immediately interested proves unattainable; but the right to strike is not interfered with, nor is the decision of the governmental agency, when resorted to, binding unless the parties have assented to the decision in advance. Mr. Hoover, who is generally understood to have been a dominating factor in the proceedings of the Conference, has taken occasion, since the issue of the report, to contrast the Conference plan for the settlement of disputes with that recently adopted by the Kansas Legislature in the case of essential industries. Mr. Hoover regards the Kansas plan as substantially identical with the scheme of compulsory arbitration which, so hopefully acclaimed when introduced in Australasia a number of years ago, is now generally acknowledged to have broken down; and it is his opinion that any compulsory plan is inherently destined to failure. We believe that this is at least certainly true of any plan of national scope; and accordingly we feel that the Conference has done very wisely in undertaking no more than to bring to bear upon a dispute a well-considered mechanism of inquiry and adjudication, the efficacy of which will depend either on voluntary submission or on the effective focusing of public opinion upon the points at issue.

The character of this machinery was set forth in sufficient detail in the preliminary report of the Conference issued on December 29 last. In the Review for January 3 we discussed the character and merits of the plan. The final report does not modify it in any important respect. We sincerely hope that the plan will be adopted by Congress, with such modifications as competent discussion may indicate to be desirable. But it was evident from the start, and it is still more evident now, that the project will meet with opposition both from the capitalist side and from the labor-union side. It solves none of the inveterate problems over which the struggles of two generations have been carried on; it does not undertake to solve them. Fundamentally, however, the opposition from either side is due to a fear that it will somehow strengthen the other. Men looking at it from the standpoint of the great organizations of capital fear that it will strengthen the position of the great organizations of labor; and the heads of the great labor organizations fear that, while it does not in any explicit way interfere with their functions, it will lessen their hold on the situation when any crucial contest is on. To our mind, the great merit of the plan is that it recognizes the abiding character of the forces on both sides, that it does not seek to eliminate or to emasculate either, but that it provides means for reducing to a minimum the clashes between them. To reject it would be to refuse to try an experiment against which no vital objection has been raised, and in favor of which there seems to us to stand the promise of innumerable opportunities for the averting of blind and disastrous industrial warfare.

Mr. Gompers objects not only to the plan for the adjustment of disputes, but also to the general recommendations of the Conference. Among these the report lays most stress upon the idea of "employee representation." The phrase itself is happily chosen to cover what "has been discussed under different names and forms, such as shop committees, shop councils, works councils, representative government in industry, and others." The Conference satisfied itself, after extensive inquiry, that experience in many industrial concerns in this country justifies the belief that a widespread introduction of these methods will have a beneficent effect not only upon the relations between employers and employed, and upon the well-being of the latter, but also upon our industrial productivity. Whether this conclusion is correct or not, surely it can not justly be made the subject of bitter attack. For the recommendation of the Conference will not be adopted in a wholesale fashion. The most it can do is to direct more serious attention to a plan which in the past few years has been attracting much interest. Mr. Gompers fears that any development of organization among the employees within a plant will lessen their allegiance to the great national organizations which, he asserts, are the sole efficient protectors of the rights of labor. But it is manifest that no such lessening of allegiance follows as a necessary consequence of that closer union among the workers of a single plant which the plan of employee representation institutes. As a matter of fact, the plan has worked successfully with all possible relations of the men to the unions. If it is instituted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Conference report, it will evidently interfere with the power of the union only in cases where the workmen themselves feel that that power is exercised in a tyrannical way.

The report says a good word for profit-sharing, but recognizes the severe limitations to which it is subject. It points out that "gain sharing" is free from the difficulties of profit-sharing, in that here the extra reward of the worker is based on actual increase of production and not on the chances of profit and loss connected with the business conduct of the enterprise. It takes up, also, such broad questions as those affecting hours of labor, housing, etc. A very important class of recommendations are those relating to unemployment. Among these is one for the establishment of "a system of employment exchanges, municipal, State and Federal, which shall in effect create a national employment service"; another relates to the devising of methods for diminishing seasonal variations in industries in which they have very evil effects, such as coal mining and building. On the special status of labor in public utilities, and of public employees, appropriate recommendations are made. In all these matters the Conference says things that are well considered and helpful. It is to be hoped that the report will be widely read. It is calculated to promote the best tendencies in the ranks of employers, of labor, and of the public. But it can not be said that the report along these general lines does more than this. Nor was more to be expected; the danger was rather that an ambitious attempt at the solution of insoluble problems might be undertaken, with the consequence of that mischief which always attends the raising of false hopes.

It is not upon the general recommendations of the Conference, but upon its plan for the adjustment of industrial disputes, that public attention should be chiefly centred. This is a definite proposal—not going to the root of the trouble indeed, but holding out the prospect of a real advance. We trust that the plan will be considered, in Congress and out, upon its merits, and not be enveloped in the haze of a vague and scattering discussion of a miscellaneous assortment of questions concerning the welfare of labor, or the principles of industrial management.

The Centralia Murder Trial

THE days have been filled with important doings of their own since last November, and the Armistice Day troubles that cost four lives in Centralia, Washington, are all but forgotten outside the region of their occurrence. Eastern papers have done little more than record the verdict, in the case of the ten members of the I. W. W. who were brought to trial for the death of one of the victims of that day's tragedy. Seven of the ten were declared guilty of murder in the second degree, one was pronounced insane, and two were acquitted. The State had contended for a verdict of murder in the first degree.

The newspapers of the Northwest express sharp dissent from this verdict, contending that the facts of the case left no tenable middle ground between shooting in permissible self-defense and premeditated murder. If the jury had accepted the theory of self-defense, acquittal was the only verdict possible. By holding the seven men all equally guilty, they say, the jury indicated its belief that they were acting by such preconcerted arrangement as to come fully within the definition of first-degree murder. The Nation takes the result as proving that the prosecution was unable to make out its case, and that therefore there was no plan to attack the procession. This forces the conclusion, it holds, that the killing took place in a riot which followed an attack by the marchers on the I. W. W. hall. A witness before the coroner's jury, himself a member of the parade, is said to have testified to an attack on the hall, and the firing of a volley from within when the door was forced open. This the Nation uses to substantiate its position.

This leaves out of account, however, the evidence produced at the trial that the paraders were fired upon from three different points outside and at a distance from the hall, by I. W. W. men armed in advance. The defense could not break down the testimony that Warren O. Grimm, the one of the victims on whose killing the indictment in this trial was based, received his fatal wound at too great a distance from the hall to have been shot in immediate resistance to an attempt to force an entrance. The defense was not in position to deny that I. W. W. men were stationed under arms at different points commanding the route of the parade, but sought to justify this as permissible preparation for the defense of their hall against possible attack. The court instructed the jury, however, that the plea of self-defense could not cover the taking of human life under such circumstances. It must be remembered that the soldiers on parade were marching wholly unarmed.

To take the second-degree verdict as conclusive proof that the prosecution had failed to substantiate its contention is to neglect more than one well-known tendency in the working of our jury system. Cases are not infrequent in which a jury as a whole assents to a milder verdict because of its knowledge that some one or more of its members will never agree to the sterner conclusion warranted by the evidence. In the material of which American juries are made, too, there is a very widespread tendency to flinch from a verdict which will involve the probability of the death sentence. Under the State law in this case, if a first-degree verdict had been rendered the decision between the death penalty and life imprisonment would have devolved upon the jury itself, while in case of a second-degree verdict the assessment of the penalty is left to the court. The opportunity to escape this solemn responsibility would act as a strong incentive, with many jurymen, to avoid the sterner verdict on any ground not felt to constitute a deliberate violation of sworn duty. We can not read precisely what was in the minds of the jurymen at Montesano, but it seems reasonable to suppose that their verdict was a not unusual softening of a sterner conclusion really justified by the evidence, rather than a determination to pronounce a sentence of guilt in some form when the failure of the prosecution to make good its contention really demanded an acquittal. For there is force in the contention of the Portland Oregonian, which gave very close attention to the case as developed during the trial, that the shooting was either an outright assassination or a justifiable act of self-defense.

We have seen no indication that the defendants did not have a fair trial. The jury was solemnly charged that they were to be considered as individuals, indicted for the specific offense of killing Warren O. Grimm. Their membership in the I. W. W. must not be taken into account, nor the fact that others were killed at the same time. Instruction was also given by the court that the confession of Loren Roberts, alleged by the counsel for the defense to be insane, must not be allowed to have any weight against any of the other defendants. It is true that an informal "labor jury," appointed by labor organizations to watch the trial and render its own verdict, pronounced in favor of acquittal. But it is also true that one member of this "jury," called before the courts as a witness, was obliged to admit that he had been aiding the attorneys for the defense in securing testimony. The prosecutor, dissatisfied with the mildness of the verdict in view of the testimony presented, has given notice that indictments for murder in the first degree of another of the victims will be immediately pressed against the same men.

Perhaps the worst of all attempts to explain the shooting was made by the Nation just after its occurrence:

> The country is reaping what it has sown; it has been teaching millions how to kill. It has expounded the doctrine that the way to punish a fellow you do not like was to apply "force without stint" to him, and we are now witnessing the private application of the doctrine on a large scale. The most lawless continue to be judges and district attorneys and law officers generally.

The genesis of the Centralia murders lay not in the war, but in the unreasoning distrust and hatred of all orderly legal processes imbedded in the ignorant and unruly minds of such men as largely make up the I. W. W., emboldened to the point of criminal action by just such wild words as those which we have quoted.

France and England

WHEN the French and English fought shoulder to shoulder, and British convoys of reinforcements and wounded were crossing and re-crossing the Channel, the lack of a tunnel connection between the two countries was much deplored by the British, and the conviction was general on both sides of the water that, after the war, an under-sea thoroughfare would be built which would symbolize their friendship in a practical and permanent form. "England must remain an island," said Lloyd George in disapproval of the plan. But though she maintained her geographic insularity, politically Great Britain will never be able to reëntrench herself in "splendid isolation." The war has made her a peninsula on the political map of Europe, and no successful opposition against the Channel tunnel can sever it from the Continent.

That being so, it is a matter of the greatest consequence to Europe that England should live on the best of terms with her immediate Continental neighbor, and the friends of both countries will therefore view with anxiety the symptoms of an estrangement which grow, week by week, in number and strength. A temperamental difference is at the bottom of this disagreement. In the Briton, less emotional than his French comrade in arms, hatred against the beaten foe will sooner subside than in the Frenchman. The latter's more open exposure to the enemy's revenge, and the recollection of severer sufferings than England has borne, add the force of argument to the imponderable strength of instinctive feelings. This deep-rooted difference of temperament, accentuated by external circumstances, accounts for the clash between British criticism and French advocacy of the terms of the peace with Germany.

Of late, however, French insistence on their justice, and on the danger of mitigation, has taken the form of an indictment of England. It is England that prevented the pushing forward of the military frontier to the Rhine, it is England that prevented the creation of a great Poland, it is England that, by urging leniency towards Germany, sacrificed the safety and reconstruction of France to the demands of the British Labor Party. The bitter tone in which these grievances are worded by M. René Pinon in the New Europe, by Pertinax in the Echo de Paris, by M. Barthou in the Chamber of Deputies, creates the impression that in Paris this conflict of British and French policies is felt to be due to an intention, on the part of the London Government, to block the vital interests of France at all points. "England," says M. Barthou, "is ready to recognize the Soviet Government as soon as she assures herself of the greatest possible advantages she can get." M. Pinon complains of "unfriendly intrigues of British agents in Syria to disgust France with Syria and the Syrians with France, and insinuates that King Feisal is still supported by Great Britain. Even England's whole-hearted support of the League of Nations is called into question; it affords her a pretext for holding her hands free and backing out of definite agreements.

How much truth is there in these accusations? That Lloyd George's foreign policy, in spite of his late denunciation of Labor, has largely been guided by the wish to conciliate the British Labor Party, is undeniable, but it is not Labor alone that insists on mitigation of the peace terms. A large body of Liberal opinion in England is no less in favor of leniency. But there would be far less of this sentiment if the British public could be brought to see great force in the French contention that a revision in favor of Germany is detrimental to the vital interests of France. Though the man at the head of affairs in England be himself not guided by any principles, the powerful body of British opinion which he can not afford to ignore is actuated by no selfish motives, but earnestly wishes to see France fully indemnified and restored and Europe at peace.

French statesmen oppose the optimistic belief in the efficacy of mercy as the surest safeguard against the lust for revenge with the realistic plea that nothing except superior strength can protect France from German revenge. The Government of France is determined, if need be, to act independently of her Allies in enforcing the strict execution of the treaty, even at the price of fresh military burdens for the country. Only an intimate knowledge of the spirit presiding at present over the German people and its Government, a knowledge we do not pretend to possess, could give one the right to condemn this attitude of the French as intransigeant. But we deplore it because of the dangers that will result from it both to France herself and to Europe. Even if Marshal Foch succeeds, which we do not doubt he can, in carrying out his plan of reprisals, France will have paid too high a price for her safety from a questionable danger by the sacrifice of the Entente Cordiale.

And of this there is a real danger. If isolated action, involving French occupation of more German territory, should lead to the political isolation of France, the security which the possession of military guarantees will give her will be neutralized by the loss of her international connections, which will make her seem a less formidable enemy in the eyes of a vindictive Germany. France isolated means a relatively stronger Germany, although under compulsion of Marshal Foch's military measures the reduction of the German army be carried out to the letter of the treaty. What more can Foch expect than to deprive Germany, for a certain length of time, of the means of revenge? The spirit of revenge he can not quell, by force of arms, in a nation of sixty millions. If it will be revenged, it will recover the means, in spite of peace treaties and military guarantees. France, in her state of physical and financial exhaustion, will scarcely be able to bear for long the burden which the possession of those guarantees entails. And, as Millerand said in the Chamber: "France will be to-morrow as she was yesterday, the first victim of a new assault."

But to England also the danger would again be as great as it was six years ago. England can not, for her own sake, allow France to put herself into an impossible position. To the express demands of the French annexationists, indeed, British opinion can never be brought to assent. But British statesmen can do a great deal towards conciliating France by removing the suspicions which, with more or less justice, are being harbored in Paris and which are responsible for the present irritation. The Entente Cordiale ought not to fall a victim to an incompatibility of temper which can be controlled by a wise and circumspect statesmanship.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Behind the Financing of China

(IN FOUR PARTS—PART TWO)

"CHINA," said my official Chinese friend, "by force of circumstances is on the auction block—it would pay the world a thousandfold to underwrite her instead of letting Japanese yen control our potentialities."

That statement was made in Peking at a time when the armistice had for the moment halted the finance that is undermining China's integrity. Even then, a movement was being pushed quietly by an inner circle of friends of the Chinese Republic. Meetings were held at certain private residences where foreigners representing official and unofficial interests worked upon schemes to provide for the international financing of China along coöperative lines. From the first there was general recognition that the legitimate vested interests of all the Powers would have to be protected in an equitable way, and that, on the other hand, the effective blocking of the extension of spheres of influence was imperative.

Well-wishers of China have been long convinced that the only way to keep China intact is to pool the conflicting interests, pro-rate the entire development of the country among the interested Powers, and thus end political manipulation by outside influence. There was nothing new diplomatically in the proposal. The idea was behind Secretary of State Knox's proposals to "neutralize," or internationally control, the Manchurian railway development in 1909-10. It cropped up in another form in the evolution of the Six Power Group to make China a huge loan for reorganization shortly before the war.

Our withdrawal from this international bloc, it will be remembered, was forced by the Wilson Administration in 1913. The abrupt action of President Wilson at that time caused a great deal of distrust between our bankers and the foreign banking groups, who could not understand how such a step could be taken by the American Government without our financial interests having foreknowledge of the move. While it may not seem strange to us now, we must bear in mind that at the time the world had not accustomed itself to the President's instinctive recourse to obstructive measures the moment his conceptions of statecraft were crossed. Thus, instead of helping to modify, as he thought best, the terms then proposed to China, he would have nothing to do with them. The President's interposition served to hold up action until the outbreak of the European war. Henceforth, the European members of what became the Five Power Group could give little heed to even their vital interests in the East, except where the war itself disastrously crossed them.

The working out of events gave Japan the free hand in the Orient which has so tremendously complicated any settlement of the situation. With Japan financial diplomacy has meant everything. She has risen from the position of a debtor nation, heavily encumbered by borrowings abroad, to that of a Power with a surplus of funds. Instead of being chronically sapped, Japan was able to embark on the sapping of her neighbor.

The three periods of Japan's financial growth in China's development vividly show what has happened. Until 1909, when she began to recover from the strain of the Russo-Japanese War, which had given her a foothold in Manchuria, the Japanese investments were of small importance outside of the Three Eastern Provinces. From the year 1909, however, to the outbreak of the European struggle, her investments rose perceptibly; they reached the total of approximately 50,000,000 yen—say $25,000,000. The distribution of Japan's surplus capital was, in many ways, not unlike those of other Powers: railway loans in her South Manchurian sphere; advances on communications in the Yangtse Valley; and a series of credits to the great Hanyehping Iron Works in Hankow, the Chicago of China. It was in the last of these advances that the purpose of Japanese loans began to show itself—to gain political domination over China's development by first mortgages which should close to other Powers possible avenues of investment.

A great increase in lending on these lines began with the opening of the Great War. Between 1914 and 1916, the Okuma Ministry negotiated 12,000,000 yen worth of loans; it was the Foreign Minister, too, of the "liberal" Okuma who directed Japan's diplomatic assault on China in 1915. The negotiations over the Twenty-one Demands gave Japan privileges directly affecting the situation at the present moment, for they secured to Japanese capital a monopoly of development in five Chinese provinces and part of a dependency until the year 2002.

Under the premiership of Terauchi, the aggressive Japanese elements intrigued with the Chinese militarists, between 1916 and 1918, to pile up a huge total of non-productive loans, for they were advanced for military or administrative purposes. They were accompanied by the most objectionable practices, a literal debauching of a nation, for (1) they were consummated in the main illegally, without recourse to the duly constituted authorities; (2) they carried an abnormally high rate of interest; (3) adequate supervision over expenditure was deliberately omitted to permit diversion to unworthy ends; (4) they mortgaged to Japan national assets threatening China's security and not infrequently violating rights held by other Powers.

According to information from American official sources, China is said to have borrowed from Japan, during 1917 and 1918, about 250,000,000 Chinese dollars—mines of all kinds, national forests, strategic railways, etc., being pledged as security. These advances were largely wasted in the struggle between the Northern and the Southern parties in China, as Japanese statesmen well knew they would be, and they served to prolong China's internal conflict. Even the much-heralded liberalism of the Hara Ministry has not been able to stop this subsidizing of China's ruin by Japan's Military Party, and the grand total of political and so-called economic loans made to China by Japan now exceeds, in all probability, half a billion yen—say, $300,000,000 gold in round numbers.

When the news of the armistice broke over the Far East, something like panic took possession of the Japanese Foreign Office and the Military Party. They felt that the Peace Conference would upset all their plans. "Had the organization of the New Consortium been brought at once to a conclusion after the armistice," one of the foreign officials directly concerned with the formation of the international financing project intimated to me recently, "the Japanese would have been only too glad to come in on the best terms we would give them. Now the situation has changed. The results of the Peace Conference have enabled Japan to hold off and dicker for her own conditions."

It is natural that Japan should wish to see the fruits of her high finance validated; namely, excluded from the scope of the Consortium, which latter she would like to wreck, as she did our dollar diplomacy in Manchuria just a decade ago. She has made large preliminary advances and her business system at home is overextended and tied hand-and-foot with the success of her schemes for expansion. These require title to Manchuria's future for a century; a similar grip must be fastened on the Shantung Peninsula; a like penetration must be assured into Mongolia. Hundreds of miles of communications will thus be ear-marked for Japanese capitalists; and the natural resources Japan so lacks will become hers as the nominal tenant of China.

The control of such interests is the stake in the fight being waged by the Powers that advocate international coöperation in the development of China, under American leadership, as opposed to the yen diplomacy of a predatory nationalism. The Consortium offers the only fair solution for this conflict of Japanese ambitions, Chinese rights, and the grouped interests of the other Powers. The bringing about of this is the inwardness of the Lamont financial mission we have just sent to the Far East.

CHARLES HODGES

Constantinople and the Turks

THE problem of Constantinople and of the status of the Ottoman Turks in slam, like everything else in this world f space and time, is confused or exlained by the principle of relativity. We ave learned copiously of late that a hing is what it is always in relation to ome other thing and never absolutely. 'hat applies here most exactly. The 'urks are one thing to themselves, anther thing to the Arabs, and yet a third ning to the far-away Moslems of India. : would be easy to establish for them ill more relativities; but in these three 'e have the cardinal points for our presnt problem. Similarly, the Caliphate is ne thing for the Turks, another thing r the Arabs, and a third very different ing for Indian Islam. And, finally, the urks feel in one way about their own atus in Constantinople; the Arabs feel another way about that same status the Turks; and India has to it still nother attitude. In all this the Turkish d the Arab positions have been clear r long, almost for centuries; but the actions of Indian Moslems are quite odern, are in all probability hardly clear, even yet, to their own consciousness, and have been deeply affected—the orthodox Moslems would say, perverted—by a couple of generations of English education. In all probability the old-fashioned Moslems of India, who have learned their Islam in Arabic or in Persian and not from English books, think of the whole complicated tangle of relationships much as do the Moslems of the nearer East and if, from motives of policy, they fall in with the drift around them, do so with a full understanding of its unhistorical character.

I. The Turks, to themselves, are primarily Turks and secondarily Moslems. This may not hold consciously of the masses; but it does so unconsciously. To them an Arab, for example, is an ogre, an enchanter, an uncanny being; this comes out clearly in their popular fairy tales. For their leaders, on the other hand, the Empire is consciously the Ottoman Empire, and to the dream of Ottomanizing everything the Young Turks sacrificed the fruits of their revolution and thus sealed the fate of historical Turkey. They feel far greater kinship with the Turanian tribes which stretch through Asia to the Great Wall of China than they do with their fellow followers of the Prophet of Arabia. They are completely under the spell of racial nationality and, under the names of pan-Turanianism or Yeni Turan (New Turan), they dream of a restored empire reaching from the Ægean to China. The rest of the world of Islam they would lightly sacrifice to that.

Naturally, then, for the Arabs, they are indifferent Moslems or absolute unbelievers. The Arabs, that is all the Arabic-speaking peoples south of the Taurus and the mountains of Kurdistan, have known them for centuries as conquerors and oppressors. For them the Turk is a bogey, despised for stupidity, feared for his heavy hand, yet respected for a certain solid force of discipline and ability to pull together in subordination. To discipline and subordination no Arab will ever submit. It is an old observation that the only thing which has ever unified them has been religion, and even that never for long. In consequence, the Turks were able, though with difficulty, to keep them under until the Arab chance came in the war. That common uprising united them for a time; now, out of the confusion, the Kingdom of the Hijaz, a dubious Kingdom of Syria and another still more dubious of Mesopotamia, seem to have arisen; but for how long none can prophesy. Religion, the only force which, according to the old and true saying, could unite them, is the one force which must not. That way madness lies. And now in recoil from foreign domination, the attraction of a common cause is being found even with the Turks. Not that the Arabs wish the Turks back again; they must stay on their own side of the mountains. But, when all has been said, they are Orientals and, at least, nominal Moslems, trying to hold their own against an all-devouring West, and if they are overthrown or weakened beyond measure, all Moslem peoples will be weakened thereby.

But modern Indian Islam has never known the Turk and has never suffered from him: It believes quite fixedly, with of course varying degrees of understanding, that Turkey in the past has not had a fair deal; has been more sinned against than sinning. That is, those who have some knowledge of the Turkish situation and problem so believe. For the masses the Ottoman Sultans have been far-off, half-legendary rulers, the greatest ruling independent Moslem realms and meeting the kings of Christendom on equal terms. Now they have fallen on evil days, and so it is for all Moslems to rally to their support; the solidarity of Islam must mean at least as much as that. It is true that they have made war on the British Raj, and Indian Islam has fought against them loyally; but the long years of friendship between Britain and Turkey should now be remembered, and too great a penalty should not be imposed. In this, of course, there is an immense amount of the will to believe; but there can not be any doubt that the Moslem masses in India do so believe. It does not mean disloyalty on their part or even, in any strict sense, a divided loyalty; it is rather a profound sentiment based on community of religion and on ancestral devotion and respect.

II. There can not be much doubt that the conception of the Caliphate is entering upon a period of change. But the time is far in the future when it will be safe to say that it has actually changed, and that there need no longer be any fear of a reversion to the original conception. And, so far, the position of the canonists of Sunnite Islam has been unanimous and clear. The Caliph is an administrator only; he is the executive of Islam, and he administers the whole system of Islam as it is related to this world and to the world to come. Strictly he should do it all personally; lead in the mosque prayers, preach the Friday sermon, judge in the law courts, head the armies in war. As that is impossible, his office has gradually been put into commission, and all the functionaries who do these things are his delegates. But he has no power of legislation, or even of interpretation. Still less is he a spiritual head who can bind the consciences of the Moslems, but otherwise has no control over them. The systems of theology and of canon law have been formulated by the inerrant Agreement of the Moslem people, and he must accept these and can administer only these. He may have his own opinion; but that is only as an individual Moslem and not as Caliph. In consequence no non-Moslem sovereign state can allow him any authority with regard to its Moslem subjects. That would mean, at the least, that he was a suzerain, however that term may be defined, and it might mean that he could interfere at any point in the administration of that state.

So, ideally, the canonists put it; the practice has, of course, varied greatly; but has always been based on the fundamental fact that the Caliph is the executive in the state. Also, as priesthood of any kind is unknown to Sunnite Islam, he has never been an authority in his own right in spiritual things. To the Turks the Caliphate came after their conquest of Egypt in 1517 by legacy from the last Abbasid Caliph, then resident there. This transfer was perfectly legal if accepted and ratified by the people, and since then the Ottoman Sultans have been formally elected Caliph by the Shaikh al-Islam, acting as representative of the people, at the time of their inauguration as Sultan. But for them these two titles were of very different practical value. The title of Sultan meant that they were rulers of the factual Ottoman state, while Caliph meant only a claim to rule over a vague Moslem world. It was of far greater importance to them to extend the actual Ottoman boundaries—especially so as to include the Sacred Cities, Mecca and Medina—than to stress an historical and practically impossible headship. It is true that later, within the last couple of centuries, Turkish diplomats found the Caliphate useful as a card to play in their game with the European Powers. They found that the idea of spiritual headship, of a papacy in fact, was current among these Powers and acceptable to them, and that the possession of such a status would add greatly to the influence and dignity in Europe of the Ottoman state. It gave Turkey, in the eyes of Europe, that hegemony of the Moslem world which she desired, while, being spiritual only, it seemed to do away with all fear of Turkish meddling with the Moslem subjects of European Powers. Naturally then, this misconception of the Caliphate was encouraged, and Turkey's possession of the title was emphasized. The European Powers were misled, or, at least, public opinion in Europe was, while Moslems in general and the Moslem subjects of these Powers in particular knew very well that the recognition of the Ottoman Caliphate meant that the Sultan was overlord de jure and in part de facto to all Europe.

Meanwhile, for the Arabs or Arabic speakers, the Caliphate meant the Successorship of the Prophet, and was limited by accepted tradition in such ways as legally to exclude all Turks and similar parvenus. "So long as there are two left of the tribe of Quraish," says a tradition from Mohammed, "one of them will be Caliph and the other his helper." This the Arabs always remembered, even when they had to submit to the force majeure of the Turks. The Caliphate, therefore, was and is for them a high ideal office. It reminds them that Mohammed was the Prophet of the Arabs and that it was under the early Caliphs that their race swept to victory from Samarcand to Spain. It reminds them of the days of undivided empire and of the future apocalyptic days when Islam will be led by a true Successor of the Prophet to the conquest of the whole earth. For those whose minds are not attuned to so lofty a strain it is reminiscent of all the glories of the vanished Moslem courts, of the Omayyads at Damascus, and the Abbasids at Bagdad and the Fatimids at Cairo. So loaded with memories and hopes is the Caliphate for them—a symbol of the necessary and essential unity of all Islam and of the glory of the Arab race. Nor can they separate it from the long theological and legal development through which it has lived. Their Caliph, as Successor of the Prophet, must be an orthodox Moslem, as orthodoxy has come with them to be understood. That does not necessarily mean the rigors of the puritanic and Calvinistic Wahhabites; but he must himself profess broad, orthodox Islam—be a Sunnite in that sense of the term—and must regard himself as the head of such Moslems and as essentially opposed to all wanderers from that faith, whether they be Shi'ites or of minor errant sects.

It might be thought that this last requirement should be taken for granted; that a Caliph must be an orthodox Moslem—"an unbelieving Pope will never do!" But the view of the Caliphate to which Indian Islam seems to have come suggests caution here. For it the Caliphate is now a symbol for all Islam in the widest conceivable sense, and their hope is that the Caliph of the time may be a centre round which all sects and parties may unite for mutual support and defense. They are thus, like the Turks, realists, but of a very different reality. The real thing for the Turks is the Turkish race, first the Ottomans and then all their connections; for Indian Moslems the real thing is the People of Mohammed, as it exists at the present day, apart from creed, school, or history. They are the only absolute Panislamists, for with them Panislam is not, as it was with Abd al-Hamid, a political means, but a faith. Some of their leaders may have schemes or ambitions; but the masses are undoubtedly simple and sincere. This tendency has been long present in Islam, and has, from time to time, asserted itself in individual theologians. One of the greatest of them all, in the early twelfth century, said, "Keep a guard on thy tongue as to people who turn in worship towards the Ka'ba." He meant that they were all to be reckoned, without questions being asked, as fellow Moslems. And modern conditions in India have tended to foster this catholic tendency. All kinds of Moslem sects are there, and they are all face to face with the crassest forms of polytheism and idolatry. They are all, too, under the Pax Britannica, bound over to keep the peace not only with their own heretics but with these flagrant idolaters. Naturally they draw together in spirit and the All-India Moslem League is the consequence. Its President was, perhaps is, the head by right of blood of the sect of Khajas, who were the Assassins of the Crusaders, and he himself is the lineal descendant of the Old Man of the Mountain—an absolute heretic if not an unbeliever for orthodox Islam. Through the English education of the leaders, too, they have for years been soaked in ideas of tolerance and union. In truth, church union seems to be in the air, and the same air is breathed in India as in the United States. Thus it came about that all Indian Moslems, Sunnites and Shi'ites with far out heretical sects to which earlier Islam refused the name of Moslem at all, have united on behalf of the Turks. Less easy to understand is their hostility to the King of the Hijaz, a Moslem of unexceptionable orthodoxy and a descendant of the Prophet in de facto possession of the Sacred Cities. But he is also a rebel against the Ottoman Sultan, and in India the glamour of Constantinople and of its great Caliph has long worked powerfully. There the Indian Moslems thought they had found the centre and symbol of the Moslem world for which they had hoped. Other, and less ideal elements, including the complicated politics of Arabia itself, have also probably played a part; but the decisive movement has certainly been loyalty to the Ottoman Sultan. It has driven some of them so far that they have formulated a demand that the lost provinces—Syria, Mesopotamia, Arabia, especially the Sacred Cities—should be returned to Turkey. That is a hopelessly impossible position, which certainly does not express the mind of these provinces and which suggests influence from Turkey itself. Yet it makes plain that for India the Ottoman Sultanate is the great fact in Western Islam.

III. It is probable that the average Turk is puzzled at the prominence which Constantinople has come to hold in these discussions. He has never felt especially at home there; Brusa, for example, as compared to it, is to him home. Just as so many Turks have abandoned Bulgaria and Thrace, so he, with a comparatively easy mind, would move on across the Straits. In all Constantinople there is only one specially sacred place, the mosque built over the alleged tomb of Ayyub, a Companion of the Prophet, who fell in that first unsuccessful siege of the city in or about A. D. 672, nearly 800 years before its capture. There the Ottoman Sultans are inaugurated by being girt with the sword of Othman by a deputy from the Head of the Mevleviyeh Dervishes at Konia. With Adrianople the ties are much older and closer, and the present threats of the Turkish army in Thrace to hold it by force are intelligible.

But with the Arabs, again, the case is different. Constantinople, for them, marks a great conquest of Islam. Their memories carry back to the first fiery raids under the immediate Successors of the Prophet, when Constantinople was reached but not taken; then to the later long-drawn-out conflict, when the Byzantines reëstablished and held the lines of the Taurus against them. That the Ottomans should finally have taken, made their capital, and held so long that city of long-deferred hopes, marked them as great conquerors and restorers of Islam, and that they should now lose it would be bitter, even to those who have cast off allegiance to them. We have here, again, the solidarity of Islam rising above race, language, and local hostilities. It is a different matter from their personal feeling towards the Turks qua Turk, and very different from their feeling towards the Ottoman Sultan as claimant of the canonical Successorship of the Prophet—he, an interloper and "climber," without lot or part, except by violence, in the sacred memories and associations of the Arab race! But, again, with the Arabs, as with all, there is another constant moment uniting them with the Turks. They recognize perfectly clearly that for centuries the Turks have represented the East as against the West, have stood in the gate, by diplomacy and by force, against that which for the whole East was and is the great peril, the ever-advancing and devouring West. But when so sweeping a statement as this is made, what of the attitude of the Oriental Christian peoples? Do they feel themselves as Orientals solid with the Moslem peoples among whom they are scattered? It may safely be answered that, given personal security and equality, they, too, would be part of this solidarity of Asia. The Egyptian Copts are an example: In the security of the British Protectorate—that is the irony of such things—they are joining the Moslem Nationalists, as Orientals against the West. In so doing they shut their eyes, wittingly or unwittingly, to the fact that the ultimate object of their agitation must be the removal of that protectorate and their own suppression and political destruction by the enormous preponderance of the Moslem population. For it can not be overemphasized that no Moslem state or civilization can, in fact, give citizenship and equal rights to its non-Moslems. It may possibly, in contradiction to the basal principles of Islam, write these into its constitution, but the non-Moslems can secure and enjoy their rights only by having actual force behind them. And the Moslems, left to themselves, will always revert to that basal Islam.

The same considerations hold with Indian Moslems; they feel the solidarity of Islam and they also feel the solidarity of the East. But so far as they have been affected by English education, and that is very widely and deeply, another element enters. They think of Constantinople in terms of our classical world. They have read their Gibbon, even if they have not their Virgil, and Constantinople is for them New Rome, the City of Constantine, before it is the City of the Sultans. There the Ottoman Sultans represent the Byzantine emperors and carry on the line of the Cæsars. To minds thus nurtured the thought that the City of Europe, the πόλις—many remember that Stamboul means εἰςτὴνπόλιν—has been held by Eastern hands for nearly five hundred years—works like a spell, and to abandon it would be proof of the final decadence of Islam. This may be set against the sentiment of Christendom that the dome of Santa Sophia must again be given to Christian worship.

Such are, fairly, the foundations of the problem. But the essence of the problem is simply the Turks. There are so and so many millions of them, scattered through such and such territory; what can be done with them? We can not employ with them their own methods with the Armenians; so they are on our hands. There must be some way, perhaps a makeshift one, found to control them. For how to control them is the question, and whatever method really controls them is right, and the right method can be found only by trying. It may be that they can be controlled from Constantinople; it may be that that will only split them up. Then they must lose Constantinople and the control must be pushed into Asia Minor. Whatever may come of the rather premature Kingdoms of Syria and Mesopotamia, the French are now advancing again into Northern Syria and Cilicia and the Greeks are advancing from Smyrna. The British will have to hold the mountains which command the Mesopotamian plains and the southern shores of the Caspian. The pity is that a precious year has been lost through waiting, mostly for this country to discover its own mind. And now it will be well for us, in our turn, to be realists; that is, to recognize facts instead of spinning theories, however beautiful. The gorgeous figments of a new heaven and a new earth are gone, and both here and in the East we must make the best of the same old conditions and the same old human nature. This country definitely declines to take a mandate; it can, therefore, claim little voice in the settlement. Whatever League of Nations can now come into being, if any, can be but feeble, and yet all actually in contact with the situations agree that a League to affect anything must have a very big and thick stick and be prepared to break it over certain heads. And these heads are not those of the supposed predatory European Powers, but of the little nationalities which have sprung into existence out of the debris of Turkey, and which are ready to fly at one another's throats. The old Turkish Empire is now fairly Balkanized, for better or for worse. And, finally, we must not imagine that any settlement is going to be permanent, for many a long day to come. This may sound like despair; it is really hope. The nations must fight their own way out to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They may be guarded and protected in that, but the burden of the struggle is and must be their own.

D. B. Macdonald

The Third Internationale

According to a cablegram from The Hague of March 20, a special edition of the Tribune, the organ of the Dutch Communists, has given publicity to the complete list of resolutions adopted by a secret meeting of the Third Internationale held at Amsterdam on February 3 and following days. The public in Holland will have received the news with more than its usual phlegm, as an extensive report of this secret conference had appeared in the papers more than a month before the conspirators put a bold face on the matter and made their Tribune repeat what a bourgeois journal had betrayed. It was the Amsterdam Handelsblad which, a week after the meeting, brought the first revelations. Communists, even when secretly conspiring, remain communicative creatures. One of them must have unburdened his mind to an undeserving bourgeois journalist, whose faithful report in the Handelsblad remained for more than a month the only source whence the Communist subscribers to the Tribune could draw information as to how their interests were being cared for by the great political thinkers of the party.

The Handelsblad chose the right moment for its disclosures. For on that same day, February 14, a general strike was declared in the Rotterdam and Amsterdam harbors, the demand of the laborers being an increase of wages, in which the four principal labor groups, Socialists, Communists, Roman Catholics, and members of the Christian Workers Union, however much differing among themselves in political views, could go hand in hand.

But when the report of the secret Communist meeting was disclosed in the Handelsblad, the leaders of the two last-mentioned groups realized that they were allied with men who used the demand for an increased wage as a pretext, merely, for starting an action directed against the control both of the harbor and the City Government, although, when they entered into the compact with the radicals, it had been emphatically stipulated that their action was to be economic and non-political. The advisors of the Roman Catholic laborers, therefore, counseled their followers to resume work at once, but—an ominous sign of the times and of the futility of leadership when once the masses have been turned loose—the men refused unanimously to do as they were told and stuck faithfully to their Communist comrades.

The strike has lasted now for seven weeks, and there is little chance that it will soon be called off. The Holland-America Line announces in the New York papers that "on account of strike in Holland, sailings up to and including April 3 have been canceled." The Federation does not lack money to finance it. "The Russian Soviet Government," says the Handelsblad report of the Communist meeting of February 6, "has placed at the disposal of the Executive Bureau of the Third Internationale a collection of diamonds, pearls, and other precious stones to a value of twenty million rubles," which, as was explained by Mr. S. J. Rutgers, the happy bearer of this news from Moscow, "must be used for the support of every strike and every movement which bears a revolutionary character." Amsterdam is a regular market for the sale of stolen jewelry from Russia, and one of the brokers employed by the gentlemen-dealers of Moscow is a Communist member of the City Council. Diamonds are offered for sale as imported from Denmark, although Copenhagen has never had any trade in that line. The wife of Mr. Rutgers is less mysterious about their origin than the jobbers. She makes no secret of it that she brought a diamond cross, a pearl necklace, one big and one small diamond to Holland in order to sell them for the benefit of the Communist movement.

This Mr. Rutgers is a Dutch engineer, who has been for some time in the employ of the Soviet Government, and, happening to be in Moscow at the time, attended the constitutive assembly of the Third Internationale. Its international character was not apparent at that first meeting, for the only non-Russian members were Chinese, Poles, Letts, and prisoners of war from the countries of the Central and Allied Powers. Lenin, being desirous to internationalize his Internationale, sent Mr. Rutgers to his native country with the mission there to effect an extension of the new organization, and to prepare a Bolshevist Conference for the West European countries and the United States. Lenin's choice of Holland as the centre for this propaganda scheme was explained in these words, verbally quoted by Mr. Rutgers from the Soviet Tsar: "It is a quiet country with a feeble reaction," a characterization which has caused no little amusement in Holland, as the brave David Wijnkoop, the Dutch Trotsky, is never tired of denouncing the bourgeois Government at The Hague as a gang of reactionary despots. The remark justifies, incidentally, the drastic measures against bolshevist agitation in this country, which will save it from the distinction conferred upon Holland by the great man at Moscow.

Mr. Rutgers was assisted in the execution of his great mission by the poets Herman Gorter and Henriette Roland Holst van der Schalk, by the astronomer Dr. A. Pannekoek, and the politicians W. van Ravesteyn and David Wynkoop. Obedient to Lenin's orders, they called a secret international conference, which was attended by representatives from Germany, Switzerland, the Netherland East Indies, Russia, England, Belgium, Hungary and the United States. The chief item on the programme was the formation of an Executive Bureau of the Third Internationale which will await its orders direct from Moscow. Sub-bureaus are to be established in North America, East Asia, Spain, and Mexico. Once in three months the countries which have joined Lenin's Internationale will send a delegate to the Bureau at Amsterdam.

With regard to Soviet Russia the following resolution was passed:

> A revolutionary action of labor for forcing international capitalism to make peace with Russia is a necessary condition for the salvation of Russia and the maturing of the world revolution. In order to promote this action, the communists in all countries must make use of every strike and every mass demonstration, must remind the working classes of their responsibility towards the Russian revolution, must convince them of the analogy between their own and Russia's aspirations, and promote all over the world a strong feeling of revolutionary solidarity. Under the growing pressure of labor on the various Governments the latter have begun to evince a desire for a compromise with Russia, not with a view to peace, but in order to dislocate Soviet Russia from within. The recent proposals for a resumption of trade relations by means of reactionary representatives of pre-revolution co-operatives, which since have been merged in the Soviet organizations, have no other purpose than to drive a wedge between peasants and laborers and to crush the Soviet monopoly. Under the disguise of such manœuvres a great spring offensive is being prepared, which must be prevented at all cost. This Bureau, therefore, must immediately take steps to organize an international demonstrative strike against intervention in Russia. Such a strike must not only demand the cessation of the blockade and intervention in Russia, but ought also to press political and economic demands, in accordance with the revolutionary development of each separate country. This demonstration must be supplemented by coercive strikes in proportion to the power which the workers can command for such an action. The appeal to the workers for an international strike must be made not exclusively through the medium of the bureaucracy of the trade unions, but should preferentially be straightway addressed to the masses both within and without these organizations, over the heads of their leaders.

A long discussion had preceded the passing of this lengthy resolution, especially about a proposal of comrades Murphy and Frayna, delegates from England and the United States, which the Handelsblad gives as follows:

> The imperialistic Governments try to justify their own aggression by accusing the Soviet Government of aggressive aims. Soviet Russia admits that revolutions have their origin, not in attacks from abroad, but in forces developed in the country itself. Soviet Russia is now waging a defensive war, which her imperialistic opponents force upon her. It will cease as soon as the imperialistic Governments accept peace on the conditions which the Soviet Government has formulated more than once. If, however, the opposition of the imperialistic

Governments should compel Soviet Russia to change her defensive war into a military offensive, either against the West or the East, an appeal would be addressed to the workers in the other countries not to offer resistance to the Soviet armies, but to expel their own bourgeois Governments and proclaim the Soviet Republic.

Against this resolution the great David Wijnkoop raised a warning voice, because it would play into the hands of the reactionary Governments. "It is perfectly true," he said, "and it may safely be admitted in this meeting, but if the bourgeoisie should come to know of these plans, it would exploit them against us and accuse us of reckoning on an invasion of the Soviet armies and of intending to aid them. I should like to know what Mr. Rutgers" (who represented the Soviet Government) "has got to say on this point."

Mr. Rutgers agreed with David Wijnkoop that the resolution of comrades Murphy and Frayna was untimely. "The situation," he said, "is such that months may yet pass before the Soviet troops can begin an offensive outside Russia. The Soviet Government, I think, would hardly be pleased with the passing of this resolution." The opinion of Rutgers, the spokesman of Lenin, finished the matter; the resolution was immediately withdrawn, so that the bourgeoisie of the imperialistic countries might be kept hoodwinked a little longer.

The disclosures of the Handelsblad form a telling comment on the recent statement of Maxim Litvinov, the Soviet plenipotentiary at Copenhagen, as to Moscow's foreign policy: "We respect the right of every country to dispose freely of its own affairs, and will not interfere in the interior politics of other nations." What business has a Government so little meddlesome to establish Executive Bureaus and sub-bureaus in Holland, Spain, Mexico, the United States, East Asia? Are strikes no internal affairs, and is their financing with the loot of the Soviets no interference in the interior politics of other nations? And how does comrade Litvinov reconcile his promise of non-interference in the domestic affairs of other nations with the conviction of the secret conference that "a revolutionary action of labor for forcing international capitalism to make peace with Russia is a necessary condition for the salvation of Russia and the maturing of the world revolution?" The answer to these questions is perfectly simple: it is not the Soviet Government which will be responsible for the universal upheaval, henceforth the Third Internationale, honestly internationalized, will do the dirty work, thereby allowing the official spokesmen of Russia to profess the Soviet Government's "respect for the right of every country to dispose freely of its own affairs."

A. J. Barnouw

Correspondence

The Adriatic Problem

To the Editors of The Review:

In your editorial on the Fiume problem in the Review for February 28 you state that "a strict application of the principle of racial self-determination would have allotted to Italy all the Eastern ports and islands of the Adriatic." Racial self-determination is a rather vague expression, but on any interpretation your statement seems wide of the truth. That the Italian race is either wholly absent from, or constitutes but a negligible fraction of, the population in the Eastern ports and islands of the Adriatic, save only the ports of Fiume and Zara and the Lussin-Cherso island groups, is frankly recognized by Italian as well as other authorities. The beautiful ethnographic map by Olinto Marinelli, the foremost living Italian geographer, published in the Geographical Review during the war, and the ethnico-linguistic maps by the Agostini Geographical Institute, which greatly exaggerate the Italian areas, agree in showing that the east side of the Adriatic is overwhelmingly Jugoslav. When President Wilson enunciated the principle of self-determination, all Italy protested through the press and through her official spokesman that this principle could not be applied to the settlement of Italy's frontier problems. The Jugoslav representatives agreed to a settlement of the whole issue by plébiscite because they were confident that not one port or island would vote for Italian rule.

Equally surprising is the assertion that "paradoxically, the Pact of London was more nearly in accord with the Fourteen Points than any subsequent proposal has been." Since the subsequent proposals have eliminated from Italian control over 200,000 Jugoslavs and only 14,000 Italians in Dalmatia, and over 100,000 Jugoslavs and only 4,000 Italians in the region at the head of the Adriatic, and have at the same time added only 10,000 Germans and Jugoslavs with less than 100 Italians in the Sexten Valley and Tarvis regions; and since, furthermore, they increase the security of Jugoslavia's access to the sea by removing Italian territory farther from Fiume, it is easily seen that they bring the settlement more closely into accord with such of the Fourteen Points as are applicable to the Adriatic problem.

You add that the Treaty of London "gave Italy virtually all of the Italian-speaking littoral." It would be more accurate to say that it gave to Italy all the economically and strategically most important Slavic-speaking littoral. It is frankly admitted by Italy and her allies that the Treaty of London was designed for strategic ends in-so-far as its Adriatic terms are concerned. And while many Jugoslavs do speak Italian, none of the parties to the Treaty denies that the Slavic-speaking population forms an overwhelming majority in the disputed areas. The Austrian census figures are based on language, and favor the Italian case, since many Jugoslavs give Italian as their language for business, political, cultural, and other reasons, while an Italian seldom if ever gives Slavic as his language. Yet the language statistics show less than 20,000 persons speaking Italian as their ordinary language and nearly 400,000 speaking the Slavic tongue in that part of the lands assigned to Italy by the Treaty of London which the President refuses to turn over to Italian sovereignty.

It is not my intention to go into questions where there is some possible ground for a reasonable difference of opinion, nor even into the oft-repeated assertion that Fiume is "an Italian city," although I think careful study will make clear to any fair-minded man the facts that the so-called Italian "majority" in Fiume is a little less than half the total population of the city, that it includes many Italian-speaking Jugoslavs who have no Italian blood in their veins, that it also includes several thousand citizens of Italy who never gave up their Italian citizenship, and that a very considerable proportion of the total Italian population, as well as the large Slavic and mixed population, is vigorously opposed to Italian sovereignty on the very substantial ground that it would mean the economic ruin of the port. But the specially staged "self-determination" of Fiume has obscured the real situation to many, and put the question in the realm of the debatable, where I am content to leave it.

Square Deal

New York, March 15

[Our correspondent justly calls attention to certain overstatements. His own figures, however, show that the mingling of races is such that no strict application of the principle of self-determination is possible. No mere reckoning of human debits and credits—Slavs assigned to Italy, and vice-versa, at all meets the case. We repeat the gist of our comment:—a commercial outlet should be assured to Jugoslavia; otherwise the presumptions are in favor of Italy, because of her sacrifices in the war, because of the necessity of securing her active adherence to the League, and because of her established cultural position and prospects. When disposing of an almost undeveloped region, statistics of the scanty population have secondary meaning. What counts greatly is the capacity of the claimants for developing and eventually peopling the territory.—Eds. The Review.]

"Keep Your Eye on Paisley"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Herbert H. Asquith's return to the House of Commons as member for the Scottish constituency of Paisley is not without much significance. "Keep your eye on Paisley," has been the maxim of political leaders in the old country for a long time. The town has historic industrial, and intellectual traditions of a peculiar kind. Asquith's constituency for nearly thirty years was the East Fife burghs, including St. Andrews, with its ancient university. The Fifeshire man, known as the "Fifer," is of the most "pawky" of canny Scots, and when Gladstone recommended the cultured young Yorkshireman from his own university of Oxford to the East Fife electors as a suitable candidate, he made an excellent choice. Both Gladstone and Asquith have combined in their characters the industrial instinct of the North Country man with the intellectual culture of their Southland university. Indeed, it is as a financier rather than as a statesman that Gladstone may finally be known to history. Gladstone himself, beginning political life as member for the University of Oxford, had finally to woo the suffrage of a Scottish constituency, that of Midlothian.

The higher "industrial call," as it may be termed—that is, the union of the historic sense and of intellectual acumen with the common sense of the manufacturer and businessman—is the call of the time to-day. The Paisley voter has a long national past behind him and combines these qualities. Two miles off, in the suburb of Ellerslie, the Scottish patriot, Sir William Wallace, was born. In its noble Abbey, left unharmed in the general destruction of religious edifices at the Reformation, lies buried a Stuart queen. In this magnanimity, Paisley wisely did not break with the past. In the eighteenth century it became an industrial centre, and Burns's Nannie, readers of "Tam o' Shanter" will remember, had a "sark of Paisley harn." An intelligent citizen of Paisley, visiting the Vale of Cashmere over a hundred years ago, made himself acquainted with the exquisite products of its looms, and planted the industry of "Paisley shawls" in the old burgh. Another Paisley man, James Coats, discharged after Waterloo with a meagre private's pension, was able to establish the manufacture of thread at Paisley in a way that made the name of Coats known all over the world. Paisley has also had a continuous literary tradition. The brightest lyric star after Burns was the Paisley weaver, Robert Tannahill, who celebrated the beauties of the Braes of Glennifer. At the close of last century, when the Marquis of Bute wished to establish a Scottish Review, it was to a Paisley editor, Dr. Metcalfe, and to the enterprising Paisley publishing firm of Gardner that he entrusted the work. And this same editor it was who brought out the revised edition of Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary, with supplement. Historically, intellectually, and industrially Asquith has thus again a constituency that will be able to appreciate him. The world still does well to "keep its eye on Paisley."

JAMES MAIN DIXON

San Francisco, California, March 3

Reducing the Human Cost of Living

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Is it permitted to say a word regarding Mr. Colcord's article on "The Human Cost of Living"?

1. Personally I deprecate the "sob stuff." Can we not leave this style to the muck-rakers and the journals of opinion?

2. Why compare those "killed and maimed" in industry with those "killed" on the Union side at Gettysburg? Unlike things can not be compared. The number killed daily in industry in the United States is 83. The number killed on the Union side in the three days' battle of Gettysburg was 3,072, or an average of 1,024 per day. The ratio, therefore, is not one to two but one to twelve.

3. The young lady in the chorus said that she had not yet learned much in her double-entry bookkeeping course at the business college but that she had found out that when you put something down on one page you put something down on the opposite page to contradict it. How then shall we make our ledger entries? If we put on the one page the 25,000 killed annually in industry, what shall be put on the other? The processes of civilization are held generally to have substantially added to the average of human life, and, whereas, say a century ago, the average length of life was approximately 32.22 years, it is now about 47.60 years. We have a population of approximately 110,000,000. These now die then at the average of 47.60 years, or 2,310,924 annually; whereas at the old rate the number of deaths annually would have been 3,414,028. We may then contrast the two entries, 25,000 lost and 1,103,104 saved.

4. But in and of itself the daily industrial loss of 83 is lamentable and it would be serious indeed were we compelled to adopt the writer's view that it is doubtful "if it is humanly possible to do more than our great industrial corporations . . . are doing to-day." Can not the workers themselves do something? Because we have swept off the statute books "contributory negligence" and "fellow-employees," have the things that they connoted disappeared?

Some years ago the then Governor of Pennsylvania in an effort to build up his political machine called an industrial conference. Mr. Gompers, in his interesting address, said that most of the industrial accidents occurred in the closing hour of work, and advocated the eight-hour workday as a remedy. I investigated the facts in one of the hazardous industries, itself on an eight-hour basis. The facts were that most of the accidents occurred in the first hour after the noon interval, and were attributed to the use of intoxicants by the workers during that interval. Voluntary reform or reform compulsory under prohibition may be a substantial remedy.

The railroad representatives at this conference called attention to fatal accidents on railroads (5,084 to trespassers and 2,031 to passengers and to employees in 1915) and advocated legislation to insure the prevention of trespassing. This was strenuously opposed by the leaders of organized labor, and the explanation passed around was that they were afraid that in the case of a strike the law might be used to prevent their easy access to railroad property, provided they wished to interfere with workers. It may be that the employer, alive to his responsibilities, has done all that he is able, but I think it likely that something remains to be done by the workmen through greater carefulness, more sober and responsible habits, and the selection of wiser leadership; and by the State through intelligent and courageous legislation.

5. From a bulletin recently received I abstract the following:

> In Pennsylvania there was reported in 1919 a total of 484 strikes, involving 171,630 wage earners, who lost in the aggregate 500,000 working days. The total strike loss is estimated at $14,000,000.
>
> In Pennsylvania the record of disabling accidents in industry for 1919 showed 152,544 cases, involving a wage loss of about $8,750,000.
>
> The abolition of strikes would mean as much or more saving for industry in general as would the complete prevention of accidents.*

It may well be that we should feel that the contrast as made is unsympathetic and gives but scant value to the human element, but on the other hand the strike loss is not fully indicated by the wage loss. There is always the suffering and the want, disease and death, the reduction to poverty and semi-starvation of thousands of workers, the dislocation of business enterprises, the dispersion of orders to other communities and other countries—consequences that may endure long after the strike is over.

* Reference is made to Bulletin No. 157 of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U. S. Department of Labor, and to the articles "On the Improvement in Longevity during the 19th Century in the Netherlands," by Pereira and Landré, and "On the Improvement in Longevity in the United States during the 19th Century," by John K. Gore, published in Volume I of the Proceedings of the Fourth International Congress of Actuaries.

L. F. Loree

New York, March 8

Religious Liberty

To the Editors of The Review:

I note with interest the proposal of Mr. Cyrus H. Eshleman, in your issue of February 28, that the Government should "supervise and regulate" religion. It is not a novelty, however. Cujus regio ejus religio was a sixteenth century maxim which can be applied under democratic control as well as under personal rule; and the policy of the dominant faction in "Red" Russia appears to be quite on that line. The French Revolutionists of the Terror tried it, too, with what success we know. But I fail to see why the proposed revival of secular tyranny over spiritual matters should be thought either "liberal," "rational," or "progressive." Such use of undefined terms darkens counsel, even though it is too often characteristic of "modern thinkers."

Mr. Eshleman forgets that historic Christianity is based upon a historic fact: the life of Jesus Christ. Christians believe that Jesus Christ is God made Man, a living Revelation of the invisible Father. Catholic Christians believe that He established a Divine Society, His Church, which shall endure, essentially unaltered, so long as the world stands. They believe that they already know the Truth, and are made free by that knowledge; and they respectfully decline Government regulation of their belief and worship, or membership in a state-controlled religious Trust. Even non-Christians will acknowledge that if men are convinced of the divine authority of a teacher, they can not make better use of their reason than by obeying him.

Mr. Eshleman is wrong when he declares that Orthodox believers worship the Bible or the Church. Whether Protestant or Catholic, they worship Jesus as their Lord and God, their living Head. And when it is proposed to "substitute progress for the idea of finality," Mr. Eshleman must tell us what he means by progress, and towards what goal. It is possible to go ahead until one is hopelessly bogged, if one does not know the way or its end.

This is no place to debate the issues between Christianity and secular systems of thought; but, to speak a word for religious liberty, in view of an apparent threat, may perhaps be allowed. And it is significant that the advocate of state control of religion should be not an ecclesiastic, but a professed liberal and rationalist, supposedly animated by the modern spirit.

William Harman van Allen

Boston, March 2

The Hazards of Book Reviewing

To the Editors of The Review:

In the first sentence of the review of "The Flow of Value" in the Review of March 20, my style receives wholesale condemnation supported by the quotation of what probably is the most abstruse sentence in the entire book. That sentence is the culmination of an elaborate line of reasoning. Unless the reader has been led up to that sentence not only will he find it "tedious," and "not to be read without effort," but he will find it utterly incomprehensible, without meaning at all. A man once said to me that Herbert Spencer's definition of Evolution was clear as crystal to the man who followed the exposition which culminated in that definition, but that if a negro minstrel were to take that definition alone and rattle it off in a vaudeville monologue it would bring a laugh from the entire audience. I hope the analogy is apparent. It is needless to say that no comparison is instituted between Herbert Spencer and myself.

Ninety-nine persons out of a hundred after reading that first paragraph not only would not read the book, but would not read the remainder of the review. To the mind of "a general reader" it would kill the book.

Logan G. McPherson

New York, March 22

[We feel that the opening paragraph of the review was likely to do Mr. McPherson's book the injustice of which he complains, though it was certainly not the intention of the reviewer to convey the impression that the sentence he quoted was typical. Had the remark been made anywhere but at the beginning of the review, its occurrence would, whether too severe as to the particular point or not, have been just one of the ordinary incidents of the hazardous trade of reviewing. As it is, we are glad to offset any wrong it may have done by pointing out that in the very next paragraph of the review the author's method of opening up his subject is commended as "one of the best ways to present it to those who are beginning to think economically"; that from this point on throughout the article, the work is commended for the straightforwardness and adequacy of its exposition; and that the closing paragraph of the review refers to the "clearness" with which the book develops its main thesis, the "vigorous enforcement" of which is declared to be a "real service."—Eds. The Review.]

Protection for Investors

To the Editors of The Review:

Senator Kenyon has introduced a bill, Senate No. 3702, which proposes Federal action to protect the investor against fraudulent stock promotions. Such legislation was urged by the Capital Issues Committee during the war, and by President Wilson in a recent message. The bill requires any corporation engaged in interstate commerce to give publicity to pertinent financial facts regarding new securities which it offers investors. Such information is to be filed with the local United States postmaster for public inspection, and also with the Federal Trade Commission at Washington, and, in addition to general facts regarding the corporation and its officers, and the latest balance sheet of the corporation, it must include a statement as to the purposes to which the proceeds of the new securities are to be devoted, and the terms of the flotation, including expenses and the names of the underwriters and others concerned with the original sale. A copy of this statement of information is to be attached to every bond and original certificate of stock and receipt for subscription. False statements are punishable as perjury and the United States District Attorney is made responsible for enforcement. Purchasers of original securities regarding which misstatements are made may recover by suit twice the amount of the purchase price, but the suit must be brought within a year of the time of purchase. The precise form which this statement should take is a matter on which expert opinion will differ, but the requirement of such a statement regarding new issues seems a sound public policy.

Still further control is effected through the public post office by the proposed enactment that the mailing of any original securities for which the required statement has not been filed or the mailing of any required statement regarding securities known to be false shall be a punishable offense.

The details of the Kenyon bill should of course be scrutinized carefully by those concerned technically with the promotion of securities, for such legislation, to be effective, must be workable. Their judgment may, however, be supplemented by that of disinterested laymen who see not only the great loss every year through fraudulent securities, but also the still greater check excited by such fraudulent activities on the growth of a habit of thrift. To one judging the situation from this point of view the Kenyon bill offers hope of a legitimate method of control, and the undersigned urges that Senator Kenyon's bill receive widespread consideration.

Benjamin R. Andrews

New York, March 16

Religious Revivals—Old and New

IN the financial columns of a New York evening newspaper there appeared recently a cable dispatch from its London correspondent which declared that there was a growing feeling among "hard-headed business men" that the best hope of checking the Bolshevist spirit lay in "a genuine religious revival."

That, on the face of it, seems rather a remarkable statement, coming from such a source. When one speaks of a religious revival one thinks instinctively of the Billy Sunday type of evangelism or of the old-fashioned emotional revivals led by some prominent evangelist who made a swing around the circle, rousing men and women to confess their sins and join the church.

It is hardly possible to overrate the influence in shaping the character of the American people that such periodic revivals exercised. They have become an intimate part of American history, and no account of the development of American character and institutions can ignore them. But clearly this is not the type of revival that one would expect to appeal to "the hard-headed business man" as a probable cure for Bolshevism. What he doubtless had in mind was a general quickening of the spiritual life of the country through a more acute realization of the truths of Christianity, an emphasis on the spiritual as opposed to the material things of life.

In point of fact, it may fairly be asserted that in America this kind of revival is already under way, and there are signs that it is spreading, by way of the great Dominions, Canada and Australia, to the British Isles. The man in the street may feel inclined to grumble at the frequency with which he is invited to pull out his pocketbook; occasional doubt may even be expressed as to the administrative economy of some of these appeals to the charitable public; but it is a rather remarkable tribute to the spiritual emphasis of these drives that it does not seem to have occurred to any one to cast serious doubts on the fundamental worth of the objects involved.

No doubts are, of course, possible. Almost without exception the drives have been in aid of some eleemosynary, educational, or religious cause of unquestioned standing. They have come at a time when the country is rolling in wealth, and there can hardly be a doubt that the spiritual blood-letting, if one may call it that, which they have accomplished has been an uncommonly good thing for the community.

This, then, is the new type of revival, displaying itself, broadly speaking, in appeals to the public to concern themselves with the things of the spirit in the most practical and effective manner possible by providing money for their support. More specifically, of course, the term revival is particularly applicable to those appeals which have a definitely religious end in view. Started by a small denomination, the Disciples of Christ, which in 1918 "went over the top," as the jargon of the "drive" has it, with a total subscription of $6,500,000, the fashion of these intensive campaigns has been adopted by one denomination after another. The most conspicuous example so far is, of course, the Centenary Movement of the two branches, North and South, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which subscribed the magnificent total of $168,000,000.

Now the ambitious programme of the Centenary is to be eclipsed by the Interchurch World Movement of North America, with an appeal to the Protestant constituency of the country for a sum of no less than $336,000,000, the intensive campaign by which this enermous sum is to be raised being scheduled to take place during the one week, April 25 to May 2. As a matter of fact the total is not quite so staggering as it sounds, for whereas the Centenary Movement, which was able to raise $168,000,000, represented only two denominations, the Interchurch World Movement represents thirty with members and adherents numbering some 30,000,000. Indeed, one compelling cause for the Movement's coming into existence was the clearly seen necessity for some kind of coördination among the various Protestant churches of the country in making their appeals for public support. The various Protestant denominations have profited so well by the lessons taught them by the Disciples of Christ and the Methodists that at the present time there are completed, under way, or in immediate contemplation more than thirty different denominational "forward movements," all appealing to their several constituencies for various sums which amount in the aggregate, for the five years which most of the forward movements adopt as the period of their programme, to considerably more than half a billion dollars.

It does not need the assistance of an efficiency expert to realize the inevitable economic waste and duplication of effort involved in conducting all these separate "drives," not to speak of the almost certain apathy or irritation that the multiplicity of appeals would ultimately induce in the general public. It is obvious also that, even if the money was collected, in the framing of a number of different programmes, each independent of all the others, the evils of overlapping and duplication could hardly be avoided, and consequently that the money collected would not be applied to the missionary and other benevolent objects of the various churches in the most economical and effective manner possible.

Both these dangers were realized by the churches in time, with the result that thirty denominations have agreed to unite their forces in the financial campaign of the Interchurch World Movement, and to adjust their programmes of expansion so as to avoid competition one with another. The denominational forward movements retain their integrity, just as the various churches retain their complete denominational autonomy. They will canvass their own constituencies for funds, and these funds will be applied to their own treasuries. At the same time a joint campaign committee in each community, consisting of representatives of all the local churches participating in the campaign, will make an appeal to citizens who are not identified by membership with any church. Funds derived from this source and not expressly given for a particular denomination will go to a central treasury in care of the Interchurch World Movement, and at the end of the financial year will be distributed pro rata among the participating denominations.

A study has been made of the exact facts of the situation, and these facts are available to the coöperating denominations and to any other denomination that may subsequently decide to participate in the Movement. The opinion of the newspaper correspondent quoted at the head of this article indicates part of the opportunity that is given to the churches, and careful inquiries made among representative men in various walks of life in this country show that that opinion is very widely shared. There is a deep and growing conviction that our domestic problems are going to be solved only through an increasing recognition by employers and employees alike of the essentially Christian principle of the brotherhood of man. Both capital and labor have rather fallen into the habit of late of assuring the church that here is an unparalleled opportunity to assert its influence—by which they usually mean to throw its weight into the particular scale which the appellant represents—and the church has at times appeared inclined to adopt an attitude of apology for its inability to assist matters. There is a good deal of evidence that church leaders in these days are inclined to take a sounder and more aggressive view of the church's position, and their reply to the vociferations of both sides is: "No, gentlemen, this is not our opportunity, it is your opportunity. We are not a species of industrial expert to be called in when you are in trouble to settle things for you, while you yourselves remain outside the church. You come inside the church, and you will find that you will quickly settle things for yourselves."

STANLEY WENT

Book Reviews

Three American Labor Leaders

Labor and the Common Welfare. By Samuel Gompers. Edited by Hayes Robbins. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

W. B. Wilson and the Department of Labor. By Roger W. Babson. New York: Brentano's.

Debs: His Authorized Life and Letters. From Woodstock Prison to Atlanta. By David Karsner. New York: Boni and Liveright.

It is an interesting and perhaps significant fact that all three of these notable American labor leaders are of foreign extraction. Samuel Gompers was born in London, in the year 1850, and came to America at the age of thirteen. William Bauchop Wilson was born at Blantyre, near Glasgow, in 1862, and came to Arnot, Pennsylvania, at the age of eight. Eugene Victor Debs is a native of Indiana, but his parents, Jean Daniel and Marguerite Bettrich Debs, were French Alsatians from Colmar. When these facts are noted, it is easy to see the tenacious pugnacity of the bulldog breed in Gompers, the untiring industry of the canny Scot in Wilson, and the fierce revolutionary idealism of the French in Debs.

The most extraordinary thing about Samuel Gompers is the fact that he has held the presidency of the American Federation of Labor from 1882 until the present time, with the exception of a single year. His enemies say that he is a labor fakir and a political boss, who, by alliance with the big national unions, has created a machine which the small factions, lacking leadership and the advantage of office, have been unable to break; but Mr. Gompers, though an astute politician, is far more than that—he is the voice of organized labor, expressing, as no one else has done, the principles and purposes of craft unionism in America during the past forty years.

Perhaps Mr. Robbins in his valuable compilation of addresses and editorials may have selected those giving the most favorable impression of Mr. Gompers's labor philosophy; but, making due allowance for the personal equation of the compiler, it must be admitted that Mr. Gompers has a record for consistency in his utterances such as few politicians of any stripe can show. He is so consistent, in fact, as to incur suspicion of insincerity in repeating the shibboleths of former days, which, although they still appeal to the multitude, must have long since lost much of their meaning for him. But, of course, no esoteric philosophy of labor is here revealed.

Mr. Gompers has been preaching the gospel of trade unionism for nearly forty years with great emphasis upon the rights of labor and with but slight mention of correlative duties. Among the most sacred are the right to organize, locally, nationally, or internationally, as may seem most advantageous; the right to bargain collectively through representatives of locals or nationals, as the laborers may prefer; the right to ask for better and still better wages, hours, and conditions of labor; the right of a body of laborers to strike, or withhold their labor; the right of laborers to boycott or withhold their purchasing power from obnoxious employers; the right to picket, to "peacefully persuade," or to use other lawful means to prevent the employment of strike breakers, or to extend a boycott. For many years, especially since the passage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890 and the Pullman Strike of 1894, Mr. Gompers has protested against the use of the injunction in labor disputes, and has contended that labor is not a commodity or article of merchandise; until finally his views were in part incorporated in the Clayton Act of 1913, and, apparently, labor was absolved from the sin of conspiracy in restraint of inter-State trade.

Although Mr. Gompers has been an antagonist of many individual capitalists, he has been at the same time a defender of capitalism against those who would kill the cow that gives such abundant milk or the goose that lays the golden eggs. He condemns Socialism as "economically unsound, socially wrong, and industrially impossible." Nor is he any too friendly to "welfare workers, social uplifters and busy-bodies, intellectuals and professional public morals experts," who are condescendingly trying to do for the laborers what they, when organized, can far more effectively do for themselves. Also, Mr. Gompers has stood out against the creation of a labor party, preferring the traditional method of pledging candidates and manipulating the balance of power, although quite recently he has seemed to waver on this point. Mr. Gompers is nothing if not self-sufficient, assuming, as the priest of trade unionism, that organized labor can do no wrong, and justifying its ways by a strange mixture of sound and specious reasoning. As for reproof and admonition of his constituents, Mr. Gompers does not indulge in it, but takes them as they are for better or worse—and here is another reason for his long tenure of office.

The Honorable William Bauchop Wilson, as presented by Mr. Babson, is not so much an evangelist and bishop of the labor church as a sort of Dick Whittington, who came to this country a poor boy, and, by virtue of his ability, honesty, and steadfastness of purpose, became International Secretary of the United Mine Workers, then member of Congress, and, finally, the first Secretary of Labor in the United States. He was a studious boy, a "lad o' pairts," who, despite his lack of schooling and his entering a coal mine at the age of nine gave his spare time to poetry, philosophy, economics, and like solid reading, and thus acquired a truly liberal education, which with his native qualities has made him one of the best and sanest of American labor leaders.

It has been Mr. Wilson's fortune to be somewhat overshadowed by more conspicuous men, such as Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell, and President Wilson, but for all that, he stands high in the regard of all who know him. He has been criticised as biased in favor of labor, and his intervention in certain disputes has been resented by many employers, yet he tries to be fair to all parties, according to his light, and the dissatisfied should be thankful that the labor administration, especially during the world war, was not in worse hands. Certainly, Mr. Wilson is something more than a labor advocate, and his utterances on economic questions bear the marks of keen analysis and sound judgment worthy of a countryman of Adam Smith and James Mill. He is especially strong in his defense of collective bargaining, as opposed to the revolutionary views and proposals of the Socialists, who, after his examination of the alleged right to the whole product of labor, have scarcely a leg to stand upon.

Mr. Babson very properly combines with his biography of Mr. Wilson a brief history of the Department of Labor and of the bureaus which preceded it, which, while substantially accurate, is far from complete or final. Oddly enough, the brilliant and versatile Roger Babson appears in the foreground with occasional references to business barometers, the "law" of equal and opposite reaction, the Babson Composite Plot, and a chapter on business cycles, and he poses in two pictures of buildings connected with the early life of Secretary Wilson. It is a little hard, therefore, to tell where Babson begins and Wilson leaves off, for the biographer has not been quite able to play the part of Boswell to his Johnson.

David Karsner, a true hero worshipper, has done better by Eugene Victor Debs, and has made a loving portrait, which, although idealized in many respects, is far from imaginary and is almost a work of art. The ordinary reader who knows of Debs as a flaming revolutionist, four times candidate for the Presidency on the Socialist ticket, one of the founders of the I. W. W., and the comrade of "undesirable citizens" like Bill Haywood, will be surprised to find that Debs has neither hoofs nor horns, but is a simple-minded, affectionate, neighborly Hoosier poet, a sentimentalist and fanatic, no doubt, but a hail-fellow-well-met whether in a country store, a tavern, a socialist meeting, or a penitentiary. Debs was a great friend of Robert Ingersoll, James Whitcomb Riley, Eugene Field, and other literary men, all of whom have testified to his fine qualities of mind and heart. Mr. James Lyons, Mayor of Terre Haute, Mr. Debs' birthplace and home, said of him in 1907:

> While the overwhelming majority of the people here are opposed to the social and economic theories of Mr. Debs, there is not perhaps a single man in this city who enjoys to a greater degree than Mr. Debs the affection, love, and profound respect of the entire community. He numbers his friends and associates among all classes, rich and poor, and some of the richest men here, people who by very instinct are bitter against Socialism, are warm personal friends of Mr. Debs.

If all this be true, why is Eugene Debs in jail? He was sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary on September 14, 1918, by a United States Court in Cleveland, Ohio, for violation of the Espionage Law in a speech before the Ohio State Socialist Convention at Canton on June 16 of the same year. In this speech Mr. Debs characterized the entry of the United States into the war as the work of "Wall Street Junkers," condemned patriotism as "the last refuge of scoundrels," scarified Samuel Gompers as a friend of the capitalist class, praised the I. W. W., glorified the Bolsheviki as "the very breath of democracy and the quintessence of freedom," and made many other intemperate and insane remarks, all of which he proudly admitted before the court, without apology or retraction. Naturally, the court had to find him guilty of "attempting to cause and incite insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, and refusal of duty in the military and naval forces of the United States," and on several other counts as well, and the sentence was later confirmed by the United States Supreme Court. Now, Mr. Debs is in Atlanta prison, recalcitrant as ever and refusing even to ask for freedom lest such action should be construed as a withdrawal of his words and an admission of wrong-doing.

Eugene Debs glories in martyrdom, arouses sympathy among friends and enemies, and will probably make converts to Socialism from his prison cell; just as he made them on a free platform and by the articles that he was continually writing for the socialist press. In fact, unrestrained and morbid eloquence such as his, is just now at a discount, when even people of radical views realize that something more is needed for the healing of the world than maudlin sentimentality, Berserker rage, the revolutionary fervor of a paranoiac, or the frenzy of a whirling dervish—all forces of destruction, which, if given free rein, might easily ruin the whole fabric of civilization.

J. E. Le Rossignol

Reality and Antidote

The Inscrutable Lovers. By Alexander MacFarlan. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

Legend. By Clemence Dane. New York: The Macmillan Company.

I RECALL "Mockery" as a somewhat disconcerting and ill-balanced piece of ironic comedy with a fresh accent. It was a new voice speaking, whether one liked it or not, which is the one thing a reviewer of contemporary fiction most yearns for. Here now was another young comer, an Alexander MacFarlan to be by a few ears, at least, listened for: "The Inscrutable Lovers" is their sufficient reward. It is a comedy of simpler and firmer texture than its predecessor. It has not only brilliancy but a delicate completeness comparable to (not like) that of Mr. Hewlett's earlier bits of romantic comedy. It is based upon a paradox more than once announced of late, in one form or other, that the realist in art or in life is a person seeking escape from his own romantic nature, and vice versa.

The problem is worked out here purely in terms of life. There are only three human factors, Count Kettle, his daughter Margaret, and the young Macaig whom she absurdly marries. Count Kettle is that hapless one who tries to "live up to" his ideals, who is bent upon expressing instead of denying or escaping his romantic nature in action—a predestined failure accordingly. He is a worshiper of fine sentiments and phrases—a true worshiper, who can not learn that his companions are mostly sniggering in their sleeves. It is his pleasure and vanity to sacrifice himself and his family to any fine desperate cause. His invincible sentimentalism makes him the gull and victim of venial plotters. A costly and disillusionizing fiasco in Mexico has finally done for his wife. Now he is prepared to offer the rest of his fortune, and his daughter, as blindly to the uses of a pro-German plot, which is thinly masked for his benefit as a stroke for Ireland. But the daughter is not willing to be sacrificed. Though she has been brought up to be noble and highflown, she has a secret yearning for common sense. Hence her sudden marriage with the young Macaig, "from his infancy nourished upon facts." There she will take refuge from romantic torments, in the shelter of his humdrum and his commonplace. She is happy. But presently the quixotic Count, her father, becomes involved in a rascally plot (which is not rascally for his innocence), and confides his part in it to his daughter. She turns upon him and threatens to block his dangerous plans by telling her English husband. The Count is outraged: "He will treat my honor as—a fact!" he cries, ". . . He will regard the situation, this tragically delicate situation, as though it were a business problem. He will bend upon it all his prudence. Prudence!" Never mind, he shall be told, says Margaret: Macaig's very literalness will see the need of curbing the Count's wild project. Then comes the high point of the comedy; for Macaig, being told, shows himself to be quite another man from the stolid citizen they have taken for granted. He quite understands the Count, being a concealed romanticist who has abhorred the practical traditions of his house as Margaret has the impractical traditions of hers. And presently, when the Count is disposed of as gently as may be, the young pair are left to discover each other anew. He, it now transpires, has married her as "a daughter of the romantic life he coveted," while she has married him solely because he was not of that life, but "a plain, steady, dependable man with no—no dreams." However, they happen to love each other, and are not to be parted by theories, even theories of each other. The old priest, Father Clithero, says the last word about them: that "their characters are much the same and only their temperaments differ." Moreover, he perceives how slyly each will continue to impute his own impulses to the other, the wife finding evidence where you will that there must be "a practical streak in him somewhere," and the husband, that "she must be romantic at bottom." A delightful piece of literary comedy.

Readers of the first novel of Clemence Dane, "Regiment of Women," will remember there also a fresh accent. That was a satirical comedy dealing with the relations of women to each other—and breaking rather suddenly at the end into the romantic vein known to vulgar tabulation as "heart interest." Only in the relations of man and woman does the author, after all, find anything sound and satisfying. One may perceive a similar moral in "Legend," different as the tale is in scope and method. Its way of telling is original, as a single dialogue or scene, recalled some years later by one of the minor actors—or, one may almost say, hardly more than a chance witness. Place, Anita Serle's rooms, occasion, a sort of monthly salon of minor celebrities, literary and "artistic"; time, the day of the death in child-birth of a former member of their group, Madala Grey. It is the legend of Madala Grey, fresh-compounded by friends and intimates, that we are to hearken to; a legend touched quite as much with malice as with affection; a commentary on the quality of the surviving friends even more than of the dead one. Madala Grey, we gather, was a wholesome young woman with a touch of genius which drove her to the writing of two remarkable novels of realism, or naturalism. And having written them and been applauded for them, she found them harsh and ugly, and wished that she might write "a kind book, a beautiful book." This she did presently, with "The Resting-place," a romance beginning "There was once," and ending "happy ever after," and delighting a vast audience hungry for the fact or the illusion of happiness. Her literary friends of the Anita sort deplored this bitterly, tried to believe it a deliberate parody, and so on. But there followed the more disconcerting fact of her marriage to a commonplace honest fellow, with whom she was apparently quite content. And now she is dead as the result of her folly. Among the company who here sit informally upon the life and character of the departed are: the egotistic Anita, later to become famous as Madala's biographer; Mr. Flood, a supercilious littérateur with no heart; "the Baxter girl," a literary satellite; the chronicler, who is Anita's new secretary; and so on. Two figures who stand apart from the rest are the painter Kent who has really loved Madala and is stunned by her loss, and (unique portrait among them all) old lady Serle, Nita's mother, who has also loved Madala for her genuineness, and is blind to none of the pretentious littlenesses of her own daughter. . . . In the end, after the long making and remaking of the legend, comes the unexpected and a trifle superfluous bit of romantic convention in which, it seems, this writer habitually seeks refuge at the eleventh hour from her satire. Whether the whole performance is more than a brilliant tour de force may only be determined or estimated, after later readings; it is certainly well worth a first.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Cockpit of Christendom

A SHORT HISTORY OF BELGIUM. By Leon von der Essen. The University of Chicago Press.

THE history of Belgium, from the early Middle Ages down to the present time, is a compendium of European warfare. "The very cockpit of Christendom" the Netherlands were called by James Howell in his "Instructions for Forreine Travell," "the school of arms and rendezvous of all adventurous spirits and cadets; which makes most nations beholden to them for soldiers." And the Nuncio Bentivoglio, writing at about the same time, coined the phrase "arena militare," which became a standing designation for Belgium in books dealing with European history.

Readers of the present volume can not fail to recognize the aptness of these descriptive names. The country's geographic situation, which induced the Germans to invade it in 1914 at the cost of their good name in the world, made Belgium a battlefield and its people combatants in most of the wars which evolved from the eternal rivalry between Germany and France. It was the latter country, in those earlier conflicts, which menaced the independence of the Belgians. "France will absorb Flanders or will be destroyed by it," said the French King Philip Augustus. And, as in our days, it was England which, for her own safety, came to the assistance of the little country against the greatest Power of the Continent. The Emperor Otto of Brunswick and the Duke of Brabant joined the English-Flemish alliance, and on July 24, 1214, the battle of Bouvines was fought, which gave Philip Augustus victory over his enemies. This famous battle established the political hegemony of France in Europe and the subjection, for nearly a century, of the political and intellectual life of the Flemish. But they had revenge in 1302, when the Flemish Communes, in the Battle of the Golden Spurs, under the walls of Courtrai, inflicted a crushing defeat on the army of King Philip the Fair. That victory not only saved them from absorption by France but raised them to the prestige of an international power, whose alliance was sought by King Edward III of England in his war against King Philip of Valois. Under the leadership of Jacob Van Artevelde, "the greatest Fleming of all times," Flanders joined the English cause; not for political reasons only, but also for the sake of its thriving cloth industry, which required an undisturbed import of English wool. Economic factors had begun to carry weight in these international conflicts, since the communes of Flanders, by the power which their growing wealth assured them, had acquired a decisive voice in the conduct of the country's policy towards its mighty neighbors.

With the incorporation of Flanders with the realm of the Burgundian Dukes, a restoration of the ninth century kingdom of Lotharingia, the political power of the Communes in international affairs came to an end. In a short but lucid survey the writer explains how the Burgundian Netherlands passed into the possession of the Spanish branch of the Hapsburgs, against whom they rose up in arms in 1568. The eighty years' war that followed divided the Low Countries into an independent northern part, the Republic of the United Netherlands, and a southern part which, from 1588 on, remained subject to Spain. Henceforth the destinies of Holland and Belgium followed separate courses, apart from a short and ill-fated period (1813-1839), when they formed one kingdom under William I of Holland. The two centuries and a half between Belgium's return under the Spanish yoke and the creation of the Kingdom of the Belgians form the most uneventful and inglorious part of its history. Under the rule of the Coburgs it resumed its place among the nations of Europe and played a part in its history not unworthy of its great past.

Professor van der Essen has treated this difficult and often intricate subject with admirable skill; though writing with a scholar's intimate knowledge of his country's history, he has succeeded in steering clear from the shoal of ponderosity and dulness. Here and there the Roman Catholic has led the historian astray. Having described the collapse of his country at the end of the Spanish war, when the population had been reduced by at least 50 per cent., when trade and industry were in large part gone, and artistic and literary activity had come to a complete standstill, the writer winds up with the words "but Belgium remained Catholic and subject to the Spanish branch of the Hapsburgs," as if that were a compensation for the loss of the nation's freedom.

Spanish America

STUDIES IN SPANISH-AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Isaac Goldberg, Ph.D. New York: Brentano's.

THIS volume is intended for several kinds of readers. It is evident from the title that it will interest not only specialists in the study of literature in the language of Cervantes, but also that part of our reading public, by no means small, which is at present extremely curious in regard to Spanish America. But Dr. Goldberg's reviewers can do him a service by pointing out what he himself has not made clear in his title, that the book concerns a third group of readers. It deals with that phase of recent Spanish-American letters called Modernismo, which is only one aspect, as its name implies, of the new spirit that permeated the world of thought during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. It is obvious, then, that it should be read also by the students of Whitman and Wilde, of Sudermann and Hauptmann, of Gorki and Ibsen and d'Annunzio, of the Parnassians and Symbolists of France, whether they know Spanish or not, and whether or not they care for Spanish America.

Whatever motive may lead a reader to open Dr. Goldberg's book, he will certainly be surprised at what he finds. Someone has written a book called "The Amazing Argentine," and the adjective might well be applied to the whole of Spanish America. Our education in regard to "the other Americans" has consisted from the first in agreeable disillusionment. Only a few years ago we thought that throughout the rest of this hemisphere everyone wore broad-brimmed hats and no one wore shoes. We supposed that the chief products of Spanish America were revolutions and yellow fever. By a series of surprises we have found out that Río and Buenos Aires and Santiago de Chile are modern cities, and that they and many other southern cities are filled with men not only civilized enough to wear shoes and uphold stable governments, but also energetic enough to win one-fifth of our total foreign trade. We still persist, however, in thinking that their progress is only material; that mentally and spiritually and aesthetically, at least, they are ragged and shoeless. And now comes Dr. Goldberg with the greatest surprise of all, for his book shows that Spanish America is as much to be reckoned with in the world of literature as in the world of trade; that the poetry of the Modernistas —and their prose too, although prose plays here a minor part—is as worth studying as that of any other recent or contemporary school of poetry, whether French, Italian, or American.

An author who attempts to write a book on Spanish-American literature is handicapped by two serious difficulties. The first lies in the fact that the majority of his readers are totally ignorant of the subject. Exposition, and a great deal of it, must come before criticism. Dr. Goldberg has realized this. In his foreword he says: "Owing to the meager acquaintance that our reading public has with Spanish-American literature, a book of purely critical essays is at this time inadvisable. I have, therefore, in the following chapters, freely mingled excerpts, exposition, and a modicum of criticism." The faithfulness with which he has adhered to this plan may be inferred from the size of his book. It contains 377 pages, of which, moreover, some 250 are devoted to only four writers. But he is not merely exhaustive. He writes English both charmingly and forcefully, and has the ability, besides, to seize and emphasize salient points. His opening pages, on the French background of the Modernistas, constitute a masterly handling of a very difficult subject. The following sections, on the precursors of the movement, are as notable for what they omit as for what they contain. And the body of the book, which deals with the four great exponents of Modernismo, is a model of expository writing. It is certain that readers who know Spanish, and who, therefore, can read the excerpts which Dr. Goldberg offers as evidence of the soundness of his critical contentions, will gain a correct impression of the versatile, but always delicate Darío, the glowing, radiant Rodó, the strong, vibrant Chocano, and the vitriolic Blanco-Fombona. It may be asserted with confidence that he has overcome one of the difficulties inherent in his task.

The majority of Dr. Goldberg's readers, however, will not know Spanish, and in their ignorance of the language lies the second of the handicaps to which I have referred. With this problem, unfortunately, he has not dealt as successfully as with the first. He has tried to solve it, of course, by means of translations, some of them in prose and some in verse. The prose translations are fairly satisfactory. Nothing can be said against them except that a prose rendering of a poem is never entirely satisfactory. But the verse translations which he uses—they are not his own—are disappointing. It is always difficult to translate poetry effectively, but it is especially so in the case of poetry of the type written by the Modernistas, where so much depends on the sheer music of the words and lines and strophes. The translations used by Dr. Goldberg, although good English verse, do not reflect this music at all, and can therefore give no adequate idea of the originals. It is even possible that they will lead unthinking or oversuspicious readers to discount the opinions of the author as to the merits of the poets concerned. In the lack of just the right kind of verse translations, therefore, Dr. Goldberg would have done better to use prose in all instances.

As to the scholarship of the book, there is not much to criticize, at least in the way of essentials. The author makes no slips in regard to such things as the dates or facts of literary history, and his critical judgments will seem justified to those who know the field. He falls below his own standard of excellence only in his occasional remarks on the metre of the Modernistas. Not that it would have been advisable for him to write a chapter on this involved subject. He himself points out, in the early part of his book, that not only the difference in language, but also the very great difference between our prosody and that of Spanish-American poetry, makes it almost impossible for us to enter intimately into the matter of metric structure. It is to be regretted, however, that he has not taken sufficient care to guard readers who do not know Spanish from certain vital errors. From his references to the influence of Whitman on the Modernistas, they will certainly draw the conclusion that the recent Spanish-American poets are Whitmanesque in their technique. In fact, they will go further than that. Owing to his unfortunate way of printing some of his prose translations in short lines, they will think that the Modernistas are akin in their metre to our own writers of free verse. These conclusions are erroneous. Whitman's influence on the metre of the Modernistas has consisted merely in encouraging in them the spirit of revolt against the traditional. They have carried out the revolt in their own way. The essential difference between them and their predecessors consists in the use of longer lines and new combinations of old lines. Their relation to the older Spanish poetry, therefore, may be better expressed by comparing them to Swinburne than to Whitman. And the implication of a metrical analogy with such schools as the Imagists is equally misleading. With the exception of a few sporadic instances, the most radical Modernistas have written only vers libre, which is a very different thing from free verse, inasmuch as it is free only in the counting of syllables, and does not abandon rhyme, or the traditional Spanish substitute for rhyme, assonance. All this is surely well known to Dr. Goldberg. He should have stated it plainly.

I have said that Dr. Goldberg's scholarship is good in essentials. Unfortunately, however, he can not be complimented for carefulness in little things. It seems probable that his manuscript was sent to the printer without the thorough final revision advisable in a book of this nature. In spite of the general clarity of his style, there are now and then pages far from clear. A revision would have allowed him, moreover, to correct occasional errors in his translations. There are also certain mechanical flaws which might easily have been remedied, such as the incompleteness of the appendix, which does not contain translations of all the poems "quoted in the text and not made clear by the surrounding matter." And if it is probable that the manuscript was hastily prepared, it is certain that the galleys were hardly proof-read at all. Here and there misprints occur even in the English; in the Spanish they are here, there, and everywhere. We who know Spanish have long since become hardened to the eccentricities of newspaper Spanish; we can even take delight in deciphering the garbled Spanish of travel-books; but misprints in a book of the kind under discussion are annoying. When they are frequent, they become exasperating.

FREDERICK BLISS LUQUIENS

Poetry

These Dead Have Not Died

HAVE done with frenzy to pierce the Veil;
We need no ghost to affirm the tale.

"These dead shall not have died in vain."
Lincoln lives—in the minds of men!

Leave to the quack the promise free.
Can God be other than mystery?

Stratford Church is a holy place;
But Shakespeare lives in the soul of the race.

HARRY T. BAKER

The Run of the Shelves

ON April 9, it is announced, Marshal von Hindenburg's memoirs are to see the light under the title "Aus Meinem Leben." The work will consist of five volumes. The first deals with the author's life before the war; the second with the war on the eastern front until August 28, 1916, the day on which he was appointed Chief of the General Staff; the third brings the history of the war up to the close of 1917; the fourth is devoted to the final struggle on the west front; the fifth contains the end of the conflict. The book, the title of which is reminiscent of Goethe's autobiography, is bound to invite a great deal of comment from critics looking for the "Dichtung," which, as in the life of his greater compatriot, is the twin sister of the Wahrheit."

When "animism" is made a term of the last opprobrium by some, as recently by Professor Joseph Jastrow in these pages, and formally defended and used to explain the interworking of mind and body by others, as by William McDougall, F. R. S., the Oxford psychologist, the plain man may well ask, What is it, after all? Up to a certain point he will be helped by Mr. George William Gilmore's admirable little book, "Animism, or Thought Currents of Primitive Peoples" (Marshall Jones). Mr. Gilmore has made a very suggestive collection and classification of certain phenomena in the case, specimens of the agglomerate of acts and beliefs which are the basis of all civilization, the stuff of all folklore, and which dominate our own most traveled mental paths. That he stops short with objective statements of the phenomena and does not entangle himself in psychologies, primitive or modern, is of his plan. But, apparently, he has come out with a definite belief in the existence of a thing in man which can be called "soul"—an exactly animistic position; in the continued life of the "soul" beyond the grave; and in the existence of superhuman powers.

There is an equally objective statement of phenomena in Professor G. Henslow's "Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism" (Dodd, Mead), but of phenomena much more exciting, though quite as well attested as the great majority of folklore elements. Professor Henslow is a botanist of reputation; he dates back in Cambridge to the middle of last century, when he took a first class in the old Natural Science Tripos; that he is also a clergyman should hardly be to his prejudice as a witness. Yet he does bear first-hand witness to the most hair-raising things which took place at private séances with unpaid mediums—automatisms, material phenomena, spirit-photography, psychographs, materializations, etc. The pity is that, like so many old and thoroughly convinced spiritualists, he is not careful and detailed in his descriptions of happenings; these things have become for him quite ordinary. Still, his book, slovenly as it often is in statement, is another moment in the accumulating mass of evidence which can not be laughed or sneered or denounced away. The fact that this man of scientific training, with so many of his like, has been so thoroughly convinced is a definite one and must be faced. There are plainly phenomena to be explained, to whatever hypothesis of explanation we may be driven. The trouble about the spiritist key is that it is too much a pick-lock and too little a key, even a master-key. Spirits can do anything and laws cannot hold them.

In philosophy, as in theology, it is salutary, if not always acceptable, for agile thinkers to be brought back to the rock from which they were hewn, and kindly nature, working in the minds of her children, generally sees to this. Thus every century has its return to Aristotle and raises its own crop, however thin, of Platonists. But there are some nearer beginnings which do not so automatically reassert themselves, partly because of inhibitions—to speak by the card—and partly because the paths of connection are overgrown beyond even the memory of nature. It may be doubted whether the Modernists of the Roman Church would welcome a reference back to the twofold truth of the Averroists or the multiform truth of Moslem theologians, and few Pragmatists know how straight is their descent from the Algazel of the mediæval scholastics. Such work, therefore, as the text and translation of Averroes' Metaphysics, by Carlos Quirós Rodríguez, is to be welcomed. ("Averroes Compendio de Metafisica." Madrid: Estanislao Maestre.) He gives a much better text than the Cairo edition, a good translation, with notes and a technical vocabulary, and a sufficient introduction. From the translation in this book the attraction which Averroes exercised on mediæval Europe can be much better understood than from those by Marcus Müller, published in 1875. The latter gave little clue to his real philosophical positions.

In the biography of her husband, the great naturalist, Mrs. Agassiz sank her own personality, though she had shared his labors as few wives have been able to do. There she was merely Mrs. Louis Agassiz. It is fitting now that we should have a "Life of Elizabeth Cary Agassiz" (Houghton Mifflin), in which the emphasis should be laid on her own achievement in founding Radcliffe College. This pleasant task has been carried out faithfully and well by Lucy Allen Paton. The emphasis, as we say, is properly placed on Mrs. Agassiz's educational work after the death of her husband, and to all Radcliffians the book will thus have authoritative value and a special appeal. To others, perhaps, the most interesting sections will be those that deal with her earlier life. The second chapter, contributed in part by Mrs. Agassiz's youngest sister, begins thus:

> Elizabeth Cabot Cary was born on December 5, 1822, at the home of her grandfather, Colonel Perkins, in Pearl Street. It was a dignified street in those days, lined with handsome dwellings and shaded by fine trees, offering many attractions to merchants as a quarter for residence because of its proximity to Fort Hill where from a grassy park on the Revolutionary fortifications, still unlevelled, they could survey the harbor and watch their ships from India or China coming into port. . . . In 1833 Colonel Perkins moved to Temple Place where he built a new house. . . . At that time the Cary family were living in Brookline, where they had gone on their return to Boston in the previous year, but Colonel Perkins speedily began to gather his daughters about him in Temple Place, and built a house for Mrs. Cary next his own on the side toward the Common. . . . Such a gathering of a clan into a single limited district was in complete accordance with the Boston custom of those days.

What a door into a life now gone is opened by these simple words! We commend the following pages to all and sundry who may care to be introduced into the charmed circle of that old Boston society. Next in interest, to the unprejudiced reader we mean, are the chapters which give the personal side of Mrs. Agassiz's life with her husband in his journeys for scientific purposes to Brazil and up the west coast of South America. Time was found for a good deal of play amid the strenuous work carried on, and adventures were not wanting. It is a pleasant, happy record of a full life.

"En Amérique à la Fin de la Guerre" (Paris: Beauchesne), by Abbé Felix Klein, a warm friend of America, and throughout the war chaplain of the American military hospital at Neuilly, has to do with the special French Catholic mission sent last year to the United States for the celebration of the semi-centennial of Cardinal Gibbon's episcopacy. Abbé Klein was associated on this occasion with Mgr. Julien, Bishop of Arras, and with Mgr. Baudrillart, president of the Catholic University of Paris, of which the Abbé is an emeritus professor. The pages of this little book are full of friendly references to the United States, of pleasant sketches of many of our leading men, and of wise reflections on our good qualities and our foibles. Its aim is to strengthen "in the best interest of the two nations, that profound friendship, that durable friendship, that necessary friendship, just as it exists—we know this is true—in French hearts and in American hearts, too, as I know full well."

Drama

"Medea" at the Garrick—the "Piper" at the Fulton

MANY years ago I read the "Medea" in translation with revolt. I rested a long time in that mixture of shame and pride which marks one's estrangement from a reputed masterpiece until, two or three years ago, a desire to correct or confirm this disaffected attitude impelled me to a wrestle with the Greek. The Greek was decisive on my own relation to the drama. Hereafter, in a better world than this, I may desire more love and knowledge of it, but, for me, in this planet, the "Medea" is everlastingly a foolish and revolting play.

The mere killing of the sons does not repel me; that has its parallels in nature and in tragedy. What confounds me is that in a play where a mother kills her sons pity should be asked—for the mother. I entertain no pity for the scruples of a criminal which, if they were active enough to deserve pity, would be active enough to prevent crime. The criminal who poses as victim is intolerable. The evident tenderness of Medea, natural enough in itself, takes the result out of nature. Killing sons is extreme in any case; but surely it is less improbable and less monstrous to kill sons whom you do not love than to kill sons whom you do. Euripides has made no attempt to obviate or moderate these difficulties; Euripides has felt no difficulties. A modern dramatist would have tempered the rawness of the improbability by causing Jason to threaten to take the children from Medea. This would have helped in three ways: it would have deepened Medea's sense of wrong, it would have shown Jason to be vulnerable on the side of paternity, and Medea's preference of her children's death to their loss by separation would have seemed rational and tolerable beside her actual preference of their death to their companionship.

I am aware of the inability of the modern man to re-create in his own mind the Greek attitude toward these intimately known and venerable legends in which the boyhood of the individual found, as it were, a pasture in the boyhood of the race. I can no more understand the relation of Euripides to the story of Medea than Euripides could fathom my relation to the book of Genesis. Associations are despotic, but they bring obscurity as well as light; and my feeling that Euripides might be a better judge than I am of some sides, at least, of the pure literature and humanity of the book of Genesis conducts me to the possibility of a like advantage on my part in relation to the "Medea." The merely local and racial appeal of the play is irrecoverable, and it is not for the sake of that appeal that Mr. Maurice Browne has given to the "Medea" an interesting, thoughtful, and in several ways stimulative presentation at the Garrick Theatre in this city.

Mr. Browne does not view the play primarily as an action; he views it as spectacle and recitative to which action is subsidiary. This attitude is probably judicious. Present a Greek play as spectacle and let us say, loosely, as opera, and all the incidental action you get is bounty and superflux. Present it as an action, and all the merely spectacular and operatic parts appear as charge and discount. In one sense Mr. Browne's presentation may be called inarticulate, the appeal to the ear is tonal rather than verbal. The enunciation is clear enough, but it is hard to follow the words because not one word in twenty is a furtherance to the action, and the passiveness with which the ear and the mind allow themselves to be rocked in the cradle of rhapsodic and poetic speech is deadening to curiosity.

Mr. Browne's chorus is not Greek in its numbers, nor, I think, in its movements; but it struck me as well imagined, as embodying perhaps better than Medea or Jason the dim terror and impalpable suggestion which gave depth and coloring to the performance. Here were six mobile, supple, rhythmic figures, who gestured with their arms, with their frames, with their robes, which seemed themselves to be only gestures of the protagonists, to be extensions and excursions of Medea's soul. Whether Greek or modern, this is poetry in spectacle. A most remarkable incident in the play, an incident, indeed, which all but snatched up the play and ran away with it, was the scene in which a messenger, in an injudicious minimum of costume, recounts the story of the "enchaunted flame that did Creusa wed." It was done with minuteness, virtuosity, and frenzy; in a sort, it was well done, and possibly the cure for the dreaded irksomeness of narrative in Greek and later drama is not reduction, but enlargement. The size of this episode, however, seemed abnormal, since the audience is indifferent to the sufferings of Creusa, and declines to excite itself about a murder which the visible imminence of a far blacker crime remands to insignificance. In Miss Ellen Van Valkenburg's Medea, there was a voice and a presence, but no woman; the accomplished and harmonious declamation revealed nothing but its own dexterity. Mr. Moroni Olsen, on the contrary, gave in Jason a vivid reflex of that shapely and lustrous hardness which Greek civilization must have wrought in its baser materials.

Every one knows the tale of the piper of Hamelin, whose music lured the rats and mice into the river, and the children into the hollow hill, when the just recompense for his first exploit was withheld by avaricious burghers. This story fills just one act of Mrs. Marks's four-act play, now offered in the cautious form of special matinees at the Fulton Theatre. Where will Mrs. Marks find her three remaining acts, and what form will the gay, saucy, and somewhat unfeeling legend take in the hands of a woman so compact of fervors and poignancies that joy itself becomes for her a half-distress? Before answering these inquiries, let me say that Mrs. Marks's fancy is blithe, even though her heart be serious, and that the "Piper," though not highly dramatic, must be reckoned among the happiest outcomes of American poetic drama. The blank verse can dance and caper as well as sing; there is plenty of movement, though sometimes the arms move rather than the feet; the play is quaintly and busily inventive, it frolics in a maidenly way, it is demurely mischievous and archly tender, and is poetically regretful that it must needs be prosaically wise. This leads me back to my unanswered questions.

Mrs. Marks, in her earnestness and conscience, has given us a piper who is no rogue, but a serious reformer in whom kidnapping is a form of philanthropy. He sees that children and grown people are two species, that children are butterflies who fly and shine and grown people are caterpillars who eat and crawl, and that the office of all pipers and of all clear-voiced and clear-souled beings everywhere is to prevent the relapse of butterflies into caterpillars. Plainly, this piper thinks; that is the catch, the snag, in the affair; for, if you think, you can not keep children indefinitely in a hollow hill away from their parents. Some day this piper will meet a sorrowing mother, and some day he will ask counsel of the sculptured Christ by the crossways, who will bid him take the children home. The Christ is perfectly right; but the piper is Pan, and somehow one does not want Pan at the feet of Christ, and one hardly likes to see Christ siding with the mealsack. The mealsack is imperious in real life. Must it triumph even in fairyland where poets are the sovereigns and legislators?

All this is done from the highest and most edifying motives; the piper grows alarmingly respectable. In a sufficiently pretty episode, he persuades Barbara, the burgomaster's daughter, to eschew the nunnery to which a peevish town had sentenced her, and accept the brave young conjurer and vagabond, Michael. He sends them instantly to the priest. To the priest they should undoubtedly go; marriage is the only safety for Barbara. But the piper who sent them should forsake the road, and pipe the

(Continued on page 340)

A Real Economy

Crocker-Wheeler Motors represent the highest achievement in motor manufacturing. Their installation is a real economy which manifests itself in uninterrupted performance and lasting service.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York, Boston, Syracuse, Chicago, Cleveland, Binghamton

Pittsburgh, Newark, New Haven, Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

RECOMMEND AS OUT-DOOR BOOKS OF UNUSUAL CHARM

W. H. HUDSON'S Books

Birds in Town and Village

"It is no dull catalogue of bird sounds and bird habits. It is rather a series of beautiful and poetic descriptions of ramblings about English and Cornish villages, in which various sorts of birds are set like jewels. Stories and legends and quiet little humorous incidents are interwoven with natural history and with moods and appreciations delightful to read in themselves."—North American, Philadelphia.

Illustrated in color from plates by E. J. Detmold, $4.00.

Far Away and Long Ago

Is an extraordinarily interesting record of the response of a finely sensitive spirit to the appeal of the fascinating South American life which he describes with such vivid color and reality. Strange, gaudy birds and butterflies, animals of the oldest types, and men of strange adventures figure in the every-day experiences through which he reveals himself simply and with rare sincerity.

With portrait, net, $2.50.

By DOROTHEA CONYERS

Sporting Reminiscences $6.00

Delightful informal recollections of horses, of hunting, of all that creates the atmosphere of following the most famous packs through the Irish hunting counties. The book is full of racy humor, and of an Ireland, happy and loved.

By GARDNER TEALL

A Little Garden the Year Round $2.50

Full of that special pleasure of the spring, the joy that comes from planning the garden, and full of helpful suggestions.

Obtainable at any bookstore, postage extra, or direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

Please mention THE REVIEW in writing to aovertisers.

The New York University Press

Efficient Composition: A College Rhetoric

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Ph.D., Professor of English in New York University.

Cloth. xviii+518 pages. Price, $2.50

A thought-provoking textbook for the advanced student of rhetoric, with more than one substantial contribution to the philosophy of composition; yet so clear in structure that none can fail to follow; so human in detail that freshmen have been known to read more than the assignment.

Said a Rutgers junior:

"This hasn't the flavor of a textbook: it is a friend with whom one may hold converse and receive something worth while."

Said a sophomore at New York University to a new student:

"I'll sell you my other freshman textbooks, but you can't have my Nason."

Have you read it yet?

The Ground and Goal of Human Life

By CHARLES GRAY SHAW, Ph.D., Professor of Ethics in New York University.

Cloth. xii+594 pages. Price, $3.50

Values, Immediate and Contributory, and Their Interrelation

By MAURICE PICARD, Ph.D., lecturer in Philosophy in Barnard College. In press.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS
32 Waverly Place New York City

Old Hallowell on the Kennebec

A study in the culture-history of a typical New England town.

By EMMA HUNTINGTON NASON (author of "Old Colonial Houses in Maine," etc.)

Cloth, xvi+360 pages. 64 full-page illustrations. Price, $3.50.

From the records of the Plymouth settlers, who established a trading-post on the Kennebec in 1627, from the Relations of the Jesuits, who had a mission there among the Abenakis, from old-time letters and unpublished manuscripts, from early newspapers, and—for the later decades—from her own girlhood memories, Mrs. Nason has produced in this volume a picture of the social and intellectual life of Old Hallowell, notable not only for its scholarly accuracy, but also for its rare literary charm.

"True as history, compelling as romance; of great interest and value as a contribution to the history of New England."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"An extremely well-constructed, well-written, and well-illustrated work."—New York Times.

"Notable both for its execution and for the inherent interest of its subject."—The Nation.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS
(Selling Agents)
32 Waverly Place New York City

(Continued from page 338)

Doxology hereafter as chorister in the parish church of Hamelin. Let him be godfather to Barbara's first child, and be prompt in the bestowal of the appointed number of Apostles' spoons. But it is hard somehow to imagine Pan at the font.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music

"Eugene Onegin"—Pushkin and Tschaikowsky

WITH the production, a short time ago, of "Eugene Onegin," in Italian, at the Metropolitan, the management gave us the last novelty announced for this season.

"Eugene Onegin" deals with romantic moods and incidents, poetic (if you will) in a Byronic fashion out of favor here, though still admired in Russia. The hero might claim kinship with Childe Harold. He has a "past" with all that this means in Byron's poems. He is bad and mad and sad, but not, like Villon, "glad," by way of contrast. Yet, when the heroine, Tatiana, an ill-balanced girl, sends him a foolish love letter, he snubs her gently. Soon after, though, he compromises Tatiana's sister, who is betrothed to his friend Lenski. And in a duel which results Lenski is killed. Then, tortured by remorse, Onegin wanders through the world in search of peace. Years later, he again meets Tatiana, who is now married to Prince Gremin and seems settled. He falls in love with her. Forbidden fruit attracts him. But, though Tatiana's heart still yearns for him, his suit is spurned. With this the story ends—a bit abruptly.

There are hints of Werther, as you see, in Onegin, and there are other hints of Charlotte in Tatiana. But the romance of Werther lends itself to opera. It has a beginning and a middle and a dénouement, of a definite kind. Tschaikowsky's "lyric scenes" seem far too intimate for the vast spaces of the Metropolitan. Mr. Gatti-Casazza has a convenient trick of forgetting his point of view. He refuses, in one breath, to give us "Pélleas." And, in the next, he produces "Eugene Onegin." To be sure, Debussy is of the French school, in which the Italians of to-day see their chief rival. But, to be fair, we owe him thanks for daring failure with this effort of Tschaikowsky. We might feel more grateful if he had chosen one of several other Russian works, the "Khovantchina" of Moussorgsky, for example, or the delightful (if too long drawn out) "Snegourotchka" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Tschaikowsky's score is often charming and always delicate, with the melodic graces of Italian music sobered and tempered by the sad Slavic spirit. The soliloquy of Tatiana in her bedroom, as she sits writing her impassioned love letter to Onegin, will probably appeal to many hearers. The dances in the first act have the attractive hues and rhythms of Slav dances. The later dances seemed a trifle commonplace. Many composers could have made them brighter. Regarded as a whole, "Eugene Onegin" has the defect which ruined many a pretty painting of the Victorian period. It is too literary. In opera we crave for drama first, and only incidentally for psychology.

Free cuts were made (not always quite judiciously) in the score by Mr. Bodanzky, who directed the performance of "Onegin" with much taste and skill. One episode, which should have occurred in a bedroom, took place in a garden. The scenery and costumes designed for the production by Joseph Urban helped the effect. The stage pictures of the Viennese scenic artist were more discreet than some which he has shown us lately. The snow scene, with the river and a reflected light in the far background, though really an easel picture magnified, with a suggestion of a glorified Christmas card, was pleasing to the eye and quite appropriate. The grays and blues and whites in one interior made an agreeable harmony. And the comparative simplicity of the ballroom, in the second act, revealed a new and greatly chastened Urban.

I can not say, with truth, that the interpreters of Tschaikowsky's "lyric scenes" deserved much praise. De Luca, who appeared as Onegin, lacked distinction and that touch of the Byronic which should have marked the character. As the ill-fated Lenski, Martinelli looked romantic and had fervor, but he sang painfully out of tune at certain times. The Tatiana of Claudia Muzio was melodramatic, although tuneful.

"Eugene Onegin" may give innocent enjoyment to a few audiences. But, when it joins some other operas I could mention in the limbo of the opera house, it may not be regretted long or deeply.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

The Candidates

WHAT may one discover, in books, to tell of the life and adventures, the mind and character of the dozen or more gentlemen who are suspected of willingness to take that thrilling drive up Pennsylvania Avenue on the 4th of next March? Of most of them, very little, indeed. Their words are in print, in the depressing pages of the Congressional Record, in volumes of Governor's mess-

(Continued on page 342)

WORTH-WHILE BOOKS WORTH READING

Mrs. GLADSTONE

By Her Daughter, Mary Gladstone Drew

A memoir of Mrs. Ewart Gladstone filled with intimate details in the private lives of both Mrs. Gladstone and her illustrious husband. A historic narrative introducing to the reader many of the great people of England. The volume is illustrated with many reproductions from personal photographs in the possession of the author, who was the Gladstones' youngest daughter. $4.00 net.

A Short History of the Italian People

By Janet Penrose Trevelyan

Here is a timely and intensely interesting work. The Fiume controversy and D'Annunzio's spectacular campaign have brought Italy into the limelight. The book starts with the century preceding the barbarian invasion under Diocletian and continues to the recognition of the Kingdom (1870). Six maps. $4.00 net.

A Short History of the Great War

By William L. McPherson

A human, concise and well-balanced story of the war, with all dry, technical detail avoided. The author, whose "Military Comment" in the New York Tribune attracted the widest attention, presents the broad outlines of the struggle in authoritative manner. $2.50 net.

Sheepskins and Grey Russet

By E. Temple Thurston

A whimsical, wholly delightful adventurous chronicle of country life. The story begins with the buying of an old farm and continues through all the humorous entangling mysteries that enhearten, confound and fascinate the amateur householder. By the author of "The City of Beautiful Nonsense," "The World of Wonderful Reality," and "David and Jonathan," etc. $2.00 net.

The Complete Opera Book

By Gustave Kobbé

Brief biographies of all of the great composers, with condensed short stories of the operas. The New York Evening Post says: "This is indeed the complete opera book—more complete and abreast of the times than any other similar work." One thousand pages. One hundred illustrations. Four hundred airs and motives in musical notation. Nearly two hundred operas. $5.00 net.

LEONARD WOOD

By William Herbert Hobbs

The life story of the career of a great American as physician—Indian fighter—soldier—statesman. An intimate biography of the achievements of a man who has kept his temper—no matter under what provocation—and quietly "carried on." Illustrated. $2.00 net.

Wilderness

A Journal of Quiet Adventure in Alaska

By Rockwell Kent

The author's "quiet adventures" on an unpeopled Alaskan island are recorded in this book with a charm and simplicity of style that stamps it a literary classic. It is fully illustrated with many of Rockwell Kent's famous drawings. $5.00 net.

The Yankee in the British Zone

By Ewen C. MacVeagh and Lee D. Brown

How did Tommy Atkins and the Yank get on? What did they learn about each other? That is what this book answers. It is not simply a war book—it is rather a study in psychology of the average man—British and American. Written by two trained observers, it reveals a wealth of anecdote, with many human interest stories and incidents. $2.50 net.

At All Booksellers

New York
2 West 45th St.
Just West of 5th Ave.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

London
24 Bedford St.
Strand

(Continued form page 340)
ages, in pamphlets—dusty even now—which contain their orations given at ceremonious meetings. Their biographies have been sketched in the magazines. For the most part we draw our mental pictures of them from the news reports, from the debates upon the Treaty, and see them as grave patriots, or ignorant ruffians, according to our own prejudices.

Thus, of Governor Cox, the shelves of the library and book-shop reveal nothing; of Mr. McAdoo, we may read in pamphlets his views upon tunnels and subways, upon fiscal affairs, and upon the general excellence of his party and its present leader. With Attorney-General Palmer, the situation is similar. For Governor Edwards, I can think of nothing better to read than the quatrains of Omar Khayyam. Among the candidates from the rival party, Senator Johnson and Governor Lowden seem to be the bookless ones.

Others have kept publishers and writers of reviews busy. President Wilson is both biographer and biographee; the books about him have already been named here. We know his favorite poem, and that he likes limericks, and can quote Oliver Herford. The card catalogues of the libraries contain a fair number of entries, also, under the name: Bryan, William Jennings. There are some painful looking campaign biographies, dating from the free silver days, any number of addresses, singly and in battalions, (all extra moral) and some ingenuous volumes of travel. The best of the collection, however, and one of the two prizes discovered in this little search of mine, is Mr. Bryan's "Letters to a Chinese Official" (McClure, 1906). It is Mr. Bryan at his best,—and also in his most innocent aspects, for it shows him the victim of a literary hoax. When Mr. Lowes Dickinson wrote his "Letters from a Chinese Official," he scarcely expected that his criticisms of western civilization would impose upon a personage like Mr. Bryan. The latter, however, had his grave reply all written before he learned that an Englishman, not a Chinaman, was the author of the original book. Among the other Democrats no one has written a more entertaining work than Mr. Gerard's "My Four Years in Germany" (Doran, 1917). The number of translations indicate that the author is taken seriously in foreign countries.

For the Republicans, Dr. Butler has been a frequent, but not voluminous writer upon matters connected with his profession; there are also one or two books and some detached addresses about foreign and domestic politics. Should we decide that we need an epigrammatist in the White House, we must plump for Governor Coolidge. His political wisdom is presented in his "Have Faith in Massachusetts" (Houghton, 1919), but I doubt if it contains anything better than his telegram to the Harvard football team in California—that should have made them all join a Coolidge Club on the instant.

General Wood is the author of two books, "Our Military History; its Facts and Fallacies" (Reilly, 1916) and "The Military Obligation of Citizenship" (Princeton Univ. Press, 1915). There are biographies of him by I. F. Marcosson, J. H. Sears, and Eric Fisher Wood. But Captain Walter Lippmann (late of the "staff" of Colonel House) says he won't vote for General Wood—despite all these books. Had the General's name been Bergdoll or Goldman, had he tried to evade the draft instead of trying to go to France, there might have been kindly words, or apologetic ones, for him. But the General is tainted with that played out rubbish called "patriotism"—and a pitying smile is the best he can expect from an editorial writer in the New Republic.

As the author of "Principles of Mining, Valuation, Organization, and Administration, Copper, Gold, Lead, Silver, Tin and Zinc," Mr. Hoover need expect no vote from me. My sense of decency as a librarian is aroused against such a preposterous title as that. But as the translator with Mrs. Hoover, of the "De Re Metallica" of Georgius Agricola, the elder, he appeals to my fondness for curious, and (I suspect) useless, books. It was translated from the final Latin edition of 1556, and sumptuously published in London, by the Mining Magazine, in 1912. It is a noble looking volume, and ought to rally to the "Who but Hoover Clubs" many of the mining engineers, and all of the admirers of Georgius Agricola, the elder.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

Propaganda and Education

ONE must be highly educated in order to read discriminatingly current publications. The press is supposed to furnish news and to educate the public. As a matter of fact, it requires well-trained minds to distinguish fact from opinion, news from publicity, propaganda from education.

When one reads, for example, an account of the deeds and aims of the Bolsheviki, one should have a mental reservation as to both the accuracy of the facts and the purpose of the writer in conveying his opinions concerning these facts. An innocent-looking news item regarding an automobile concern, or a particular industrial enterprise, may be merely veiled publicity, not news. And an interesting statement in the news columns of a newspaper regarding some public measure or decision of importance may be framed in a clever way, not to educate the public, but to influence the public to support a special point of view.

This obviously is propaganda in disguise. It is more effective and much more insidious than formal advertising or editorials known openly to represent a candid, definite policy.

The development of this means of influencing public opinion was greatly accentuated during the recent war in connection with the many "drives" in support of various projects "to help win the war."

The promoters of such measures emphasized, of course, the necessity of educating the public. What they meant, however, was not strictly to educate, but to make the public see just one point of view. Irrespective of the nature of the particular project, this brand of education is to be characterized as out-and-out propaganda; and propaganda is nothing but publicity, or advertising. The object is to induce the public by news items—soi-disant—by editorials, and open advertising, to accept the ideas advocated by the men backing the project in question.

The advertising manager of one of the most successful advertising mediums in the United States tells me that, if one is willing to spend the money, it is possible by modern advertising methods to "put over" almost any article of trade or any commercial undertaking. He says that the guiding principle in successful advertising is to appeal to men more through their sentiments and emotions than through their reason. Emphasis is to be placed on the happy, forward-looking, and altruistic attitude of mind. Happy, serene lives may be attained by sleeping on a special make of mattress. Homes may be brightened, annoyances and domestic infelicities obviated by various mechanical devices to save labor and give comfort. The children may be made better behaved and more helpful if provided with divers articles of play, dress, and elaborate conveniences. Perhaps the most striking example of the evolution of modern advertising is to be found in extraordinary advertisements couched in literary form by undertakers, appealing to the sentiments and emotions of the public. A funeral is made to appear so æsthetic and beautiful that one is almost induced to want to die!

By substantially the same methods it is possible, according to the expert already cited, to "put over" an idea as well as to sell goods and securities. By the adroit use of publicity a popular demand may be successfully created in behalf of almost any project backed by money and by men whose names carry weight with the public.

Now propaganda of this character obviously is not education in the true sense, which, on all matters of importance requiring reflection and decision, must necessarily include a presentation of all sides of a question. The objections to a proposal must be considered as well as its alleged virtues. True education of public opinion is through candid discussion and argument. This, naturally, is not the aim of advertising, nor is it the aim of propaganda. The lamentable result is that, unless there is a counter propaganda backed similarly by money and men of prominence, the public is not in a fair position to discuss intelligently the proposal in question, or to reach a reasoned decision.

The significance of this fact is of special moment at a time when so many intricate problems, domestic and international, are clamoring for wise solution. Never was there a more urgent need for a press which should aim dispassionately to give the public, first of all, real news, based on ascertainable facts; secondly, the judgment of experts on these facts; thirdly, honest discussion concerning these facts and opinions; and fourthly, a generous consideration of all serious arguments concerning a proposed line of action suggested by the facts and interests involved. The pity of it is that our publications seem constrained to assume an irrevocable, partisan attitude on most questions of importance. From that moment they dedicate their services to propaganda rather than to the education of public opinion.

This need is nowhere more apparent than in the field of international affairs, where the American people, largely by reason of their lack of training, are peculiarly deficient in the ability to understand clearly, and to reach mature judgments concerning other nations and world politics in general. For years it has been evident that public opinion has greatly needed expert guidance in such matters. The American people have been pathetically eager for reliable information and for authoritative assistance in reaching sound conclusions. Too often they have listened, instead, to an ex parte presentation of facts, and are besieged by partisan propaganda which not infrequently takes the form of a moral, social, and political coercion. It is not strange that they feel utterly bewildered when drawn by the recent war into the maelstrom of world politics, and asked to commit themselves to new undertakings that run counter to previous habits of thought, as well as to long-established policy.

For these reasons I desire to make an appeal for a changed attitude on the part of our "journals of public opinion," that they should regard themselves as the educators, not the arbiters, of public opinion. When the New Republic was founded I fondly hoped, with many others, that it would prove a public servant of this character. In this age of transition in thought about most matters of vital importance, I felt the need of a periodical which would seek to enlighten the American people and help them—particularly the reactionary conservative element—to progress to a plane of conservative liberalism that knows how to move with the times but preserves all that is best in our institutions. But the New Republic became the organ of special policies and views presented in a cavalier fashion inconsiderate of other honest arguments, and affronting the very class of thinkers it should have most desired to reach and help.

And now that another journal—the Review—has this same great opportunity before it, I am hopeful that at last the American public has obtained the trustworthy medium for news and education that is so imperatively needed at this critical period in our history. We ask a genuine opportunity to be educated. We ask to be delivered from the irksome necessity of being constantly on the alert against publicity and propaganda. The press should neither presume on our ignorance nor make too great exactions on our powers of discrimination.

PHILIP MARSHALL BROWN

"HOW to Promote Better Relations Between England and America" is the imposing subject dealt with in an essay competition between St. George's School, Harpenden, England, and the school of the same name near Newport, Rhode Island. The essays, it appears, were few and not of striking merit but the character of the competition was one which calls for imitation by other American and English schools, particularly at a time when the rising generation has great need to understand the necessity of promoting better relations between

DIVIDEND NOTICE

WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC
& MANUFACTURING COMPANY

A quarterly dividend of 2% ($1.00 per share) on the PREFERRED Stock of this Company will be paid April 15, 1920.

A Dividend of 2% ($1.00 per share) on the COMMON Stock of this Company for the quarter ending March 31, 1920, will be paid April 30, 1920.

Both dividends are payable to Stockholders of record as of April 2, 1920. H. F. BAETZ, Treasurer.

New York, March 24, 1920.

Oldest Banking House in the United States

The house of Alex. Brown & Sons was founded in the year 1800—120 years ago.

For more than a century the house has steadfastly maintained the highest standards of financial service for its customers.

Investments are offered only after the most careful and efficient investigation.

Large estates can best be protected and are frequently much benefited by a special study conducted by investment experts.

This is particularly true at the present time on account of changed values due to the war and subsequent conditions.

We make investment studies without charge, recommending such changes as conditions or new tax laws render advisable.

The strictest confidential relations are adhered to in our transactions with customers.

ALEX. BROWN & SONS

(Oldest Banking House in the United States)

Baltimore, Maryland

the two great English-speaking nations. Even those who because of some bias, Hibernian or other, feel that nothing good can come out of "perfidious Albion" must admit that if we are to make faces we ought at least to understand the character of our adversary; while most good Americans must see positive benefits in any step to encourage understanding in the younger generations of the two countries. Those in middle age and beyond will go on with their Anglophile or Anglophobe prejudices, little affected by propaganda, but they will be dead in a little while. It is the boys and girls of to-day who must shape the international policy of to-morrow; and little could be more promising than an extension of the St. George's idea—an attempt in academic competition to see the good points of the other side.

"THE unholy alliance between tiredness and temper" is the striking phrase used by Mr. Whiting Williams, of the Hydraulic Pressed Steel Company, Cleveland, Ohio, to picture one of the causes of a condition which offers fertile ground for the agitator. It produces grievances. "An imaginary grievance is just as powerful and impelling a force as a real grievance," is one of many significant sentences in a speech made recently by Col. Arthur Woods, formerly Police Commissioner of New York City. In the course of his speech he told of the experience of a Russian Jewess who had been fined for a minor infringement of a complicated law regarding ash-cans, of her sense of grievance, and of her projection into that condition which offered fertile ground for the agitator. He then proceeded to tell how an order was issued forbidding policemen to make arrests for violation of the city ordinances. "They were told that . . . they had to secure an observance of the city ordinances on their posts, but that they must do it by educating the people and not by arresting them. . . . The result was quite astonishing. We had the people of the East Side turning to the policemen for assistance in every sort of way, and we had the boys on the East Side formed into what were called junior police forces."

All this is only an evidence, in another field, of what the company clubs are attempting to do in industrial work. The policemen, to do their work well, had not merely to be told that it was educative, but they had to be taught how to make it educative; and behind that lay an understanding of their relation to the people and to the municipal officers of the people. It is encouraging to note that the Police Department of New York City is a member of the National Association of Corporation Schools.

America's Foreign Loans

AMERICA's advances to the Allied Governments were made as "call loans" and bore interest at the rate of five per cent. The amount of them outstanding on December 31, 1919, together with the interest accrued, is shown in the table which follows:

Country.	Amount of Credits Advanced.	Interest Accrued.	Total.
Great Britain	$4,277,000,000	$144,440,837	$4,421,440,837
France ..	3,047,974,777	94,021,749	3,141,996,526
Italy	1,621,338,986	54,256,589	1,675,595,575
Belgium .	343,445,000	11,465,278	354,910,278
Russia ..	187,729,750	16,832,662	204,562,412
Czecho-Slovakia	67,329,041	1,667,083	68,996,124
Greece ..	48,236,629	....	48,236,629
Serbia ..	26,780,465	917,299	27,697,764
Rumania.	25,000,000	609,873	25,609,873
Total Loans European Allies .	$9,644,834,648	$324,211,370	$9,969,046,018
Cuba	10,000,000	....	10,000,000
Liberia ..	5,000,000	548	5,000,548
Total Loans to all Allies .	$9,659,834,648	$324,211,918	$9,984,046,566

Reckoning accrued interest, the amount is therefore now well in excess of $10,000,000,000. Loans of this kind between Governments are not wholly without precedent but are an unusual feature in modern finance. They generate problems, moreover, which are not easy of solution. Leaving out of consideration altogether the political disadvantages (and perhaps dangers) of a mass of unfunded obligations of this sort and considering only the financial aspects of the case, it appears that our loans to the Allied Governments are very likely to prove a source of disturbance if not actually a hindrance to our foreign trade.

The amount of interest annually accruing to the United States on these loans as they stand at present is $500,000,000. Presumably some arrangement must be come to with regard to the extinction of principal, so that we have to consider a sinking fund as well as interest. Sinking fund at one per cent. would make the total amount annually due to the United States for service of the obligations $600,000,000. There is only one way in which this amount could be received by the United States, and that way leads through the exchange market. In other words, our Government would have to dispose of foreign exchange (that is, drafts upon the countries enumerated above) to an amount of some $600,000,000 every year. This would make the Government a factor of tremendous importance in the foreign exchange market. It must be remembered also that the debtor Governments would be forced into the exchange markets of their respective countries as purchasers of exchange upon a large scale.

Neither these Governments nor the United States Government is in a position to "create" exchange upon a foreign country or to "consume" exchange upon a foreign country in the ordinary way of trade. Neither the United States Government nor the foreign debtor Governments are able to control or even to influence the operations of their individual nations in foreign commerce, which operations determine the supply and demand of exchange in the various countries. Yet our Government must every year market a great quantity of exchange; the above-mentioned foreign Governments must every year purchase a corresponding quantity.

From the point of view of the American merchant engaged in foreign trade, the entry of the United States Government into the foreign exchange market as a large seller of bills every year is a decidedly unfavorable influence. It would be very much better, so far as he is concerned, if we had made no advances whatever to the Allies, or, indeed, if we simply wrote them off as cancelled. The foreign trade of the United States is face to face with the necessity for a readjustment. Our people have until now conceived "foreign trade" wholly in terms of merchandise exports; now our export trade is menaced very decidedly unless we increase both rapidly and largely the volume of our merchandise imports. The dead weight of the annual debt of foreign nations to the United States Government, amounting to $600,000,000 annually, will operate powerfully toward forcing this readjustment. There is only one way by which it can be quickly accomplished, and that is by reduction of exports. It is not too much to say that perhaps the greatest single influence tending to diminish American merchandise exports to-day is this credit balance of $600,000,000 a year.

It is perfectly evident that the wisest course for the United States to pursue with respect to this debt is to fund it over a long term of years, making the rate of interest and the annual contribution to sinking fund as small as possible. The best interests of the whole community would probably be served by funding these obligations into bonds running one hundred years at a rate of interest not more than two per cent. and with a sinking fund sufficient to retire the whole issue in the period. If the two per cent. rate of interest seems too low, it could be made two per cent. for twenty-five years, three per cent. for the next twenty-five years, four per cent. for the third twenty-five years, and five per cent. for the concluding term of the loan. If that be considered too low, then a good way to deal with it would be to fund the interest altogether for a period of five to ten years so as to remove the Government from the exchange market during the critical period of trade readjustment. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK

345

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 48 New York, Saturday, April 10, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 345

Editorial Articles:

The Expulsion of the Socialists at Albany 348

The Housing Problem — Ethics or Economics? 349

Justice and the Bonus 351

Ousting the Sultan 351

Behind the Financing of China. Part III. By Charles Hodges 353

Helping the Reactionaries. By W. J. Ghent 354

Poetry: Tides. By S. N. 356

The Outlook in Germany. By Examiner 356

Correspondence 358

Problems of Labor and Capital: Employers' Associations. By Morris L. Ernst 361

Book Reviews:

A Sheaf of Verse 362

Domestic and Imported Models 363

Echoes of the War 364

The Run of the Shelves 365

The Tragedy of Pygmalion. By Raphael Demos 368

Drama: The Craft of the Tortoise and Other Plays. By O. W. Firkins 368

Music: James Huneker on Art and Occultism. By Charles Henry Meltzer 370

Books and the News: Libraries. By Edmund Lester Pearson 372

IF you represented a ring of conscienceless criminals that had by treachery and cunning seized power in a great country, plundered and looted its public and private resources, and by violence and terror held its simple folk in a state of abject serfdom, and

IF your principals had secured testimonials from prominent Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. officials, giving assurance that they were sincere reformers highmindedly, if perhaps mistakenly, seeking to bring about a heaven on earth in the form of a Communist commonwealth, and

IF, abundantly supplied with men and money, you had by insidious propaganda succeeded in persuading the less intelligent workingmen over the country that you represented a workingmen's Government, a veritable Utopia, and

IF you had been successful in enlisting the services of the parlor-radicals and the devotees of isms, and

IF, with your unlimited funds, you had taken into your employ discredited politicians and venal journalists, and had secured the active support of many journals professing liberalism and open-mindedness, and

IF you had tempted many unscrupulous and dishonest speculators with promises of large profits and rich concessions if they would use their influence on the Government, and

IF you had secured the opportunity to use a Senate Sub-committee as a forum to create the impression that your principals had reformed, had given up the terror, had discontinued their campaign to set class against class and overthrow other Governments, and

IF, just as you felt you were about to receive that recognition for your principals that would legalize their criminal acts and confirm them in the possession of their plunder, a courier bringing you fresh resources in rich diamonds and the latest instructions for your work was seized and the whole plot exposed,

WOULD'NT IT MAKE YOU MAD?

MR. KEELING, whose book on Soviet Russia received ample notice in the Review, is now in jail at Moscow. Lansbury, the editor of the Daily Herald, the British Labor organ, has visited him in his cell, and elicited from the prisoner the confession that he was not the actual writer of his book. He had told his impressions to others, who had prepared them for the press, and persuaded him to put his name to it. But he now regretted his part in the publication, as his opinion of Bolshevism had changed considerably since his first visit, and as a Christian he wished to confess that he had been in the wrong. Soviet prisons must be charming resorts that a residence there can change the impression of horror gained by a free wanderer through Russia into a favorable opinion of that country. We shall soon, we fear, have to express our sympathy with Mr. Keeling for being dismissed from his comfortable reformatory.

HAS the police administration of New York City sunk back into something like the mire uncovered by the Lexow committee, and its counsel, Mr. Goff, twenty-five years ago? Are vice and crime simply kept a little further out of range of the casual eye, but allowed to go on with their noxious work on condition of pouring a steady stream of their profits into the pockets of the men paid and sworn to bring them to punishment? Evidence brought out during the past few weeks points very significantly in that direction. The blackmail levied by the criminal police organization of Lexow's day was so carefully graded to the ability of its victims to pay as to suggest the work of an expert price-fixing committee in some great branch of modern trade. The poor foreigner with his pushcart, down on Hester Street, uncertain whether he had any legal rights or not, got along by paying three dollars a month. The manager of a house of prostitution had to pay five hundred dollars at the outset and fifty dollars a month thereafter, to free himself from the worry of a possible arrest and prosecution. And the individual inmates of these houses made their own forced contributions to the graft thus gathered by these guardians of the public safety and order. The Lexow revelations brought a stunning defeat to Tammany, and under Mayor Strong's Police Commission such corruption became merely sporadic, if it was not eliminated altogether. But twenty-five years is a long time, and there are many apparent signs that the lesson has been forgotten. If the grand jury now at work does not probe the matter to the very bottom, and arrive at satisfactory results, another investigation from Albany may be in order.

INVESTIGATIONS by legislative bodies, however, have their own dangers. The influence of a political boss deprived New York of the full gain in constructive legislation which might have followed the Lexow exposure of the rottenness that finds so convenient a hiding place in the partisan management of police administration. Well up towards a hundred investigations by Senate or House committees at Washington are now in progress, public interest and confidence in all of which is decidedly marred by the fact that they have not been kept free from the suspicion of partisan purpose. If the New York Legislature, with a strong Republican majority, is to investigate the police of New York City under a Tammany administration, the very fact of this political setting of the stage calls for a committee wholly above the level of conducting such an enquiry on the basis of its relation to a coming election. What New York City wants is a police force too honest and too well disciplined to fill its pockets through blackmail from the gains of harlots and criminals, not simply a political overturn.

IF the men in power to-day in Berlin were not known to be novices in the subtle art of diplomacy, one would feel inclined to see in their sending of troops into the neutral zone a clever move to force the French Government to reprisals which, if they should be disapproved of by England and the United States, would drive a wedge between France and her associates. France isolated, we wrote the other day, means a relatively stronger Germany, and that diplomatic gain would be well worth to her the loss of the few cities that Marshal Foch threatened to occupy. But neither our knowledge of the German statesmen now at the head of affairs, nor the course of events that led up to the present situation seems to justify such a suspicion. Instead of taking the decisive step of sending troops into the Ruhr Valley when conditions there appeared to be sufficiently alarming to make that infringement of Article 43 of the peace terms seem a pardonable act of self-protection, they shrank from the initiative and even offered apologies in Paris for the forward march of Reichswehr troops into the Ruhr region, which Herr von Mayer, the German chargé d'affaires in Paris declared, was against Government instructions. And now, when the Red forces seem near to a collapse, the same step which, when taken at the right moment, was officially called a mistake, is deliberately made under Government orders. In the matter of diplomacy, if such aimless, hesitating proceedings deserve that name, Herr Müller has proved himself to be no match for M. Millerand and Marshal Foch.

LITTLE countries, as if infected by their great neighbors, are susceptible to fits of chauvinism and expansion. Belgium suffered from one when, after the armistice, it demanded annexation of Dutch territory. Now Denmark has succumbed to the contagion. To do justice to the population of both countries, it must be admitted that those who come forward with such claims form only a small, but vociferous minority, consisting mostly of political hotheads and wealthy capitalists whose interests would be promoted by territorial expansion. In Denmark this group acquired greater importance than its counterpart in Belgium by its finding favor with the Court. But the satisfaction of their demands depended on factors over which they had no control: those of the Belgians were submitted to an impartial conference of diplomats in Paris, and the Danish claims to the inhabitants of the disputed area. In neither case was the verdict to the satisfaction of the chauvinists.

Those in Denmark committed the mistake of calling the justice of the decision, thus impartially arrived at, into question, and clamored for a revision. That Flensburg, included in the second zone of the plébiscite era, was lost to Denmark, they felt as a national defeat, whose quiet acceptance by the Cabinet of Mr. Zahle was to them a betrayal of the country's honor. They want to see the Dannebrog, the red flag with the white cross, hoisted on the townhall of Flensburg. Their influence with the King carried the dismissal of the Zahle Ministry. The step was not approved of by the large majority of the people, and the general indignation would have found a more decided expression if the issue had not been warped by the Socialists' cry for a Danish Republic. The nation refused to have its vindication of constitutional rights made an occasion for anti-dynastic propaganda. Still, the King realized that the disapproval of his policy was stronger and more general than of the motives which made the Socialists call a nation-wide strike, and wisely came to terms with the Rigsdag leaders.

NEW YORK'S jungle—Fifth Avenue—has waked up with a vengeance from its winter snows. All the Christian sounds of Easter Sunday could not silence the laughing-hyena mail trucks, the chattering bands of monkey cyclists, the incessant barking of wolfish taxis, the elephantine tread of the buses, and the prolonged roars of Rolls Royces and other lions of the Avenue. There is nothing tame here. Why go to Africa for excitement? Is it the thrill of danger you crave? Then dodge your policeman and take but two steps into this modern jungle. If it be at night, you will find, besides the terrors of the day, dragon eyes bearing down upon you. But this is civilization at its height! At least, the advocates of a brotherhood of man for the whole world, including the most primitive peoples, need not despair when we have set up in our midst a full-grown jungle which we point to with pride as "Fifth Avenue."

BUT, jungle or not, Fifth Avenue is the most beautiful business street in the world. The remark is safe because there is nothing of its kind to compare it with. London, Paris, Berlin, and Vienna have no business thoroughfares of such magnitude. And even if they had, Fifth Avenue would doubtless hold its own. For in itself it is a thing of great beauty, as foreign visitors have freely admitted. Those who saw it as the Avenue of the Allies, when it was the symbol of America's union in a great cause, will never forget how satisfying it was to all our eager hopes for the maintenance of a civilization containing the elements of charm and beauty as opposed to an order in which might made right. With that memory still strong, the institution of Fifth Avenue Week as a yearly event will give pleasure to many persons the country over. In its gala dress it is worth coming from afar to see, even though New York is, and has been for months, "full up."

ENGLAND is meeting the campaign for prohibition in the right way. Before even considering it seriously, she means to know whether prohibition is to be used as an entering wedge for a host of other restraints upon personal liberty. Will it lead to the giving up of tea and coffee, of "scent," as the English still like to call perfume, and of other domesticated vices? This is not extravaganza, for unless we have backbone we are in for the establishment of a new set of Deadly Sins. Science will, of course, be the guide in these matters. What cigarettes can do to women we have just been authoritatively informed. We dislike to think of what science, once spurred on by William H. Anderson, will reveal when its attention is focused upon coffee, ice-cream sodas, and sugar on grape-fruit. Americans are an easy-going people and will not permit themselves to worry too much. They will probably be content if the new Deadly Sins are no more than seven. All the same, the evident intention to legislate evil and sorrow out of the world and virtue and happiness into it makes one wonder at Samuel Butler's foresight when he said that the next tyrant to rule on this earth would be machinery. Of all machinery legislative machinery can be the most diabolical.

THERE will be general sympathy with Hudson Stuck, Archdeacon of the Yukon, and well-known writer on Alaskan matters, in his attempts to save the residents of the region drained by the Yukon and its tributaries from the starvation which is threatened by recent developments of the salmon-canning industry. The whole economy of this region, he says, is based upon dried salmon as the staple article of food. There is not enough to eat without it, and no native product with which to replace it. Existing "restrictions" merely limit the gross amount which may be taken by the canners in the waters of the river itself, but do not restrain them, when this altogether too liberal limit has been reached, from moving their floating plant just outside into the Bering Sea and taking all the fish they can get. The fish they catch there are the fish that have gathered to ascend the river, and it makes no difference in the depletion of the Yukon Valley food supply whether they are taken in the one place or the other. The danger is no longer a mere matter of prophecy; there was much actual distress during the past winter because of the shortage following the canning operations of last summer. The Fish Commission has no marine jurisdiction, and there seems to be no resource save an act of Congress forbidding commercial fishing in the Yukon and adjacent waters. Archdeacon Stuck is now seeking to bring about the introduction and passage of such a bill. We suggest letters from our readers to their Congressmen urging the passage of such a measure before the adjournment of the present session.

WELL-BRED talk, neither profound nor obvious, but human always and ranging through the centuries and over the globe—with a large class of English, this is still a staple of life. The remark is prompted by a glance at the first few numbers of the London Mercury, a monthly occupied with the sphere of literature and the arts. We have called the articles in this publication "talk" because they are so much more informal than articles in American journals with similar intellectual pretensions. To find informality in American letters one has usually to descend to the popular magazines, where the desire of the writer to be at one with the reader has led to such silly affectations as illiteracy and the slang of the bar-room. In between there is, of course, plenty of plain writing—so plain as not to differ in style from the report of a factory superintendent. But we are speaking of our intellectuals, many of whom when they write put on their culture as though dressing for a function. We have in this country—witness the considerable sale of Everyman's Library—a large audience for whom an appreciation of the urbanities, the charm, the enduring satisfactions of life could be made an active force if these were offered freely and winningly.

INFORMALITY is all right when well-bred. One is not surprised to find it ill-bred in the London Saturday Review, which is always ready to stoop when given a chance to indulge its dislike of America. For this weekly, Lady Astor is plain "Nancy." Yet it is only charitable to remember that the Saturday Review has long carried a weight which less-determined editors would have shifted. It has to repulse the Americanization of Europe and the democratization of England. The latter danger is the one which must cause it the most embarrassment. The honors bestowed by the King at New Year's create a predicament. Shall this paper acquiesce or shall it ignore them? It is the self-appointed guardian of English aristocracy. When, some years ago, Mr. Blundell Maple, head of a large furniture store, was elected to the House of Commons, it was delighted to have the chance to "Blundell" him out. Lady Astor's tongue has been wagging—does the Saturday Review hope to stop it by being too familiar?

The Expulsion of the Socialists at Albany

IN the face of solemn and impressive protests by eminent Republican leaders like Mr. Hughes, by Republican newspapers of which the New York Tribune was the chief, and by New York City organizations like the Bar Association, the Citizens Unions and the City Club, the Assembly at Albany has expelled the five Socialist members by an overwhelming vote. It is a matter of national interest to appraise as correctly as possible the character and significance of this action.

There is one special point that demands separate consideration. Under the Constitution and rules of the Socialist party, those of its members who might be elected to public office incurred certain obligations which, on their face, impaired their independence as public servants. If the fight on the Socialist Assemblymen had been made exclusively on this ground, the question of their expulsion would have had no such significance as it actually bears. A member of a Legislature who is under a definite pledge to follow the instructions of a particular association, whatever its nature, is not truly a representative of the constituency that elects him, but, in part at least, a mere agent of that association. Had the Assembly confined itself to asserting this principle, it would not have raised the broad and fundamental issues which, in point of fact, its action has brought to the front. Even so, as we have heretofore said, the expulsion of the members would not have been justified. It has been pretty clearly made out that the ejected Assemblymen did not explicitly sign such a pledge; and even if they had, all that could justly have been required of them, as a condition for retaining their seats, would have been the abrogation of the pledge. The assumption of such an obligation, though ever so wrong, would have been neither criminal nor disgraceful, and its past existence could not justly be regarded as a disqualification for future service. But the gravamen of the case against the Socialists did not reside in the existence of an obligation as such, but in the character of the association to which the alleged obligation had been incurred. The heart of the case against them was not in any special feature of their relation to the Socialist party, but in the aims of that party itself. The reason that the five men were expelled was because the Socialist party aims to bring about a revolutionary change in the character of our institutions.

Accordingly, the alignment of the forces for and against expulsion was, in essence, upon this question: Has an American constituency the right to be represented in an American legislative body by a man who is opposed to the continuance of the American system of government as now established? And it must be said, in justice to the chief exponents of both sides, that in the main they have frankly recognized this to be the issue. The Tribune, the leading Republican paper of New York, and the World, the leading Democratic paper, were equally unflinching in the assertion of the principle that to deny such right is a flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of representative government. On the other hand, the Sun and New York Herald and the Times firmly declare that the expulsion of the Socialists was a justified assertion of the right of every form of government to take such measures as are necessary for its own preservation. All other elements in the case sink into insignificance in comparison with the fundamental divergence between these two points of view.

Readers of the Review do not need to be told on which side it stands in this vital question. Every form of government is, indeed, possessed of the right—more than that, is charged with the duty—of striving to preserve and perpetuate itself. The question is, by what means shall it accomplish this? In the case of a democratic nation, at least, the answer is plain. Against violence it must maintain itself by any exertion of force, or of punitive repression, that the circumstances may call for. Against infidelity of officers of the law to their sworn duty—as in the case of the Boston police strike—it must maintain itself by summarily dismissing them from their posts. But as against any other form of agitation or endeavor, however clearly directed against established institutions, it must protect itself solely by preserving its hold on the source from which it derives its powers, the sentiment of the people. If any body of men in this country, large or small, is convinced that democratic institutions are an evil and that a monarchy would be preferable to them, they have a right to disseminate that view, to obtain converts to it, and to elect representatives favoring it in any electoral district in which those converts may have come to be a majority. If we can not keep the country from becoming a monarchy otherwise than by suppressing the monarchists, our democratic institutions are in such sad shape that they are not worth preserving. And if we can not keep America from turning Socialist or Communist except by suppressing the voice of those who believe in Socialism or Communism, we have likewise admitted that American democracy, as established by the founders, is a failure.

Through a hundred years of our history, although this kind of question was very remote from our own affairs, we all took an emphatic stand upon it. For the difference between the rights which the Socialists are claiming among us to-day and the rights which liberals in the monarchical countries of Continental Europe were asserting throughout the Nineteenth Century is only a difference as to whose ox is gored. When the Tsar of Russia was sending to Siberia anybody who dared to propose a change in his form of government, when the German Emperor was putting in prison for lèse-majesté anybody who questioned his God-given authority, who were more indignant than we Americans over the exercise of such tyranny? If Bismarck or the Chancellors who succeeded him had undertaken to exclude from the German Reichstag members of the Social-Democratic party, would there not have been a universal outcry in America over this denial of the people's rights? Yet the very name Democratic, not to speak of Social, plainly avowed the design to overthrow the German form of government. Are we to admit that, while it is the duty of a monarchical government to admit to representation those who distinctly avow a programme aimed at its overthrow, a democratic government must resort to the strangulation of its opponents as the only means of preserving its existence? Surely but one answer is possible.

We do not believe that the action of the New York Assembly will find imitators. But if it did, there would be inflicted upon our institutions, upon the whole spirit of them, an injury incalculably grave. If the precedent were to be established, if the practice were to become general, we should never again know whether the country was sound at heart or not. Representation would come to mean not a true picture of the state of public feeling in the various constituencies, but only such a picture as an intolerant majority permits to be presented. When there has been one Socialist in Congress, or two, or three, we have been justified in saying that, out of the hundreds of Congressional districts throughout the length and breadth of the land, this handful was all that the Socialists, with a fair field and no favor, were able to capture. If we don't allow the Socialists to show how many they are, it will obviously be impossible for us to show how few they are. And that is not the worst of it. The charge of disloyality, of an allegiance to some other institution transcending the allegiance to State or country, may be made in more directions than one. It has been made in the past against Catholics, by fanatical organizations which have at times commanded a formidable following. It may be made in the future against members of a labor party, even though not Socialist. It is essentially of the nature of a proscription of citizens not for their acts but for their state of mind. It contains the very essence of tyranny. It bears within itself the seeds of the destruction of freedom. No higher duty rests upon the leaders of public opinion in America to-day than that of exposing its pernicious and dangerous character.

Deplorable as the action of the Assembly has been, viewed as a matter of principle and precedent, there is one aspect of the occurrence in which we find it possible to take a certain degree of comfort. In the duty of responsible legislators, men who should be supposed to understand the principles of the government of which they are a part, the Assembly has lamentably failed. But while it is no excuse, it is something of an explanation of their conduct that they doubtless supposed themselves to be reflecting the sentiment of their constituents. They were not carried away in the end—whatever might have been the case at the beginning—by a sudden gust of emotion. No such overwhelming majority could have been cast against the Socialists unless there had been a fairly universal feeling at Albany that the people held the Socialist programme in abhorrence. Accordingly, if there was any doubt before, it is quite certain now that, except in a few districts, the heart of the people is in the right place. They believe in the government and the institutions under which the country has prospered and grown great. They have no patience with raw innovators who wish to smash all that the industry, the energy, and the patriotism of four generations of Americans have built up. They would, we believe, have been perfectly content to have the Socialists keep their seats; but the Assemblymen were playing to the galleries, and that means, though not to the sober convictions, yet to the emotional susceptibilities, of the people. The wrong that has been done is much like the wrong that was done by a mob here and there to some real or alleged pro-German during the war. Such acts are evil, and not to be excused; yet they had behind them an impulse of real, though undisciplined, patriotism.

It is perhaps not fantastic to surmise that in the very bigness of the Assembly's vote against the Socialists there may be found a certain antidote against its evil effect. It will be difficult for orators to get people greatly excited about a danger which the vote itself shows to be one over which there is no occasion for immediate alarm. However this may be, and whether the Socialist menace shall wax or wane, let us hope that those public men, newspapers, and civic organizations that have borne so honorable a part in resisting the high-handedness at Albany will keep up the good work. There is but one right way, and there is but one effective way, to preserve our institutions against the assault of destructive opinions. America can remain America only through maintaining its hold on the minds and hearts of the great mass of the people. If they will not be Americans of their own free will, we can not make them so by proscriptions and penalties.

The Housing Problem —Ethics or Economics?

THERE has been rushed through the New York Legislature a batch of bills designed to protect tenants in New York City against the hardships of an extraordinary situation, and to restrict the gains of "profiteering" landlords. A number of the bills relate to details of the relation between landlord and tenant, especially as affecting the procedure of dispossession. The most notable of the measures, however, is that which makes an advance of more than 25 per cent. over the preceding year's rent presumptive evidence of an unreasonable agreement, which the tenant may contest in the courts, the burden of proof resting on the landlord, so that the tenant may remain in possession on the old terms, subject to the risk of a judicial decision against him. It is not impossible that this law, if its constitutionality is sustained, will enable a considerable number of tenants to continue in occupation at rents lower than those which their landlords are now demanding. It may further be conceded that, in view of the highly exceptional character of the situation, such relief, however abnormal the method, is justified, provided that it does not carry with it evil consequences that outweigh whatever good it may accomplish. But it is only too evident that the Legislature acted in response to a wild rush of popular feeling, and without the slightest consideration of the larger aspects of the problem.

Every man of sense must know that no artificial restraint upon the scale of rents can continue effective for any length of time if the pressure for housing, due to the scarcity of accommodations, continues unabated. The reasons for that scarcity are of the most substantial possible kind. During the war there was an almost total stoppage of building. Since the close of the war there has been but an extremely slight resumption of operations, owing in part to labor troubles, but above all to the tremendous increase in the money cost of materials and labor. In the meanwhile there has been since the armistice a return of great numbers of men who had been away, and a large influx of newcomers. The supply of housing is hardly greater than it was three years ago, while the demand, both in point of numbers and of the money resources of the population, has been greatly augmented.

Under the ordinary play of economic forces an article of prime necessity, when the supply is deficient, commands a price increased in a far greater ratio than the percentage of deficiency would indicate. In the case of ordinary commodities, however, this increase of price acts as an immediate and powerful stimulus to production. Not so with houses. The keen demand which the exigency brings forth bears not directly upon houses, but upon housing—i.e., the occupancy, the rental, of houses. With no assurance that the high rents of to-day will continue for a long period of years, the inducement which high rents offer for the building of houses is comparatively feeble. If the price of shoes is doubled, and the cost of making them is also doubled, that presents no difficulty to the producer, for he makes his complete turnover at once. But if rents are doubled and the cost of building houses is doubled, the builder has no assurance that he will come out square, so long as he has no strong reason to believe that the increased scale of rents will continue during something like the lifetime of the house. Accordingly, even if there were no legal restrictions on the scale of rents, uncertainty as to the future would act as a most powerful deterrent to building enterprise. A Legislature soberly considering the problem would see that its first duty was to provide encouragement to building enterprise.

What the New York Legislature has done is the diametrical opposite of this. The degree of discouragement which the new laws will create is not to be measured by the character of their specific provisions, serious as those are. People thinking of entering upon building enterprises are put upon notice that any calculation they may make, based on the state of demand and supply, may be completely upset by some act of the Legislature whose nature it is quite impossible to predict. To add to the risks and uncertainties inherent in the situation this novel risk, of unforeseeable dimensions, is evidently to impede in a disastrous degree any prospects there may have been of a widespread resumption of building enterprise; and nothing short of such resumption can bring substantial relief to a housing situation like that of New York.

The failure of the Legislature to grasp the essentials of the subject was emphasized by the circumstance that the one bill which did point toward the encouragement of building failed of passage—a bill exempting mortgages up to a modest amount from taxation. It should be understood, however, that such a measure, while good as far as it goes, can make but a slight impression on the situation. The difficulty of borrowing money is a somewhat important element in the case, but is very far from being the most important one. The great obstacle consists in the risk of the enterprise. To offset this, measures far more effective are necessary than the relief of mortgages from taxation. Exemption from taxation of the houses themselves, for a considerable term of years, would be a really powerful stimulus. If the Legislature had adopted strong measures of this nature, simultaneously with those designed to restrict increase of rent for present occupants, there would have been much more justification for the latter measures.

A prime cause of the futility which marks our dealings with all this class of problems is the tendency, well-nigh universal, to expend upon invective and indignation the energy which ought to be concentrated on sober thinking. With few exceptions, even the most levelheaded of the daily newspapers concentrate attention upon the "greed" of the landlords and the wickedness of the "profiteering" speculators, and have little thought left over to devote to the question of what can be done about the trouble. The landlords may be greedy, the speculators may be profiteers, but why does not somebody else come to the rescue? Why are not the virtuous people, the people who are neither landlords nor speculators, the people who are content with a moderate return on their investments, rushing into the breach? There is nothing to prevent hundreds of millions of dollars being put into the business of house building in New York. Yet nothing of the kind is going on. If wickedness alone is the cause of the high rents, righteousness plus money—and surely the combination must exist—ought to suffice to bring them down. Yet up they stay, and up there is every reason to expect them to stay, for aught that virtue shows any sign of doing to mend matters. It looks as though the rest of us wanted the landlords to be content with less than what the market would give them, but were quite unwilling to take any chances as to what the market would give us if we built the houses which the people need. We are indulging in a lot of high ethics for the other man, but don't care ourselves to act on any higher plane than that of ordinary economics.

Justice and the Bonus

IS it right to compel another person to do a disagreeable job for you and then hold him down to less compensation than you crammed into your pockets while he was away? Let those who are fighting the so-called "bonus" legislation face and answer this single question. To give a soldier $50 more for each month he was in service will not make him whole, and every one knows it. If we may not confiscate property without paying an owner its full value we certainly may not in justice confiscate men's time without equal due compensation.—New York Tribune.

If the question of military service to the country is to be put on the basis of "justice," as applied to the ordinary affairs of daily life, we must not only pay the proposed bonus for the "confiscation of men's time," but heavy damages for compulsory disturbance of their comfort, injury to their peace of mind, all the woes which they and their families suffered through the break-up of their relations. Mere compensation for loss of "time" is quite inadequate. The Tribune does not strengthen its case, but weakens it, by asserting that "to give a soldier $50 more for each month will not make him whole, and every one knows it." That is true in many cases, and in many cases it is the opposite of the truth; but the more it is true, the more plain it is that the underlying principle is wrong, for upon that principle there is no limit whatever to what might be claimed in the name of "justice."

We put forth a mighty effort in the great war, but, in comparison with other great nations, our sacrifices were trifling. If we had suffered as France did, through four years of desperate fighting, we should be having a list of three million men killed, perhaps six million seriously disabled, and many millions more who had served four years under the colors. To pay for these sacrifices, upon the principle that justice requires us really to make "due compensation," would require an inconceivable sum of money; and even if the "due compensation" were reckoned by the measure of the proposed bonus, it would run up to at least a hundred billion dollars. A pacifist might properly assert that any nation that goes to war is bound to burden itself with such an obligation; in the mouth of anybody else it is an absurdity.

The nation's call upon its citizens for military service rests on grounds transcending those that regulate its claims in other matters. It must, indeed, deal justly with all its citizens, in the sense of making favorites of no class and scapegoats of no class. The draft was conducted on this principle. Men of certain ages were called, those of other ages were not; and within the called ages selection was made by the impartial operation of chance. Some who stayed home have got rich—though it must not be forgotten that millions of those who stayed home got poor through the enormous advance in the cost of living. Some who went to the war were killed, some were disabled, most came home hale and hearty. What money compensation can equalize these fates?

To take the chances of war is part of the citizen's duty to the nation; to demand that these chances be taken is part of the country's right to self-preservation. If she can not rightfully make that demand, she can not rightfully compel military service at all; for surely of those who went to the war there are hundreds of thousands who would not have gone for any money consideration whatsoever, though they went gladly for love of their country. Plausible as the Tribune's argument may seem to some, the truth is that the proposed bonus is far more defensible without it than with it. For a bonus, pure and simple, something might be said, but the principle of "due compensation" must be rejected outright. It runs counter to the very essence of the principle upon which the country's right to call on its citizens for military service rests, and the logical consequence of its acceptance would be nothing less than the paralysis of the nation in time of danger.

Ousting the Sultan

IN the conflict between the advocates and the opponents of the Sultan's expulsion from Europe, sentiment is pitted against practical politics, the romantic against the realistic spirit. The creator of fiction who gives to avenging justice the last word in his story finds a reward for that departure from the probable in the approval of the majority of readers. So when there is a chance of seeing poetic justice done in this shocking reality of ours, weighty arguments must be adduced by those who would hinder it from taking effect. For little less than five hundred years the intruder from Asia has resided in the great city which was the cradle of European art and culture. The spirit of the place had left him untouched; not even a veneer of western civilization would stick on his nature. He has remained the Asiatic despot, blasting the prosperity of the lands under his rule, and since, under the tuition of his German master, he learned to foster the ideal of racial expansion he seeks to realize it in true Asiatic fashion by the wholesale massacre of all his Greek and Armenian subjects. An accomplice of his master in the great war, he shared in his downfall, and now that the cruel despot has been brought to his knees, who would not hail his ousting from Constantinople as a just punishment for his misrule and his many crimes, and a recovery by Europe of what she, on historical grounds, considers to be her own?

Such is the reasoning of a large majority in all Christian countries, and Mr. Wilson's recent note insisting that "the anomaly of the Turks in Europe should cease" gave clear and eloquent expression to their feelings. But the whole Turkish problem is a tangle of anomalies. We know from Professor D. B. Macdonald's illuminating article in last week's issue of the Review that of the three large groups of Moslems concerned in this matter—the Turks, the Arabs, and the Indian Islamites—it is the Turks that would view their expulsion with comparative indifference, and the distant Moslems of India who would take it ill as an omen of the final decadence of Islam. The Sultan, consequently, has no better supporters of his continued residence at Constantinople than the very Mohammedans who, in loyalty to their British Emperor, took up arms to help bring about his defeat. Mr. Wilson refuses to believe "that the feelings of the Mohammedan peoples, who not only witnessed the defeat of Turkish power without protest, but even materially assisted in the defeat, will now so resent the expulsion of the Turkish Government as to make a complete reversal of policy on the part of the Great Powers desirable or necessary." With equal right one might meet this confession of disbelief with a credo quia absurdum. But those who dissent from him have more cogent arguments than a statement of their belief in such resentment. The All India Moslem League, uniting both Sunnites and Ghi'ites, has made a strong appeal on behalf of the Sultan, and the "Young" Mohammedan elements in India form the nucleus of a systematic agitation against British rule for which the contemplated humiliation of the Caliph is excellent propaganda matter.

President Wilson, indeed, in support of his disbelief, refers to the active part which the Indian Moslems took in the Sultan's defeat, he leaves out of account the dual nature of the ruler in Stamboul, which made it possible that, as subjects of the British Emperor, they fought against the Sultan of the Ottomans, for whom they have no special affection, and that, as faithful Moslems, they now stand up for the Caliph and the seat of Islam, both objects of their devout worship.

Neither can the objection to the Sultan's expulsion be proved futile by arguing, as is often done, that the Allies were not prevented from throwing the Turks out of three holy places, Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem, by any consideration for their sacredness. The sanctity of Constantinople, in the eyes of the Indian believers, is an attribute not inherent in the city itself, but dependent on the Caliph's residence there. One must not, therefore, equate the ousting of Turkish rule from the holy places in Arabia and Palestine with the expulsion of the Sultan from Constantinople. If the English, on occupying Mecca, had removed the Ka'ba to the British Museum, they would, in the opinion of Indian Moslems, have committed a sacrilege comparable to the contemplated removal of the Caliph from the Seat of Islam. In the mere fact of the occupation of the city there is little that can offend the religious susceptibilities of the believers.

But whether sentiment or practical politics will turn the scale against or in favor of the Sultan, "no arrangement that is made can have any permanency unless the vital interests of Russia in these problems are carefully provided for and protected, and unless it is understood that Russia, when it has a Government recognized by the civilized world, may assert its right to be heard in regard to the decision now made." We quote Mr. Wilson's words with hearty approval. They are based on the assumption that, after the fall of the Soviet Government, which the President appears to take for granted, a new united Russia will arise, vital and strong enough to care for and insist on its right to have a voice in these decisions. The rulers of the present Russia, however, whose Government can not be recognized by the civilized world, are taking good care that, though their delegates are excluded from the council of the Entente diplomats, the discussions shall be ruled by fear of their power. It is not the pressure brought to bear on them by French capitalists, holders of Turkish bonds, that will save the Sultan. The British Government's conversion to the French point of view is dictated by a genuine desire to placate England's Moslem subjects, so as to deprive the Bolshevist agitation in India of fuel. We have, and shall shortly print, an article by Dr. Paul Rohrbach of Berlin, an authority on Eastern matters, from which our readers will see that Mr. Montagu's fear lest Indian resentment over the Sultan's expulsion should be exploited by Bolshevist firebrands is far from imaginary, and is not merely a pretext to be made serviceable to financial interests of French and British capitalists. Russia is actually asserting her right to have her interests regarded in the decisions, but in a different fashion from what Mr. Wilson had in view.

But it must be borne in mind that the sole object of the Bolsheviki's interference in India is the overthrow of British rule, and they will not deem themselves frustrated if the Entente's clemency towards the Sultan should rob their emissaries of some of the fuel for the fire they are to fan. Other matter will be found by the firebrands to set India aflame. The danger can not be averted by leaving the Sultan unmolested. Though the English escape the blame of being enemies of the Caliph, they will still remain the suppressors of Asia, against whom Madam Balabanova and her helpers can stir the hatred of the suppressed. Great Britain must maintain her colonial realm by other means than this roundabout way involving the perpetuation of an anomaly which is a disgrace to Europe. If she can not rely on her own prestige and the loyalty of the races under her rule, the makeshift arrangement with regard to Turkey can not save British India. It would seem to be a wiser, because a more self-reliant, policy for England to scorn the futile protection which a conciliated Sultan might afford, and, trusting to her own resources, to help rid Europe of the intruder and render to Christendom the ancient city of Constantine.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.

Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Behind the Financing of China

(IN FOUR PARTS—PART THREE)

JAPAN'S repudiation of the Paris agreement of May, 1919, is not an exhibition of bad faith on the part of the Japanese Government. Her action—delaying the financial salvage of the Chinese Republic by international coöperation—evidences the difference between the de jure government of a prime minister with his cabinet and the de facto star chamber body actually ruling from behind the Mikado's throne.

When the duly accredited Japanese delegates met the representatives of the United States, France, and Great Britain in a conference at Paris to settle the destinies of the Far East under the overwhelming shadow of the Peace Congress, Japan subscribed unreservedly to the preliminary agreement for a new China Consortium. This was a momentous step. It was a stroke of statesmanship which, if carried into effect with shrewd rapidity, might have redressed substantially the wrong just previously done to China in the abortive Shantung settlement. The four chief principles drafted for the guidance of the financial groups associated in the Consortium were as follows:

(a) That no country should attempt to cultivate special spheres of influence;
(b) That all existing options held by a member of any of the national groups should, so far as practicable, be turned into the consortium as a whole;
(c) That the four banking groups of the countries in question should act in concert and in an effective partnership for the interests of China; and
(d) That the consortium's operations should deal primarily with loans to the Chinese Republic or to Provinces of the Republic, or with loans guaranteed or officially having to do with the Republic or its Provinces, and in each instance of a character sufficient to warrant a public issue.

In other words, the edge was taken off individual financing which threatened China's conquest by strategic railways and government-backed banks. The very first clause of this declaration of purposes was inspired by the United States in order to check effectively the recrudescence of the "spheres of influence" principle in Far Eastern diplomacy under the skilful manipulation of Japanese statesmen. The second was retroactive, striking at the concession gobbling carried on by Japanese interests under cover of the Great War, inasmuch as it laid the basis for the pooling of all options upon which "substantial progress" had not been made. The third, fully the equal of the initial provision in significance, would appear to have made joint action by the financial Powers obligatory; and the idea conveyed in "an effective partnership for the interests of China" was obviously the reassuring cry of the New Finance to those who professed to see in the Consortium a juggernaut of imperialism overriding Chinese independence. Finally, it was provided, largely in deference to Japanese susceptibilities, that the Consortium's scope extended only to operations of a public character involving the financing of the Central Government or the provinces.

Not only were these desiderata agreed to by all the groups through their banking and diplomatic representatives, but the purport of this agreement was presented to the Governments concerned and approved by them. The first intimation that Japan would find it necessary to dissent from these cardinal principles came months after, when the full import of the agreement had been reviewed by the real rulers of Japan. The veto, it is not without significance, originated with the Japanese War Office and those behind it who dictate the master-policy of the Mikado's land. The reason quite frankly intimated was Japan's "special position" in the East.

Reduced to plain terms, this meant that the old guard in Japan retained their dominating control of Japanese destinies behind the screen of pseudo-liberalism of a Premier Hara and a Baron Uchida in the Foreign Office. These men were stalking-horses, political fictions if you like, behind which the old diplomacy of the War Office moved with no faltering steps in the advance on China. There would have to be a revision of Japan's promises, so the fiat went forth to the Hara Cabinet, to maintain intact the "special position" which Japan's devious statecraft had labored so industriously to build. Thus it was the irony of Japanese politics that the "liberal" Ministry itself was coerced into administering what the War Office crowd hoped would be the coup de grace to the project the Cabinet had just underwritten.

There is more than a difference over the interpretation of the Consortium between the inner and outer circles in Japan's Government. In assenting to the financial arrangement of Paris, the Hara Ministry sincerely thought that the best interests of the Mikado's land were being conserved—that the old diplomacy would be Japan's ruin in the East. The War Office, however, under the leadership of General Tanaka, saw no such need for a drastic re-alignment of Japan's policies. The Minister of War and his associates in the background were practical statesmen of the world. They thought that when the flurry America was creating over the financing of China should have passed, there would be little trouble in maintaining the old order in the East. They were also past masters in compromising a diplomatic proposal until it no longer endangered the jealously guarded "special position" of Japan. Indeed, this process of emasculation had been known to stalemate in the past diplomatic games that threatened to embarrass Japan—notably whenever the missionary instinct so pronounced in America's temperament found its intermittent expression in a fluctuating foreign policy.

It is just possible that these hard-headed Japanese statesmen, who had none of the gilded altruism of youth in them, were not unmindful of an approaching Presidential election in the United States, a calculation which has been justified by the fate of the Peace Treaty in the Senate. Perhaps judicious handling could jockey the Consortium through 1921 with enhanced prospects of its dissolution in the end. When we understand that Japan's carefully builded primacy in the East is at stake, her past fruits threatened, and her freedom for expansion at the expense of her neighbors taken from her, why should not the inner circle behind the Mikado gamble yet once again?

After all, these Japanese leaders, strangers to public emotions, could not be expected to abandon their handiwork of a generation so easily. They were asked to turn from the secure past of spheres of influence, railway politics, predatory finance, and all that has made for national aggrandizement to an uncharted future of international coöperation for a dubious national benefit. Ever since the Anglo-Japanese Alliance in 1902, they had made the recognition of Japan's "special position" the goal. Her snarl in 1910 over our proposal for the "neutralization" of the Manchurian communications was prompted by an excess of confidence accumulated during the intervening years. The entrance of Japan into the Great War, and the subsequent diplomatic assault on China in 1915, were reaffirmations of this inverted Monroe Doctrine of Japan. The alliance which she consummated with Russia in 1916 was a partnership designed indubitably to coöperate at China's expense. Japan's state high finance, giving her economic priority in China's development, has become the trump card in the bargaining process to which Japanese statesmen have resorted in their efforts to defeat the Consortium. Linked to these loans are railroad rights different from those of any other Power now concerned in China's fate, because in Japanese hands they mean the extension, in a monopolistic grip, of Japan's extraterritorial jurisdiction over Manchuria, Mongolia, Shantung, and Fukien. This strong position was reinforced by the circle of treaties Japan made in 1917 with Italy, France, Russia, and Britain, as well as by the Japanese distortion of the Ishii-Lansing Agreement so as to make the United States inferentially a party to the underwriting of the "special position" doctrine in the East.

The only hopeful aspect of this delicate situation which has arisen is that, while the Japanese War Office has dictated Japan's course of action, a strong part of the Japanese people are becoming restive.

The responsible business elements have their qualms about the "rail-and-iron" policy dominating the Japanese Government. They at least know Japan can not pit herself against the world. The United States, standing firm on the essentials of the Consortium, aligned France and Britain with us. Japan has been induced to reaffirm international joint action. But Japan's familiar tactics of indirect obstruction remain a dangerous factor. Our State Department's problem is to show the Japanese War Office that the game is up.

CHARLES HODGES

Helping the Reactionaries

THERE can be no doubt about the reaction. It is here, and unless it overreaches itself, it is destined for a long stay. Its evidences are on every side. Nor as yet is there any sign of effective resistance. What it has already won is but a preparation for further advances. The editors of the Review will, of course, differ with me not only as to the reactionary character of certain measures and tendencies, but as to the extent of the reaction as a whole. They can hardly, however, reject the evidences of the general movement. This movement, true enough, is not all-inclusive; it does not carry everything with it in a tidal sweep; for along with much that is subversive of progress is to be found much that is hopeful and promising. But reaction is dominant, and its threat of further encroachments is menacing. To the dangers, perhaps diminishing, of the Bolshevism of the left are added the increasing dangers of the Bolshevism of the right.

A strange sequence is this to the expectation of a new order which prevailed at the time of the armistice. The war had been waged to "make the world safe for democracy." It had resulted in an overwhelming victory. Everywhere, except among the extreme radicals and the extreme reactionaries, the confident belief was held that the old world, with its bitter evils, had fallen asunder and that a new world of social justice was to be ushered in. Even the extreme radicals, though they scoffed at what they called the delusions of the moment, prophesied a new epoch. It was to come, they said, not in the ordinary course of events, but by a carefully planned revolution. By one means or another, according to the general belief, we were to have a new order.

Well, in these United States there is no revolution and no sign of one. The embryo Lenins and Trotskys are mostly in jail or on their personally conducted tours abroad, while their American dupes or abettors, as the case may be, are slated for a bad time. Nor are the signs of a peacefully evolved new order, then so promising, any longer visible. If, as Mr. Wiliam Allen White said, in September, 1918, "capital is permanently hamstrung," the fact but shows that this lively creature is able to get along very well without its Achilles tendons. If, as Mr. Charles M. Schwab then prophesied, only a short time would be needed to wipe out all "sharp distinctions between rich and poor," it seems probable that the term "short time" will have to be interpreted, not according to the calendar, but according to the reckoning of a geologist. And if the President's exhortation to all of us, a few months earlier, to "search our hearts through and through and make them ready for the birth of a new day," is still to be followed, it would appear to demand an extended period of spiritual preparation and of watchful waiting. Not only has the new day not arrived, but it shows no sail in the offing. A likelier happening is the return of an older day. Reaction rules; it rules, moreover, not by usurpation, but by a franchise from the people. It finds easy the task of persuading the common run of citizens that it is not the most evil in the world—that, in fact, in the present crisis, it is a refuge against an intolerable menace.

Any propagandist of the left can tell you the causes of this great transformation. He can recite a long list of governmental derelictions and capitalist aggressions which are responsible. He can sum up all the contributing causes, near and remote —that is, all except the one proximate and dominate cause which, by reason of his closeness to it, escapes his notice. And that is the flood of revolutionist and pseudo-liberal propaganda, inspired first by Germanophil opposition to the war and later by infatuation for the Lenin régime. This propaganda has enabled reaction to arm itself at all points and steadily to increase its hold. It has enabled the reactionary to identify social and political criticism with sedition; the pettiest reform with the extremist overturn; direct legislation with direct action as equal subversions of government; the nationalization of railways with the nationalization of women; reformer, reconstructionist, and revolutionist as common enemies of society. Of the two inspirational sources the Lenin infatuation has, of course, produced the greater volume of most helpful propaganda. Mere wartime sedition could be, to the reactionaries, of only partial and transient benefit. It is Leninism that puts the game in their hands; that enables them to consolidate their gains and to move forward along the whole line for new conquests. For Leninism, with its violation of the most primal right of human beings, is an evil that comes directly "home to men's business and bosoms." All except the fanatic and the sentimentalist can see and understand what it threatens. Even the downmost man, embittered by privation, may regard it with scarcely less dread than does the comfortable bourgeois. Every gratulant utterance of the radical and pseudo-liberal press in behalf of this thing, every palliation or defense of Bolshevist tyranny, brigandage, and persecution, has served to increase the popular apprehension; and reaction, sharp-eyed and resourceful, has reaped the advantage.

Through no power of their own, through no skill in manœuvring, through no measure of press control possible to them, could the reactionaries have come unaided to their present position. The public in recent years had been anything but charitably disposed toward the seekers of privilege and the obstructors of democratic progress. The current of legislation had long been driving against their aims and interests. The vast majority of the votes cast in the Presidential election of 1912 was specifically and aggressively against them. The results of the 1916 election are a puzzle no man can ever read; but, at least, there is nothing in them to indicate a marked subsidence of popular resentment of reactionary designs. Only by generous and plentiful aid could reaction have come into its own. Without doubt there have been contributory causes. The muddling of the Administration in a score of vital matters, by lowering the morale of the people and weakening its faith, has aided in the consummation; and the prolonged wrangle over the peace treaty has added something more. But all this might have happened with no serious effect on the general situation. It is Leninism, with its propaganda of social chaos, which has given the reins to reaction.

In so far as it has been able to do so, against the interference of the law, the outright Communist, I. W. W., and official Socialist press has steadily carried this propaganda to the factories and the fields. In the case of the Communists, the I. W. W.'s, and other extreme groups the plain intent has been the incitement of armed revolution. In the case of the party Socialists it has been to furnish the incitement and then let nature take her course, without reference to any dogmatic interpretations as to the best method. The ballot is good, they say in effect, but if events choose to move in a more violent way, who are we that we should interpose an objection? In its unbolshevized days the Socialist party was the first to condemn any propaganda which even implied the use of revolutionary force. In those times it would have furiously denounced these revolutionists as the tools of reaction, the betrayers of the working class, the Father Gapons who sought to lead their victims up against the rifles and machine guns of the Government, to be uselessly slaughtered. How often in the old days was that denunciation thundered from Socialist press and forum! But times change, and so do parties; the Bolshevik uprising showed an easier way of attaining a goal, and its influence has been to swing the Socialist party more than half way over to the outright revolutionists.

This Leninite propaganda of the extremist papers is not wholly their own. Much of it—in some issues most of it—is drawn from the pages of the so-called liberal journals of opinion. One who has followed the extremist papers for the last fourteen months can not have failed to be impressed with the number of columns credited to the New Republic, the Nation, and the Dial (the last-named now retired from the pro-Bolshevist field), and the additional credits occasionally given to the Survey and the World Tomorrow. One must further have been impressed with a sense that the stuff fitted well in its new setting. It may have been more pretentiously written, more sanctimoniously, or even more daringly and violently written than the home-made stuff of the revolutionist editor. But in point of view and in general adaptability to the needs of revolutionism it harmonized admirably with the surrounding text. The readers of the stuff on its original appearance may have understood it in any way they pleased. To the revolutionist editor who copied it in enormous quantities it meant what he meant, and what his readers wanted it to mean. Those sophistical persons who, in defense of the pseudo-liberal press, draw subtle distinctions between the Leninism in these pretentiously intellectual journals and the Leninism in the rough-stuff revolutionist papers, are sufficiently answered by the fact that so much of the material does duty for both. Highbrow or lowbrow, far or near, the stuff is in substance of a kind. It may be differently trimmed up for different readers; and its effect on the cloistered professor or on the naïve seeker of "culture" may be different from its effect on the perspicacious "sab cat" or on his ecstatic ally, the parlor Bolshevist. But it differs little in essentials. In the high-class journals it takes the form of an arrogant outpouring of passion and prejudice loudly certified as judicial opinion; a studied distortion and suppression of inconvenient facts; a sweeping falseness of accusation; a canting defense of tyranny and repression in the name of democracy and freedom; and a frequent implication, soft-pedalled or loud-pedalled as occasion prompts, of probable revolutionary uprisings. In the case of the rough-stuff papers it is much the same thing, though with less arrogance, less disingenuousness, and with a refreshing absence of cant.

It is all so tragically stupid. Reaction, shrewd old reprobate, pretending to the keenest alarm, and calling, in the name of the high gods, on society to arm itself for defense, chuckles in his sleeve like a Roman soothsayer. For the time, at least, the battle is his.

W. J. GHENT

Poetry

Tides

We sat last night by the fire
In the old room;
She, with her work
In her hands,
I with the gray sock
In mine.
I was knitting;
And the things that we said
To each other,
Of war, and its waste
And its woe,
And the talk
Of books and of friends
Was like the froth
On the wave.
For the tide of one's being flowed on
In thought—
Of which speech
Is but so fitful a sound.

* * * * *

Poetry this may not be called,
Yet—were it signed by the name
Of one of the writers
Called poets to-day—
Would you not, reader,
Give pennies of praise
To buy a new leaf
For the crown?

S. N.

Boston

The Outlook in Germany

SUFFICIENTLY accurate accounts of the German revolution have been given in the daily press so that no detailed history of this totally unexpected reactionary coup d'état is necessary. The revolution never had any chance of permanence because it was not supported by popular reactionary leaders who might have carried the people with them. The new Government lasted a few days only because it was supported by certain troops and because its advent was so unexpected that there was no organized opposition. But with the passing of the reactionary danger, due to the astonishingly unanimous stand of the people, has arisen the more serious menace of Red revolution. An estimate of this situation, because of its bearing on the immediate political and economic future of the world, should be of interest.

The success or failure of a Communist revolution in Germany depends, for the moment at least, on the military. According to the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, the German army was to be reduced by March, 1920, to 100,000 men, but this stipulation was based on the theory that the Treaty would be ratified shortly after signature. As a matter of fact, the Reichswehr, or active army, consists of about 300,000 men, evenly distributed throughout the country. In addition, there are the Sicherheits-polizei — called "Noske's Frogs" because of their green uniforms. These troops, 75,000 in number, correspond roughly to American State troops. They have not yet been tested to any extent but, as they were under the immediate orders of Noske, it can be taken for granted that their tendency would be conservative. Finally, there are the Einwohnerwehr, numbering perhaps 600,000. These forces are largely made up of returned soldiers. They are an entirely volunteer organization, formed to protect the home from violence and have been placed under the Department of the Interior in order to avoid an appearance of excessive militarism. It may be added that they exist contrary to the stipulations of the Treaty.

It was obvious that on the attitude of these troops, especially the Reichswehr, must depend the success or failure of the reactionary revolution. Almost immediately well over half of the Reichswehr declared for the Ebert Government and, when lack of popular support for von Kapp became evident, the balance of the troops wavered, and turned in their allegiance completely to the Ebert Government when their old commander, von Luettwitz, resigned as War Minister. The reactionary revolution was a dead issue. But has its failure strengthened the régime of the coalition parties?

The Ebert Government was based on a compromise and suffers from the traditional weakness of a coalition that has no dominant leadership. It contains members of the moderate parties, which represent the majority of the German people, but these representatives recognize no leader and spend their time dickering over trivialities while vital questions are neglected because no one party is willing to adopt the programme of any other party. The Socialists are disaffected because the Government has not nationalized industry. The Democrats are unhappy because, in the face of economic disaster, and the prime necessity of resumption of trade, the Government has given way too much to Socialist pressure. The Centre is losing its hold on the peasant voters because of the Government's food regulations—paper regulations, to be sure, since no laws are efficiently carried into effect, but none the less irritating. The result of this is that Germany has become more and more disgusted with a régime which appears to accomplish little of importance, which has supplied neither food nor work. In the meantime the two extremes have been active and the Government has been unable effectually to control the propaganda either of the Nationalists or of the Independent Socialists. The Nationalists, or reactionaries, practically control the schools and the universities. Their principles appeal to the enthusiasm of youth and they have tangible, easily understood ideals which strike the imagination. They have national heroes, like Hindenburg, to set up as figureheads to worship—and youth is prone to hero-worship. They have inherited the science of organization. They make fun of the spineless Government of "King Ebert, the saddlemaker"—and youth likes to laugh. The Independent Socialists, on the other hand, attack the Government more grimly. They call it capitalistic; they sneer at its inability to control the profiteers and enforce laws made for the benefit of workingmen. They fatten on hunger and high prices. And always they point toward Russia—the great new Russia where the workingman is king, where the hated bourgeoisie has been hunted from its age-old position of cynical exploitation of the common man. Above all, they point to the Russia with an abundance of grain that could pour across the German borders in a life-giving flood if only the German Government would think of the German people and make peace with the Soviet. Finally, both extremes agree in denunciation of the Treaty of Versailles and the subservience of the Ebert Government to the humiliating dictates of the Entente.

This is the dark side of the picture, so far as the Ebert Government is concerned. The latent strength of the Government was proved by the unanimity with which the people turned to its support when von Kapp carried out his foolish coup d'état. This was not a movement in support of the personnel of the Government. It was rather a spontaneous negative to the threat to take away rights that had been acquired in the revolution of November, 1918. The Government had a great opportunity, and lost it through lack of any firm policy, through dallying with the issues presented, through failure to lead. The Government itself had called a general strike, had thereby pricked the von Kapp bubble, and had put into the hands of the extreme radicals a weapon which they lost no time in using to their own advantage. Demands were made on the Government and agreed to by the Government in a half-hearted fashion. Resignations were demanded and Noske, the really strong man in the Socialist Party, was forced to get out. The Government would not go far enough to make the inclusion of Independent Socialists possible. It went far enough, if its pledges are carried out, to make it subservient to the labor unions. It weakened its own personnel without gaining new adherents either through its weak concessions or through its wavering attempts at firmness. Throughout it acted so slowly, with such obvious hesitation, that it gave the leaders of the Communists plenty of time to organize their military forces and perfect their plans of military adventure.

It is hard to think a spineless government capable of inspiring military forces, and if the Reichswehr stand firm against the Communists, it will not be through loyalty to Ebert but through loyalty to an ideal which the Government has not destroyed. Such loyalty can not be of long duration because enthusiasm demands a living embodiment of an ideal. President Wilson's idealism appealed theoretically to the people of Europe but had no active force until those same people saw the President himself. There is in Germany no truly democratic leader with the power to come out in full view of the people and lead them into realization of the ideals which are latent in the hearts of those who have been freed from imperialism and shudder before the menace of a new autocracy. Therefore, it is fortunate that the Ebert Government has agreed, as one result of the reactionary revolution, to hold new elections in June. The troops and the people know that this Government is the only one which can insure a fair and full expression of the popular will. They know that an election under Communist control would be as farcical as are the elections in Russia, and, since the time is short, they will probably support the Government during the intervening months.

Although the Communist movement in the industrial regions of the lower Rhine has collapsed like the reactionary movement, the recent revolution will leave its mark in one or two outstanding results. German opposition to fulfillment of the terms of the Treaty of Versailles will stiffen. The press has been a unit in claiming the treaty as the real reason for the revolution. The Nationalists have much to say about "German honor"; the Independent Socialists have more to say about the burden placed by the treaty on the workingman. At first Germany trusted to the League of Nations to revise the treaty. When hope in the power of the League went a-glimmering, the nation adopted an attitude of passive resistance. Now it is hopeful of dissension among the Allies and of the growth of radicalism in Allied countries; but in any case it fully intends to scrap the economic terms of the treaty. The second obvious result of the revolution will be a turning away from the West and toward the East. To the Nationalists, Russia is a prostrate nation to be exploited for Germany's benefit. To the Independent Socialists, Russia is the hope of the workingman. The German Government can not put an end to the Communist revolt without making large concessions to the left, every concession being a step toward the Russian alliance. This is not opposed by the reactionaries because they believe themselves able, eventually, to cope with Communism. They are autocrats by nature and by training and think that they know how to deal with a counter-autocracy. Ludendorff recently remarked that he should be quite as willing to work with the Communists as with the militarists for the defeat of the treaty.

This, then, is what the German revolution means. It will immensely increase both the active and the passive opposition to fulfillment of the treaty terms, although opposition by force of arms appears unlikely unless a really Communistic government establishes itself. It will swing the German Government far to the left and will hasten an alliance, or at least close coöperation with Soviet Russia. It has already retarded, and will slow down for a long time to come, the process of German recuperation. The duty of the Allies and of America would appear to be to support the present German Government by every legitimate means, because, in spite of its weakness, in spite of the concessions it has been forced to make, it remains the only bulwark against a radicalism that would almost certainly develop into anarchy. The coming elections will determine the policy of Germany. They will indicate the true national sentiment only if the ballot is universal, secret, and exercised without intimidation. These things, at least, the present Government can guarantee.

EXAMINER

Correspondence

High Praise for Senator Lodge

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I read with much interest your excellent article in your issue of March 27, entitled: "The Wreck of the Treaty." In much that you say I concur; but it contains one sentence against which, as one of your readers, I want to enter an earnest protest. After justly criticizing President Wilson's course in the treaty controversy, you say:

> We do not by any means wish to absolve others of their share of the blame. Senator Lodge has shown himself neither a large-minded statesman nor a competent party leader and he has given countenance to many abominable moves in the game.

This would be more convincing if you had given any specifications for so severe a criticism of one of the most experienced and scholarly statesmen now in the public life of this country. In my judgment, this criticism is without justification. I think you have unconsciously fallen into the error of so many judges who feel that they give an impression of great fairness by distributing the praise or the blame. In many law cases there is much to be said on both sides, and the judgment of the Court carries wider conviction because it fairly measures the pros and cons. But it is a weakness of some judges that, in cases where one side or the other is everlastingly right or wrong, their attempt to be judicial results in an opinion which, either praising or blaming both sides, compromises the issue involved by denying full credit to one side or withholding full discredit from the other. Such an issue, in my opinion, was the momentous controversy just closed in the United States Senate.

It involved two issues of transcendent importance.

The first was our form of government; for if Mr. Wilson had crowded down the throats of the American people his League of Nations, whatever its merits might otherwise have been, by an unconstitutional expedient, whereby it was sought to coerce the Senate into the acceptance of the League, it might have meant the destruction of one of the most salutary features of our Constitution, which divides the power over the foreign relations of this Government between the President and the Senate. It will be an unhappy day for America when its destiny in international relations is controlled by one man, and Mr. Wilson's course in withholding information from the Senate and in interweaving the League with the treaty, in order to compel the acceptance of the former, almost amounted to a coup d'état.

The second issue was the grave question whether America should become a member of a foreign Council sitting in Geneva, which could compromise its sovereign powers and fatally entangle it in the local politics of Europe and Asia. This meant in any form an abandonment of the great and noble tradition to which this country had hitherto been faithful and under which it had grown surpassingly great. It was not a question of isolation, but of independence.

The burden of this terrific struggle fell upon Senator Lodge. No leader of our time since Abraham Lincoln has had a graver responsibility. His party was divided into three factions—the so-called "irreconcilables," the "strong reservationists," and the "mild reservationists." He owed it to his party and to his country to keep these interests together, so far as possible, without sacrificing principle or the great purpose of defeating the President's coup d'état. It was not an easy task. From last July, when the President submitted the treaty to the Senate, until the present month, Senator Lodge gave his time and energy to as difficult a task as any leader in Congress ever assumed. I did not share his view that this country could accept even honorary membership in the so-called "League of Nations"—which is not a league of nations at all, but an offensive and defensive alliance masquerading under the form of a league of nations. I believed that any participation in a so-called "League" which challenges the basic principle of the equality of sovereign nations would have been a mistake and a dangerous mistake; for if this country had become a member of the so-called League, even with the protective reservations, President Wilson, acting through his representative at Geneva, could have continued his fatal implication of this country in the local quarrels of Europe and thus completed the work of destroying the good-will which, at one time, all our Allies had for us in such generous abundance.

Senator Lodge, however, was obliged to reckon with the conflicting views of his own party in the Senate, and, as the responsible leader, take the middle course. He did so with such extraordinary ability that not only was the independence of America saved and the burden of defeating the treaty put upon the President—where it belonged—but he kept his party together and won the support of nearly one-half of the Administration forces. The fight, so far as it was one of personalities, was largely a great struggle between Lodge and Wilson—and Lodge won a complete victory.

I can not recall that a greater triumph has been won for America since the Civil War, and I do not recall that, in the long and acute controversy, Senator Lodge ever said an unworthy word or did an unworthy act. Throughout the whole bitter dispute he was the gentleman, the scholar, and the statesman. His great speech on the League recalled the best traditions of the Senate.

I wish heartily that he were a younger man; for, in my judgment, he would be the ideal candidate to succeed President Wilson. But the immense burdens of the most difficult office in the world must of necessity devolve upon a younger man. But it would be a calamity to the country if the next President of the United States did not have in some capacity, either in the Senate or Cabinet, the great ability and exceptional talent for leadership that Senator Lodge has shown in this great controversy.

Under these circumstances, it does seem to me unjust for the Review to apportion the blame for the defeat of the treaty between President Wilson and Senator Lodge. Did Lodge construct an indefensible League, which, as stated, contradicts the basic principle of the equality of sovereign nations? Did he interweave it with the treaty so that the treaty could not be ratified without the acceptance of a misnamed League which would have fatally compromised the sovereignty and independence of the United States? Did he show any indisposition to accept the treaty—and even the League—if such independence were measurably preserved?

It may be that we live too near these great events to estimate them properly; but I venture the suggestion that a future generation, looking back upon the great controversy in the perspective of a half century, will say that Senator Lodge rendered as great a service to his country as did his great predecessor as the representative of Massachusetts—Daniel Webster—when he defended the integrity of the Union against the assault of Senator Hayne.

This, at least, is my view; and I venture to state it, not without full recognition that the editors of the Review are equally sincere in their conviction.

JAMES M. BECK

New York, April 2

Clemenceau and the Left Bank

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

An editorial paragraph in the Review of March 27 courteously expresses some doubt about the correctness of a remark of mine that M. Clemenceau, until the special treaties with England and the United States were proposed, seemed to have fought with all his skill, resourcefulness, and pertinacity for the separation of the left bank of the Rhine from the German Empire. You quote a statement of M. Stéphane Lauzanne, to the effect that M. Clemenceau and the majority of the French delegation were opposed to this programme, of which President Poincaré and Marshal Foch were the principal sponsors. M. Lauzanne is doubtless in a position to know whereof he speaks. Nevertheless, it is a matter of official record that the French Government and the French delegation insisted, until the middle of March, upon the adoption of the Rhine as "the western boundary of Germany." And M. Clemenceau was the head of the Government and the spokesman of the delegation. I translate from the report presented by M. Louis Barthou on behalf of the Commission de la Paix of the Chamber of Deputies:

> The views of Marshal Foch were adopted . . . by the Government, whose memorandum of February 25 defined its opinion with a clarity, force, and authority which give a historic value to the document. Its title expresses its object: Mémoire du gouvernement français sur la fixation au Rhin de la frontière occidentale de l'Allemagne et l'occupation interalliée des ponts du fleuve. The agreement upon these points between the Government and Marshal Foch continued up to the moment when, on March 14, negotiations with the Allies determined the Government to accept another system of guarantees [i.e., the treaties with England and the United States].

This evidence appears to me to render untenable the assertion that M. Clemenceau did not vigorously support in the Peace Conference the demand for the separation of the territory on the left bank of the Rhine. Either M. Lauzanne's statement is incorrect, or—which is more probable—it refers, not to the period to which the remark quoted from me expressly referred, but to the period subsequent to the proposal of the "other system of guarantees." In the latter case there is no conflict between M. Lauzanne's statement and mine; while your editorial paragraph, through a failure to distinguish the periods before and after March 14, would seem likely to give the reader the erroneous impression that M. Clemenceau was from the first, and irrespective of the alternative guarantees, opposed to the demand for separation. It is true, and is frankly mentioned in the official document I have above cited, that after the French Government had accepted the Anglo-French and Franco-American treaties as a substitute, Marshal Foch continued to favor, and to agitate for, his original programme.

It is also true—to pass from past history to present politics—that if the latter treaty is not ratified by the Senate of the United States, the existing French Government may be expected to demand the other alternative, or at the least, to insist upon the indefinite prolongation of the military occupation of the left bank and of the bridgeheads. Such a policy on the part of the French, though it may seem to them necessary for their military security, would be absolutely indefensible from the point of view of the armistice agreement, and would be fraught with grave peril to France and to Europe. It lies within the power of the Senate to avert that peril and at the same time to exorcise from the French mind that obsessing fear of another German invasion which disturbs their political judgment and deflects their foreign policy into courses dangerous alike to themselves and to others. Either the defensive treaty with France is a superflous precaution against future German invasion, in which case there can be no harm in ratification, or else, as most of the French people seem to believe, it is a needed precaution, in which case there is imperative reason for ratification. That ratification would have, in any case, an incalculably steadying and tranquillizing effect upon the general European situation seems beyond question.

ARTHUR O. LOVEJOY

Baltimore, Md., March 27

[We can assure Professor Lovejoy that Stéphane Lauzanne's statement clearly refers to the period antecedent, not subsequent, to the proposal of the "other system of guarantees." The conversion of Tardieu, according to him, took place before Wilson and Lloyd George, in the beginning of March, offered the solution which the French Government accepted. Lauzanne's disclosures, we admit, seem to clash with the report presented by M. Barthou from which Professor Lovejoy quotes. However, that document speaks of an "agreement upon these points between the Government and Marshal Foch," and although M. Clemenceau was both the head of the Government and the spokesman of the delegation, it does not necessarily follow that his views turned the scale in the decisions of either body. In the French Cabinet the majority, evidently, did not share that moderate view of which M. Lauzanne asserts him to have been an advocate in the peace delegation.—EDS. THE REVIEW.]

Can a Constitutional Amendment be Unconstitutional?

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The first ten amendments were placed in the Constitution to satisfy dissenting States like Rhode Island, as the Congressional resolution submitting them for ratification shows upon its face. They all, including the Tenth, were limitations upon Federal power for the protection of individual rights, either directly or through the States by the application of the home-rule principle of the Tenth Amendment.

The Eleventh protected the States against suit in the Federal courts.

The Twelfth changed the machinery for electing the President and in no way affected State power.

The Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth were products of revolution; adopted in form as Constitutional amendments, they were in fact terms of peace and conditions of reconstruction imposed upon the States in rebellion by force of arms.

The Thirteenth recognized the existing fact of the abolition of slavery which the triumph of the Northern arms had already achieved. In itself it effected nothing new. The police power of the States over the institution of slavery, to which its terms referred, was already non-existent.

The Fourteenth Amendment placed certain disabilities upon ex-Confederates and provided for a change in the Congressional representation of the States in rebellion whereby, as a term of reconstruction and re-admission, the negro population was to count in full instead of three-fifths, as formerly, subject to decrease in representation for disfranchisement.

The remainder consisted of the Freedman's Bill of Civil Rights. It simply extended for the benefit of the colored man, as against the States, guarantees of individual liberty and property rights taken almost verbatim from the original Bill of Rights.

This Amendment neither invaded State power nor transferred it to the Federal Government.

The Fifteenth Amendment related solely to suffrage—suffrage, however, which by the fiat of the military reconstruction Governments had already been conferred upon the negro. Consequently it made no new voters, as does the proposed Nineteenth Amendment.

The States in rebellion, as a condition to their re-admission with full sovereignty and Congressional representation, were required to record their affirmative assent and formal ratification of the three war amendments, as these are, therefore, appropriately called.

Without such assent and ratification by the rebelling States, the necessary three-fourths vote for a Constitutional Amendment could not have been recorded, at least for the Fifteenth, if not for the Fourteenth also.

The Sixteenth Amendment, dealing with the income tax, re-asserted a Federal right (then in temporary abeyance) existing from the foundation of the Government and not affecting State power.

The Seventeenth Amendment merely changed the form of choosing United States Senators, requiring their popular election. It diminished in no way the States' power over such elections, the regulation of which had always been ultimately Federal.

In the strictly historical sense, then, it can be truthfully said that the Eighteenth Amendment is the first attempt by means of a Federal amendment to limit an existing State power reserved by the Tenth Article of the Bill of Rights, or to transfer the same to the Federal Government, or to infringe an individual right protected by our Home Rule plan.

Whether in the light of a perpetual union of equally perpetual States that can be legally done is the question the Supreme Court must determine; whether the perpetual scheme of our Government contemplated the right of the citizen of Nevada, 3,000 miles away, along with 35 other States of varying distance, to legislate upon the dining tables and personal morals of a citizen of Rhode Island or to prescribe by perpetual mandate the conditions of suffrage in South Carolina.

Our form of government contemplates regulation of our intimate personal and local affairs by a responsible political agency—the State Legislature—within reasonable reach of the anger of an outraged people. It contemplates government in such intimate personal affairs by those whom we can punish and reward by our votes; who must look us in the eye and be subject to social ostracism and the door of fellowship being closed in their faces, if by their legislation they have committed an act of tyranny upon their fellows, their neighbors.

That is the philosophy of the Home Rule plan of the Constitution of the United States. That is the cornerstone without which it falls.

That and that alone is States Rights and local self-government.

If that right is invaded, whether in the form of a Constitutional Amendment or not, it can only be protected by a decree of the Supreme Court.

If these amendments can be legally enacted, all our liberties can be taken from us by irresponsible, long-distance political action. The entire Bill of Rights, including its Tenth Article, can be wiped away by this new legislative process.

Jefferson said that the Bill of Rights was the one essential part of the Constitution.

The people of this nation have no right to destroy their form of Government except by actual physical revolution.

If the entire Bill of Rights should be held to be indestructible and beyond the reach of amendment, this would not involve a rigid Constitution, but merely a permanent protection to the individual in his person and property, of his right to government by his neighbors in all things intimate, personal, and local.

It is plainly as much the duty of the court to preserve the States as indestructible political units for local purposes as it is its duty to preserve their indestructible union for Federal purposes, and to declare ultra vires a measure of direct legislation presented in the disguise of a Federal amendment, if it wholly or partly destroys the States.

The limitation upon power is as clear as in the ordinary case of an unconstitutional statute.

The matter, therefore, is clearly justiciable. It begs the question to say that, under our dual form of government, there is no such thing as an unconstitutional Constitutional Amendment. This at first blush might seem to be the case. But when such proposed amendment destroys the Federal form of our Government, in whole or in part, or its method of adoption violates the letter of many of the individual State Constitutions, whose legislatures attempted to ratify, there must be judicial power to declare such amendment void and such ratification illegal.

Otherwise, it must be held that we can commit governmental suicide, without an actual physical revolution, by simply invoking the forms of the amending clause.

These amendments establish iron rules, which are practically permanent, and which the people of no State can hereafter change by any action of their own.

Both the Eighteenth Amendment and the proposed Nineteenth destroy fundamental State powers. Both impose by force a distasteful policy upon the people of unwilling sections. The people of four States are coerced by the former, and of nine or ten by the latter.

If 36 States finally ratify the Nineteenth Amendment, if the question of legality is held not to be justiciable, or if the Supreme Court, in its wisdom, feels it must sustain them as legal acts of government, then a revolution has happened, not only in our form of government, but in our political thought, which foredooms our continued existence as an indestructible union of indestructible States—a Federal Republic under whose home-rule plan we have become great and until now remained free.

It will doubtless be admitted as a legal proposition that it would be ultra vires—and within the power of the Supreme Court to so declare—for two-thirds of a quorum of Congress, backed by 36 State Legislatures, to impose upon the people of 12 dissenting States the so-called nationalization of women; to establish polygamy; to cede all State power; to abolish property; to prescribe a particular religion, or to set up a monarchy in place of our Federal Union.

Yet if the question of the power to pass the so-called Eighteenth and Nineteenth Amendments is not a subject for judicial determination, neither could the Supreme Court declare any such acts void in law, provided they were clothed in the prescribed form of, and adopted as, constitutional Amendments.

As long as we remain the United States of America that can not be.

GEORGE STEWART BROWN

New York, March 30

Intermolecular Space and the Spirit

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have just read Professor Jastrow's excellent analysis of "The Case of Sir Oliver Lodge" in the Review. I am not a believer in "spiritism," though a very able "medium" gave me private daylight séances with remarkable manifestations. On one occasion a scientific skeptic of note observed the séance freely from an adjoining room—after which we changed places, and I, too, could not discover fraud. Yet I was not convinced.

There is, however, one entirely scientific argument in favor of the "possibility" of the "astral body," which to my mind is unanswerable, and on the strength of which I have frequently consoled sadly afflicted mourners who came to ask my opinion of spiritualism. This is the well-known acceptance of the "intermolecular space," the argument being that the molecules of the body might "collapse" in death, leaving the intermolecular space of the body "charged" with "atomic activity" and—for a time—as a personal entity.

EMILE BERLINER

Washington, D. C., March 12

Problems of Labor and Capital

Employers' Associations

[This is the first of a series of articles, which will appear in the Review in successive weeks, by Mr. Morris L. Ernst, a member of the New York Bar, who has long given special attention to many aspects of the labor question, and especially to the relations between employers and employed. Mr. Ernst was for several years engaged in manufacturing business as joint proprietor of a plant and afterwards managed a large retail establishment in New York City. The law firm of which he is a member is in the peculiar position of representing both employers' associations and labor unions, in various lines. Mr. Ernst is now chairman of the New York City Club's committee on legislation. For several years preceding his selection for this post he was chairman of the City Club committees on State Employment Bureaus, Farm Colonies for Vagrants, and Industrial Relations. During the war, as a "dollar-a-year man," he acted as Assistant Labor Expert to the Shipping Board.]

SHORTLY after Mr. Wilson was elected President for the first time, he wrote to the Federal Trade Commission requesting it to make a study of trade associations throughout the United States. Nowhere is there greater need of such investigation and of the clearer definition that may be expected to result from it. In most industries associations of employers are a sporadic growth, summoned into existence to meet the threats either of labor or of legislation, and their membership, in consequence, is often hastily and illogically made up. Yet until the associations of employers are as highly developed as the trade unions, and their jurisdiction as clearly defined, peaceful and lasting settlements in labor disputes can not be hoped for.

An illustration of the present difficulty very quickly made itself manifest to the men and women who were called upon to assist in a proposed settlement of the laundry strike in the City of New York in the latter part of 1919; they realized at once that, whereas there was supposed to be a strike in one industry, in reality there were strikes in three separate industries. Even a cursory study showed that the steam laundry, bundle laundry, and hand laundry trades must each one be treated separately in the adjustment of conditions of employment, although the employers engaged in all three of these businesses, commonly known as the laundry business, had illogically combined into one association. As soon as a strike developed, the employers in these various laundry industries realized that their interests were not in common, and even if the employers had remained in one association a lasting settlement would have been impossible because the conditions of employment were in no way similar among them, and the employees were not interchangeable.

Employers' associations have, indeed, very generally been born out of a need for united action in matters other than labor, for exchange of credit information, or for proper representation in legislative chambers. In the textile and garment trades, it has taken years to develop associations of employers on the basis of similarity in the type of persons employed. The retail furniture trade was organized for credit purposes years before it was put on a basis which enabled it to deal with labor problems. In the jewelry industry, until recently, there were separate associations of platinum-smiths and goldsmiths. Although employees are not interchangeable, that is, a worker on cheap gold jewelry can not take a position in a platinum-smith shop, nor would a worker on platinum be satisfied with the pay of a worker on gold, the amalgamation was inevitable because the labor unions covered the entire industry engaged in the manufacture of jewelry. A form of organization, however, which is to make possible lasting industrial peace must be on a basis of type of labor employed and not on the basis of the name commonly applied to the product; otherwise parties to the conflict will discover conflicting interests within their own ranks, and those who do finally come to an agreement may be so far from numerically representative that no solution they arrive at will long continue to be held satisfactory.

This desirable symmetry of organization is sometimes easy, and sometimes very difficult, to accomplish. The more skilled the trades, the simpler it becomes to consolidate into a single employers' association all the plants employing such workmen. Conversely, the unions of office-help will always be handicapped by the almost impossible task of gathering into one assocation all the employers of office help. Even employees, who have advanced much further than employers toward proper organizations, meet with difficulties arising from overlapping jurisdictions. The Teamsters and Chauffeurs Unions, for example, can never reach lasting agreements with employers in the retail furniture trade until the unions include in their membership the teamsters and chauffeurs working for furniture departments of department stores, piano manufacturers, warehouses, and others employing similar labor. Unless agreements between chauffeurs and employers extend to nearly all employers of such chauffeurs, competition will destroy their effectiveness.

In its important investigation, therefore, the Federal Trade Commission, and any State boards or agencies having similar powers, should receive the hearty coöperation of organizations such as the Merchants Associations and Chambers of Commerce of the larger cities. But unfortunately such organizations are composed of individual merchants, who so far as they represent anything as a whole, represent capital as a whole. Real progress is not to be made in that way. It is surprising that the Merchants Association of the City of New York, for example, has not organized in the form of a subsidiary council a group consisting of the official representatives of all of the different trade associations in the City of New York. Not only would the formation of such a council clarify to some extent the present confused jurisdictions of the various employers' associations, but in the event of conflicting interests between industries there would exist a forum for proper discussion.

Another problem which is related to the question of the definition of jurisdictions is the matter of competition as affected by different standards adopted in various competing communities in regard to labor conditions. Employers in one city, presented with demands from their workmen for increased pay or shorter hours, hesitate, and with considerable justice, to accede to such demands because the granting of them would place the manufacturer of that district under a competitive disadvantage in relation to other markets. The demand of the Upholsterers Unions of New York City for a forty-four-hour week with a dollar per hour minimum wage was presented at a time when practically every other competitive manufacturing market, such as Grand Rapids, Binghamton, Chicago, and Medina, was working under a forty-eight-hour week and no hourly minimum.

In a proper organization of employers' associations on national lines also lies greater success for the legitimate aims of organized labor. Several industries, it must be admitted, have developed their organizations of employers and trades unions along analogous local, State, and even national lines. In the building and printing trades great strides have already been made. The tentative report issued by the President's Second Industrial Conference also has in mind the establishment of district boards which would be cognizant of the fact that conditions of employment, in so far as they affect cost of production, must be established on more than a purely local basis.

What is needed can come only gradually. Already the continued successful operation of "impartial chairmen" in certain trades is a striking token of clearly defined and comprehensive organization on the part of employers. Thereunder, employers have obtained industrial peace, and labor has been able to speak clearly.

MORRIS L. ERNST

Book Reviews

A Sheaf of Verse

The Cobbler of Willow Street. By George O'Neil. New York: Boni and Liveright.
The Pursuit of Happiness. By Benjamin R. C. Low. New York: John Lane Company.
Hearts Awake. By Amelia Josephine Burr. New York: George H. Doran Company.
Youth Riding. By Mary Caroline Davies. New York: The Macmillan Company.
Shadowy Thresholds. By Cale Young Rice. New York: The Century Company.

MR. GEORGE O'NEIL, a poet of twenty-one, is already impressing critics. Miss Zoe Akins takes his verses to her heart in a preface which is almost an embrace, and the grave salute of the Harvard professor, Mr. John L. Lowes, is hardly less affectionate. I am quite at one with Miss Akins and Mr. Lowes in the sense of a real—even a rare—charm in this fragrant and glancing verse. It is full of quick, bright, shy, passing things, like the surprises of the grove or the cliffside. The means astonish us sometimes by their simplicity. "O rolling hills, trees in the wind, blue sky," says Mr. O'Neil; and the trees in the wind are actually consigned to us in that verse, and the transfer seems so inexpensive to Mr. O'Neil that at first we scarcely realize its profit to ourselves. I quote a six-line poem, common enough except for the empyreal final line, which flies skyward, taking its companions with it.

Now summer is a king grown old,
Whose wealth diminishes, whose sway
Over his land ebbs day by day . . .
And soon, with pageantry of gold,
A prince shall come to claim the realm. . . .
(All this is rumored in an elm.)

This is imagination. Let us frankly and warmly proclaim its worth, and at the same time curb that impulse to prophesy which so instantly and curiously follows the eagerness to praise. Mr. O'Neil is said to be twenty-one, and at twenty-one it is sometimes a little hard to say whether the age or the man writes the poetry. For the lark to sing hymns at heaven's gate is comparatively easy at the break of day. The difficulty is to maintain the song when the east has ceased to be roseate. In the poem I have just quoted, Mr. O'Neil's fondness for dots in punctuation is observable, and the sensitive reader will note that his felicities are mainly dots. He is an illuminator, but, as yet, perhaps it is letters rather than words that he enriches in his glowing missal. He is overfond of a few words and images, of lace, for example, and he falls into fantasticalities like

While cricket Nero fiddles by Watching his Rome—the summer—burn.

These things are subsidiary. What troubles me a little more is the inaccuracy, or perhaps I should more modestly say, the doubtfulness, of some of his originalities. He speaks of the "speculative fingers" of the rain. Now I can conceive of rain as speculative if it falls slowly enough to suggest the meditative indolence of Milton's "minute drops from off the eaves," and I can see fingers of a sort if it falls rapidly enough to form lines; but I can not conceive it as simultaneously finger-like and speculative. To sum up, Mr. O'Neil has proved in this first volume the rarity of his endowment. The difficulties I have suggested are conquerable, no doubt, and there is nothing to preclude the hope that the strength for their conquest has been granted to Mr. O'Neil.

I thought well, on the whole, of Mr. Benjamin R. C. Low's "House That Was." Of his "Pursuit of Happiness," with its ruffed eighteenth-century title, I think worse and better. It is more perverse; it is also more original. If there could be a poetry for the nostril that was not also a poetry for the mouth, I should call the fifty-five sonnets which comprise about half the volume high poetry. Their effluence—I am choosing my word—is delectable. Under Mr. Low's pilotage "Sabaean odours" from Araby the Blest have blown across my route; but he has refused to disembark, and the spice-jars which I as trader had brought to that coast are unreplenished.

I quote a sonnet:

A summer beach, warm, drowsing; clean, wet sand
With filling footprints; boys and girls and sea.
Here, hose and shoon discarded, rapturedly
They run the gauntlet; here, linked hand in hand,
Adventure off their native bridge of land—
Foam-deep to instep, ankle and then knee—
To scurry home again in panic glee
With clothes caught high, and limbs all shining tanned.
Beauty wafts inland, Love to seaward blows,
And meeting, part, and parting, meet no more
One golden moment blended, they are still;
In children, in the bud-break of a rose.
The petals bloom, the childish zest burns chill:
The wind is desolate upon the shore.

Several points may be noted in this sonnet. First, there is the intricacy of expression, catching a traditional thought in the meshes of its superficial novelty. Second, there is the half-fit, or misfit, in the leading figure: children pursue their gambols with the sea with a perseverance to which the idea of momentary contact and eternal parting can not be effectually related by a vigilant mind. Third, there is the exquisite "in the bud-break of a rose," followed in the next line by the absurdity of "zest burning chill" (to which Milton's "burns frore" is not really comparable). Last of all, is an undoubted magnificence, a "proud, free sail," a high and gallant carriage, in the verse, which remind one somewhat of the work of Olive Tilford Dargan. Three of these points, the arrival at the obvious through the recondite, the exquisite in phrase shot with the puerile, and the manner of a prince of the blood, are pretty constant in Mr. Low, and make him at the same time valuable as a possession and stimulating as a problem.

"Hearts Awake" has not the full inspiration which made Miss Burr's "Silver Trumpet" memorable among the evocations of the war. Possibly the difference lies less in the blast itself than in the fact that in its passage towards us it has crossed the Quai d'Orsay and Pennsylvania Avenue. Between the "Silver Trumpet" and "Hearts Awake" there has come upon the world a change like the reaction in Scott's stag hunt in the "Lady of the Lake" from the blitheness of the morning gallop to the time when

Back limp'd with slow and crippled pace
The sulky leaders of the chase.

Miss Burr's lyrics are still vigorous and fervent; she has the good gift of heated epigram, epigram being a figure whose crystallizations often indicate a fall of the mercury. She says of the flag: "Of old it was our heritage—to-day it is our child." She makes Serbia say:

Listen to my living ere the hour be sped,
Lest you hear forever the silence of my dead.

This is the simple old idealism—the traditional idealism—over again. I admit its beauty, but I feel that the idealism which can now save us must be not an inheritance but a discovery.

Two-thirds of Miss Burr's volume, however, is occupied with a fairy play in three parts, called the "Pixy." It is a fairy tale informed with a human and a Christian spirit; the Pixy who gives it its name and its impulsion differs from the other characters rather by the excess than the shortage of her humanity and Christianity. She has the zeal of a convert, and it is part of the irony of things that the moving first act, in which she is still unconverted, should attract to its earthy and pagan self the whole dramatic vigor of the play. The rest is dutifully done, but its piety is unaffecting.

There is one law about subjects of this kind which Miss Burr has permitted herself to infringe. Old tales and legends are crusts or shells, the filling of which is renewable from time to time. A twentieth-century filling in a thirteenth-century shell is entirely proper. But novelty in the form or body of the legend—in other words, a new shell—is hardly permissible. If there is to be fairy lore in a rationalizing age, it must be a fairy lore with which we in our childhood, or the world in its childhood, was acquainted. Now, Miss Burr's idea that a fairy by self-destruction can magically free a beloved human being from the thraldom of a charm is new to me in fairy legend. It may not be new to Miss Burr, but Miss Burr is not writing for herself. We should like her fairy better in any case with a smaller allowance of magnanimity. The Pixy turns into a saint without becoming a woman in the process.

Miss Mary Davies begins thus in "Youth Riding":

> I will not bow my head
> To listen to the dead.
> I am alive and I am young,
> There is gladness on my tongue,
> And my lips are red.

Youth for Miss Davies is no state of simple, natural well-being. Youth is a calling; youth is a cult, and its object is not to forget itself in labor or in joy, but to recall itself to itself in endless strains of self-fondling panegyric. Shelley in his "Prometheus" describes certain dithyrambic beings in a chariot who "drink the wind of their own speed." That is the occupation of Miss Davies' "Youth." Old age is a lingering ailment from which the examples of recovery are few. Youth is a more violent malady, with the compensating advantage that the cure is speedy and relapse impossible. The peculiarity in Miss Davies' case is that the inflammation has been prodigious. She despises age. God is old, and Miss Davies is almost kittenish with him on the subject of his infirmities,

> God, his dim old eyes to bless,
> Brings back the Spring.

Miss Davies is an emotional poet, or at least a poet of emotional themes. She avers, she insists that she feels, and she is a strenuous and determined young person whom it would be impolitic to gainsay. Besides, the testimonies are overwhelming. It is difficult to deny that a person is wounded who bleeds visibly, copiously in one's presence, who stands, so to speak, in a pool of his own blood. Even the hardiest doubter must in all seriousness admit that Miss Davies is adept in the rhetoric of feeling. I do not mean the ancient, spurious rhetoric, but the true modern brand which preaches simplicity, directness, condensation. She feels the puissance of monosyllables, and she knows that tiny words, like children, however rebellious to the tactless hand, are pliancy itself to the touch that sympathizes. Her formula for emotion might be defined as measure in the expression of the unmeasured, and its excellence as formula is undeniable. She deploys emotion skilfully; she is sensitive to brevity and climax. There are rare and fortunate moments in which cynicism itself could hardly discriminate her virtuosity from virtue. Who could ask for anything better than the close of the "Door," or than two lines like the following?

> And where the little river cried,
> Her grave was made.

But Miss Davies talks too much, permits the adversary too many tests. The foreigner who wishes to pass himself off for a native in the Pays du Tendre, or anywhere else, should not only talk very well, but talk very little. Miss Davies' emotion reminds me of that chill, bright gleam which does duty for flame on the stage grates in our theatres. It has every property of fire—but warmth.

Mr. Cale Young Rice has a very active mind, a mind active in several planes. The plane of its activity in his latest volume, "Shadowy Thresholds," is hardly of a nature to exalt his reputation. Mr. Rice, like Shakespeare's Richard II, is too lavish of his commerce with the public. He should imitate the reserve of Bolingbroke:

> My presence, like a robe pontifical,
> Ne'er seen but wondered at.

Much in "Shadowy Thresholds" is as good as much in the earlier collections of lyrics; the inferiority of its best to their best is the disenchanting circumstance. The verse, indeed, is often melodious, and once in a while becomes seductive. The four lines that follow are a hammock for the ear:

> To watch along Sumatra
> The Bay of Bengal counting
> Its fevered pulsing surf-beat
> With timeless undertone.

One recalls with some pleasure the opening sketches of a "Poet's Childhood," and the Hawthornesque fantasy, "After the Symphony," which ends the book. There is a preface which is worth reading, though passages occur which breed the wish that the sharpness of the author's temper might be transferred to his perceptions.

O. W. Firkins

Domestic and Imported Models

The Happy Years. By Inez Haynes Irwin. New York: Henry Holt and Company.
The Board Walk. By Margaret Widdemer. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe.
From Place to Place. By Irvin S. Cobb. New York: George H. Doran Company.
The Blower of Bubbles. By Arthur Beverley Baxter. New York: D. Appleton and Company.
Short Stories from the Balkans. Translated into English by Edna Worthley Underwood. Boston: Marshall Jones Company.
A Lithuanian Village. By Leon Kobrin. Authorized Translation from the Yiddish, by Isaac Goldberg, Ph. D. New York: Brentano's.

The author of "The Happy Years" is past-mistress of the type of short story that is "available" for the benevolent and not unprofitable uses of the woman's (or ladies') home magazine. A recent critic of the novel has very well said that the prime essential in popular fiction is its linking of the strange to the familiar. For the flapper, if you like, wild journeyings into a romantic void. For the young matron, bring hither, rather, your "little stories of married life." Show her a pair not so unlike herself and her man, meeting conditions and problems not so unlike her own; show her a domestic gear often subject to strain yet running smooth and safe in its bath of sentiment; and you have shown her the pleasantest fare romance possesses for her. Such is the fare provided in "The Happy Years." Maywood, the snug, well-groomed commuters' town, with its nice average people, its Woman's Club, its Business Man's Club, its comfortable social and civic preoccupations, is the town we all know, whether we live in it or not. Martins, Storrows, Warburtons—these are sound Anglo-American names, a circle of young or middle-aged couples busy with their problems of domestic economy, child-rearing, and connubial adjustment. Such materials the story-teller handles capably and not too subtly, always with an eye to the necessity for everything's "turning out right" even if it has to be taken by the scruff and turned out by hand. Miss Widdemer ("as was") has also often shown her ability to produce pleasant, comfortable stuff of similar kind. She has romanticized the flapper to good purpose, and her "rose garden husband" or her "wishing-ring man." In "The Board Walk" she seems to rest from felicity. This is realism of no timid order. The light of romance hangs over two or three of the tales, but not romances of the "sweet pretty" kind. There are no commercially agreeable endings; and a number of the sketches are about distinctly unpleasant matters, like the betrayal of infancy, the cruel snobbishness of childhood, the brutality of a religious flock toward its pastor. Our persons are the "natives" of a little summer place, with its Boardwalk and its "tawdrily excited summers" lived at the pace of its irresponsible visitors and too often to the cost of the resident maidens who are dull enough, Heaven knows, the rest of the year. A fresh scene, to which the story-teller brings an uncompromising if not unsympathetic eye.

There is not much to say of any newest collection of stories by Irvin S. Cobb except that they are or are not up to previous sample. "From Place to Place" includes some very good "Cobbs." Not that they are all of a piece. Mr. Cobb, though he has the endurable misfortune to be popular, has not only a natural knack for story-telling, but a liberal instinct for ideas. He can tell you a story about a hangman, or a crook, or a child, or a Southern mammy, or a "bull called Emily," with equal address and effectiveness. Now and then he is careless about letting the bones of his plot stick out or in buttering the action overfreely with sentiment. But though frankly enough a smile-and-tear artist, his humor is sound enough to avoid, nearly always (in his fiction), the extremes of blubber and guffaw. In contrast with his easy professionalism, the amateurishness of "The Blower of Bubbles" would become unfairly conspicuous. The five stories collected were written by a Canadian soldier at odd times during his "interesting but undistinguished service of nearly four years" with the Canadian forces. The title story is a somewhat labored portraiture of an unusual sort of man. The other tales, which are more consciously plotted and rounded out, are better of their kind. One of them, "The Airy Prince," is a brilliant and tender little fantasy, involving the war-brought contact of an English airman and a little French peasant who, not by chance as we see, is called Pippa.

The translator of "Short Stories from the Balkans" has before this published English translations from the Russian, Spanish, and Portuguese. The present volume contains versions from the Czech, Rumanian, Serbian, Croatian, and Hungarian tongues. Each of the tales is prefaced by a brief note on the author and his place in national and European literature. These really do much to illuminate names like Vrchlický, Savatopluk Cech, Lazarevic, Miksáth and Jan Neruda. It should be a good thing for the story-reading American to realize that all over Europe, even in those tumultuous Balkans which but the other day we connected with "opera-bouffe," men of genius have for many years been expressing themselves in that form of the short-story which American magazine editors have held up as a recent American invention. The translator emphasizes the fact that these writers have not confined themselves to that form. Versatility seems to have been the rule among them. Most of them have been primarily poets, but have essayed all sorts of writing, and through one medium or another have expressed all sorts of moods and points of view. In theme and treatment the tales here assembled show great variety. But the striking thing about them is the subtlety and complexity of mood one feels in them, in almost every one of them, taken by itself. For a parallel we must turn to Scandinavia: Andersen, Ibsen, Bojer, Nexo. Otherwise Mrs. Underwood's generalization may safely stand: "The union of the poet and the wit, the romantic dreamer and the bitter critic of life, is one of the gifts of Hungary and its neighboring peoples to the world of letters. It is seldom found in the Teuton or the Latin, even in a slight degree."

But in the Jew it is surely to be found, or a blend closely akin to it; in a Heine, and in the author of "A Lithuanian Village." Leon Kobrin is among the few leading writers of Yiddish literature in America. Besides his dramas of the ghetto and a vast number of tales and half a dozen novels, he has translated much into Yiddish from the world classics, with a range from Faust, Hamlet, Echegaray, Turgeniev, Maupassant, and Hugo. His own translator into English admits that his tales are often "brutally realistic." In this book, however, though naturalistic detail is by no means lacking, the atmosphere is war with sentiment and memory. The words with which it begins and ends, "Somewhere in Lithuania there once nestled the little village of B——", are not without their tender elegiac overtones. Out of memory the author seems to build the homely Jewish nest of his childhood, a place of poverty and squalor, yet also a place of ancient faith and young dreams. It is gone. America has called it from the old ways; and it will never be again. The book is a group of sketches rather than stories in the magazinable sense, but full of vitality and interest for English readers who, as Dr. Goldberg says, are at last "gazing toward wider literary horizons."

H. W. Boynton

Echoes of the War

The Stolen Lands. By Marie Harrison. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

How I Filmed the War. By Lieut. Malins. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

Written apparently towards the close of 1917, Miss Harrison's little book is a bit of simple and earnest propaganda addressed to the average Englishman with the object of convincing him that the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine is not merely a natural desire of France, but the concern of all nations united for the overthrow of German militarism. As such it has served its turn. When the war ended France reclaimed her provinces, not merely with the acquiescence, but with the hearty applause of all her allies. That problem of the war is settled; one "open sore of Europe" has been healed, and just so far as that is the case Miss Harrison's book appears to lag superfluous on the stage. All that she says is good and true, but it has not only been said before, but has been heard and acted upon.

Yet there is something in the book of lasting value. Miss Harrison had the rare chance of visiting during the war that part of Alsace which was already regained for France. She went, not as a member of a personally conducted party, but independently, to study conditions and gather impressions at her leisure. She stayed for the greater part of the time at Massevaux, not ten miles from the German trenches; at Thann she saw shells bursting in the streets and was presented with a gas-mask by the Mayor of that little town. What she gives us, then, are her impressions of life in Alsace redeemed from the German yoke, but still under the ever-present German menace. They may, perhaps, be summed up in a single phrase: "In all the tumults of warfare the Alsatians are closer to peace than they ever were in the days of Germany occupation." The district was never more prosperous; factories were working, vineyards were cultivated, farmers were making more money than ever before. There were few food restrictions; rules that applied in Paris were not enforced in Alsace. The menu of a chance luncheon in a little wayside inn—creamy soup, a cheese pancake filled with whipped cream; tender veal, petits pois, éclairs, coffee, and a bottle of good red wine, all for three francs—makes one's mouth water with longing for past delights. And it was not material prosperity alone that the Alsatians enjoyed—they had that under German rule—but the sense of liberation. "In the old days" a teaching sister at Thann told her "we used to lock the doors and draw the shutters and in very soft voices sing the Marseillaise. Now we can sing it as loud as ever we like and all the doors and windows are open." "What did you feel like when the French came into Alsace?" Miss Harrison asked a woman in Massevaux. "It was like a coming home," she answered; "as if someone I had loved long ago and who had gone away had at last come back. It was the happiest day of my life; no matter what the future holds in store for me, nothing can take away its splendor." Or take the words of a simple shop-keeper envisaging the terrible possibility of a German return. "In that case" said he, "I should go into a little corner of France and be glad to die." Actions, however, speak louder than words, and the strongest proof of the loyalty of the two provinces to France is furnished by the fact recorded by Miss Harrison that they gave the French army some 3,000 officers; in the German army there was but one real Alsatian officer; five others—only five—reckoned as such, were by descent half German.

It is its recognition of the human element, the little scenes from Alsatian life, bits of talk that reveal the heart of a people, that give lasting interest to what would otherwise be a book wholly devoted to the discussion of a past issue.

There is nothing of the faint or slowly dying echo in Lieutenant Malins's work. It is, in fact, the noisiest book imaginable. Every page resounds with the bursts of crumps, pipsqueaks, flying pigs, woolly bears, and other zoölogical specimens of high explosives. For Lieutenant Geoffrey Malins, Official War Office Kinematographer, "filmed" the battle of the Somme where heavy artillery first showed its full power, and, to speak in the vernacular, had the time of his young life doing it. It is impossible to criticise such a book seriously and yet it is impossible to laugh at the author. In his pursuit of thrilling scenes for the camera he braved danger in a way that would be heroic, if it did not seem almost stupid. He was drenched with German weeping gas and blinded for hours; he was blown into a deserted trench by the explosion of a shell and lay all night on the body of a German killed some weeks before; he was hit by a burning fragment in the conflagration of Peronne and "set up an unearthly yell" as the flames caught his ear and singed his hair. But nothing daunted him. He lay all night in the front trenches to photograph the explosion of the great mine near Beaumont-Hammel that opened the battle. He filmed the first tank that went into action near Martinpuish and the first British regiment that crossed the Somme. When the Germans fell back on the Hindenburg line he was hot on the trail, often miles in front of British troops, "filming" scenes of Hunnish devastation, villages of starving refugees, and joyous receptions of liberating soldiers by the peasantry.

But he was not given to the pursuit only of scenes of battle and ruined towns. He "filmed" personages great and small on all occasions, the greater the better: naturally, the Prince of Wales, Lord Kitchener, Sir Douglas Haig, and the King. Perhaps the most delightful chapter of the book is that which records his pursuit of King George on his visit to the Somme battlefield. From this first moment he followed the King like a bloodhound, flying after him in cars that blew out tires at inopportune moments, rushing on before the royal party in time to plant his camera on the parapet of an old trench and catch them as they passed, and especially happy at getting a picture of the King patting a small puppy outside a field hospital. At the last moment he received permission to return to England on the same boat as the King. He drove madly to the harbor, cursing his old "bus" because she could only "limp along" at fifty miles an hour. He just arrived in time, dashed wildly by the King, who was making his official farewells on the quay, set up his camera on the ship's deck and "filmed" it all; "not an incident had passed me."

The book is written in the most remarkable mixture of styles imaginable. We have page after page of realistic dialogue, steeped in the racy slang of the trenches, and then an outburst of flamboyant journalism such as no human being ever spoke and no good Christian ever wrote. In spite of his journalese, however, the writer really succeeds in putting over a most lively picture of trench warfare. We see and feel the Flanders mud, up to the bellies of the pack-mules at times; we hear the deafening roar of the high explosives "plastering" a hostile trench; we snuff the tainted air on Trones wood, a "fair hell" of rotting corpses. One of the vividest pictures in the book is that of the writer staggering through the ruined trenches under the weight of his equipment, "sweating like a bull," with a lighted cigarette in each corner of his mouth to keep off the buzzing torment of the poisonous flies. Lieutenant Malins is not one of Carlyle's strong silent heroes. He is a very voluble young person, but he is something of a hero all the same.

T. M. Parrott

The Run of the Shelves

Lack of interest in the matter is the reason assigned—and it is the real reason—for the abandonment of simplified spelling by the Modern Language Association. Its adoption some years ago was the work of an enthusiastic minority, but the enthusiasm, as time went on, failed to spread. How "shud" it be expected to when the Association's papers "ar red by title"? Too many of the simplifications adopted by the Association were of this highly objectionable sort. As Mr. Henry Bradley has made plain, spelling does other things besides suggesting sounds; a word as a whole and as it is spelled suggests trains of associated ideas; "red" for "read" and "shoes" for "shows" and "shud" for "should" in two cases out of three not only do not suggest the desired sound, but in all three cases do suggest a world of undesired associations. A great deal of simplification has been accomplished in a quiet way since Johnson's Dictionary regularized English spelling. A great deal that is illogical and cumbersome still remains. Possibly we place an exaggerated value on consistency in spelling. The days of Shakespeare and of Milton afforded in this respect a freer air for the noble and aspiring spirit. Something like a return to these go-as-you-please methods must be the result of any large simplification of spelling, for such simplification, besides possessing many other disadvantages, is generally too complicated for any but its originators to be able to apply with consistency.

Mr. F. C. Prescott's "Poetry and Dreams" (Boston: The Four Seas Company) is described as "a study of the psychology of poetry, in the light of the Freudian theory of dreams." Dreams, according to Dr. Freud, spring from the attempt of unconscious and suppressed desires to obtain imaginary gratification through the images of sleep. "Poetry," according to Mr. Prescott, "has its source in repressed and unconscious desires," and its object is the "relief or purgation" afforded by the "expression and imagined gratification of our desires." Mr. Prescott is a careful and candid reasoner, and, if citations prove anything, a learned man. He points out many clear and strong analogies between poetry and dreams to which the assent of cultivated readers will be unquestioning and universal. Indeed so much of what Mr. Prescott wants will be granted with perfect ease that perhaps he is hardly alive to the difficulty of obtaining the other small but momentous admissions which are needful for the demonstration of his thesis.

So far as expression or the poetic process goes, Mr. Prescott's theory is unavailing. The poet wants expression and gets expression, and so far the gratification is not imaginary, but actual. But what Mr. Prescott has in mind is the content of poetry; that is drawn from our unfulfilled wishes. We will not urge the obvious point that nobody wants to be Hector or Hamlet or Faust or Brand. The ungratified desires which poetry slakes by images are clearly not desires for happiness, but for intensity and beauty, though why ungratified desires for happiness should be so much less efficacious in breeding poetry than ungratified desires for intensity or beauty is by no means clear. Let us grant to Mr. Prescott that poetry deals largely with the images of things that we want and can not get; he is further bound to prove, and it seems to us that he has failed to prove, that images of things that we want and can get are undiscoverable in poetry, or that poetry ceases to be poetry in the adoption and utilization of these images. Let us imagine a case. The familiar lines of Herbert,

> Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
> The bridal of the earth and sky, are read out-of-doors by a reader in the full and immediate enjoyment of the actualities which they reflect. Is it credible that their charm would vanish?

The relation between poetry and unfulfillment may be comprehensive, and yet, in a sense, fortuitous. A nation imports nine-tenths of its coffee. This involves no fondness for importations as importations, but merely a practical desire to get coffee where coffee can be had. Poetry, likewise, seeks intensity and beauty where intensity and beauty are to be had. It abounds in unfulfillments, that is, completions or fruitions unknown to real life, not because it loves unfulfillments for their own sake, but because, in the poverty and stringency of our present state, nine-tenths of our aspirations toward intensity and beauty are unfulfilled in practice. There remains the other tenth—the unsubmerged tenth—of our actual experience, a tenth that may be troublesome to Mr. Prescott, unless he is prepared to prove its foreignness or worthlessness to poetry.

The first volume of Axel Olrik's "Danmarks Heltedigtning" has been translated by Lee M. Hollander, with several American scholars acting in advisory capacity, and under the supervision of the late Professor Olrik himself. The book has been issued by the American-Scandinavian Foundation in a form which is worthy of the most distinguished work of a most distinguished scholar. "The Heroic Legends of Denmark" becomes at once a book of prime importance to the students of Old English literature. It is the most stimulating and the most informing treatment of the Old English poem of "Beowulf" that has appeared in many years. If only a few passages from the second and third volumes of Olrik's great work had been included in the present translation we should have had available in English the most complete and authoritative discussion of the important relations of the "Beowulf" with Scandinavian literature that has so far been written.

The way in which the two supplement each other is very pretty. Both the "Beowulf" and the Scandinavian poems and sagas here considered deal with the fortunes of the Scylding (Danish) kings who ruled at Leire in the fifth and sixth centuries, their external struggles against the Heathobards and a struggle within the family, long and bloodily carried on, for possession of the throne. The poet of the "Beowulf," to be sure, chooses to treat this matter as part of his epic background, to which he makes allusion from time to time, allusions that are immensely effective when you know the story. In the foreground he has placed the heroic figure of Beowulf, and centres attention upon his somewhat tawdry adventures, first, in killing the monster that infested the royal hall at Leire and, later, meeting his death in contest with a fire-drake that ravaged his own land of the Geats. Much space, too, is devoted to the wars of the Geats against the Franks (a matter of historical record elsewhere) and against the Swedes, which, as perhaps matters not so well known to an English audience, the poet feels bound to handle less allusively than he does the story of the Scyldings.

Concerning the Scyldings the Old English poet knows some things that the later Scandinavian writers do not. He knows the relationship of the chief characters in the story; but the Scandinavian stories tell more clearly the rôle they played. For example, he very plainly indicates that Hrothulf (Hrolf), the nephew of the great king Hrothgar, who enjoys honor second only to the king himself, will one day grow a little less than kind to Hrothgar's young sons, Hrethric and Hrothmund. The "Biarkamal" (the reconstruction of this poem is one of Olrik's scholarly triumphs), on the other hand, tells us of the slaying of the weak and avaricious king Hrœrek (Hrethric) by Hrolf (Hrothulf), but it is not aware of the family relationship between them. Hrolf, who in later Scandinavian tradition becomes with his attendant heroes the most brilliant and powerful of the Scylding kings, is in turn attacked at Leire and slain by a certain Hiarvarth. The "Beowulf"-poet does not tell the story, but he does know, what Scandinavian tradition had forgotten, that Heoroweard (Hiarvarth) is the son of Hrothgar's elder brother Heorogar, who might, therefore, regard himself as the rightful occupant of the high-seat of the Scyldings. In this particular, as in hundreds of others, an understanding of the one literature is greatly enhanced in the matter of epic breadth and tragic tensity by some knowledge of the other.

The "Soul of Abraham Lincoln" (Doran) is an ominous title. The "True Story of Abraham Lincoln's Spiritual Life and Convictions" is an ominous description. Authorship by an orthodox pastor is an ominous source. It is bare justice to Mr. William E. Barton to affirm that all these omens are falsified by his performance. Clergyman though he be, his judgment is incorrupt. Possibly the only safe judges are the men for whom judgment as a mere gymnastic is a stimulus and an enjoyment. Mr. Barton is a born gauger of evidence, and is glad rather than sorry to relieve his own side of those shaky arguments which, like non-combatants in an army, increase its liabilities without fostering its strength. He admits that Lincoln was a deist or agnostic in his early manhood—a state of mind which the intolerance of the times denounced as infidelity. He is able, however, to draw up a creed from the words, and practically in the words, of the riper Lincoln which comprises a belief in an all-wise and all-righteous Providence deeply concerned in mundane perturbations, in a personal relation between man and God which man can modify in his own favor by supplication and repentance, in the Bible as God's highest gift to man, and in reunion with departed kinsfolk in a happier world. In 1920 this creed will doubtless be ample enough to satisfy even those persons whose fathers or grandfathers would have been first to deplore its meagreness in 1860.

The elaboration of Mr. Barton's plea, to which a hundred pages of appendices and bibliography are punctiliously added, may seem to some readers to rest on an overestimate of the difficulty and the importance of the problem. But the best way to reduce an inflated problem to its natural and proper dimensions is to solve it, and the solution must adapt its own bulk to the bulk of the testimony. There is another side on which all this research and particularity is amply justified. The ease with which honest people lie is one of the points in human nature on which analysts are unanimous and satirists talkative. But the extent of that lying and the perfection of that ease are realizable only in the immediate presence of a stirring question on which the accumulation of testimony has been extensive, various, dispersed, and contradictory. Mr. Barton's book is a precious document in psychology in which the insufficiency of sincerity as a check on deception is exposed, and the difficulties of truthtelling are made so clear that its imposition on human nature as a duty seems, for the time being at least, unjustifiable.

Pierre Loti is not an easy man to put into English. His peculiarly French combination of sharpness in expression with delicacy of sentiment seems scarcely transferable to a language in which sentiment is regularly attained by vagueness. And so one's first impression of S. R. C. Plimsoll's translation of "Madame Prune" (Frederick A. Stokes Co.) is likely to be a sense of what has been lost in the transference from French to English. But as one reads on and becomes familiar—hardens oneself, shall we say?—to Mr. Plimsoll's rather Gallicized style, one is likely to feel rather that he has come closer to success, where complete success is impossible, than would be expected. Slowly the Japan of Loti, the Japan of fragile and superficial loveliness with hints of terrible cruel power under the surface, is evoked; and we almost forget that we are not reading the author's own words. Mr. Mortimer Menpes has contributed eight illustrations in color, which help to perfect this evocation. Those who know only "Madame Chrysanthème" will be glad to have its sequel in this attractive form.

Three Latin volumes (Ausonius I by H. G. E. White, Martial I by W. C. A. Ker, and Livy I by B. O. Foster) and one Greek volume (Thucydides I by C. F. Smith) come to us from Putnams as a reminder that the Loeb Library has weathered the war and is slowly building up for its founder a monumentum aere perennius and for the editors and contributors an operae pretium. It is not the function of this column to offer a detailed criticism of these scholarly works, but we may note especially the excellence of Professor Smith's translation and annotation of the first two books of Thucydides. Some very minor complaints we might make. Dates should have been given more abundantly, and might well have been printed regularly in the running headlines. Thucydides has been fortunate in his translators since Hobbes set his hand at the task (and learnt much of his philosophy of history

(Continued on page 368)

32 Years Behind Them!

The sturdiness of C-W motors is traditional. Under the severest conditions of service these motors have stood up unflinchingly and with the minimum of attention and repairs.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

Tiffany & Co.

Diamond and Gem Merchants

Pearls Diamonds Jewelry
Silverware Watches Clocks
China and Stationery

Efficient Service by Mail

Fifth Avenue & 37th Street
New York

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

RECOMMEND AS OUT-DOOR BOOKS OF UNUSUAL CHARM

W. H. HUDSON'S Books

Birds in Town and Village

"It is no dull catalogue of bird sounds and bird habits. It is rather a series of beautiful and poetic descriptions of ramblings about English and Cornish villages, in which various sorts of birds are set like jewels. Stories and legends and quiet little humorous incidents are interwoven with natural history and with moods and appreciations delightful to read in themselves."—North American, Philadelphia.

Illustrated in color from plates by E. J. Detmold, $4.00.

Far Away and Long Ago

Is an extraordinarily interesting record of the response of a finely sensitive spirit to the appeal of the fascinating South American life which he describes with such vivid color and reality. Strange, gaudy birds and butterflies, animals of the oldest types, and men of strange adventures figure in the every-day experiences through which he reveals himself simply and with rare sincerity.

With portrait, net, $2.50.

By DOROTHEA CONYERS

Sporting Reminiscences $6.00

Delightful informal recollections of horses, of hunting, of all that creates the atmosphere of following the most famous packs through the Irish hunting counties. The book is full of racy humor, and of an Ireland, happy and loved.

By GARDNER TEALL

A Little Garden the Year Round $2.50

Full of that special pleasure of the spring, the joy that comes from planning the garden, and full of helpful suggestions.

Obtainable at any bookstore, postage extra, or direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

(Continued from page 366)
thereby), and Professor Smith has well maintained the tradition. With its notes and maps this is for a "gentleman scholar" about the ideal edition of the historian who was regarded by the great Chatham as "the eternal manual of statesmen."

The Tragedy of Pygmalion

A FEW months ago the parcel-post brought me a beautiful picture as a present from an unknown donor. The picture depicted Pygmalion embracing the statue of a lovely woman, just coming to life under his embrace and with the red hue of blood already flushing her cheeks. It looked very nice, but I couldn't help a vague feeling of dissatisfaction with the theme. Here was Pygmalion actually preferring a living woman to the work of art; is not art, I reflected, precisely an escape from life and is not Pygmalion a fool to reverse the process? To get more light on my problem I looked up the story and unearthed the following account in the classical dictionary:

> Pygmalion was a celebrated statuary of the island of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus to which he was a witness created in him such an aversion for the fair sex that he resolved never to marry. The affection which he denied to the other sex, he liberally bestowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of ivory which he had made and at his earnest requests and prayers, the goddess of beauty changed this favorite statue into a woman, whom the artist married.

Now I understand. Disgusted with women born of mortals, Pygmalion resorted to the Platonic world of forms in his search for a decent mate. But—my reason protested—are not all women, women?

Well, my worst misgivings have proved justified. I have come across an ancient document hitherto undiscovered which gives a fairly full account of Pygmalion's married life. And sad reading it is, indeed.

Economists have always protested against the popular opinion that, after shelter, man's most important need is clothing. They have pointed out the fact that savages put on plumes and generally decorate their bodies, when in fact they wear no clothes whatever. The history of Galatea—if our chronicler is to be trusted—further verifies this contention. As soon as she became alive it seems that she asked for a hat. Feathers came from a great distance, from Carthage, and they cost a great deal. Galatea wanted fans and perfumes and shawls and many other things. Now, Pygmalion was only an artist and hence very poor. Moreover, the Persian Wars had just been concluded, and Cyprus, which had been drawn into them, was left in an impoverished condition. Her rate of exchange was very low as compared with that of Phoenicia, from which Cyprus imported all articles of luxury. Pygmalion easily consented to Galatea's requests, for his love for her was warm and fresh, but you can easily see that the expense made a heavy drain on his scanty purse.

The historian of those days relates that the first organ of Galatea's to come to life was her tongue, and her feet the last. In fact, she never got quite rid of the habits of immobility which she contracted on the pedestal; a certain lassitude still pervaded her; she preferred repose and wanted to be carried about. She insisted on having breakfast in bed. Now Pygmalion was a gentleman and, therefore, the owner of a slave. But those after-war days were days of unrest; new ideas floated in the air. The union of slaves was on strike, demanding that the state fix a maximum to the number of blows which a master could inflict on his slave. So the work fell on Pygmalion's shoulder, and having so far been a bachelor, he was naturally very awkward in his ways and was justly scolded by his wife.

You may have thought that Galatea had to learn everything from the beginning. Not she. Like her more famous sister Minerva, who emerged full-fledged from the Jovial head, Galatea descended from the pedestal with all her womanly instincts mature. She knew her mind well and soon had Pygmalion under her thumb. Galatea was a born (the expression is incorrect but may be allowed) coquette. In a short time she got tired of Pygmalion and began flirting openly with a poet-friend of his. Pygmalion gloomily recalled the days when she was still on the pedestal. Then she was docile and never refused his kisses. She was without life, but all his own. Then, she had no claims for herself and made no fuss; she was perfect. He was her slave, but oh! what a gracious mistress she was. Now that she had come down from the pedestal, she was so different—full of caprice, petulant, cold—in short, exasperating. Disillusioned, Pygmalion reflected, as Solomon had done, that everything has its proper place, and that what the artist conceives and creates is all right on the pedestal but very unsatisfactory if transferred to the rough earth.

Pygmalion made an attempt to resume work. At least Galatea might pose as a model and help him return to the realm which her unexpected advent had forced him to leave. But no, Galatea would never stand on the pedestal again. Anyway, she was too busy shopping or receiving friends or dressing. And as if this were not enough, she would not allow Pygmalion to call in other models. She did not love her husband but still she didn't like having other women in the house.

Pygmalion was driven to despair. Finally, he made a resolution. He went up to Delphi and called upon Apollo to transform his wife into the statue she had been. The oracle replied that the gods never undo what they once have done. Pygmalion came back in a state of utter dejection.

At last Apollo took pity on him. One morning the married couple was engaged in one of their usual quarrels. Galatea lost her temper and stamped her foot. Pygmalion lost his courage and implored forgiveness. But Galatea looked at him with a cold stare and the blood froze in his veins. It did, really and literally. Pygmalion was aware of a certain numbness creeping into his limbs; he tried to speak but his mouth would not move. He lost consciousness. . . .

Apollo had turned him into a stone and now it was Pygmalion that was the statue.

Galatea shed a few tears, but later had the statue moved on to her own previous pedestal, and exhibited it to friends.

My historian's account stops at this point. We may conjecture that Galatea married again, but nothing is known definitely. Personally, I am interested to know whether the statue still exists in proper shape. Excavations ought to be started at once with a view to clearing up this matter. But I must leave that to the archæologists.

RAPHAEL DEMOS

Drama

The Craft of the Tortoise and Other Plays

THE CRAFT OF THE TORTOISE. By Algernon Tassin. New York: Boni and Liveright.
THE POWER OF A GOD AND OTHER ONE-ACT PLAYS. By Thacher Howland Guild. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press.
THE LAMP OF HEAVEN. By Mrs. L. Worthington Smith. Boston: The Four Seas Company.

MR. ALGERNON TASSIN is a person eminently worth looking at. Whether he is a person worth listening to is a point on which his first book (first to my knowledge) is inconclusive. The work proves beyond question that his intelligence is marvellous. The first few pages of his preface suffice to demonstrate his mastery of English style. These qualities, valuable as they are, would be still more valuable if their partial origin in Mr. Shaw were less discernible. I say "partial" with deliberation; Mr. Tassin's relation to Mr. Shaw resembles that of the wife who has property in her own right.

The New York University Press

The Ground and Goal of Human Life

By CHARLES GRAY SHAW, Ph.D., Professor of Ethics in New York University

Cloth, xii+594 pages. Price, $3.50

An attempt by means of Individualism to elaborate a super-scientific and super-social view of human life.

"The book bears throughout the evidence of Professor Shaw's forceful individuality, and will certainly have a distinct field of usefulness."—Prof. W. E. Hocking, Harvard.

"Full of erudite reasoning and cogent thought."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"In the background, Professor Shaw presents a rich landscape of literary experience."—The Dial.

"A valuable work, and in the right direction, teaching good, sound doctrine much needed today."—Prof. W. H. Sheldon, Dartmouth.

Values, Immediate and Contributory, and Their Interrelation

By MAURICE PICARD, Ph.D., lecturer in Philosophy in Barnard College. In press.

This book purposes to discuss, in a fresh, empirical, and concrete manner, two great classes of values. Its premises are grounded in biological and psychological data, rather than in transcendental and metaphysical pre-suppositions. The origin, the development, and the co-existence of values are successively treated. There is an interesting discussion of the possible value of false judgments. Altogether, the book lays a solid foundation for research in several new fields of philosophical investigation.

Efficient Composition: A College Rhetoric

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Ph.D., Professor of English in New York University.

Cloth, xxiii+518 pages. Price, $2.50

A thought-provoking textbook for the advanced student of rhetoric, with more than one substantial contribution to the philosophy of composition; yet so clear in structure that none can fail to follow; so human in detail that freshmen have been known to read more than the assignment.

Said a Rutgers junior:

"This hasn't the flavor of a textbook: it is a friend with whom one may hold converse and receive something worth while."

Said a sophomore at New York University to a new student:

"I'll sell you my other freshman textbooks, but you can't have my Nason."

Have you read it yet?

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS

32 Waverly Place New York City

Both Mr. Tassin and Mr. Shaw are thinker-dramatists, with the thinker-dramatist's double handicap that his study is draped like a stage while his stage is furnished like a study. Drama should be based on thought. It should not be ceiled and wainscoted with thought. Mr. Tassin learns fast; he wants to teach fast; and the difficulty with drama is that, while it paints fast, it teaches slowly. Speed up its teaching and you retard or confuse its portrayal. To have many images and few, but strong, ideas is well-being for a dramatist. Mr. Tassin is not content to embody a thought; he wants to limn a treatise. Atalanta-like, he may lose the race by stooping to pick up the golden apples of intelligence.

He may lose the race, but the loss is far from certain. His equipment for drama is, in some points, remarkable. He has a strong dialogue, a compact, pugnacious, assertive dialogue, a dialogue in which each sentence is a stand. He is a dramatist in his sense of the impact of people upon each other; even in quiet scenes, in mere exposition, the talk is ridged with passing angers, jealousies, contempts, fawnings, dictations. He is a skilled inventor, not of plots, but of incidents that uncover relations. But his limitation as playwright lies in the fact that, while he cares much for the dramatic manner, he cares little for the dramatic or emotional outcome. He cares merely for the intellectual outcome; he is satisfied to make his point. His people are illustrative. He makes them vigorous because, being a sound man of letters, he likes to make his illustrations vigorous. But as beings, as lives, they mean very little to him. He has Hamlet's impartial scorn for the two sexes—"man delights not him; no, nor woman neither." Is there any pregnancy in Rosencrantz's reply to Hamlet's words that the players would receive lenten entertainment from such a man?

The author of "Hamlet" himself might almost have been daunted by the burdens which Mr. Tassin has laid upon his dramatic faculty. He wishes to prove that the art of woman perpetually wrests the mastery from the strength of man; the nerves, as we know, control the muscles. The theme has obvious affinities with that of "Man and Superman," but Mr. Shaw's play is contemporary. Mr. Tassin's acts are divided by cycles. He not only gives us present-day New York (Act IV.) and Europe in 1260 (Act. III.), but patriarchal times (Act II.) and even pre-historic man (Act I.). Three characters appear in all four acts in successive incarnations, not of the person exactly, but of the type. How far are these pictures of life true? In the first three acts, plainly much must be left to faith; and plainly again,

(Continued on page 370)

James Shirley, Dramatist: A Biographical and Critical Study

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Ph.D., Professor of English in New York University.

In this study of the life and works of Shirley, the endeavor is threefold: first, to examine the little that we know of Shirley's life, to determine, fact by fact, the value of the evidence, and, on a basis of this critical examination, to construct a chronology more accurate than has been hitherto available; second, on a basis of this revised chronology, to restudy the dramatic works of Shirley, in order to determine, if possible, the course of his development as a dramatist; and, third, from this same examination of the plays, to determine the distinctive characteristics of his dramatic works. The result is a new and most interesting picture of this the principal dramatic poet of the reign of Charles I.

"A very thorough contribution to the history of our drama, and fills a gap that needed filling."—Sir Sidney Lee.

"A delight to the eye and hand of any book-lover."—Prof. A. L. Bouton.

"A model in method, showing evidence of careful scholarship on every page. A final study of its subject."—Prof. F. H. Stoddard.

"Gives the fullest and most careful account of Shirley's life now in existence."—Prof. R. S. Forsythe.

Cloth, xvi+472 pages. Choicely illustrated. Price, $5.00.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS

(Selling Agents)

32 Waverly Place New York City

(Continued from page 369)
Mr. Tassin's demands for credit in three acts impose on him a quite decisive obligation to furnish cash in the fourth, that is, to furnish truth which is not only true but verifiable. But when payday comes Mr. Tassin wants to renew his note. His eccentric New York has to be taken on faith. His Emmeline, the last and lowest of her vulpine breed, seems almost as alien to the spectator's experience as his Em or Emla or Emelie. I do not say that Emmeline as exception or aberration is inconceivable. Tradition and modernity are two species, and in an age when woman is the offspring of their union, she is normally a hybrid and potentially a monster. Do I go too far in suggesting that a successful authoress who flirts with a workman in overalls is a monster? Clearly she is not typical, and Mr. Tassin is pursuer of types.

"This play," says Mr. Tassin in a preface, which, always coruscating, is sometimes too coruscating to be luminous, "develops the theme that woman compensates for her bodily inferiority to man, which, handicapping her in the beginning proved her strength in the end, by the utilization of her apparel!" Woman is tortoise; man is hare: the tortoise wins the race. Shell in the tortoise is replaced by dress in woman. That the tortoise is not crafty and is not helped by its shell in the race are obvious objections. Mr. Tassin's is a subtle mind. One suspects him of a mind as insensitive to the obvious as the obvious mind itself is impervious to subtlety. In formal reasoning he is prodigiously acute, but he is possessed of and possessed by an ardor for generalities with which a scorn of particulars is delicately mingled. In the swiftness of his logic he resembles Mr. Shaw; both Mr. Shaw and he resemble the hare; and I doubt if he is quite wise in recalling incessantly to our minds a fable in which victory was obtained by the hare's plodding rival. The very quickness of his mind is a bias—a bias towards explanations that presuppose quickness. Historically, he makes woman conscious and inventive where her willingness, if operative at all, must have been ingenuous and unreflecting. This is partly no doubt the dramatist's necessity, but it is also probably the conscious thinker's instinctive disallowance of instinct. If women are the real Machiavels, it is odd that a man should name the quality. Are they wily as a sex or only as a class—historically a serf or subject class? Are they so wily as eunuchs? Are they wilier than subject males—than parasites or courtiers, for example? Mr. Tassin thinks that the guile of woman is operative today in the attempt to keep privileges while she gains rights, to demand justice and chivalry in the same breath; and, by a comparison in which chivalry gives up the ghost, likens her to the enfranchised negro helping herself to her ex-master's goods and getting wages at the same time.

Four one-act plays by Thacher Howland Guild have been collected in a volume to which commemorative tributes by Mr. George P. Baker, Mr. Stuart P. Sherman, and other friends have been prefixed. The plays show an instinct for the theatre and a humane spirit which should fit them for successful performance by amateurs.

The "Lamp of Heaven," a one-act Chinese play of the time of the Boxer rebellion, is exactly imaged in its heroine, Mee Fah Kam. She is very pretty, but her feet are bandaged, and she can scarcely walk. The diction of Mrs. Smith's unambitious little play is pleasing enough; what is lacks is the power to move. O. W. FIRKINS

Music

James Huneker on Art and Occultism

BEDOUINS. By James Huneker. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

JAMES HUNEKER, at his best, has almost genius. And, at his very worst, he stands alone. There is always

Religion among American Men

BOOKS WITH PURPOSE

The material for this book was gathered under direction of "the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook"—consisting of such men as:

WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, GEORGE W. COLEMAN, W. H. P. FAUNCE, HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, HENRY CHURCHILL KING, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, CHARLES S. MACFARLAND, WILLIAM DOUGLAS MACKENZIE, SHAILER MATHEWS, ROBERT E. SPEER

A questionnaire, which sought to obtain not only facts, but their meaning, was sent to chaplains, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, army officers and men. To the data secured were added the results of many interviews both in the A. E. F. and at home, and of an extensive correspondence. This mass of carefully analyzed evidence is presented as a challenge to the Church, and to the individuals. Cloth, $1.50.

Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

Also prepared by "the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook"

The increased significance and urgency of the missionary enterprise; the changed outlook in every mission field; the new light thrown on missionary policies and principles—the discussion of these subjects by outstanding experts gives to this volume authority and inspiring power. Cloth, $2.00

The Army and Religion

Edited by D. S. CAIRNS, D.D. Preface by the Bishop of Winchester

"Perhaps, as never before, the British Army during the Great War represented a sort of cross-section of the nation's life. Here, then, was an exceptional opportunity for an enlightening analysis of an army that represented the life of the men of the nation itself. It would be difficult to represent the religious revelation and results of the war more skillfully and judiciously than they are presented in this report."—Robert E. Speer. Cloth, $2.00

Ask your bookstore or write to us

ASSOCIATION PRESS
347 Madison Avenue, New York

THE worst blow to progress would be to sacrifice the progress of the past.
—The Review

THE REVIEW
$5 a year
140 Nassau St.
New York

Please mention THE REVIEW in writing to advertisers.

this to be said of what he writes—it needs no signature. The style, in his case, does denote the man.

That seems high praise, indeed, in these drab days, when twenty writers have one single style. But it implies as well some faint dispraise. For of late years (to be quite frank) it has not been only style that has distinguished Mr. Huneker's short tales and essays. A tendency has now and then become evident, both in his fiction and his criticism, to score points with the help of what Frenchmen call a procédé—of which the equivalent in English is a recipe.

The results are often brilliant, if bewildering. But they are also sometimes just the least bit wearying. Not tiresome (heaven forbid!), but they do tire. Not everyone can bear the constant strain of following even such a mind as Mr. Huneker's through a whole volume of flamboyant and dazzling fantasies.

In this latest of his many books Mr. Huneker has gathered up a number of his reviews, short tales, and essays. The title is, perhaps, a little vague as a suggestion of a work which deals with babies, critics, cats, Caruso, Mirabeau, Luke, Anatole France, and Mary Garden, to say nothing of His Black Majesty, the Devil. I grieve to say (though I do not take him seriously at this point) that, on the fifth page of his essay on Mary Garden, he frankly names himself, I believe for the first time, a devout disciple of that strange but infamous writer, René de Gourmont. The Satanist author of "A Night in the Luxembourg" might surely have been excluded from his rare and audacious study of a star. The study in itself is a delight, unsparing, to be sure, in its analysis, but flattering by the frank and searching thoroughness with which it is made. I note with interest that, unlike some foolish critics, Mr. Huneker knows Mary Garden as a singer of unusual charm, not only as a wondrous "singing actress." I can not understand, though, why he proclaims her "invincibly Yankee." She is Scotch by birth, and French by education, and the language which she projects across the footlights is—well, Anglo-French. He more than hints that she is a reincarnation of such flaming characters as Thaïs, Phryne, Sappho, and the admired Aspasia. She is also termed an orchid, a human dynamo, and an opal. Having labelled her as American he pronounces her Gaelic. Yet, in the same breath, he dwells on her Gallic art. A moment later he tells us that she swears by Duse. Yes, often Mr. Huneker bewilders one. He extols Miss Garden's sweeter and nobler interpretations—they are nearly creations—her exquisite Melisande, her pathetic Jean (in "Le Jongleur"), her beautiful Monna Vanna. He detests her when she appears as crazy lemans of the Aphrodite type. When he has scratched and patted, praised and damned her in all sorts of ways and keys and moods, Mr. Huneker sums up, "She is unique." And so for all her flaws, Miss Garden is.

In "Bedouins" one may find other essays, less thorough than those given up to Miss Garden, but hardly less interesting. An essay about "Mélisande and Debussy." Another on "The Artistic Temperament" (as to which the author is, beyond doubt, an authority). Another (rather flippant and unworthy of the tribute of a reprint) is entitled "Caruso on Wheels." In most, the author hovers around music—an art of which he knows more (and writes less) than almost any other critic in this country. As usual, when he does discourse on music and on artists who make music, he often treats of them in terms of literature. And, as an offset, when he speaks of painting or drama he expresses his ideas in musical formulas. He has, throughout his life, been a voracious reader of fiction, drama, science, and philosophy. His memory is remarkably retentive. But he does wrong, I think, to crowd so many references into his essays. George Moore and Huysmans, Chopin, Poe and the Sar Peladan are hurled at one at every opportunity. It matters little what the theme may be. The author's favorites must be quoted and re-quoted.

Now this, though it impresses one at first, in the long run becomes annoying to the general. It may be true, as he himself once said to me, that he "writes for twelve persons only," not for the crowd. We may assume, despite all such assertions, that Mr. Huneker appeals to a large audience. If not, why does he contribute to the dailies? And why does he reprint what they have published? Before they were essays, most of his writings had been articles. And now, collected, they form parts of a real book. Not everything in "Bedouins" bears rereading. Some short stories, for example, might with advantage have been left out of this volume. Among them (to name two) are the three slightly futile tales entitled "Brothers-in-Law," "Grindstones," and "Venus or Valkyr." Moreover, those who most admire the author may deplore the resuscitation of two powerful but disturbing little stories which deal with Satanism.

The short stories referred to will distress most recent souls, though they will fascinate some searchers after the occult. They are morbid, and, to many, will seem dangerous, though one is founded, I am told, on actual fact. We know that there were Satanists in Paris, in the Quartier Montparnasse. We had heard that there were Satanists in one, at least, of our American cities. To go hunting after cases of the kind may please Mr. Huneker. To relate what he has found, with the allurements of his

(Continued on page 372)

Complete Banking Service in Convenient Localities

55 Cedar Street
Broadway at 73rd St.
Madison Av. at 75th St.
125th St. at Eighth Av.

Customers of one office have at their disposal the facilities of all offices.

DEPARTMENTS

BANKING — TRUST
MORTGAGE — COUPON
CREDIT — TRANSFER & REGISTRAR
FOREIGN — MUNICIPAL BOND
REORGANIZATION — SAFE DEPOSIT
SAFEKEEPING OF SECURITIES

UNITED STATES MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY

Capital and Surplus, $6,000,000
NEW YORK

The Menace of Inflation

This article, written by George E. Roberts, a former Director of the Mint, appeared in THE REVIEW November 22, 1919.

5,000 banks have been supplied with copies of this reprint by Federal Reserve Banks. Over 7,500 copies of it have been requested.

5 copies or less, free on request. Larger quantities at cost.

The Review
Reprint Dept.
140 Nassau St. New York

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF

THE REVIEW

Published weekly, at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1920.

State of New York, } ss.:
County of New York, }

Before me a Notary Public, in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Harold deWolf Fuller, who, having been duly sworn, according to law, deposes and says that he is the Editor of THE REVIEW, and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form,. to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher—The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Fabian Franklin, 617 West 113th Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Harold deWolf Fuller, 8 East 8th Street, New York, N. Y.

Managing Editor—None.

Business Managers—None.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or, if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent. or more of the total amount of stock.)

The National Weekly Corporation: Emile Berliner, 1458 Columbia Road, Washington, D. C.; R. A. Carter, 130 East 15th Street, N. Y. C.; James E. Clinton, P. O. Box 7, Boston, Mass.; E. C. Converse, 14 Wall Street, N. Y. C.; R. Fulton Cutting, 32 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.; Est. of J. R. De Lamar, 43 Exchange Place, N. Y. C.; Charles S. Fairchild, 37 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; Emil Fischl, 19 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.; Fabian Franklin, 617 West 113 Street, N. Y. C.; A. P. Hepburn, 57 Broadway, N. Y. C.; Archer M. Huntington, 15 West 81st Street, N. Y. C.; G. M. Hyams, P. O. Box 5104, Boston, Mass.; Alfred Jaretzki, 49 Wall Street, N. Y. C.; Felix E. Kahn, 140 West 57th Street, N. Y. C.; Max Levy, Wayne Junction, Pa.; Louis Marshall, 120 Broadway, N. Y. C.; Samuel Mather, Western Reserve Building, Cleveland, O.; Walter E. Maynard, 501 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; George Merck, 45 Park Place, N. Y. C.; James H. Post, 129 Front Street, N. Y. C.; John T. Pratt, 27 Pine Street, N. Y. C.; Thomas T. Richards, 52 William Street, N. Y. C.; Manual Rionda, P. O. Box 4, Wall Street Station, N. Y. C.; Russell Robb, 147 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.; Julius Rosenwald, Chicago, Ill.; Mortimer L. Schiff, 52 William Street, N. Y. C.; Finley J. Shepard, 120 Broadway, N. Y. C.; William Sloane, 575 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.; Frederick Strauss, 1 William Street, N. Y. C.; Paul M. Warburg, 17 East 80th Street, N. Y. C.; Edwin S. Webster, 147 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.; William Woodward, 5 Nassau Street, N. Y. C.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent. or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.)

None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

H. deW. FULLER, Editor.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 31st day of March, 1920.

HOWARD CAMPBELL,
Notary Public, Queens County,
Certificate filed in N. Y. C. No. 263.
(My commission expires March 30, 1921.)

(Continued from page 371)

warm and vivid style, seems almost criminal.

That a man like Huysmans should have praised "The Vision Malefic" of Mr. Huneker long years ago will amaze no one. It will fret most, however, to be told that Tolstoi, the austere and ecstatic Tolstoi, paid it the tribute of a dignified rebuke. In times like ours, when thousands upon thousands in a distracted world are dabbling with perilous mysticisms, an author should think hard and then think harder before he ventures to reprint such disturbing stories as "The Vision Malefic," and that other excursion into the diabolic, "The Supreme Sin."

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Books and the News

Libraries

THE work which the American Library Association did during the war is described in a very readable volume by Theodore Wesley Koch, "Books in the War; the Romance of Library War Service," (Houghton, 1919). The most considerable study of libraries as they have developed in this country is by the public librarian of St. Louis, Dr. Arthur E. Bostwick, in "The American Public Library" (Appleton, 1910). Similar books, doing the same thing for England, are J. J. Ogle's "The Free Library" (Allen) and, for its chapters on a number of topics, Richard Garnett's "Essays in Librarianship and Bibliography" (Allen, 1899). The American author previously mentioned, Arthur E. Bostwick, has written in "The Making of an American's Library" (Little, Brown, 1915) a brief book, speaking of the private library, and the effect of the public library upon it.

Beginners in the art of managing a library are often referred to J. C. Dana's "A Library Primer" (Library Bureau), in which the elementary steps are briefly described. The architectural points which a librarian needs to know, or a possible library architect may be glad to read, are in Charles C. Soule's "How to Plan a Library Building for Library Work" (Boston Book Co., 1912).

There are many books which one may read for the pleasure of learning a little of the history of libraries—Ernest A. Savage's "Old English Libraries; the Making, Collection, and Use of Books During the Middle Ages" (McClurg, 1912) is one of them. Nothing, however, is more quaint and charming than Sir Thomas Bodley's "Life" and his "First Draught of the Statutes of the Public Library at Oxon." J. C. Dana and H. W. Kent edited an edition in their "Literature of Libraries" series (McClurg, 1907). The Statutes must have been the origin of many of the tales about librarians who guarded their books like dragons.

The book which suggested this brief list is not primarily about libraries, but is P. B. M. Allan's "The Book-Hunter at Home" (Philip Allan, 1920). It has a long chapter about libraries, but is really intended to instruct and entertain the book-collector—and the collector who is after fairly big fish. The pleasant art of hunting the minnows of the book world—the books which bought at second-hand leave one some change from a two-dollar bill, yes, even from a dollar—this harmless sport is always beneath the dignity of the gentlemen who write of book-collecting.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Bailey, H. C. Barry Leroy. Dutton. $2.00 net.
Banning, Margaret Culkin. This Marrying. Doran.
Bojer, John. Treacherous Ground. Moffat, Yard.
Cadmus and Harmonia. The Island of Sheep. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50.
Capes, Bernard. The Skeleton Key. Doran.
Chamberlain, George A. Taxi. Bobbs-Merrill.
Fitzgerald, F. Scott. This Side of Paradise. Scribner. $1.75 net.
Gale, Zona. Miss Lulu Bett. Appleton.
Galsworthy, John. Tatterdemalion. Scribners. $1.90 net.
Haggard, H. Rider. The Ancient Allan. Longmans. $1.75 net.
Holding, Elizabeth S. Invincible Minnie. Doran.
Humphreys, Mrs. Desmond. Diana of the Ephesians. Stokes.
Jepson, Edgar. Pollyooly Dances. Duffield.
Maurois, André. The Silence of Colonel Bramble. Lane. $1.25 net.
McMasters, Wm. H. Revolt. Small, Maynard.
Spofford, Harriet P. The Elder's People. Houghton Mifflin.
Washburn, Claude C. Order. Duffield. $2.00 net..

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Mackenzie, J. S. Arrows of Desire: Essays on British Characteristics. Macmillan. $3.75.
Macmichael, William. The Gold Headed Cane. New York: Hoeber. $3.75.
Parker, Carleton H. The Casual Laborer and Other Essays. Harcourt, Brace & Howe.
Symonds, John Addington. In the Key of Blue and Other Prose Essays. Macmillan.

MISCELLANEOUS

Bleyer, Willard G. How to Write Special Feature Articles. Houghton Mifflin.
Crowder, Maj.-Gen. E. H. The Spirit of Selective Service. Century.
D'Annunzio, Gabriele. Tales of My Native Town. Doubleday, Page.
Grey, Viscount. Recreation. Houghton Mifflin. $1.25.
Harrison, Jane Ellen. Aspects, Aorists and the Classical Tripos. Cambridge University Press.
Klickmann, Flora. The Lure of the Pen. Putnam.
Shaw, Leslie M. Vanishing Landmarks. Laird & Lee.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 49 | New York, Saturday, April 17, 1920 | FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 373
Editorial Articles:
The Chances at Chicago 376
Information from Russia 376
The Preservation of Our Wild Life 378
A Question of Longevity 379
Theodore Dreiser, Philosopher. By P. E. M. 380
The Case of Maurice Maeterlinck. By Joseph Jastrow 381
Gone German University Days. By G. R. Elliott 384
The Revival of the Classic Drama. By James M. Beck 386
Correspondence 388
Book Reviews:
John Redmond 390
Studies in Honor of Dr. Osler 391
Gardens and Garden Books 392
New American Novels: The Individual Bobs Up 392
The Tragic Years 394
Bulgarian Apologia 395
A New Brand of Modernism 396
The Masquerade 398
The Run of the Shelves 400
Books That Appear in the Spring. By Edmund Lester Pearson 402
The Ship's Library. By Robert Palfrey Utter 404
The Nature Lover. By William Beebe 406
Problems of Labor and Capital:
II. Honest Ballots for Unions and Employers' Associations. By Morris L. Ernst 408
Books and the News: Primaries 409
Educational Section:
The University President 410
Universal Training 412
Education for the Cotton Industry 415

THE railroad workers' strike is a vivid reminder of the coal strike. In both there are the same elements of doubt as to the true inwardness of the move. In both there is the same absence of any doubt as to the intolerableness of the method resorted to. And in both there is the same element of just grievance on the part of the strikers. The greatest point of difference is in the attitude assumed by the heads of the great railroad Brotherhoods. The strike is distinctly of "outlaw" character, and the Brotherhood chiefs seem to be thoroughly sincere in their energetic opposition to it. Moreover, it is a satisfaction to note that President Lee, of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, expressly says this good word for the railroads:

> There have been rumors that the new organization, known as the Yardmen's Association, and made up of deserting members of the older bodies, was inspired by the railroads as a means of destroying organized labor. But I can not say emphatically enough that I do not believe this true. The railroads themselves have honorably kept their contracts with us, and it is the aim of the Brotherhood to treat them as fairly. To this end I have issued orders that the unlawful strike by deserting members be broken even at the cost of placing loyal Brotherhood men in their places.

THE strike deserves the designation of "outlaw" for more reasons than one. Primarily, it is applied, of course, to indicate that the strike was inaugurated without authority of the recognized labor organizations, and in defiance of their heads. But this defiance takes the shape not only of insurgency against those leaders, but of the breaking of the contract which they had made as representatives of the men. The most serious phase of the outlawry, however, is one that has nothing to do with any question either of contracts or of organization, but with the method of the strike itself. In attempting to gain their objects by a sudden attack upon the life of the community, the strikers have put themselves into the position of a public enemy. Some look upon the move as a revolutionary manifestation; most probably it is in the main simply a strike for wages, which the revolutionary element is trying to make the most of. But whichever it is, its threat against the well-being of the whole people must be met with all the energy that the people and their Government can command.

AS regards wages, the facts are not sufficiently known to warrant a confident statement; but it looks as though the men were justified in the assertion that their wages have lagged far behind the rise in the cost of living, as well as behind the advances made in many other lines of work. And there is one special point that must not be forgotten. When the President appealed to the railroad men, last August, to refrain from striking until the Government had been given a chance to carry out its programme for reducing the cost of living, what he was asking for was not an indefinite postponement. He and his advisers were looking forward to the inauguration of a great "drive" to bring down prices, from which they expected speedy and decisive results. Seven months have passed since, and prices are not lower, but distinctly higher, than they were then. There was never any good reason to believe that the measures which the Government had in view would have any appreciable effect in the lowering of prices. They were directed at superficial and minor evils, which were mere symptoms of a deep-seated difficulty. The hope that anything of large importance could be accomplished in those ways has long been abandoned, and the men who were asked to wait for something that has not happened, and that nobody is expecting to happen in the near future, can not be blamed for demanding that their case be attended to. If they had made the demand in a decent and proper manner, it would undoubtedly have gained a friendly hearing from the public.

ENGLAND and France are passing through a critical moment in their relations to each other and to Germany. The situation contains elements that can not be thought of without grave anxiety. But it is rash to say, as does Mr. Frank Simonds, that "the present crisis foreshadows the end of that alliance which saved Europe by insuring German defeat in the World War." If the maintenance of that alliance were necessary to France and not to England, or necessary to England and not to France, this dark view might be justified; but it is just as true that France saved England as that England saved France. The trouble between them over the Ruhr situation, whatever its deeper causes, arises directly from the contrast between the intensity of French apprehension of the German danger and the laxity of British feeling about it. There is no reason why a middle ground should not be found, between these two extremes and more in accord with the actual facts than either. Both countries have too much at stake in the preservation of the Entente for either of them to sacrifice it if there is any way to preserve it—and it would be strange indeed if a way could not be found. For Americans the most comforting element in the situation, at this moment, is the apparently well-established fact that our own Government has, in the presence of a most delicate situation, maintained not only a "correct" but a really helpful attitude. To keep Britain and France good friends, and America a good friend of both, should be regarded as the most vital of all our international aims.

THE Navy inquiry has revealed no substantial defect of organization. Indeed, that system must be excellent which worked reasonably well under a chief who didn't know his own mind. The main trouble, in a word, was that Secretary Daniels would not promptly accept a general strategic plan, but preferred to feel his way. Admiral Benson, Chief of Operations, whose task it was to persuade the Secretary of the Navy to adopt a plan based on the actual situation, was unequal to the feat. A stronger man would naturally have resigned and made the situation clear. Admiral Benson hung on patiently, and urged one thing at a time on the Secretary. Thus in six months or so the Navy achieved the necessary team play. The delay had been serious, but not fatal. It is clear that the Bureau of Operations was negligent in not preparing an anti-submarine plan from the moment of our first clash with Germany. The Navy was unfortunate in having a Chief of Operations who could not cope with Mr. Daniels's idiosyncrasies. Yet Admiral Benson deserves rather sympathy than censure. He was dealing with one of the strongest things in the world—the will to procrastinate. Mr. Daniels, on his side, could not suddenly divest himself of the mentality of a petty politician. His indecision and confusion of mind unquestionably slowed down our naval effort by three months or so—and the critical months of the anti-submarine campaign.

Navy and laity will join in the sentiment that, considering that Mr. Daniels was in charge, it was lucky things went as well as they did. Charge the delay, confusion, and needless expense to Mr. Wilson's cult of unpreparedness and to Mr. Daniels's psychology. The Navy itself displayed an energy that largely compensated for the absence of any initial policy. The organization more than responded to all appeals. The appeals were not made intelligently or promptly. War is merely an extension of policy, and until we had been at war for three months Mr. Daniels, and consequently the Navy, had no policy. Such is the chief result of the inquiry.

"I WOULD rather be a cow than be a man." This and similar cries of genuine disillusion are now beginning to be heard. What else was to be expected from those who built up hopes of an entirely new order of civilization coming into being after the war? It is the price of a "vision" which they are now paying. The Review has repeatedly called attention to the cruel awakening that would come to trusters in such false hopes. China, with its Shantung episode, was the first of the nations to experience it, and the weaker peoples, generally, have begun to see that absolute justice is not to be obtained —or even defined—all of a sudden. But it is the American boosters of the President's programme who have received the greatest jolt. If the President himself is disillusioned, he is careful to hide his feelings. Utopias of any magnitude have always failed, and one great reason for their failure has been the food problem. Food—the lack of it—is what is spoiling Mr. Wilson's dream. While conditions in Europe each day cry louder for our help, for a resumption of effective economic conditions, the President holds out for the realization of every detail of his huge programme. When a man's house burns down, he rebuilds according to a better plan—if he can afford to. If the house is not insured, he may have to make shift until, after some years of plodding, he can rebuild it nearer to his ideal. Europe is close to exhaustion. Are we to go on bickering over the prospect of a perfect, or nearly perfect, world before helping to bring some sort of order out of the chaos? The desire (if it has any real vitality, as we believe it has) for a better civilization to come later on will not be destroyed by our getting back to a peace footing and lending much-needed assistance now.

THE present tower of high prices is builded upon something infinitely more firm than the sand of the profiteers. It is built upon the ivory of twenty or thirty million consumers who are too busy consuming to produce.—Kansas City Star.

Yes, yes; but how do they get the money with which to pay the prices? Like the famous Hebrides Islanders who make their living by taking in each other's washing?

THE institution of freedom of speech and of the press suffered intrusions in time of war, and some good people have been alarmed lest these intrusions threatened the very existence of our democracy. But it will not be abandoned by those who have for generations cherished it. The violent protests which we have heard come chiefly from an entirely different class of people. They come, indeed, from people who themselves are most intolerant of freedom of speech in others. They are not in the least concerned when the opinions and the appeals of the sober, thoughtful, and truly progressive elements of a community do not receive publicity. They are only concerned with securing the widest forum for those who voice unrest, discontent, disbelief in our institutions, and wild revolutionary doctrines.

WHY these agitators arrogate to themselves the rôle of defenders of the freedom of speech is made clear by Mr. N. Bukharin, chief spokesman of the Bolshevik régime at Moscow. In 1918 he published under the title of "The Communist Programme" an authoritative exposition of their principles. A portion of this book was published in America by a revolutionary organization, but it was careful to omit from it Chapter VII, in which Mr. Bukharin states the Bolshevik attitude toward freedom of speech with an unlooked-for cynicism, a cynicism that comes out like a yellow streak following the Bolshevik triumph. Thus Mr. Bukharin writes:

If we have a dictatorship of the proletariat, the object of which is to stifle the bourgeoisie, to compel it to give up its attempts for the restoration of the bourgeois authority, then it is obvious that there can be no talk of allowing the bourgeoisie electoral rights or of a change from soviet authority to a bourgeois-republican parliament.

The Communist (Bolshevik) party receives from all sides accusations and even threats like the following: "You close newspapers, you arrest people, you forbid meetings, you trample under foot freedom of speech and of the press, you reconstruct autocracy, you are oppressors and murderers."

It is necessary to discuss in detail this question of "liberties" in a Soviet Republic.

At present the following is clear for the workingmen and the peasants. The Communist party not only does not demand any liberty of the press, speech, meetings, unions, etc., for the bourgeois enemies of the people, but, on the contrary, it demands that the Government should be always in readiness to close the bourgeois press; to disperse the meetings of the enemies of the people; to forbid them to lie, slander, and spread panic; to crush ruthlessly all attempts at a restoration of the bourgeois régime. This is precisely the meaning of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Another question may be put to us: "Why did the Bolsheviki not speak formerly of the abrogation of full liberty for the bourgeoisie? Why did they formerly support the idea of a bourgeois-democratic republic? Why did they support the idea of the Constituent Assembly and did not speak of depriving the bourgeoisie of the right of suffrage? Why have they changed their programme so far as these questions are concerned?"

The answer to this question is very simple. The working class formerly did not have strength enough to storm the bulwarks of the bourgeoisie. It needed preparation, accumulation of strength, enlightenment of the masses, organization. It needed, for example, the freedom of its own labor press. But it could not come to the capitalists and to their governments and demand that they shut down their own newspapers and give full freedom to the labor papers. Everybody would merely laugh at the workingmen. Such demands can be made only at the time of a storming attack. And there had never been such a time before. This is why the workingmen demanded (and our party, too), "Freedom of the press!" (Of the whole press, including the bourgeois press.)

THAT the solution of the Danish crisis is not exclusively a Socialist victory, but rather a democratic victory of common sense over chauvinism, is shown by the constitution of the new Ministry. The reinstatement of Mr. Hansen as Commissioner for Slesvig affairs seems even to indicate that the settlement, from the King's standpoint, is a compromise rather than a surrender. Mr. Hansen was formerly editor of Heymdal in Apenrode, in which capacity he was a strong protagonist of the Danish element on Germany's northern frontier. As a member of the Zahle Government, it is true, he advocated moderation, until, shortly before the plébiscite in the first zone, he delivered an address at Flensburg in which he confessed to holding the opinion that Flensburg ought to be Danish. Among the Germans of North Slesvig this change of attitude was looked upon as a time-serving device evidencing the growing influence of the annexionist group in Denmark, and not as the expression of Mr. Hansen's real conviction. His reappointment seems to confirm that impression. But, all the same, the annexionists can claim him as one of theirs by reminding him of his Flensburg speech.

P. E. M., whose spirited article on Mr. Theodore Dreiser is printed on another page, was somewhat abashed (or was it exhilarated?) by our invitation to write about so slippery a modern. And it must be confessed that even in the diversified gallery of the Shelburne Essays the portrait of Mr. Dreiser would create a scandal. What shall a critic of Mr. More's classical lines do with one who, as is pointed out, can praise "The Prince" of Machiavelli as the truest of books, and the next minute flock enthusiastically with flabby humanitarians? Yet it will not do to pass him by in silence, for he and a few others of his kind have the floor to-day. We suggest that our best critics might well defer for a time the study of the Church Fathers and such like dignitaries and repair to the forum of present-day problems. The best French critics have never been averse to tackling all comers.

THE discussion of Mr. Frank E. Spaulding's proposal for a compulsory year of training in "civic responsibility" has very definite bearing on the conditions of the present moment. With Princeton students volunteering in a body for service on the railroads, with Morristown commuters ("millionaires," no doubt) firing the train that carries them to the city, it is evident that there is a point beyond which the public is not willing to suffer while the grievances of any small industrial group, however just they may be, are awaiting a settlement.

A spirit of adventure, the amateur's keen delight in discovering that he can do fairly well something that he has not regarded as his proper job, may always be counted on to furnish some help in a pinch of this sort. But if such crises multiply in number and severity something more will be needed. If society finally breaks down because it has grown too complicated, because any fool who can possess himself of a monkey-wrench can wreck its delicate mechanism, it will be society's own fault for not taking in time steps which will make its functions less highly specialized and the services of its members more readily interchangeable. To any plan which looked to the accomplishment of such ends a good deal of opposition might be expected. But nothing like an organized nation of professional strikebreakers would result from even the fullest establishment of it. The spirit of adventure, the spirit of the amateur, would still control, and this is a spirit which is warmed by fires that burn brightly but can not be counted on to burn long. So far as the plan functioned publicly, it would function only to meet a crisis which is potentially destructive. Meanwhile, the chief benefits would accrue to the individual. Mr. Spaulding's plan, at any rate, points in a direction which gives promise of rewarding further exploration.

The Chances at Chicago

THE political sky shows little sign of clearing up. On the Democratic side there is almost literally nothing doing. On the Republican side there came a sudden flash with the Michigan primaries, which quite dazzled people for a while, but which has shed little if any real light on the situation. The approaching primaries in New Jersey and Illinois may prove significant, but there is no very strong reason for expecting that they will. With the Republican Convention less than two months off, the field continues to be as nondescript as ever.

Senator Johnson's victory in Michigan was superficially striking, and certainly was a surprise. But as an index of the state of mind of the country it has no importance whatsoever. First and foremost, a feature of the case must be noted which has attracted little or no attention. Quite apart from the fact that the victory is wholly accounted for by the highly peculiar Detroit vote, it was essentially the victory of a united vote against a divided one.. The votes cast in the entire State for Wood, Lowden, Hoover, and Pershing were in the aggregate far greater than the vote cast for Johnson. His vote represented all the elements of radicalism and of discontent—including many forms of racial ill-feeling, pro-German, pro-Irish, pro-Russian; the non-radical and non-racial vote was split up among the other four candidates. Johnson beat Wood by a plurality of perhaps 45,000, but he fell short of the combined vote of the four by about 55,000. Now the fact that there were four important candidates in the field besides Johnson, all of them representing a standpoint sharply contrasted with his, is merely an accidental feature and robs the result of all authority.

But the significance of Johnson's victory in Michigan is further diminished by consideration of the part played in it by the vote of Detroit. With that vote left out, the other four candidates beat Johnson by about 82,000; their combined vote was considerably more than the double of his. And the reasons for Johnson's extraordinary majority in Detroit are highly peculiar. Not only is that city a hotbed of radical sentiment, but Senator Johnson's aggressive and spectacular opposition to the retaining of American soldiers in Siberia was doubly effective in winning votes for him in Detroit. It got him the Russian vote as such, and it got him the vote of thousands of friends and neighbors of the Detroit boys who, as it happens, formed a large part of our Siberian troops. When to all these points is added the big makeweight against Wood which the charge of lavish use of money for his campaign had naturally produced, coming on the heels of the Newberry conviction, it is obvious how little ground the Detroit vote furnishes for any inference as to the state of mind of the country at large.

If any inference at all be permissible from the Michigan elections it would seem to be one favorable to the chances of Mr. Hoover at Chicago. With almost no campaign, and with the announcement of his candidacy hardly a week old, he polled about 45,000 votes in Michigan, almost exactly the same as Governor Lowden, and more than half as many as General Wood. This, together with the showing he made in the Democratic primaries, in spite of his having announced himself as a Republican candidate, gives substantial proof, if any were needed, of the existence of a large spontaneous sentiment for Mr. Hoover among the people throughout the country. But it is not upon this circumstance that the inference favorable to his chances at Chicago rests, for the vote merely confirmed what was already sufficiently well known. The point is that anything that makes Johnson strong tends to make Hoover possible; and, although the Michigan figures have little evidential value as regards Johnson, they certainly have established the fact that a strong fight is going to be made for him. Mr. Hoover will have no show at all among the Chicago delegates, on the face of things; not only will very few of them be committed to him, but nearly all will be strongly adverse to taking him. His only chance is that of his being turned to by the Convention as the clear means of rescue from a dangerous situation. He will not be nominated in order to prevent the Democrats from nominating him, and we do not believe that this would have been at all likely to happen even if he had not plainly declared, as he now has done, that he would not take the Democratic nomination. But he may be nominated in order to keep the party united; and the more formidable the manifestation of the Johnsonites at Chicago, the more possibility is there of such an outcome.

Information from Russia

IF one is to judge from the numerous correspondents who have recently been permitted to visit Russia and send out the results of their observations and interviews, the rulers of Moscow are now seeking publicity instead of concealment. But correspondents seem to have been personally conducted with the utmost care, and it is evident that not one of them was admitted without careful scrutiny. The matter they send is therefore not to be taken at its face value; but to the careful student of Russia, who has a background of Russian experience, and who analyzes the internal evidence of the articles, they present valuable sources of information.

The most prominent and intelligent of these recent journalistic visitors to the land of Communism is Mr. Lincoln Eyre, and the series of articles by him in the New York World contains a mass of concrete information. It is evident that he was able to put searching questions to the Soviet leaders in his interviews, and that frequently he was able to see beyond the screens whereby they sought to limit his vision. Nevertheless, they were able to confuse him considerably, and the result is that his material must be carefully scrutinized and evaluated in order to get a just estimate of present-day Russian affairs.

One of Mr. Eyre's recent articles is devoted to the administration of justice under the Russian Soviet system. He describes in an interesting manner how he attended the session of a revolutionary tribunal trying a noble and ten priests for treason against the Soviet Republic, and then goes on to a general consideration of judicial procedúre and crime statistics. He draws the conclusion that order now prevails and that crime is on the decrease, and lays considerable emphasis on the improvement of prison conditions. The casual reader will gain the impression that the Bolshevik régime, in spite of its utterly lawless and arbitrary character, had succeeded not only in establishing order, but in raising the general moral tone of the country.

Yet Mr. Eyre unconsciously disproves all this in the same article. He bases his conclusion that there is less crime upon a comparison of statistics, but in this he fails to take into consideration that for such a comparison statistics must refer to the same things and must have a common basis of interpretation. Calling attention to a sharp diminution in the total of criminal cases tried, he says: "During the Soviet fiscal year 1918-1919, November to November, there were only 47,120 persons tried for crime in Petrograd, as against 160,000 in 1914. The population for the former capital in the same period decreased more than 50 per cent., but still the reduction in crime is very considerable." The cases of those tried in 1914 were, of course, those of persons accused of offenses against a regularly established code of criminal law. The cases in 1918-1919, however, are entirely different, as shown by Mr. Eyre's own statement to the effect that "judges are obliged not only to apply, but to create, the laws under which, according to the Peoples' Commissaries' rule, they are to be governed 'by a sense of Socialist conception of right.'" In other words, Mr. Eyre compares the statistics of criminal cases before regularly organized courts under an established penal code with the loose and valueless records of cases before revolutionary tribunals, themselves making as well as administering the laws, according to some rude ideas of justice, influenced by popular emotion. He does not even call attention to the fact that these tribunals were for the most part self-chosen or appointed by irresponsible Commissars, or that they were frequently composed of men who themselves were criminals but recently released from jail.

Having proved to his own satisfaction that crime is on the decrease in Russia, Mr. Eyre proceeds to explain this, on the ground, first, of the iron order imposed by the Soviets in the informal ruthlessness of their treatment of criminals, and secondly, of the ban on vodka. This latter reason is distinctly ludicrous. The ban on vodka was imposed in 1914 under the old régime, and was made effective, because the old régime had in its hands, through the spirits monopoly, the complete machinery necessary for its control. At the present time it is a notorious fact, frequently attested in the official Bolshevik journals themselves, that vodka is being manufactured everywhere clandestinely and moonshine spirits abound. Even the Bolshevik authorities themselves complain of the extent of drunkenness among the Commissars, and peasants are upbraided for turning grain into vodka instead of sending it to the starving towns. But for complete refutation of this theory that there is a decrease in crime, thanks to the abolition of vodka, one has only to refer to the official report of Mr. V. Milutin of the Supreme Council of National Economy, published in its official organ, Economic Life, on November 7, 1919. After stating that the sugar-beet industry has furnished the initial step in the creation of the rural industries, he reports: "The brandy-distilling industry occupies the next place, and its development has been begun by the Supreme Council of National Economy during the last few days." In other words, the manufacture of vodka as a Government monopoly was resumed last year and is considered next in importance after the beet-sugar industry.

One could multiply such examples at will in Mr. Eyre's interesting articles if space permitted. One additional illustration, however, will suffice to show the limitations of a correspondent, however honest in his intentions, if he speaks no Russian, has no background of Russian experience, and is dependent upon unscrupulous Bolshevik leaders for his information. Much has been written about education in Russia under the Soviets, and the radicals have circulated assiduously the fine-sounding but utterly baseless reports of Lunacharsky, according to which he had opened some dozens of popular universities and ten thousand new schools, and had devoted billions of rubles to education. As a matter of fact, an examination of the news items in the official Bolshevik press shows that these popular universities were closed because no one cared to attend them, and that, so far from starting new schools, thousands of schools were discontinued all over Russia from lack of teachers. What is still worse is that in such schools as remained, the only instruction that is given is that devoted to instilling in the minds of the children Communistic ideas, and all serious education, even of the simplest sort, is neglected. All this is inadvertently borne out by Mr. Eyre in the very article in which he describes at length the Bolshevik claims with reference to education. But what is most interesting of all is his description of education among the soldiers. It is here that the Soviet Government has centred its greatest efforts, and so Mr. Eyre states: "It was claimed that within two years, if demobilization did not intervene, there would not be a single uneducated Red soldier." Under the old régime, every soldier was given a simple education during his military service, so that the idea of education among the soldiers is not a new one. What is noteworthy is that at the present time this is all being directed along the lines of Communist propaganda, and further that the admission is inadvertently made of a lengthening of the term of service, which stamps the Soviet régime as definitely militaristic.

Such articles as those by Mr. Eyre, who may be considered as one of the best of the journalists that have been permitted to visit Soviet Russia, illustrate very clearly how necessary it is to analyze and pick to pieces the material which is being sent out of Moscow. If such a task is properly performed, much valuable information can be obtained and real light thrown upon the situation. But if one takes the correspondence, even of thoroughly reputable writers, without such analysis and evaluation, a wholly distorted impression is created, and the Bolshevik authorities succeed in producing the effect at which their propaganda aims.

The Preservation of Our Wild Life

THERE is scarcely a session of any American State Legislature, or of Congress, which does not have before it some measure for the alleged protection of fish, wild animals of the land, or birds. And yet we are told by the most trustworthy authorities on the subject that many species of these three classes of wild life—especially those sought as game by the sportsman—are passing swiftly toward extinction It seems quite evident, therefore, that the legislation so far enacted is hopelessly defective.

Perhaps the main difficulty with Congress and the State Legislatures has been the lack of a suitable body of scientific information on which to base a complete, consistent and effective code of measures for wild life conservation. Some single phase of it is brought up, such as the limits of the open season for bass in Ohio streams, and classes, or individuals, of sportsmen's leagues immediately interested supply such information as will make for their view—generally a narrowly limited and one-sided view—of the matter in hand. The legislator knows not where to turn for any complete and impartial treatment of the subject, and the result is likely to be the triumph of the most skilful and persistent lobbying. Good legislation in some narrow corner of the field results, now and then; but permanent advance along the entire line is impossible, so long as the matter is handled in this piecemeal way.

The situation leads us to suggest the possibility of a National Commission on the Conservation of Wild Life. Because of the migratory habits of certain forms of this life, the scope of such a commission should include the whole of North America. We have already entered the field of international regulation concerning this subject, and must enter it still further to secure the desired ends. The commission would be expected to consider the matter in every important relation which it might be found to possess. There is, of course, the direct value of many of our fishes, wild animals, and birds as part of our food supply. What regulations are necessary to maintain them as a permanent element in the feeding of the nation? Others serve as an indirect aid in the food supply, such as the birds which feed upon insects injurious to fruit, the lesser forms of aquatic life which furnish needed food to edible varieties of fish, and animals which feed upon noxious forms of life. Forestry also has its vital interest in the preservation of such birds as feed upon borers and insects destructive to trees. Another phase of the subject is the proper classification of birds and other animals which are predominantly harmful, and should be exterminated either everywhere or in particular districts. Mistaken legislation has more than once been passed in this branch of the field. Information is wanted, too, as to feasible methods of counteracting harm occasionally done by birds and animals which are predominantly useful, and which should be protected by law.

Such a commission might well begin with an analytical criticism of the mass of legislation now in existence, showing what in it is good, what is rightly intended but wrongly drawn, and what is essentially vicious, either because it was so intended by its proponents, or was bedeviled by crafty amendments in course of passage. An analysis of this kind would be the proper clearing of the ground for the proposal of a body of State legislation absolutely uniform in its purpose—the permanent maintenance in normal quantity of all desirable forms of wild life—and differing in form just where, and just as, local conditions would demand a difference, for the sole purpose of securing the uniform end. One of the most difficult of all points to be considered would be the proper adjustment of the rights of the hunter to the rights of the landowner, particularly the owner of lands under tillage, over whose fields he desires to hunt. Theoretically, the coöperation of the farmer in the preservation of game birds and animals ought to come as a matter of course. As a matter of fact, it has generally been very hard to get, just because his unquestionable rights are often not duly respected in the law itself, and are very generally disregarded by hunters, even when the law under which they are licensed is all right as far as it goes.

Of course the success of such a commission as we have suggested would depend wholly upon the fitness of the men composing it, assuming a sufficient appropriation to meet any reasonable expense in the prosecution of its work. Every one of its members should be recognized as capable of appreciating and representing the broad national interest in the subject, and not merely the point of view of some class or organization, however much that class or organization may have done to promote the public interest in wild life conservation, or to secure the passage of protective laws. The interest at stake is not the interest of him who carries the rod or gun, of the "nature lover," of the farmer, or of the market-man, but of the whole people. A commission is needed which would be broad enough and courageous enough to tell the hunter, for example, that his hunting license should cost several times what he now pays, and give only a fraction of the privileges which it now gives; that open seasons should be generally shortened; and that certain kinds of game, in certain places, should be subject to no open season whatever for a number of years in succession—if any or all of these restrictions should appear necessary to the continued existence, outside museums and game "sanctuaries," of the wild life now threatened with extinction.

A Question of Longevity

DR. WILLIAM H. WELCH, the eminent pathologist, beginning his seventy-first year with undiminished vigor and activity, has naturally been asked some questions about old age, and his answers have both the good sense and the cheerfulness which all who know him would have expected. There is one point, however, that must leave a critical reader of the interview in a certain perplexity of mind. Asked about "the Biblical three-score and ten years," Dr. Welch exclaimed: "Oh, but we have changed that. The span of life has been lengthened. Our greater knowledge of life and its preservation has added twelve and a half years to the span of life in the last century, and mostly in the last half-century." But he goes on to state the familiar statistical fact that the gain has been made in "the early period of life," that "infant mortality has been greatly reduced," that "we have learned how to control and remedy conditions and diseases which have made high the death rate among individuals between birth and the attainment of fifty years of age," but that in the way of promoting longevity for those who have passed their fiftieth year "little has been accomplished."

Of course, this offhand answer to a reporter's questions was not intended to be taken as a scientific dictum. Yet it is interesting to note that, on the face of it, the second part of what Dr. Welch says eats up the first; if all the gain that has taken place relates to people under fifty, people who have reached or are approaching their three-score and ten are in the same case as they ever were. But Dr. Welch is not likely to have said, even in haste, that we have "changed all that" without pretty substantial basis, and one is tempted to speculate as to the possibility of reconciling the two statements.

He who judges by his own impressions will feel, as Dr. Welch apparently does, that the man of sixty or seventy is not as old as he used to be in former times. Such impressions, to be sure, are untrustworthy; but statistics has its own pitfalls, and so has medical observation. Several years ago, before the great war had centred attention upon infinitely more menacing aspects of the state of the world, a number of high authorities were persistently urging upon public attention the deterioration in American vitality which they found disclosed in the statistics of mortality above the age of fifty or thereabouts. Their conclusion from the figures was that present ways of life had a lowering effect upon vitality which manifested itself in a steady increase in the percentage of deaths among people past middle age. The conclusion seemed to contradict most people's observation; yet if there was no flaw in the reasoning the statistician was clearly entitled to the last word. It was pointed out, however, that there was reason to doubt the adequacy of the statistical inquiry; and, for our part, we regard Dr. Welch's remark, though a casual one, as a valuable confirmation of scepticism, coming from the source that it does.

There are several reasons for doubting the conclusiveness of the figures that seem to contradict the general impression as to the improved vitality of middle-aged and elderly people. Immigration is a factor that obviously complicates the question. But there is one consideration, less obvious and more interesting, that has not received the attention it deserves. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is quite possible for longevity to be advancing all along the line, and yet for the death rate among people above the age of fifty to be increasing. If we think of the population as divided into two parts, the first consisting of those among whom the conditions of life and work are so hard as seriously to shorten life, and the second consisting of those that are favorably placed in this regard, an improvement of conditions in the first class might have just the paradoxical effect we have indicated. For a great number of deaths in that class which had formerly taken place before the age of fifty would now fall in ages above fifty, and the increased death rate in those ages might mean not that the type of people who formerly did well at those ages are now doing worse, but that a type of people who formerly died before the age of fifty now live—and therefore also die—at ages beyond fifty. Shorter hours and better conditions mean longer lives for glass-blowers or miners—clear gain in vitality; yet in the mortality tables it would look as though the gain in vitality for ages below fifty (or forty-five, or whatever it might be) had been offset by a loss of vitality in ages above fifty.

In the absence, then, of an authoritative determination of the question, we incline very strongly to the belief that people of fifty, and sixty, and seventy, are younger than they were in former generations. They are both better cared for and take better care of themselves. They live under better sanitary conditions; and when they fall sick they have better nurses and better hospitals, as well as the advantages of the splendid progress of medicine and surgery. Moreover, in spite of the rush of modern life, people take life easier than they did twenty-five or fifty years ago. They work fewer hours; they take more holidays; they have not only greater facilities for comfort, but are more inclined to make themselves comfortable. The middle-aged business man of to-day, whether playing golf or going to his office in a Palm Beach suit, not only looks but feels ten years younger than did his predecessor of half a century ago, who sweltered through the New York summer in his starched shirt and broadcloth coat.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Theodore Dreiser, Philosopher

THE editors of the Review are great jesters, though this is a secret not commonly known, and it was in a moment of unseemly merriment that they asked me to write an article on the views of Mr. Dreiser as expounded in his volume of essays entitled "Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub." Now, as these same editors probably suspect, I have never been able to read to the end of one of Mr. Dreiser's novels, and shall never again try to read one; but under their cynical compulsion I have read these essays, and, to tell the truth, have been rather interested by them. The publishers, Messrs. Boni and Liveright, kindly inform all prospective buyers or critics of the book just what to expect. "If philosophy can ever be made exciting," they announce on the jacket, "Mr. Dreiser has here achieved that feat. Here is Life—mysterious, terrible, wonderful—and Dreiser looking at it unafraid" (as one can see him in the photograph furnished with the book). Well, these publishers, like their friends the editors, are great humorists, and it is their jest to evoke the picture of Mr. Dreiser, in a Jersey City bedroom, confronting Life, the mysterious and terrible, and staring the monster out of countenance. And Mr. Dreiser himself, who may or may not have provided the publishers with the notion of his heroic eye-duel, has his funny side. For instance, he has a humorous way of dealing with Logic. "In England," he writes, "they hung men for sheep-stealing a few hundred years ago, and yet sheep were and still are stolen in England. It is death to kill your neighbor, and yet when did man ever cease killing his neighbor?" Argal, the statute books are void of effect and human conduct is governed solely by "the first or pyknotic law of energy as laid down by Vogt."

A good deal of amusement might be got out of Mr. Dreiser's logic, his pyknotic scraps of learning, and his portentous solemnity. But cui bono? Probably he would not laugh at his own jests, and I certainly should not. And so I prefer to take him rather seriously as a sign of the times; his originality and egotism are a mere pose, while in reality he is voicing, somewhat hoarsely, the sentiments of a large class of men who take their uneasy muddle of ideas for philosophy. He says it himself: "Philosophers have dreamed, poets have written; and I, mussing around among religions, philosophies, fictions, and facts, can find nothing wherewith to solve my vaulting egoism, no light, and no way to be anything more than the humblest servitor."

He is a "servitor" in two things. In one mood he is the voice of Nietzscheism: "The race has always been, and will so remain, of course, to the swift, and the battle to the strong. . . . The best that can be said for the theories laid down in the American Declaration is that they do more credit to the hearts of those who penned them than to their heads." Nietzsche is right, and no truer book than Machiavelli's "Prince" was ever composed. Even the masses of men, dull as they are, yet know in their hearts that they are of small importance here or there. Our captains of industry, as we name our "blond beasts," have been cunning and greedy and relentless; they have bought legislatures and robbed the people; they have been a failure in so far as they have not realized their mission to create the genuine superman; yet, after all, they are the best we have, and out of their slyness and ferocity are produced whatever scant gleams of art and beauty have fallen to our lot in a democratic country.

All this is harshly expressed by Mr. Dreiser and with a needless swagger, but in fact it is a view of Life more commonly held, though often inarticulately, by poor as well as by rich than we like to admit.

And so Mr. Dreiser, swimming with the tide, is a Nietzschean—on one page. On the next you will find him the sleek and orthodox humanitarian; and why not? He has worked as a day-laborer at the building of a railroad, and been promoted to foreman of a gang; and in both positions he has revolted from the grinding burden imposed upon the masses, while, as it seemed to him in the trenches, their employers were wallowing in slothful ease. And so, in a moment of pity and dejection, he threw up his job of driving foreman, with a cry of bitterness against the injustice of life. One is rather drawn to Mr. Dreiser by this honest report of his experience; whatever one may say of his philosophy, he put into personal practice the sympathy which generally exhausts itself in vague whimperings or wild threats or attempts to reform somebody else.

This, I should say, is the distinguishing note of the book, this oscillation between a theory of evolution which sees no progress save by the survival of the rapaciously strong and a humanitarian feeling of solidarity with the masses who are exploited in the process. It even looks occasionally as if Life had called Mr. Dreiser's bluff.

The remarkable thing is not that Mr. Dreiser should be intellectually in this state of unstable equilibrium, but that he should pose, or be posed by his publishers, as an original thinker. The fact rather is that, like a good many other vociferous egotists, he is merely tossed about by the contrary currents of popular opinion. In his chapter on "Some Aspects of Our National Character" he has written rather a telling indictment of the "psychological flounderings and back somersaults" of the American people before and during and since the war. For instance, we went into the war under the plea that the world had to be made "safe for democracy," yet once in the war we, the people, submitted to an autocracy worse than that of Russia, and so on, and so on. The account is brilliant, and humiliating; but, oddly enough, Mr. Dreiser never seems to guess that the flounderings of democracy—as democracy now is—are the sure result of just this polarization of the popular temperament between Nietzscheanism and humanitarianism of which he himself is a conspicuous example. Nor does he see that this swaying from one extreme of emotion to the other follows naturally on the denial of all those laws of moral accountability and the abrogation of all those spiritual values which we sum up under the name of religion.

Oh, I know that Mr. Dreiser, like others of his kind, has a good deal to say about balance and equilibration and that sort of thing. But if there is no purpose in the unfolding events of creation, no certain law of justice perceived by faith and truer intuition through the apparent chances of life, no incorruptible tribunal, no inner rewards and penalties besides those which a man can grasp in his hands and feel in his flesh, no ideal world of which this material world is the illusory shadow; if man is nothing more than a product of chemic and mechanic forces, a blind cog in a blind machine, if the great achievement of philosophy is "to rid the human mind of all vain illusion concerning things spiritual," if life is a mere "social or chemic drift," to be reckoned in the end only "errant and nonsensical," if "so-called vice and crime and destruction and so-called evil are as fully a part of the universal creative process as are the so-called virtues, and do as much good"—if these things are true, what compelling power is there in such fine words as "balance" and "equilibration" and the like, and what remains to save a man from oscillating restlessly between the poles of his temperament, practising a more than Nietzschean hardness when his cupidity is excited, urging an indiscriminate humanitarianism when his sympathies are touched without too much cost to himself? I do not mean to imply that mankind in general to-day would assent to the blatant logic of materialism which glares in Mr. Dreiser's eyes when he confronts Life; but it is true, nevertheless, that he is symptomatic of social disease, in so far as masses of mankind have lost their hold on any save materialistic values. Just to this extent democracy has in fact become a victim of evolutionary philosophy, and Mr. Dreiser is a victim of democracy. But I for one refuse to believe that the equation of democracy and materialism is necessary.

In one respect Mr. Dreiser has outstepped the popular mind, though in this, too, the multitude may soon be at his heels. I refer to his unmitigated allegiance to the theories of the man whom our inquisitive college youth are beginning to speak of reverentially as "Frood." Mr. Dreiser has much to say about the "shabby little pinchbeck repressions" of the moralists. "In no law code and in no religion of any nation," he declares, "has the sex question, the need of moderation, duty to family and the like, been ignored; but in all that time the social expression of sex has never been so much as modified, let alone done away with." (His facts are as false to history as his logic is funny; but we pass that.) And then to illustrate this truth, as he holds it, he paints a lurid, and, alas, not wholly falsified, picture of the inconsistency of one of our traditionally Puritan towns, where a lofty code of ethics is still preached officially and decreed legally, while in practice the literature, the movies, the dancing, and the women's dress are all devised to keep the sexual emotions in a state of excitation. The actual results as he sets them forth in "Neurotic America" are not pleasant reading—except to the author. A reasonable man might suggest that the way out of such a morbid dilemma would be, not to repudiate all laws of repression, but to look to the imagination, where alone restraint can be normally effective; and this reform in the realm of imagination, he might add, is impossible until men have been taught again the reality of those values which are not of the body. But Mr. Dreiser, naturally, will have none of this; he admits, in fact, no quarrel with neuroticism, but only with those who reject the full consequences of Freudianism for some antiquated folly of faith and decency.

We are told that Mr. Dreiser has made philosophy "exciting" and has confronted Life unafraid. Perhaps he has only sunk down in terror of true life into the currents of decomposition that have been flowing in dark, ill-smelling places from the beginning of time.

P. E. M.

The Case of Maurice Maeterlinck

THE gift of imagination is a precious power, likewise an insidious lure. How to give it play without letting it run wild is a persistent problem. The grindstone routine of harsh reality crushes its claims; but suppressed instincts crowd for escape, and, along with romance and day-dreams, the occult offers satisfaction to those weary of a severely rational diet. Balanced rations, born of domestic science under chemical rule, are disagreeably nutritious, monotonous, and unstimulating. The artist, the poet, and the dramatist cater to another palate, in which calories are irrelevant and taste rules supreme. So may it ever be!

The troubles of the denied imagination make a sorry tale, to be recited to schoolboards and other hard-headed officials of the intellectual life. The present inquiry concerns the surfeited and unregulated imagination of the irreconcilables with reality. The case of Maeterlinck, the occultist, commands attention by reason of its compensation in the dramatist. There is also the bourgeois mysticism of the essays, drifting on a calm moonlit sea of speculation, scorning harbors and lighthouses that make the irregular venture possible. Questioning in his favorite mood, one may wonder by what fateful spell, by what malicious Lorelei he was enticed to the charted realms guarded by the prosaic sentinels of science! There is no need to suppose that the fertile fantasy of the dramas debouches in the fantastic credulity of the essays, with their amazing departures from the ordinary standards of plausibility; one must be content to record that logical compunctions have yielded disastrously to the æsthetic satisfactions of bizarre belief.

It may seem needlessly didactic and cruel to apply intelligence tests to a poetic mind. Intelligence testers at times find great disparity between the mental and the physical age; when the instincts and desires of maturity appear without the responsible control of reason, those thus defective may become a menace to the community. The lack of relation between emotional and intellectual development in the higher reaches of personality can not be simply plotted, though the uncongeniality of the poetic and the objective temperament—what William James called the "feminine-mystical" and the "scientific-academic" mind—is a matter of common comment. Ungenerous as it may appear towards one richly honored as a master dramatist in his genre, the suspicion can hardly be avoided of a critical defect in logic that passes the bounds of normality.

The imposing Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research and the Annales des sciences psychiques are not responsible for such temperamental leanings—only for their confirmation. In the older, deeper sense, Maeterlinck is not an occultist—not a searcher or researcher into mysteries, and the devotee of a cult—and by his own avowal he is not a spiritualist; he is a collector of psychic rarities—a miraculist displaying his trophies under the seal of psychical research. To that type of mind the miraculous must be real because it is so interesting; the apparently incredible must be true because so inviting. The world of the common man becomes a pitiable torso, to be restored to its pristine integrity by the revelations of mediums and the "psychic flashes" of rare men (or, more commonly, women) and—be it anticipated—equally rare horses. Men of science live pitiably in a dark cave, with their backs to the entrance, and their eyes closed.

To the miraculist, the truly significant places are not the formal chambers of the earthly mansions, nor the busy floors of the workshops, but the obscure corners of the attic. The temple of wisdom is to be built of rejected stones, and prepared for the reception of "The Unknown Guest." We have "table-turning with its raps; the movements and transportations of inanimate objects without contact; luminous phenomena; lucidité or clairvoyance; veridical apparitions or hallucinations; haunted houses; bilocations and so forth; communications with the dead; the divining rod; the miraculous cures of Lourdes and elsewhere; fluidic asepsis; and lastly the famous thinking animals of Elberfeld and Mannheim." Ghosts that haunt until their mortal remains are "decently interred"; "scattered limbs; pale, diaphanous, but capable hands" suddenly appearing in a physiological laboratory in the presence of the notorious Palladino; seeing and hearing at any distance in space; foretelling the future; solving police mysteries by trance-revelations; reading a life-history by a lock of hair or a scrap of writing; warning of danger by mystic voices; presentiments; premonitions; exploded tales of Indian jugglery; mathematical and philological equine prodigies;—anything, everything, that is sufficiently unusual, incredible, and discredited is invested by the omnivorous miraculist with the crucial significance of the rare psychic ray that penetrates the dark ignorance wherein ordinary men spend their dull skeptical days.

That a man of distinction in an intellectual profession should be convinced that the shallow survivals of superstition to which he subscribes are demonstrated and momentous facts, should undertake to inform the public that many of them are now a "matter of scientific experiment," will be set down by the charitable as a naïve lack of critical sense, and by the plain-spoken as an amazing instance of twentieth-century gullibility. But no enumeration of the strangely assorted wares which are to be found upon the shelves and in the cupboards of M. Maeterlinck's sanctum can convey an adequate sense of the state of mind of the convert who finds comfort in their accumulation. For this, we must go to the attests of their genuineness and the descriptions of their virtues.

When, in September, 1913, the obscure M. Maeterlinck went upon his pilgrimage to the miraculous horses of Elberfeld, his wife (likewise incognito) took a letter of his to a clairvoyante medium, Mme. M., who—wonderful to relate—"without a second's hesitation, declared that I was very far away, in a foreign country where they spoke a language which she did not understand." Also that the unknown traveler was standing in a courtyard examining horses; also that he was wearing a long coat (common among hostlers). In this remarkable instance of clairvoyance there are "two rather curious mistakes," M. Maeterlinck observes; the one that he was no longer in the stable-yard when Mme. M. saw him there, and the other that he did not wear a long coat. Otherwise, the vision is scrupulously, if cautiously, correct, even to the insight that the horses were exhibited, not in the drawing-room or the counting-house, but in the courtyard. Whereupon M. Maeterlinck comments:

> The transmission of thought is remarkable; but this is a recognized phenomenon, and one of frequent occurrence, and we need not, therefore, linger over it. The real mystery begins with the description of a place which my wife had never seen and which I had not seen either at the time of writing the note which established the psychometrical communication. Are we to believe that the appearance of what I was one day to see was already inscribed on the prophetic sheet of paper; or more simply and more probably that the paper which represented myself was enough to submit either to my wife's subconsciousness or to Mme. M., whom, at that time, I had never met, an exact picture of what my eyes beheld three or four hundred miles away?

On a later occasion, M. Maeterlinck took to the same clairvoyante a letter containing a request for his autograph. "She began by describing us, my wife and myself, who both of us had touched the paper and consequently impregnated it with our respective 'fluids.'"

> On the one hand, we shall have to admit that the sheet of paper handed to the psychometer and impregnated with human "fluid" contains, after the manner of some prodigiously compressed gas, all the incessantly renewed, incessantly recurring images that surround a person, all his past and perhaps his future, his psychology, his state of health, his wishes, his intentions, often unknown to himself, his most secret instincts, his likes and dislikes, all that is bathed in light and all that is plunged in darkness, his whole life in short, and more than his personal and conscious life, besides all the lives and all the influences, good or bad, latent or manifest, of all who approach him. We should have here a mystery as unfathomable and at least as vast as that of generation, which transmits, in an infinitesimal particle, the mind and matter, with all the qualities and all the faults, all the acquirements and all the history, of a series of lives of which none can tell the number.
>
> On the other hand, if we do not admit that so much energy can lie concealed in a sheet of paper, continuing to exist and develop indefinitely there, we must necessarily suppose that an inconceivable network of nameless forces is perpetually radiating from this same paper, forces which, cleaving time and space, detect instantaneously, anywhere and at any distance, the life that gave them life and place themselves in complete communication, body and soul, senses and thoughts, past and future, consciousness and subconsciousness, with an existence lost amid the innumerous host of men who people this earth. It is, indeed, exactly what happens in the experiments with mediums in automatic speech or writing, who believe themselves to be inspired by the dead. Yet here it is no longer a discarnate spirit, but an object of any kind imbued with a living "fluid," that works the miracle; and this, we may remark in passing, deals a severe blow to the spiritualistic theory.

All this elaborate obfuscation, because a shrewd medium guessed and "fished" and pieced together a simple situation into which the believer injected what trivial mystery it may be made to assume. There is more of this tinsel, endless tangled skeins of it; let one other sample suffice:

> Nevertheless, there are two rather serious objections to this second explanation. Granting that the object really places the medium in communication with an unknown entity discovered in space, how comes it that the image or the spectacle created by that communication hardly ever corresponds with the reality at the actual moment? On the other hand, it is indisputable that the psychometer's clairvoyance, his gift of seeing at a distance the pictures and scenes surrounding an unknown being, is exercised with the same certainty and the same power when the object that sets his strange faculty at work has been touched by a person who has been dead for years. Are we, then, to admit that there is an actual, living communication with a human being who is no more, who sometimes—as, for instance, in a case of incineration—has left no trace of himself on earth, in short, with a dead man who continues to live at the place and at the moment at which he impregnated the object with his "fluid" and who seems to be unaware that he is dead?

The insane reveal their infirmities not so much by what they believe as by the reasons they give for their delusions and the confidence with which they hold them, and also by the obvious explanations which they overlook. To maintain that a powerful medium can see across a few hundred miles seems a mild and rational assumption compared with this absurd speculation about "fluids" and energy and compressed gas and generation and nameless forces, jumbled into a vapid cloud of verbiage. Without quotation-marks the reader may well refuse to believe that this drivel emanates from the author of "The Blue Bird" and "Monna Vanna." Nor is this a diversion or a lapse of an otherwise sober discourse. The writer is deadly serious; to question these vagaries is heresy:

> I consider it necessary to declare for the last time that these psychometric phenomena, astonishing though they appear at first, are known, proved, and certain, and are no longer denied or doubted by any of those who have studied them seriously. I could have given full particulars of a large number of conclusive experiments; but this seemed to me as superfluous and tedious as would be, for instance, a string of names of the recognized chemical reactions that can be obtained in a laboratory.

There is mystery here: the mystery that the dramatist and the miraculist—at least so unreserved and abandoned a miraculist—should occupy the same tenement of clay and use the same cerebral hemispheres for their writings. Perhaps Andrew Lang suggested the explanation:

> There are also people who so dislike our detention in the prison-house of unvarying laws that their bias is in favor of anything which may tend to prove that science in her contemporary mood is not infallible. As the Frenchman did not care what sort of scheme he invested money in, provided that it annoys the English, so many persons do not care what they invest belief in, provided that it irritates men of science.

Or did George Eliot hit the mark when she observed that the absurd is "a perfectly juicy thistle" to certain types?

Gnats and camels, mediums and horses, are all swallowed without any sign of strain. The prologue of the miracle-play called "The Elberfeld Horses" goes back to Berlin twenty years ago. A stallion earned the title of "Kluger Hans" by convincing his master and tutor, Herr von Osten, as well as a host of better-educated Berliners, that a horse, under proper schooling, could count, add, multiply, subtract, divide, convert decimals into fractions, tell time by the watch, name the notes on the musical scale, tell what tone is missing to make a harmony, spell out the name of an object or a picture, give the day for any date, repeat a sentence after a lapse of twenty-four hours, catch the meaning of words when whispered—in fact, reach the intellectual status of a fourteen-year-old child. Berlin was excited, and rushed into pamphlets and controversy—a favorite Teutonic indoor sport. To quiet the uncertainty, a commission was appointed, including eminent university professors and psychologists. By a shrewd and painstaking analysis, they solved the mystery. As the questioner finishes the question, he bends his head ever so slightly, which Clever Hans has learned to accept as a signal to begin tapping with his foot; as the questioner follows the tapping, his interest causes him to bend forward more and more, and then to straighten his posture when the correct number is reached, which is the signal for Hans to stop. Herr von Osten was honest, but as self-deceived as table-tippers; the signals were wholly involuntary, and Hans deserved his title, and his sugar and carrots, for his part in the performance. According to Maeterlinck, the result of the report was that "people felt a sort of half-cowardly relief at beholding the prompt collapse of a miracle which was threatening to throw confusion into the self-satisfied little fold of established truths." Von Osten died of a broken heart. Maeterlinck is his avenger.

A new champion of equine genius promptly appeared. Herr Krall of Elberfeld discovered two Arab steeds, Muhamed and Zarif (as is well known, we derive our number lore from the Arabs), whose mathematical genius makes Hans's accomplishments seem a kindergarten exercise. After three weeks of instruction, Muhamed could count, add, subtract, multiply, divide, in whole numbers and in fractions; in the second month he learned to reply to questions in French as well as German; within four months he learned to spell; thence by leaps and bounds he galloped to erudition. Having read these accounts Maeterlinck was "wholly persuaded of the genuineness of the incidents" before starting upon his pilgrimage.

At length he stands before the sacred animals. Herr Krall speaks:

"Muhamed, attention! This is your uncle [pointing to me] who has come all the way to honor you with a visit. Mind you don't disappoint him. His name is Maeterlinck. . . . Now show him that you know your letters and that you can spell a name correctly." Muhamed gives a short neigh . . . strikes first with his right hoof and then with his left the number of blows which correspond with the letter M in the conventional alphabet used by the horses. Then one after the other, without stopping or hesitating, he marks the letters ADRLINSH, representing the unexpected aspect which my humble name assumes in the equine mind and phonetics. His attention is called to the fact that there is a mistake. He readily agrees and replaces the SH by a G and then the G by a K. They insist that he must put T instead of the D; but Muhamed, content with his work, shakes his head to say NO and refuses to make any further corrections.

In a second experiment, Maeterlinck proposed the name of the hotel at which he was registered, Weidenhof: which appeared in hoofiform spelling as WEIDNHOZ (the Z upon request corrected to an F), and elicited this comment:

"Observe, by the way, the logic of his phonetic writing: contrary to his habit, he [Muhamed] strikes the mute E after the W, because it is indispensable; but, finding it included in the D, he considers it superfluous and suppresses it with a high hand,"—or low hoof.

It is the "by-the-ways" that reveal the complete abandonment of the miraculist to the spell of conviction, cost what it may. The philological comment is followed by a rhapsody:

Was all this what they hid in their eyes, those silent brothers of ours? You blush at man's long injustice. You look around you for some sort of trace, obvious or subtle, of the mystery. . . . It is as though a sort of higher instinct, which knows everything and is not ignorant of the miracles that hang over our heads, were reassuring us in advance and helping us to make an easy entrance into the regions of the supernatural.

We approach the climax of credulity. After the Mahlzeit, the experiments are resumed:

Pointing to me, he asks Muhamed if he remembers what his uncle's name is. The horse raps out an H. Krall is astonished and utters fatherly reprimands: "Come, take care! You know it's not an H." The horse raps out an E. Krall becomes a little impatient: he threatens, he implores, he promises in turn carrots and the direst punishments [at the hands of the groom, for Krall does not punish the horses, for fear of losing their confidence]. "Come now, are you going to be more careful and not rap out your letters anyhow?" Muhamed obstinately goes his own way and strikes an R. Then Krall's open face lights up: "He's right," he says. "You understand: H E R standing for Herr. He wanted to give you the title to which every man wearing a top hat or a bowler has the right. He does it only very rarely and I had forgotten about it. He probably heard me call you Herr Maeterlinck and wanted to get it perfectly."

While this ridiculous fable amply proves the completeness of Herr Krall's delusions, it may be capped by a still wilder tale told by Krall and swallowed whole by his distinguished guest; that one day quite spontaneously "an absolutely human sentence" came letter by letter from Zarif's "ouija-board" hoofs; "'Albert [the groom] has beaten Hänschen' [the pony]. Another time I wrote down from his dictation, 'Hänschen has bitten Kamá' [a young elephant]. Like a child seeing its father after an absence, he felt the need to inform me of the little doings of the stable."

In such a paranoiac atmosphere miracles generate spontaneously. Square roots and cube roots are as familiar as turnips; and it is Maeterlinck's shocking arithmetical limitations and not those of Muhamed that stop the performance. Horses explain their inability to speak by striking out: Weil ig kein Stim hbe (because I have no voice). The 4th root of 7890481 is given as 53 even when the answer is unknown to the questioner. But it is the explanations that disclose how completely they who enter here have abandoned all reason. Horses are clearly mediums; they do not solve these problems by our clumsy systems but by "psychic flashes"; telepathy is seriously discussed as a partial factor; when the horses make a mistake and tap 73 for 37, the question arises whether this is due to mirror-writing; the equine subliminal consciousness is always functioning and supplies that mysterious intuition known as horse sense. Nothing less than a weary reading of the 140-page essay can suggest the possessed irresponsibility of the "facts" and the extravagant irrelevance of the befuddled explanations. But the insult of it all is the persistent attempt to square these accounts with what is known of animal psychology. In the good old credulous days Pegasus and the Unicorn were accepted on faith; their zoölogical affinities were not a problem. But the equine Euclid is demonstrated "with the convincing force of photographic records," which only the stupid prejudices of psychologists refuse to accept.*

The pilgrimage to Elberfeld may well prove the occultist's undoing. Despite their versatile gaits, horses can not sidestep and cover their tracks as mediums can. Without this coveted specimen Maeterlinck's collection of psychic miracles might have imposed upon the uncritical and retained its prestige. With it the quality of the entire collection becomes suspicious. Not that Maeterlinck stands alone in succumbing to the lure of animal mythology; many another well-known intellectual has come to test the intelligence of the horses and by his report has shown that the horses tested his—and found it wanting. But Maeterlinck is insistent. One might have thought that he would show some respectful attention to the report, repudiating equine geniuses, signed by Professor Stumpf, the psychologist of the University of Berlin; or to the monograph of Dr. Pfungst, which was deemed worthy of an English translation with a laudatory introduction by Professor Angell, psychologist of the University of Chicago. This admirable investigation, which has been generally accepted as convincing, is dismissed as a "monument of useless pedantry," based on "a cumbrous and puerile theory." The irresponsibility of the verdict offsets its imperinence; it suggests a more fundamental disqualification for judgment than a blind prepossession explains.

Such is the case of Maurice Maeter-

*With apologies to the reader for implying that any further detailed explanation of this preposterous farce is necessary, let it be briefly stated that the signs (whatever they are) by which Muhamed, like Hans, knows when to begin and when to stop pawing with both left and right foot, are irregularly given and easily missed. Consequently, wholly irrelevant letters appear; for, in his eagerness, the horse may stop pawing a little too soon, or not catch the clue quite soon enough. The arrangement by which each letter is indicated by a combination of two numbers is wholly arbitrary. Thus "Pferd"—a word commonly asked for—is "spelled" by the phonetic Muhamed in over thirty different ways. That the questioner and not the horse perfoms the operation (while the horse is intent only upon the sign which spells carrots) is amply shown by the analysis in the case of both Hans and of Muhamed. When the questioner knew the answer to the question, from 90 per cent. to 100 per cent. of the horse's answers were correct; when the questioner did not know the answer, from 6 per cent. to 10 per cent. were correct; this for Hans, as appears in the report of Dr. Pfungst. For the Elberfeld horses, the successes when the questioner did not know the answer were from 8 per cent. to 11 per cent. The small residue of successes may well be due to the constant repetition of certain combinations (as in number habits) and the increased chance of the favorite tapping pattern asserting itself at the right time. The further fact that the simplest problems are answered with no greater accuracy than the most complex ones, that the horses start at once upon the answer without any hesitation, that they do not look at the figures or boards upon which the problems appear, abundantly show that no question of calculating or reasoning enters.

While there has been no definitive examination of the Elberfeld horses, the critical accounts warrant the conclusion of Professor Watson (who includes an account of them in his authoritative book on "Behavior" for the sake of the light which they throw upon animal intelligence as well as upon human lack of it) that their responses do "not rise above the level of those given by Hans."

always chasing some notion or other which had no possible relation to practice—witness German transcendental philosophy—and that all such stuff would not amount to anything in the end: it was all "mere ideas." Perhaps after further reflection upon the war and upon antecedent history, the Anglo-Saxon mind will decide that mere ideas are the fuel of all great fires; that in schools and colleges this fuel is piled up day by day, waiting for sparks; and that it would be good economy, even if certain more "practical" subjects had to be displaced in the process, to require all young students to take a course in elementary ethics (and religion, when possible) as applied to political life. So far, however, this point has not been loudly emphasized in plans for post-bellum reconstruction. I must recall words uttered in London ten years ago by a young Englishman—a representative Oxford graduate, who had spent four years in Germany, and with whom I was comparing notes—"O yes, they talked all that political tommy-rot to me, too. Mere pedantry, you know. Just pedantic book-notions that never come to anything. They'll get over it. But my word, what a joy to watch them do tennis! Throw themselves into it as if the whole of civilization were at stake. And what a terrible mess they do make of it, eh?"

G. R. Elliott

The Revival of the Classic Drama

IN a recent address to the League for Political Education, I took occasion to speak of the degradation of the stage as a great organ of public instruction. A fragment from this speech was used as the basis of an article in the New York Tribune, of Sunday, February 15, and among those who commented upon my indictment of the stage in recent years was Mr. David Belasco.

I confess to considerable surprise that Mr. Belasco, who as a producer has had high ambitions for the stage, while accepting my premise, seems to dissent from the conclusions which I drew. He appears to justify the frivolous play as though it were the chief end of the stage. He says: "It is a theatrical manager's duty at times to crowd the stage with as many pretty women, as much youth, and light and charm, as possible." And he proceeds to state that each Friday night finds him at a musical comedy, "as near the front as I can get," where, as he states, he is refreshed and invigorated by "the love-making of the handsome tenor and the beautiful soprano."

I did not question that, even on the stage, a little nonsense, now and then, is very much relished, and the real question, which Mr. Belasco did not discuss, was as to the relative proportion which the amusing should bear to the instructive and inspiring. Shakespeare could blend both in one play to great advantage; but it may be cheerfully admitted that there are few Shakespeares.

Mr. Belasco proceeds to make the amazing statement that there are "fewer frivolous plays in New York than in any other big city in other lands." If this be so, then the titles to New York plays are very misleading, and matters of great pith and moment can be found "Up in Mabel's Room." Mr. Belasco finally says that he pays out twenty thousand dollars a year in advance royalties, and yet "can not get the sort of serious play that I want." He rejects many, because, in his judgment, they are "overly serious and altogether too gloomy."

My contention was that most of the fifty theatres now producing plays in New York devoted their energy to the exploitation of the very lightest and most frivolous of productions. I cheerfully recognize that there are some honorable exceptions. While recognizing that the stage, as a great and potent instrumentality of society, has as one of its functions to amuse and entertain the public in this work-a-day age, yet I also emphasized that its larger functions were to instruct and inspire, and that, in these latter functions, the American stage had, in recent years, largely failed.

Those of us who would like to see the stage restored to its true position, as one of the four great pillars of society, may well feel discouraged when the foremost of American producers seems to attach so little importance to the stage as a serious medium for public instruction and inspiration.

Feeling some curiosity to contrast the opportunities of a young man of this day to hear the best and noblest in the drama with those of the period when the writer was a young man, I took occasion to consult my diary for the year 1883, and I found that in that year I had seen in my native city (Philadelphia) the following plays: Robson and Crane in "A Comedy of Errors"; Salvini in "Lear" and "Othello"; Janauschek in Schiller's "Mary Stuart"; Salvini in "The Civil Death"; Langtry in "She Stoops to Conquer"; Modjeska in "Cymbeline," "As You Like It," and "Twelfth Night"; Sheridan in "King Lear"; Rose Eytinge in "A Winter's Tale"; Rhea, the noted French actress; Irving and Terry in "The Merchant of Venice," "Charles the First," and "Hamlet."

Even the plays then produced which were not classics had at least the merit of intelligence, and Boston, New York, and Philadelphia each had its stock company with an extensive repertory of classic and modern plays. Why can not New York with six millions of people have another company like Daly's?

As the fish that were discovered in the dark recesses of the Mammoth Cave were found to be blind, because they had never been privileged to see the light, the disappearance of the classic drama has been followed by the passing of the actor who could read the lines. I have been informed by those who ought to know that, to establish at this time a Shakespeare theatre in any of our leading American cities, would involve the preliminary necessity of training a school of actors, even to read the lines, much more to interpret the rôles. Raw material is not wanting. To-day there are more good actors and actresses than ever before. But there are few great ones, because so few great plays are given.

The present seems to be the psychological time to start afresh in this matter. After the Civil War was ended, there came to the American people a deep seriousness, which found its reflection in the revival of the classic drama. Only a few years after Appomattox, Edwin Booth played "Hamlet" for one hundred consecutive nights in New York, and then followed it with a revival of "Romeo and Juliet" for sixty-eight nights. Thus the public demand for two serious Shakespearean tragedies was so great that for nearly a half-year these plays ran successfully—and New York at that time probably did not number over a million people.

It seems fruitless to urge these obvious facts, which all intelligent men must recognize with regret and humiliation, if we depend upon the theatre as a business enterprise. The knowledge of the syndicates that own and control nearly all the American theatres consists largely in the old aphorism that "Shakespeare spells ruin." They believe that the taste of the public is confined to the class of plays which revolve around a bedroom, as that eminent theatrical manager, Mr. Vincent Crummles, caused his dramatist to write a play around a pump. But it might be suggested, even to these gentlemen, that there are bedroom dramas with a very serious purpose. "Othello" is one of them, "Cymbeline," another.

All this leads me to believe that the work that requires the earliest attention is to found a classic theatre by community effort that will, so far as one theatre can, lift the stage above the dull and sordid mediocrity of its present management.

It may be admitted that the revival of the classic drama can not be accomplished as a mere business enterprise, or through some of the human agencies which to-day control the American stage. They much prefer the moral scum of the Great White Way. The appeal should be made to the parents, who ought to feel not a little real concern with respect to the intellectual as well as the æsthetic advancement of the rising generation.

The more serious problem presents itself as to how a competent stock company could be recruited at this time, when there are so many competent actors and actresses for modern plays, but so few who any longer have any training in the classic drama. Undoubtedly such a theatre would necessarily be a matter of slow growth. It would be necessary to build up a stock company slowly, and, at first, with disappointing results. There are, however, actors who would willingly drop the trivial parts they now play and attempt something more worthy of their noble profession. Those who saw George Gaul last season play the part of "Job" in the dramatized version of that wonderful book of the Bible, will never forget the consummate skill with which he read the most remarkable poetry, perhaps, that the literature of the world knows. I have followed the theatre from the time of E. L. Davenport down to the present time, and have seen nearly all the great actors of England and America and some of the great actors of France and Germany, and, in my judgment, George Gaul's performance of "Job" was a real achievement, considering that the play had almost no action and that the actor was obliged to rely upon the skillful rendition of his lines. There are doubtless many Gauls in the profession wasting their talents upon trivial parts. It certainly would be a crowning reflection upon the American stage if, from the thousand actors and actresses who have not yet become stars, a company could not be recruited which, with adequate training and with the wise guidance of students of Shakespeare, would become a very competent company.

But, after all, "the play's the thing." Better a Shakespeare play, even though inadequately done, than not to have Shakespeare played at all; for even an indifferent performance of "Hamlet" is a delight to those who have seen far greater actors in the rôle; because it is a delightful reminiscence of all the Hamlets who have paced the battlements of Elsinore while waiting the coming of their ghostly father. Never will the writer forget the impression made upon his mind, at the age of thirteen, when, from a gallery in the old Walnut Street Theatre in Philadelphia—once the home of the classic drama—the wonderful mystery of "Hamlet," as interpreted by E. L. Davenport, sunk into his soul. He can only feel sorrow for those of the rising generation whose theatrical pabulum consists of "Nightie Night," "Roly Boly Eyes," "The Midnight Whirl," "Linger Longer Letty," etc.

To many, the revival of the classic theatre will seem an impossible dream. We shall be quickly reminded of the disastrous failure of the New Theatre, which, while devoted to serious drama, did not have as its raison d'être the revival of the classic drama, and which failed for a variety of reasons to which it is not necessary to make allusion. My faith in the possibility of developing a classic theatre, not only in New York, but in a hundred American cities, is based upon the extraordinary development of the public taste for music. It does not require a long memory to recall the time when it was difficult for more than one symphony orchestra to find any public response in New York, and when, in Philadelphia, only meagre audiences greeted the orchestral concerts of Theodore Thomas. Even the opera spelled ruin quite as much as the Shakesperean drama is proverbially supposed to do. In less than two decades, a taste for music has been developed that is marvelous. In New York, five symphony orchestras give successful concerts, and seats for the opera—possibly the best in the world—are sold out in advance for almost daily performances for a season of twenty-three weeks. In New York the thirst for music seems to be well-nigh unquenchable.

The difference between the two situations is that, while the taste for the symphony concerts had to be developed, the love of the theatre as one of the great primitive passions of mankind has always been with us, as witness the alacrity with which the public frequent even the poorest drivel of the stage, and the popularity of the moving-picture shows. With this love of mimic representation it should not be difficult to develop in a city of six millions of people a demand for a classic theatre which would be distinguished from all other theatres, not only because it was not conducted for profit, but also because it would produce no play that was not at least one hundred years old. Therefore, it would be called the Classic Theatre. This would open an extensive repertory—Shakespeare, Sheridan, Goldsmith, Molière, Racine, Schiller, Goethe —not to omit the masterpieces of the greatest stage that the world has ever seen, that of Athens, with Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

Fortunately, there are unmistakable evidences that the same reaction from the frivolous which followed the Civil War is again slowly taking place. There is a reasonable possibility that next season will witness four or five serious attempts to revive the classic drama. Already the Vrooms are to give a series of classic matinees. Walter Hampden, whose "Hamlet" matinees were so successful last season, is understood to be developing as a business enterprise a stock company with a classic repertory. That ever conscientious actress, Margaret Anglin, whose productions of classic Greek plays have been so successful on the Pacific Coast, has under consideration a somewhat extended season in New York. Barrymore has given us "Richard III," and Sothern and Marlowe have again taken the stage with their familiar Shakespearean rôles.

Even more promising, however, is the prospect that the Stratford Players may visit America next year. This company of actors represents the most serious attempt in the English-speaking world to put Shakespearean representation on a sound artistic basis. They have discarded the star system, and their appeal to the public is based upon the care with which every part in a Shakespearean play is enacted. Each year they give two seasons in Stratford, one an early spring season and then a long summer season. The company consists of fifty players drawn from all parts of England and especially trained to render the plays of Shakespeare not for the mere exploitation of a star, but as an artistic whole. These players, whose chief season is in Shakespeare's birthplace and who have all the inspiring influence of an artistic enterprise which is devoted more to the memory of Shakespeare than to commercial profits, have been immensely strengthened by the elimination of some who had outlived their usefulness and by recruiting younger and fresher talent from the English stage. I have received a letter from Sir Johnstone Forbes-Robertson that speaks in the highest terms of the artistic excellence of the Stratford Players. It is, therefore, gratifying to know that there is this prospect, and that efforts are now being made to bring the Stratford company to America; as they have more than thirteen Shakespearean plays in their repertory, it is possible that the American people may see the production of masterpieces which have not been seen by American theatregoers for many years.

I have always been impressed in reading "Hamlet" with the marked distinction which Shakespeare makes in his greeting to the two courtiers, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, and to the players. To the former, his attitude was the formal one of a prince; but he hails the latter—not once, but many times—as "friends." Whether the Stratford Players come to America or not, if the players of America shall use their influence for the revival of the classic drama, and especially of the Shakespearean drama, then the public not only should, but assuredly will, say:

> Good, my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?

JAMES M. BECK

Correspondence

Congress's Right to Declare Peace

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the course of the discussion which has been aroused in Congress by the proposal to declare hostilities with Germany at an end by joint resolution, Senator Thomas of Colorado has brought forward evidence showing that on one occasion the Convention which framed the Constitution voted down unanimously a motion to vest Congress with the power to "make peace." This evidence is good so far as it goes, but it does not support all of Senator Thomas's deductions from it, nor indeed has he given a quite complete account of it. The proposal in question was made and rejected by the Convention on August 17, 1787. One ground for its rejection was that the making of peace would naturally fall, not to the Executive, as Senator Thomas would have it, but to the treaty-making body, which was, by the plan at the date before the Convention, the Senate alone. And the principal argument which was offered against the proposal Senator Thomas ignores altogether. It was the argument made by Ellsworth and repeated by Madison, that "it should be more easy to get out of war than into it"—the obvious deduction being that the making of peace ought therefore to be lodged with a less cumbersome body than Congress. The Convention was apparently unacquainted with the "single-track mind"!

The mere fact that Congress is not specifically authorized to make peace does not prove that it does not possess powers in the exercise of which, on proper occasions, it may bring peace about. Congress was also denied by the Convention of 1787 the power to charter corporations; notwithstanding which it has repeatedly exercised this power, and has been sustained by the Supreme Court in so doing. Nor again does the fact that peace, whether domestic or international, may be, and ordinarily is, attained by the treaty route prove that all other roads thereto are closed. To cite some parallel cases: certain businesses are subject to both the taxing power of Congress and the police power of the States; treaties may be abrogated, at least so far as the United States is concerned, both by act of Congress and by agreement between our Government and the other parties thereto; certain international conventions may be entered into by the President alone, upon authorization by Congress, or by the President and Senate without such authorization; certain types of breaches of the law may be cured either by an executive pardon or by a legislative act of indemnity; and so on. In short, it frequently happens that the same legal result may be produced by very different powers of government; nor need this fact lead to confusion, since as soon as any of the competent powers has acted, the result is produced.

Congress may repeal or otherwise curtail the legal operation of any measure which it had the right to enact in the first place, though naturally it can not repeal the acts already done under the sanction of such measure while it was still operative. Congress can not now invalidate, nor does it wish to, what was properly done by virtue of its declaration of war upon Germany; but it can withdraw its sanction from any further hostilities against our former foe. But the proposed Porter resolution has also a second purpose, namely, to force the German Government, by the threat of cutting off all commercial relations with it—relations which are now going on in the midst of "war"—to proclaim the cessation on its part of hostilities against this country and the renunciation of any claims against this country which the German Government "would not have the right to assert had the United States ratified the Treaty of Versailles." This provision, at least, it will be contended, amounts to an attempt on the part of Congress to usurp the treaty-making power. In fact, however, the proposal is grounded on the securest of precedents, on Madison's Non-Intercourse Act, on the "reciprocally unjust" clause of the McKinley Tariff Act, which was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S.) against the objection just recited, on the "maximum and minimum" clause of the Dingley Act, on the Canadian Reciprocity Act passed during President Taft's Administration and at his special instance. In all these cases Congress did just what it is proposing to do at the present moment; it was using its power to regulate "commerce with foreign nations" to force certain concessions from those nations.

Congress has the right, then, simply by virtue of its power to repeal its previous enactments, to declare hostilities with Germany to be at an end, and its declaration to this effect, once duly enacted, will be binding upon the Courts and the Executive alike. Also, it has the right by virtue of its power to regulate "commerce with foreign nations" and to "pass all laws necessary and proper" to that end, to curtail or even to prohibit American trade with Germany, and this it may do either forthwith, or conditionally upon the occurrence or non-occurrence of certain events the ascertainment and proclamation of which may be left with the President. Both these propositions rest upon practice, precedent, and unchallengeable principles, while the opposing view rests upon the fallacious supposition that since peace in a legal sense would undoubtedly ensue upon the ratification of a treaty of peace with Germany, a treaty of peace is the only way to obtain it. But there is more than one road leading to peace, as to Rome, and a sovereign government, which the United States undoubtedly is in the field of foreign relations, must be regarded as having access to them all, until at least it can be shown to have been cut off therefrom by some very definite Constitutional prohibition such as no opponent of the Porter resolution has as yet produced. There is, in other words, no good reason either in law or common sense why Congress should not turn off the current which it turned on three years ago to-day, and so allow Uncle Sam to relax his wearied grip from an altogether useless and excuseless live wire.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Princeton, N. J., April 6

The Excess Profits Tax

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

General Wood, President Nicholas Murray Butler, and the New York Times have ventured to criticize the excess-profits tax, and the New Republic has rushed to the defense. The argument of the editors seems to run like this: These people who say that the excess-profits tax is bad are not to be trusted in any way: that ought to be enough. But for those who might otherwise be misled it may be pointed out that such a tax does not discourage production, because it takes only $2.40 out of $12 excess profit on $100 of investment. The $2.40 is not added to the price of goods, because the manufacturer will charge all he can get anyway, and he can get more than the tax just now. The real remedy is not less excess-profits tax but more. Take one hundred per cent, of the profit above an adequate minimum—say, ten per cent., or even fifteen. Divert more and more of the profits of "trusts" and "barons." The result must be that the plunderers will reduce prices. There is nothing to be gained by making profits for Uncle Sam's sole benefit.

All this is familiar tactics. Discredit your opponents; fix unpopular names on them; set up and beat down a man of straw; above all, state with violence some half-truths and suppress everything that disproves their application. It's not difficult and it works.

In that respect it differs from the excess-profits tax, which doesn't work. And the income super-tax, which doesn't work. And every other tax intended to put undue burdens on a few, which never works. Nobody in his senses contends that the excess-profits tax cuts any figure in prices when the economic situation permits the producers of goods to secure enormous profits. When demand far exceeds supply the tax becomes negligible. Nor does any one suppose that such a tax, in times like these, discourages any corporation from producing all it can under the circumstances of inefficient labor, short coal supply, and other handicaps. But it is conceivable that even General Wood, President Butler, and the New York Times may be telling the truth when they say that the excess-profits tax will be added, at least in part, to prices when a more normal situation returns.

Nobody has ever succeeded in beating into the heads of a certain kind of "economist" that 8 per cent. or 10 per cent. on capital invested is not necessarily an adequate return in all cases. And yet for at least a century there has been a strong inducement to every form of industry to turn back earnings into the business, because nearly every enterprise that did not do that has failed. Those which grew strong, including such of the railroads as have not been through receivership, put earnings into extensions and improvements. Now all that is to be changed. High authority has pronounced that shippers can not be expected to provide interest on invested capital and new capital besides. The underlying theory of excess-profits taxation in peace time must be that manufacturers and dealers ought to make no more than a "fair" profit (whatever that may be) on invested capital. With the exception of a very moderate allowance for depreciation, the Act of Congress does not permit deductions for replacements and none at all for extensions of plant. Then the new capital, which must be had if there is to be healthy growth, must come from the profits remaining after payment of taxes. The amount needed for this purpose differs in different industries and it may vary from year to year. It may very much exceed 10 per cent. on the capital invested in some industries. There can be no fixed "adequate minimum" unless it is put so high as to cover the most needy cases.

The New Republic points to the recent railroad law and suggests that nobody thought of allowing even as much as 8 per cent. profit. True. And it remains to be seen how it will work. If profits are to be limited to a small return on capital, there must be some guarantee that they will be steadily earned and paid before investors will care to put new money into railroads. It may be that the recent Act of Congress provides such a guarantee, though there is as yet no visible eagerness to buy railroad securities. If that guarantee is not provided, the railroads must fail and the New Republic will clamor for Government ownership and the Plumb plan.

The manufacturer does not expect, and he certainly will not get, any guarantee whatever. If he can not strengthen his position, he knows what will happen; he will fail, as so many others have before him. He is not allowed to deduct the cost of strengthening his business before his taxes are levied. Then it must come out of net earnings, after taxes, and go into the price of goods after we have reached the time when cost of production counts. It is conceivable that the gentlemen who have incurred the sovereign contempt of the New Republic have perceived this and would prefer to have our house set in order while there is still time.

But all this is beside the point. It is the man of straw, set up to be knocked down. The real issue would be inconvenient for the "economists" who prefer to deal in half truths. That issue was adequately stated by Mr. Glass, when he was Secretary of the Treasury. Speaking of the excess-profits tax in his annual report, he said, "It encourages wasteful expenditure, puts a premium on overcapitalization and a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise, discourages new ventures and confirms old ventures in their monopolies." Everybody who has had experience of its actual effects knows that this is true. Will any one contend that these results have had no effect on prices? Will any one assert that they will not have a marked effect in preventing a return to lower prices when other conditions permit? To those who are not "economists" it certainly seems likely that extravagant management, inertia, and safety in an entrenched position will make goods dearer.

Secretary Glass failed to carry his criticism to its logical conclusion. Exactly the same objections are valid with respect to the super-tax on earned incomes. Everybody who has come in contact with its actual effects is aware that it encourages waste, puts a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise and discourages new ventures. But fortunately General Wood, President Butler, and the New York Times have apparently confined their criticism to the excess-profits tax. One can imagine the New Republic dealing faithfully with them if they had ventured to touch the sacrosanct super-tax; one can foresee the sneers, the imputation of sinister motives, the magnificent assumption of wisdom, and one can be grateful for being spared the spectacle.

But there is cause for gratitude in the threat with which the second article on this subject concludes. "Excess-profits taxes offer one solution of the problem of monopoly. There is one other solution compatible with democracy. That is nationalization. Everything else has failed." Really our political leaders ought to be told this. Perhaps they ought to paste it in their hats. It is so neat and sonorous. Let us draw comfort from the existence of two possible solutions. One might have supposed that there was not even one.

PHILIP DEXTER

Boston, Mass., April 3

Compulsory Medicine

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

We are facing a deplorable condition of the times in respect to compulsory medicine. Commercialism has so surrounded, invaded, arrogated the fields of intelligent personal prerogative, that good citizenship wonders where it will stop. The privilege of preserving health has been practically assailed, and the healthy are confronted with so many forms of compulsory medicine that good judgment rejects them all, not, however, without being assured by some pseudo-authority that legal penalty will follow.

The question before the public is a large one, but a simple one of sense and justice after all. It is this: Are laboratory foundations which are endowed by multi-millionaires in the name of philanthropy to be the nucleus of experimental activities beginning with the lower and higher animals and extending to free human beings who may be assembled for the purpose in various grades of submission? Is there any science in it? Any art? Any humanity? Any philanthropy? No. The whole fabric as to its exploitation for benefit of human health is an affliction. Witness tuberculosis, influenza, and numerous infections in our camps and armies following inoculations of healthy recruits for diseases which are known to be non-existent under properly regulated sanitation.

The human organism is very tenacious of its integrity as against foreign invasion. It revolts when its blood and other tissues are contaminated, especially so when that contamination is most inappropriate as to immediate demand. The need of the organism is evidenced by very delicate signs, and it is the height of unscientific imposition to institute laboratory theories and practice, wholly speculative as they are, to replace the best ideals of normal hygienic habits of life as a basis of health, as well as sane medical aid from the physician in times of sickness to restore health.

We can not have our children infected by any therapy which forces into the bloodstream an agent of any kind. The foreign element is a menace, since it is foreign; when it is also a product of disease it is doubly dangerous. The Shick test, diphtheria antitoxin, typhoid prophylaxis, all the serums and vaccinations are to be regarded with more than suspicion, for they have already too large a mass of testimony to their discredit.

Public health demands that public places be kept clean and sanitary beyond anything which obtains at present. Public health will not endure human infection from any agents whatever, though they be industriously promulgated by all the endowed systems of so-called medical research.

JOHN HUTCHINSON, M.D.
New York, April 10

The New Home Rule Proposals

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Is not the following a reasonable interpretation of the Irish situation, as it stands at present?

The British Government is bound by the Home Rule Act of 1914. The conditions which led to the adoption of that Act have been altered during the progress of the war by the disloyalty of the Nationalist, and Sinn Fein people of the South, and by the patriotic loyalty of Ulster. To carry out the provisions of that Act and to place Ulster under the control of a Dublin Parliament without her consent and contrary to her wishes would be a return for her loyalty which is inconceivable and would be a harm alike to the people of Ulster, to the British nation, and to the friends of Great Britain throughout the world. The question which Mr. Lloyd George must solve is how to dispose of the obligations resting upon the Government under the Act of 1914. Every proposal hitherto made to the disaffected element in Ireland has been rejected, and every proposal that can be made—consistent with the welfare of the Empire—is likely to be rejected. To meet this situation the Prime Minister has tendered a measure which represents the extreme concession which the Government can offer. The South will reject it. Were Ulster to reject it she would be placing herself upon the same basis of disaffection as the South. Sir Edward Carson understands and supports the purposes of the Prime Minister. Ulster therefore assents. When the South rejects, as it undoubtedly will, the Government will be freed from all obligations under the Act of 1914, and can then deal untrammeled with the Irish situation as the welfare of the Empire may require. All friends of Great Britain—and they doubtless include a great majority of the citizens of the United States—must sympathize with the British nation in its difficulties, and must hope for an early and rational solution of them.

ALBA B. JOHNSON
Philadelphia, March 22

Book Reviews

John Redmond

JOHN REDMOND'S LAST YEARS. By Stephen Gwynn. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

AMID the abundant and increasing literature on Irish affairs it is seldom indeed that there comes into a reviewer's hand a literary treasure such as this. It is not simply a fascinating and convincing sketch of Redmond in the final phase of his career, though if it were estimated on this ground alone it must be ranked among the finest achievements of recent times as a psychological portrait of a public man. It is also a study of the conflicting currents of Irish life during a period which was crowded with events of world-wide significance, and in which the clue to the inner meaning of what has happened may well elude even the most patient and industrious of outside inquirers. Much that has been given to us upon this subject is, on the face of it, either inflamed rhetoric or well-intentioned literary incompetence, and it leaves us as far as ever from real insight into the situation it tries to present. Mr. Gwynn writes as one having knowledge and authority. He has had access to Redmond's private papers covering the whole period under review. He is not biased by religious creed, for he is a southern Protestant, of a family that has long been distinguished in the social circles of Dublin. As a Nationalist Member of Parliament he was himself among the first to respond to his leader's patriotic call in August, 1914, and his judgment upon the upheaval in Ireland since then is given us from the point of view of one who served for years with an Irish regiment at the front. On his periods of leave from service he constantly revisited the House of Commons to watch the turbid political whirlpool that was mingling its waters with the flowing river of national effort, and he sat as a member of the ill-fated Irish Convention of 1917 whose fair promise of public spirit was so soon darkened by the mists of sectional intrigue. He is thus able, so far as any man can be, to tell us how Redmond's later policy was conceived, how it was pursued, and how it was balked. Incidentally we learn from him much about those forces, hostile to Redmond, whose achievement is to be seen in the chaotic Ireland that lies before us to-day. And though strong language may rise often to the reader's lips as he follows the record, it is the spirit of charity by which, as the best tribute to his dead leader's example, the biographer is unfailingly inspired.

Perhaps what strikes one first in the book is just this judicial balance by which it is everywhere marked. Mr. Gwynn is keenly aware of the temptations against which he must struggle as he depicts the last years of John Redmond. He had to write the last sad chapter of a public life which he intensely admires, and he was writing it within a few months of the tragic gloom, amounting almost to martyrdom, in which it closed. He had to explain the causes by which a noble enterprise was defeated, the prejudices by which a high scheme of constructive statesmanship was misunderstood, and the implacable passions by which an exalted character was maligned. If the execution of this literary task had not been made imperative by its obvious bearing upon certain problems that have waited too long for settlement, it is safe to say that this writer, with his vivid sense of its difficulties, would have deferred the attempt until a more propitious season. The soil is indeed still too hot and too convulsed for an historian's quite steady tread. But we have all reason for thankfulness to one who has ventured a work of such immediate urgency, bringing to it a power of sustained self-control for which we so often look in vain even where lapse of time and cooling of tempers have made historical work comparatively simple.

Mr. Gwynn, knowing the risk that a disciple may idolize his master and vilify his master's enemies, is always careful to point out wherein Redmond may be judged deficient, and the strength which belongs to much that was urged against him from the camp of his opponents. The figure drawn for us in this book is that of a great Party Chairman, devoted heart and soul to the twin causes of Irish self-government and Anglo-Irish reconciliation, a leader far-sighted, with admirable tact, unfailing courtesy, an almost unique gift for presiding over and guiding debate. But joined to these qualities through which he shone in every public meeting, and which even his Ulster enemies in the Convention of 1916 were among the first to acknowledge, were some less fortunate characteristics that made one remember his Norman descent and his own deep-seated conservatism. Owing to a temperamental aloofness, Redmond was less accessible than he might with advantage have been to individual members of his own group, so that he sometimes misjudged the depth of new currents and the changes which were in process underground. "It needed some courage," says Mr. Gwynn, "to go to him with a question in policy, and if you went, the answer would be simply a 'Yes' or 'No.'" His was not a notably "magnetic" leadership; he sometimes annoyed those whom he might easily have won over by taking them more into his confidence; he lacked in some degree the personal touch. Thus within his own party he was admired rather than idolized, the object of liking and profound respect, rather than of love and passionate enthusiasm. His high standard of honor made him recoil from all that he thought of as intrigue, so that he shrank at the same time from frankly opening his mind to the legitimate influence of others. The integrity which was part of his own nature, and which he assumed in those opponents to whom he held out the hand of fellowship in August, 1914, made him forget how few were capable of his own vision, and how slowly the unclean methods of party strife are discarded.

The problems upon which one most desires light are such as these: Why did Redmond's appeal for recruits succeed so magnificently during the first eighteen months of the war, and then so disastrously fail? What were the forces that so sapped his strength as to reduce within four years a solid Parliamentary block of eighty-three to an insignificant group of seven? How far was he justified in the belief that the increasing displacement of the constitutional Nationalists by the violent Sinn Feiners was due to mismanagement by the British Cabinet?

Mr. Gwynn has supplied the most intelligible and the most credible answer which has yet been put before us. Redmond, as his biographer sees him, was confronted with two kinds of hostility. On the one side was the party, small at the beginning of the war though destined to reach ominous proportions before long, in which hatred of England and distrust of English promises had become an unconquerable passion. On the other side was the party of Ulster extremists, backed by the least reputable of the English Tory Opposition, to whom a reconciled Nationalist Ireland would be a positive offense. It was the business of the first of these parties to prevent enlistments in the south and west, as it was the joy of the second to prove that such enlistments were not taking place. Mr. Gwynn thinks that Lord Kitchener, invaluable in the field, was lamentable at such a time as Secretary for War, but it was as Secretary for War that he insisted upon acting. He knew how to use all other forms of force, but not the force that belongs to timely conciliation. Hence the wretched failure in the management of Irish recruiting, the use of Protestant and Unionist propagandists in intensely Nationalist districts, the refusal to recognize and officially equip the National Volunteers, the staffing of Irish Catholic brigades with officers alien in sentiment to all the men whom they commanded, and innumerable other blunders to which Redmond again and again called attention in vain. Lord Kitchener's wildest hope was for ten thousand recruits from Redmond's following! Even when this number had been multiplied many times, he would accept no advice from the leader who had so far surpassed his expectations. Mr. Asquith's promises in his Dublin speech were thus consistently falsified; one scheme after another to bring the organization of Ireland definitely under Ireland's natural and thoroughly loyal chiefs was adopted only to be again cast aside at the bidding of politicians. The inevitable result followed. Sinn Fein gained by leaps and bounds. Redmond with his constitutionalism was branded as a failure, while Sir Edward Carson with his counsels of violence had been a conspicuous success. A southern and western Carsonism became the new gospel. The Government had discredited its friends and stimulated its enemies. As one reads Mr. Gwynn's pages one recalls the trenchant summing up by Macaulay generations ago of that spirit which, then as now, spoiled the British administration of Ireland; "waiting that you may once again hit the exact point at which you can neither refuse with safety nor concede with grace."

It is a sad story, but a very plain one. It is sad in its outcome for the fate of the best and truest leader whom Ireland has had within living memory, sadder still in that effect upon Anglo-Irish relations which all men can now see, and which some are making remorseful efforts to undo. Mr. Gwynn again and again reminds us how hard was the Cabinet's task, how little time amid the burdens of the war could be spared for inquiry into the situation across the Channel, how much allowance we must make for the men in Downing Street who had to ride the whirlwind and direct the storm. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George may be excused if they missed their way when they had to choose between forfeiting one sort of support and forfeiting another, at a moment when so much was at stake, and the maximum support was so sorely needed. Lord Kitchener must not be too harshly blamed if he was not a statesman as well as a soldier. Of the politicians, both Carsonite and Sinn Fein, who involved the Government in such desperate dilemmas, and who seem to have been fishing on their own party's behalf in those troubled waters, the reader of this biography will have to judge, and the materials for such a judgment are before him. But the more carefully this record is read and studied, the deeper will be the reverence of all true men, both Irish and English, for the heroic figure of Redmond, greater in the high purpose which failed than even in those unforgettable services of a long political life which had succeeded. His follower and friend has erected a noble memorial to one who, like those of old, had to live and die in faith, not having received the promises.

HERBERT L. STEWART

Studies in Honor of Dr. Osler

CONTRIBUTIONS TO MEDICAL AND BIOLOGICAL RESEARCH. Dedicated to SIR WILLIAM OSLER, Bart. M.D., F.R.S., in honor of his Seventieth Birthday, July 12, 1919, by his pupils and co-workers. 2 vols. New York: Paul B. Hoeber.

SIR WILLIAM OSLER practised and taught his art in three countries and in four universities. He had pupils and he won friends everywhere. A miscellany offered in commemoration of the birthday of such a man could not well be less than the volumes before us: well printed, for he loved a well-made book; possessed of literary distinction, for he was himself a charming writer on a wide range of subjects, and at the time of his death president of the Classical Association, succeeding Professor Sir Gilbert Murray; and finally, though rigidly technical in parts, confining itself to no narrow view of the field of medicine. Osler's own range was as broad as humanity itself. Accordingly, of the hundred and fifty articles fully half deal with historical medicine, education, books, social problems, and the humanities.

"The Eye of the Burrowing Owl," by Dr. Casey Wood, arrests one by the title and the vivid color of the illustration—it—this glowing eye—reminds one of Mr. Butler's painting of the Solar Eclipse. The article is an interesting contribution to natural history as well as to comparative anatomy.

Dr. Charles Singer and Dorothea Singer of Oxford have also a fascinating color print of "A Miniature Ascribed to Mantegna." It depicts an operation by Cosmas and Damian, the patron saints of medicine. A patient wearing a look of placid enjoyment has just had his cancerous leg removed and replaced by the leg taken from a dead Moor. The approximation is perfect and the operation a success.

Here is a verse showing something of what Cosmas and Damian suffered:

Victi, torti, carcerati,
Crucifixi, lapidati,
Sagittati, cruciati,
Per tormenta varia:
Ignem, aquam transierunt,
Ferro mortem pertulerunt,
Dulce mori sic duxerunt
Pro coelesti gloria.

There are only six war articles, but these are authoritative and valuable.

The late Professor E. E. Southard has an article which is entitled "Prothymia; a Note on the Morale-Concept in Xenophon's Cyropedia." Dr. Southard bases his paper on a long and well-balanced discussion on the art of war between Cyrus and his father Cambyses. Prothymia is a word which Southard would suggest as indicating at least the morale situation in Xenophon's day. Xenophon was a master of morale, and he used definite behavioristic means to secure it. His prothymic procedures were enheart-ening, inspiriting measures within the domains of the emotions and the will. Southard was fond of neologisms, and he often made a good one.

Dr. Burton Holmes contributes a page devoted to a "Votum Medici" (The Doctor's Prayer). It begins with the difficult aspiration:

> Ut conata mea sine ratione lucrandi
> Aut perpendi perficiam.

It contains a sentiment which applies to all good citizens:

> Ut onus offici suspiciam potius, et muneribus
> Quae ad me atque ad homines pertineant
> Maxime perfungar quam mihi ipsi.

In another page Dr. Gerster pays homage to Osler through the medium of a stanza from the "Clouds" of Aristophanes. The quoted verse expresses in Greek, Latin, and English a wish that the mellow ripeness of genius and of cultured wisdom might produce more work from Sir William. It was not to be.

Sir Auckland Geddes, who earlier in life was a teacher of anatomy, during the war became Minister of Reconstruction, and has since been named British Ambassador at Washington, speaks with authority in his article on "Social Reconstruction and the Medical Profession."

> It seems to be a law that once Science is SCIENCE, the emotions of human betterment and of beauty are perverted. We have seen all that in Prussianized Germans, and it need not now be labored.
>
> The point that it is necessary to make most clear is this: In the world with which statesmanship has to deal, mass emotion is infinitely more powerful than accurate knowledge. It follows that those who play their part in democratic states must understand the human emotions, more especially the spiritual emotions of beauty, human betterment, and truth.

Dr. Fielding H. Garrison contributes an article on Physicians' Letters. The best known are, of course, those of Guy Patin. In modern times the quality of such letters has probably declined, but in the last century there were many interesting collections. Dr. Garrison quotes largely from a correspondence between Sir Lauder Brunton and the late Dr. John S. Billings.

Dr. Henry Barton Jacobs in an article on "Edward Jenner, a student of Medicine, as illustrated in his letters," has drawn a most interesting picture of the intimate life and varied scientific interests of a man who through his contribution to vaccination belongs to the world as well as to medicine.

Perhaps the most charming contribution in the volume is a proem written by Sir Clifford Albutt, the Regius Professor of Medicine at Cambridge University. His tactful and eloquent contribution to his colleague at Oxford reads the more impressively when we remember that Sir Clifford is a man over eighty years of age.

CHARLES L. DANA

Gardens and Garden Books

A LITTLE GARDEN THE YEAR ROUND. By Gardner Teall. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

TIME was when the last word in garden seductiveness was spoken by the seed catalogues. The text, forcing its way through a gigantic vegetation, miraculously contrived to suggest an even huger hugeness, profusion even more profuse, than was pictured by obese tomatoes (an elderly gentleman, still smiling, is bowed beneath the weight of two or three of them), fat-podded peas that have burst into a dentifricial smile, and roses that are easily to be distinguished from the cabbages by their color.

Times have undoubtedly changed. Catalogues of the older fashion continue to appear and people continue to buy from them, for the world has long since comfortably reconciled itself to the fact of dining off cauliflower less perfectly curded, lettuce not quite so close-packed, and onions less ambitious to emulate the great globe itself than the pictures hold forth promise of. And man still loves to stick flower seeds into the earth and sense the thrilling fact that some of them do indeed come up. But in the literature of the subject we demand a great deal more. We demand the gardening book. At any rate, we get it in abundance and often of very high quality.

The garden book does not picture flowers; it pictures gardens. It does not dangle before us the hope of bumper crops; it speaks, sometimes just a little cloyingly, of the spiritual satisfactions that come to one who is the genuine possessor of a garden. Such books—and the garden magazines, too—have played a large part in the change that has come over American gardens in the last quarter century. The rediscovery of the hardy perennials of our great-grandmothers, the establishment of firm structural relation between garden and house, the conversion of the central flower bed into borders, the massing of "spotty" shrubs and trees into richly gradated walls enclosing a little universe of open grass and open sky, and the intelligent use of garden furniture have combined to make the garden what it should be, a place where one lives out of doors, passing from room to room, each with its special purpose and its peculiar charm.

Mr. Teall's book is a good specimen of its kind. There is poetry for those who want it, and explicit and practical planting directions, and some good pictures. It is impossible not to feel a conviction that we are here moving along sound lines. Fashions in rock gardens, in pools, in trellises may change, but the elements with which the modern gardener composes are those which have stood the test of centuries. On only one point are books of this sort a trifle reticent—how the work of making and caring for the garden is to be done. One of them a few years ago let drop the secret somewhat in this way: Speaking of the desirability of marking certain plants to be kept for seed, the author, a lady, said "my maid keeps me supplied with boxes containing strips of different colored cloth." No doubt one of the under-gardeners tied them on for her as she directed. If, indeed, one did all the things these books lay out for the occupation of the ambitious gardener one would do little else. But it is not necessary, though it is a temptation hard to resist, to plan more nobly than one can realize with a single pair of hands and not too abundant leisure. The logic of the modern garden vindicates itself in that it may be reduced to the narrowest strip and still remain complete and satisfying.

The man who thinks he will not care for gardening, or who dreads to involve himself lest he should not be one of those—there are some—who succeed in recovering from the pleasant malady, must not at his peril open this book of Mr. Teall's and the others like it. Those who are gardeners already will run through it, as apparently they run through all the others, feeling amply rewarded when they get a single fresh suggestion.

New American Novels: The Individual Bobs Up

PETER KINDRED. By Robert Nathan. New York: Duffield and Company.
THIS SIDE OF PARADISE. By F. Scott Fitzgerald. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
THE CRESTING WAVE. By Edwin Bateman Morris. Philadelphia: The Penn Publishing Company.
FAIRFAX AND HIS PRIDE. By Marie Van Vorst. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company.
ORDER. By Claude C. Washburn. New York: Duffield and Company.
REVOLT, AN AMERICAN NOVEL. By William H. MacMasters. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company.
BERTRAM COPE'S YEAR. By Henry B. Fuller. Chicago: Ralph Fletcher Seymour.
MISS LULU BETT. By Zona Gale. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

LOOKING over a chance assortment of new novels, the latest American product, one may discover, rather unexpectedly, that most of them are frankly individualistic. With two shoulders to the war and one to peace (as such), and a careless elbow for humanitarian or proletarian millennia, they proceed earnestly with the old but not yet antiquated business of that Everyman upon whom, as far as he, according to his secret conviction, knows, the earth pivots and the stars focus their beams. They breathe the air of modernism, but it is primarily important as the air they have to breathe. They are full of youthful flutterings after theory and practice as abstract objects; but the main point is whether youth is gaining its own ends of self-discovery and "self-expression." Often they are the attempts of mature youth to express its own experiences to date, of the graduate to interpret a world still apparelled in undergraduate mystery. Andover and Lawrenceville, Harvard and Princeton (yes, yes, and Yale!) are being dealt with as minutely and as seriously as Harrow and Eton, Oxford and Cambridge by the younger novelists of England. It must be owned that young America writing novels owes much of its inspiration and its technique, or lack of it, to the example of young England. At all events, it is busy with the affair of its own self in its own home. From among the novels of the past year or so any diligent novel-reader will recall various books of the teens and the twenties by authors of a suitable age: such as "Peter Middleton," by Henry K. Marks; "The Groper," by Conrad Aiken; "The Iron City," by M. H. Hedges, and "Youth Goes Seeking," by Oscar Graeve. To these but now are added eager and brilliant improvisations (as they seem) like "Peter Kindred," by Robert Nathan; "This Side of Paradise," by F. Scott Fitzgerald, and "The Cresting Wave," by Edwin Bateman Morris.

All of them, needless to say, heroically eschew the official hero, the worthy or the all-conquering idol of the discredited past. They will to deal uncompromisingly not quite with the average young man or woman of our days, but, let us say, with that young man as he appears to himself and his females. Above all, let not firm or self-contained character be attributed to him. Let him be uncertain of impulse and infirm of purpose, open to the tempting lure of every sexual zephyr or intellectual cross-current. Give him "temperament," give him talent, let him be snob and cynic and poseur by turns, but in Heaven's name don't let him be sure of anything except his own mystical importance. So like you and me, if we would only admit it! . . . Notably this nearly average young man is parted from the average by his extraordinary hankering to write. If himself is nothing better than a series of moods or a catalogue of recognizable qualities, himself must still be "expressed," recorded, set down in black and white. He lisps in numbers, or their currently accepted equivalent. He proses faithfully, in the latest manner, when the innumerable numbers fail. Usually he writes a novel before we are done with him. No doubt writing men rightly write about writing youths, since there is a direct draft from experience. But it is a little hard on mere reading men, one may suspect. . . . What we sigh over, it may be, in these ingeniously ingenuous fables, is that they represent the average with variations, instead of embodying and sublimating and individualizing the average or the typical in the really creative manner. If you read half a dozen salad novels of this kind, full of talent and cleverness, and permit your mind to relax for a moment, and then try to see or hear one of their protagonists in fancy, you find available only a vague composite figure, ardent, sceptical, self-centred and elaborately commonplace.

So it is with "Peter Kindred." The boy is a tolerably nice boy, and he does and thinks and says the things a tolerably nice boy would. We do not deny that he is true to fact. But what of it? Who cares? Since the author has failed to make us care about him as a person? Well, there is the feminine reader, with her inexhaustible maternal instinct for making a swan of a goose; she can be counted on to do the author's work for him. And there are the actual nice boys, thousands of them, peopling their Harvards and their Princetons and perhaps eager to see how they look in print; but one doubts it. For them the romantic superman who breaks rocks with his fist, or the "wiseguy" who cracks the world's nut without the aid or handicap of a bachelor's degree. The young and too clever chronicle "This Side of Paradise" concerns a youth of more accredited brilliancy. Amory Blaine is the only son of an abnormal marriage, and "inherited from his mother every trait except the stray inexpressible few that made him worth while." He is born a snob, an egotist, and a philanderer. He takes his well-bred schooling at St. Regis and Princeton. He has various amours with others of lower degree. He finds himself fairly landed at last in the blind alley of disillusion. Even women—"women—of whom he had expected so much: whose beauty he had hoped to transmute into modes of art; whose unfathomable instincts, marvelously incoherent and inarticulate, he had thought to perpetuate in terms of experience—had become merely consecrations to their own posterity. Isabelle, Clara, Rosalind, Eleanor, were all removed by their very beauty, around which men had swarmed, from the possibility of contributing anything but a sick heart and a page of puzzled words to write." In brief, poor Amory is all dressed up, intellectually and æsthetically, with no place to go. And the brave lad has thrown up his job as copy-writer in an advertising agency. Now he turns his back (tentatively) on the worship of beauty and the pursuit of art, and inclines to be "a certain sort of man." It is true that he appears to be still quite at the mercy of his own language. He has a notion of turning radical in earnest, and he has also (at the same time) a vague leaning towards the Church as a refuge. Perhaps we do not quite share his author's vision of him as a new-made "personage"—as one who without at all knowing where he is going is at last discernibly on his way.

However, one marks with some pleasure that these new novels almost invariably end with the rising inflection. It is no longer the fashion to leave youth, at the end of a few chapters, wallowing helplessly in a quasi-Russian bog of "reality." If a man is a worm, let us at least see him lift his head towards the light. "The Cresting Wave" is built upon one of the very oldest of ideas or morals: namely, that it is better to be decent than successful, better to serve than to grasp. It is less chronicle and more fable than the stories mentioned above, the immortal fable of youth stretching out its hand without scruple towards wealth and pleasure, and finding them ashes in his palm. Perhaps my gratitude to young William Spade for neither trying to write a novel nor spouting free verse nor hanging about cafés and studios in search of "life" prejudices me unduly in his favor. He is a straightforward business boy who, having imbibed the current doctrine of "success," goes after it under the flexible rules of the game. In the end he is man enough to turn against this doctrine and the accompanying laxities which threaten to "make the name of America stand for misrepresentation and fraud and short-change methods throughout the world." And he swears allegiance to the older faith in which his father was bred, in the day when the clipper ships spread spendidly "the world-wide reputation of American thrift and fairness."

The Fairfax of "Fairfax and His Pride" is, alas, still another mighty genius, whose achievement we must take on faith. His pride is Southern and he brings it North with him to New York, where he has come to make his fortune. He aspires to enter the studio of the great Swedish sculptor Cedersholm. He forthwith produces offhand certain work which the great man promptly appropriates as his own. Thereupon Fairfax takes the road, becomes a railway engineer, marries an Irish waitress. Years later he resumes his career again under another name, wins fame, and at last is free to take to himself the little cousin Bella, the "honey-child" who has been aimed at him by the author from the first page. "His personality had not yet developed to the point where he was at peace. He knew that such peace could only come to him through the companionship of a woman." Lucky Bella. . . . "Order," by Claude C. Washburn, and "Revolt," by William H. Macmasters, are self-titled novels of ideas. The order at stake in the first-named story, however, is not the social or political but the moral order—convention, if you will. And the sadly reactionary idea appears to be that the convention of personal morality may not be a bad thing, after all—that, at all events, many persons actually base their happiness on its maintenance. A charming and predatory Englishman creates a flurry for a time in a certain elegant American suburb, plays havoc with more than one feminine temperament, but retires defeated by the quiet forces of order upon which, despite their will, life really rests for these women. "Revolt," interesting as a symptom, is a raw and energetic tract concerning the struggles of the American "people" against the machinations of the capitalists and their kept political parties; and the final triumph at the polls of the Presidential candidate of the new Revolutionist party which is to make America safe for all duly accredited "people." The narrative is sullied by no touch of characterization, that subtle differentiation of personalities which will no doubt be clearly recognized and condemned by proletarian critics as the trail of the capitalistic and individualistic serpent.

Meanwhile there remain artists, even in America, whose interest lies in the interpretation of life through character. By contrast with the confused ingenuity, the elaborate formlessness and inconclusiveness, or the thin didacticism which so often finds shelter under the charitable eaves of current fiction, two novels of the moment take on importance for that quaint person the "serious" reader. In a sense they are all foreground; no vast concerns of race or class or humanity crowd in upon their simplicity. Time and scene are then and there, not now and here—then when America remained at ease with herself and the world; there where, as it seems, the chronicler chanced to pass one day and to see vividly a bit of life so inconspicuous that we other passers might have glanced upon it without seeing it at all. If there were such a thing as photography in storytelling, we should not find it in "Bertram Cope's Year." Mr. H. B. Fuller's realism is the real thing; in seeming to register it interprets and portrays. Therefore your initial reservations as to Bertram Cope's importance or saliency as a subject may well have been forgotten if not consciously withdrawn when the full portrait is before you. He is a nice, clean boy of the midlands who not long after his respectable graduation returns to his old university for what turns out to be a single year's service as instructor. He has literary leanings, but we are not given to suppose that he has anything more than a mild talent for writing concealed in him, and are on the whole grateful that it remains concealed. He can sing pretty well, and has a kind of boyish freshness and energy which attract people. He is tolerably successful with his work and happy in it, but we are chiefly concerned with his extra-professional experiences. These are limited enough in range, and follow upon his being "taken up" by two rather wistful persons of middle age who crave contact with his invigorating youth. They begin as recognizable types of the customary university entourage, but we feel them clearly as persons before we are done with them. Randolph, the not quite elderly bachelor, a broker by calling, by avocation a collector of odds and ends, among them choice specimens of the priceless article Youth; Medora Phillips, the comfortably "left" widow, whose taste runs, more diffusively, in similar paths. They have a sort of rivalry for the intimacy of Bertram Cope. Both fail; and half-laughingly condole with each other when he has passed along casually, after his year at Churchton, to a new post in the "important university in the East" which is the natural next step forward in his modest career. For the rest, his year has produced blameless excursions and alarms in the field of young love, one of which, we gather, may lead to an actual encounter later on. A mild affair altogether whose sole and sufficient distinction lies in the delicate perfection of its setting forth.

The "Miss Lulu Bett" of Zona Gale is another firmly moulded novel of the shorter kind. In "Birth," its immediate predecessor, Miss Gale showed a surprising growth not only as "localist" but as ironic interpreter of character. This story is firmer in tone as well as more compact in form. It is a study of character in the light of a culminating episode. The situation of the spinster aunt who has become the household drudge and is more or less put upon by all the members of the family she serves is among the staples of Victorian fiction. Let us own that this is an American-Victorian family, with its action by no means necessarily in the past. Mr. Deacon, the tiresome paterfamilias, with his stale jests and his pompous authority, is familiar enough as a type. But Miss Gale lifts him away from the type by revealing the pathos of his limitations, and the slender but true vein of emotion that runs alongside his petty egotism and petty malice. To his sister-in-law he is pitiless, to his children and his wife he deals out indulgence or censure purely as his whim may determine. Yet there is a warm bond between him and the silly wife, and she is tenderly devoted to her cantankerous old mother as he is to the foster-mother to whom he "owes what he is": "In both these beings," says the chronicler with a kind of wonder, "there was something which functioned as pure love." But this does not help Miss Lulu Bett, with whom the story as narrative is concerned. Hers, submerged but indestructible, is the only strong character in the tale. It is for us to see it come to the surface, and, first vainly, then successfully grasp at a rescuing hand. A happy ending, which is, after all, no bar to any but the most "uncompromising" realism.

H. W. Boynton

The Tragic Years

Now It Can Be Told. By Philip Gibbs. New York: Harper and Brothers.

"Some day," we said, "the history of the war will be written; then we shall know the truth about these things." We said it in days of dark confusion, when we were trying to approximate truth by a blind process of averaging official reports from both sides with rumors and guesses, discounting the result to allow for overweening hope, and adding ten per cent. to offset sheer despair.

"Now It Can Be Told" says the title of Mr. Gibbs's book. "It" is the thing as he saw it, which can be told now with freedom from censorship, too soon perhaps for a true perspective, but not too late to put facts and impressions, emotions, reactions and reflections on record before they fade, "as a memorial of men's courage in tragic years." "The purpose of this book," says the author, "is to get deeper into the truth of this war and of all war—not by a more detailed narrative of events, but rather as the truth was revealed to the minds of men in many aspects, out of their experience; and by a plain statement of realities however painful, to add something to the world's knowledge by which men of good-will may try to shape . . . some new code of international morality, preventing or at least postponing another massacre of youth like that five years' sacrifice of boys of which I was a witness." "I have not painted the picture blacker than it was, nor selected gruesome morsels and joined them together to make a jig-saw puzzle for ghoulish delight. . . . I have tried to set down as many aspects of war's psychology as I could find in my remembrance of these years, without exaggeration or false emphasis, so that out of their confusion, even out of their contradiction, the real truth of the adventure might be seen as it touched the souls of men."

The things that touched the souls of men—and the things that did not, and the men who had no souls to touch—these are the material of the book. It is not a sensational tale of horror, though no painted horror could well surpass it. He who wants cold-blooded atrocities will not find them here; they are curtly dismissed as "not authenticated." Men's souls were raw to the touch throughout the four years of grinding horror in the trench and volcanic horror in battle; that of Mr. Gibbs at least did not become calloused, or subdued to what it worked in. The book moves on a current of sympathy which sometimes dims the glow of his heat against those who lack understanding. His heart is with the line; he can scarcely mention the staff save in words that bite, "elderly generals who liked their little stroll after lunch," "young Regular officers released from the painful necessity of dying for their country." Montreuil as occupied by G. H. Q. becomes the "City of Beautiful Nonsense." It takes General Sir John Harrington to reveal the science of war as "not always a fetish of elementary ideas raised to the nth degree of pomposity as I had been led to believe by other generals and staff officers." He dips his pen in acid to write of generals who compete with one another on paper in games that rot the souls of men in trenches, blow their bodies to bits and churn them into the mud, with no result but the score on the office records, of profiteers, of people of all sorts who express bloodthirsty sentiments and play safe at home, of "little ladies" in fancy dress uniforms or bare-backed at bazaars or dancing bare-legged "for the dear wounded." There are times when his feeling clearly belies his words. He depicts with all possible skill the ghastly tragic confusion at Loos, the fate of the 21st and 24th Divisions, and that of the Scots on Hill 70. He cites Lord French's own despatch to show that the plan and timing of the attack were directly responsible for the pitiful and useless slaughter, that Lord French was directly responsible for the plan and time-table. By that time it is too late for him to say:

> I do not blame Lord French. I have no right to blame him, as I am not a soldier nor a military expert. He did his best with the highest motives. The blunders he made were due to ignorance of modern battles. Many other generals made many other blunders, and our men paid with their lives. Our High Command had to learn by mistakes, by ghastly mistakes, repeated often, until they became visible to the military mind and were paid for again by the slaughter of British youth. A writing-man who was an observer and recorder like myself, does not sit in judgment. He has no right to judge.

Judgment it is none the less, and the reader who must take such things largely on authority finds confidence in it as he goes on. Clearly enough Mr. Gibbs is not that cold-blooded impossibility, "an impartial observer," but he has an effect of impartiality, perhaps the best sort, coming from the quickness and breadth of his sympathy embracing all suffering wherever he finds it. Against Heinie in the trench he has no more rancor than had Tommy in the trench; that he saves for those who fattened on the war. Withal he had almost unparalleled opportunity to see and judge. With imperfect knowledge and observation we may sometimes say of generalship as of divine providence, "Perhaps if we could see the whole we might see in this slaughter or that a justifying purpose." As often as not Mr. Gibbs shared the plan of battle with G. H. Q. before the first attack, and had full information as to what was to be done and why, and of what came of it at last he saw all that human eyes could see. He went through the whole; he was one of the first group of unchartered correspondents in civilian clothes who went over in the first weeks of the war, and was with the British forces steadily till the end beyond the Rhine. If his sympathies are such that you feel that you can not trust his judgment, at least you gather from his work material on which you may form a judgment of your own.

Americans will look in vain in the book for anything more than mention of their exploits, but it will be wholesome reading to any who think they "won the war." On President Wilson we have comment much like that of Mr. Keynes:

> President Wilson had raised new hope among many men who otherwise were hopeless. . . . His Fourteen Points set out clearly and squarely a just basis of peace. His advocacy of a League of Nations held out a vision of a new world. . . . Here at last was a leader of the world. . . . In the peace terms that followed there was little trace of those splendid ideas which had been proclaimed by President Wilson. On one point after another he weakened, and was beaten by the old militarism which sat enthroned in the council-chamber, with its foot on the neck of the enemy. The "self-determination of peoples" was a hollow phrase signifying nothing. Open covenants openly arrived at were mocked by the closed doors of the Conference. When at last the terms were published their merciless severity . . . which would lead as sure as the sun would rise to new warfare, staggered humanity.

The book is interesting from beginning to end; that is part of its quality as journalism, for journalism it is, though it needs not be ephemeral. The essence of the style is speed. In a passage of agonizing tension the author tells of writing his long newspaper despatches against time at the end of a wracking day at the front. This habit of speed has become chronic. The narrative rushes through a smother of words, lifts on a wave of emotion and races like a ship's engine. It has the effect of having been sent to the printer sheet by sheet without possibility of revision, and the reader wonders that the style can be so good as it is. Mr. Gibbs says things well; his fault is that he says them too often. Passages to the same effect as some of those here quoted could be quoted from almost every chapter. He says a good thing, forgets that he has said it, and says it again. Some of the repetition is clever emphasis that drives home the point while the speed saves the effect of boredom. If the book lasts it will be as a record of matters which properly belong to history, but with which history does not always deal. As such it would be much more valuable if it had an index.

Bulgarian Apologia

Balkan Problems and European Peace. By Noel Buxton and C. Leonard Leese. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Critics will find much to dispute in this presentation of the reasons which governed Bulgaria's entry into the war on the side of the Central Empires, and the treatment she ought to have received in order to prevent that unhappy event. Although this small book goes by a comprehensive name, which seeks to include all the Balkan peoples, it is essentially, if not frankly, interested only in Bulgaria. Its value depends on the light it sheds on Bulgarian aspirations rather than on any impartial discussion of new material.

The book's main argument is that Bulgaria could have been brought into the war on the side of the Allies by paying her price, and that the price she demanded was reasonable and just. With the first half of the thesis there can be no dispute. But leaving out of account the consequences of such "practical diplomacy" there is a fallacy in the second half of Mr. Buxton's proposition—the fallacy that Macedonia, Bulgaria's sine qua non, is predominantly and indisputably Bulgarian, and that there exists a clear ethnic and historic Bulgarian right to that province, a right which has been obscured through all latter history by the machinations of Greece and Serbia, carried on with the connivance of the great Powers. This is not a suitable occasion for arguing the subject at length, but it must be stated that the existence of such a right is not clear. It is not frivolous to remind Mr. Buxton that the inextricable conglomeration of many ingredients bearing the name macédoine was not so called without reason. Every established rule goes by the board in Macedonia. In a Macedonian family bearing a Bulgarian name, for example, one of the sons may be fighting in the Serbian and another in the Greek army; the father may once have been a Turkish agent and may still profess to be a follower of the Prophet; the son in the Serbian army may call himself a Vlach and belong to the Orthodox Church, while the Greek son may think he is an Albanian and a good Catholic.

Bulgaria was the earliest of the rival contestants to go into Macedonia with her propagandists. And she has had several special pleaders among British statesmen (most of the present generation of whom have at one time or other served a term at the Sofia Legation). Robert College at Constantinople, also, with its close Bulgarian ties, has the keen interest of many philanthropic and influential Americans; that M. Panaretoff, the Bulgarian Minister at Washington, was once a professor at Robert College proved a considerable factor in determining the American attitude toward his Government during the war. But that Bulgaria, as a possible ally, was clearly entitled to a big slice of the Macedonian territory of Serbia, already an ally and fighting the battle of the Allies alone, while British and French policy went blundering up and down the Balkans, is difficult to prove.

Part three of the volume begins with the following bald statement: "It is not forgotten that a political assassination committed in the cause of Greater Serbia was the spark which set Europe ablaze." This is one of those absolute statements which so often are wrong. The world will probably never know what the author here assumes we all know so well that he makes no effort to prove it. What forces really were behind the murder of Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo? What part was played in the tragedy by the Magyars, extravagant haters of the Archduke because of his opposition to Magyarization schemes in Croatia and Slavonia and his determination not to permit Magyar domination of the Government after he came to the throne? What part was played in it by the extreme imperialists of the Dual Monarchy (almost one might say of the Royal House), who greatly feared the Archduke's pet scheme of "Trialism," a proposal to federate Austria-Hungary and the Jugo-Slav provinces on a more or less equal footing? How largely was the murder part of an ill-advised and immature plot of Slav subjects of Austria-Hungary, how largely the work of irresponsible anarchists, how largely instigated by the war party in Germany, working through Vienna and Budapest? It is a profound and sinister mystery, not likely ever to be satisfactorily solved. If we assume the complicity of Austrian officials, certain extraordinary incidents connected with the lack of precautions taken to protect the Archduke in a town notorious as a centre of anti-Hapsburg feeling, the searching of the murdered man's pockets by the police, the hurried and unattended funeral, can be better understood; but nothing is certain. Probably the one agency we can absolve from suspicion is the Serbian Government itself, which was in a peculiarly bad situation to meet such a crisis, with a general election impending and on the eve of the consummation of important foreign negotiations. Serbia, indeed, stood not the remotest chance of profiting by such an event and was pathetically unprepared to meet the armies of a great power, as is evinced by her readiness to go all lengths save the sacrifice of independence itself in order to avoid the war in which she must inevitably be overwhelmed. M. Jonescu, the Rumanian ex-Premier, tells us in his "Personal Recollections" how violently the theory of Serbian instigation was propagated in London during the days when war was trembling in the balance, and the steps those who knew Vienna well had to take to counteract the effects of this Red Herring. In the last analysis it can only be repeated that nothing is certain—least of all anything to warrant a generalization with such distinct implications as that which Mr. Buxton takes for granted we all will swallow.

Hamilton Fish Armstrong

A New Brand of Modernism

Outspoken Essays. By William Ralph Inge, Dean of St. Paul's. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

THE Dean of St. Paul's describes his new volume of essays as "outspoken," and the word is none too strong. Here is a voice from perhaps the most influential pulpit of the Anglican Church calmly rejecting the virgin-birth and the resurrection of Christ, translating the hope of immortality into some metaphysical conception of an impersonal "eternity," and deprecating the continuance of the Church as an institution—it is indeed outspoken. But frankly avowed as are these negative views, they are introduced rather as obiter dicta. Dean Inge has also a positive message, for which he prepares the way by showing the inadequacy of the principal modern movements in the Church; and whatever may be thought of his scepticism and of his own attempt to rise through doubt to a position of inexpugnable faith, his destructive analysis of the various other attempts of the sort is the work of a master hand. The religious papers in this volume—of the sociological group we shall say nothing—display what is rare in contemporary English literature, a highly trained philosopher in the pulpit.

The exposition begins with Bishop Gore (probably the most generally esteemed of the orthodox Anglical theologians) and his theory of a Catholic Church which yet shuts itself off from communion with half the Christian world by its repudiation of the authority of Rome, and which looks for a new empire over the masses by courting disestablishment and flirting with socialism. "The Church of England," Dean Inge observes, "has been freely accused of too great complaisance to the powers that be, when these powers were oligarchic. Some of the clergy are now trying to repeat, rather than redress, this error, by an obsequious attitude to King Working-man. But the Church ought to be equally proof against the vultus instantis tyranni and the civium ardor prava jubentium. The position of a Church which should sell itself to the Labor party would be truly ignominious. It would be used so long as the politicians of the party needed moral support and eloquent advocacy, and spurned as soon as its services were no longer necessary."

To Dean Inge at least the foundation of reform, if the Church is to be made alive again, must be laid deeper than Bishop Gore's plea for humanitarian institutionalism; it must go down till it reaches the rock of philosophic belief. The Dean is a modernist, but not of the school of Loisy and Tyrrell and the others who have usurped the name. His attempt to get below the doubts now troubling religious faith begins with a criticism, sympathetic but unsparing, of Cardinal Newman, whom he regards, justly, as the father of the whole modernist movement. "Newman," he says, "was only half a Catholic. He accepted with all the fervor of a neophyte the principle of submission to Holy Church. But in place of the official intellectualist apologetic, which an Englishman may study to great advantage in the remarkably able series of manuals issued by the Jesuits of Stonyhurst, he substituted a philosophy of experience which is certainly not Catholic. . . . To deny the validity of reasoning upon Divine things is to withdraw one of the supports on which Catholicism rests. . . . For Newman, as for his disciples the Modernists, theological terms are only symbols for varying values, and he holds that the moment they are treated as having any fixed connotation, error begins. It is no wonder if learned Catholics thought that Newman did not play the game." Dean Inge does not mean to impugn Newman's sincerity or to deny the depth and reality of Newman's faith; his point is rather that Newman, by rejecting the orthodox rationalism of the Catholic theology and introducing in its place a symbolical pragmatism, was opening the door to a kind of double-faced scepticism from which he himself would have shrunk back in detestation. "It is one thing to admit that dogmas in many cases have a pragmatic origin, and quite another to say that they may be invented or rejected with a pragmatic purpose. The healthy human intellect will never believe that the same proposition may be true for faith and untrue in fact; but this is the Modernist contention."

What is meant by rejecting or inventing dogma with a pragmatic purpose Dean Inge expounds at length in the essay on "Roman Catholic Modernism." Thus, according to M. Le Roy, one of the ablest apologists of the movement, the dogma "God is our Father" does not state an objective fact or offer a rationally comprehensible definition, but signifies that we are to behave to God as sons behave to a father. "Jesus is risen" means simply that we are to think of him and act as if he were living amongst us. The dogma of the Real Presence implies that we ought to have the same

(Continued on page 398)

CROCKER-WHEELER-MOTORS

"Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power"

The Choice of Experts

The experienced engineer and manufacturer refuse to speculate with untried equipment. They pin their faith to Crocker-Wheeler Motors because the endurance, reliability and economy of these motors have been tested by time.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

IRELAND THE OUTPOST

By GRENVILLE A. J. COLE Net $2.50

This essay pictures Ireland in the new light of an outpost not only of England but also of Europe, which has been profoundly influenced by the successive and overlapping waves from which her people and civilization have been drawn.

MOSLEM ARCHITECTURE

Its Origins and Development

By G. T. RIVOIRA Net $21.00

An original work of the greatest value describing the development of the Mosque, and illustrated with a remarkable series of 158 plates.

MODERN CHINA

By S. G. CHENG Net $3.25

A valuable and timely volume throwing a clear light on the chief problems of modern China, with constructive suggestions for their solution. The discussion is notably free from political bias and deserves the close attention of all interested in Chinese matters.

DIPLOMACY AND THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By D. P. HEATLEY Net $3.75

An attempt to portray diplomacy and the conduct of foreign policy from the standpoint of history. In the history of diplomacy we see the fruit of each age in treaties which express the movements of thought and mark the development of conventions that are widely recognized.

At all Booksellers, or from the Publishers.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

AMERICAN BRANCH

35 West 32d St., New York

THE PEACE TREATY

IN THE PRESENT CRISIS EVERY AMERICAN SHOULD KNOW WHAT IS IN THE PEACE TREATY AND WHY IT IS THERE.

An Introduction to the Peace Treaties

By ARTHUR PEARSON SCOTT, the University of Chicago, gives valuable information regarding the causes of the war, the aims of the belligerents, the peace proposals, and the framing of the Treaty of Peace. It is also a comprehensive explanation of the League of Nations and the location of new national boundaries. Illustrated. Ready May 15. $2.00; postpaid, $2.15.

OTHER BOOKS

A Short History of Belgium

By LEON VAN DER ESSEN, of the University of Louvain. $1.50; postpaid, $1.60. It is a fascinating and authoritative account of the past of this country from 57 B.C. to the end of the Great War.

The Religions of the World. (Revised Edition)

By GEORGE A. BARTON. $2.00; postpaid, $2.15. The author gives a keen and sympathetic interpretation of all the great religions, as well as such facts concerning their origin and history as one must have in order to interpret them.

The New Orthodoxy

By EDWARD S. AMES. $1.00; postpaid, $1.10. Every person dissatisfied with the scholastic faith of traditional Protestantism will find this volume exceedingly helpful.

The Problem of Democracy

Edited by SCOTT W. BEDFORD. Vol. XIV. Papers and Proceedings of the American Sociological Society. 230 pages, royal 8vo, paper; $1.50; postpaid, $1.65. Timely papers and interesting discussions of this important subject.

The Relation between Religion and Science: A Biological Approach

By ANGUS S. WOODBURNE. Paper; 75 cents; postpaid, 85 cents. The author has shown that religion and science may exist side by side in cordial relationships where the specific functions of each are recognized.

A Manual for Writers

By JOHN M. MANLY, University of Chicago, and John A. Powell. $1.50; postpaid, $1.65. A book designed to aid all who are concerned with the writing of good English.

The University of Chicago Press
5786 Ellis Avenue, Chicago, Illinois

(Continued from page 396)

feelings before the consecrated Host which we should have if Christ were really present before us. "The same treatment of dogma," Dean Inge adds, "is advocated in Mr. Tyrrell's very able book 'Lex Orandi.' The test of truth for a dogma is not its correspondence with phenomenal fact, but its 'prayer-value.'" That is to say, modernism is a transference to religion of the als-ob, "as-if," development of Kant's metaphysic; having no knowledge of truth or means of acquiring truth, we are nevertheless to act as if certain things were true. "Let the dogmas be interpreted in this way," exclaims M. Le Roy, "and no one will dispute them." Naturally! But such a form of pragmatic assent is merely a parasitic growth on the faith of genuine believers, and can have no power over the conduct of men so soon as the genuine faith from which it draws its vigor is dead. As Dean Inge says, "the crisis of faith can not be dealt with by establishing a modus vivendi between scepticism and superstition."

We have not the space to set forth Dean Inge's substitute for a feeble and intrinsically insincere pragmatism. In brief his plan embraces two recommendations. First, for the institutional Church he would propose a religion of personal mysticism, and would do away with the creeds and confessions and rely on the immediate sense of spiritual values in the soul. That may sound well and may seem to offer an escape at once from orthodoxy and pragmatism; but apart from the extraordinary spectacle of a man in Dean Inge's position advocating the suppression of institutions, it is clear that such a scheme ignores the great and wholesome restraints which flow from tradition and solidarity; an institution may become a prison-house of the spirit, but a pure individualism makes demands on human nature far beyond its strength and must end in spiritual distraction and moral license. Dean Inge's other recommendation would seem to admit as much, by offering the suggestion—we do not know how seriously he means it to be taken—of a new institution, or at least association, of a kind and a new creed of a kind. The reader who is curious to learn the full regula of this "league for mutual protection" of the spiritually minded against a debased and materialistic civilization will find it on page twenty-eight. Here it is sufficient to note the religious basis of the society. This "will be a blend of Christian Platonism and Christian Stoicism, since it must be founded on that faith in absolute values which is common to Christianity and Platonism, with that sturdy defiance of tyranny and popular folly which was the strength of Stoicism."

Dean Inge has written a remarkable book, and his conclusions are more practicable than they may seem to be in our abridgment.

The Masquerade

MASKERADE. Door Jo van Ammers-Küller. Amsterdam: N. G. van Kampen.

IT is a long-established custom among the students of the Dutch universities to celebrate, once in five years, the anniversary of their Alma Mater with an historical pageant, a so-called masquerade. The title of Mrs. Jo van Ammers-Küller's latest novel must be understood in that sense of the word, so far as the first of its three parts is concerned. This centres upon the students' historical pageant and the various festivities that are attendant on it. But in the background of this gay, light-hearted gala the author has painted a darker scene of intrigues and hungering desires, the cruel reality behind the bright show of gaiety and pomp. Thus the title acquires a second meaning: not only the costumes of a bygone age make this life in a university town a masquerade, but also the outward demeanor of those who move in it, worn as a mask to hide the inner life of the soul.

There is Mrs. Van Ravensberg, the cool and stately professor's wife, who taxes all her mental and financial powers for the attainment of the one great aim, the betrothal of her daughters to wealthy, aristocratic students. There is the student, Fritz van Warmelo, who plays a cruel, deceitful game with her eldest daughter Hanny. These two are the most typical actors in the great society play of hypocrisy, where behind the mask of amiable faces lives the fierce desire for money and sensual pleasure. The students gratify the lusts of the body in riotous nights with venal women. Tine, the youngest of the professor's daughters, the heroine of the story, has, at one time, had a glimpse of that other life of the male, at a fair, in a merry-go-round, where a girl friend belonging to a less respectable class of people had taken her one evening. And when all those men, so distinguished and well-mannered, sit conversing at the dinner party arranged by her mother with diplomatic intentions, Tine realizes as an obsession, behind the attractive outward show, the dark inner life which every one of them so cautiously conceals.

With great talent and mastery of language the author suggests to her readers how this constant dissembling strains the relations between the two sexes, how Tine, the warm and simple-hearted girl, is stunned by it and how her passion for the one strong man who irresistibly attracted her suddenly fails her at the very moment when he whom she has once happened to see with "one of those

The New York University Press

The Ground and Goal of Human Life

By CHARLES GRAY SHAW, Ph.D., Professor of Ethics in New York University

Cloth, xii+594 pages. Price, $3.50

An attempt by means of Individualism to elaborate a super-scientific and super-social view of human life.

"The book bears throughout the evidence of Professor Shaw's forceful individuality, and will certainly have a distinct field of usefulness."—Prof. W. E. Hocking, Harvard.

"Full of erudite reasoning and cogent thought."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"In the background, Professor Shaw presents a rich landscape of literary experience."—The Dial.

"A valuable work, and in the right direction, teaching good, sound doctrine much needed today."—Prof. W. H. Sheldon, Dartmouth.

Values, Immediate and Contributory, and Their Interrelation

By MAURICE PICARD, Ph.D., lecturer in Philosophy in Barnard College. In press.

This book purposes to discuss, in a fresh, empirical, and concrete manner, two great classes of values. Its premises are grounded in biological and psychological data, rather than in transcendental and metaphysical pre-suppositions. The origin, the development, and the co-existence of values are successively treated. There is an interesting discussion of the possible value of false judgments. Altogether, the book lays a solid foundation for research in several new fields of philosophical investigation.

Efficient Composition: A College Rhetoric

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Ph.D., Professor of English in New York University.

Cloth. xviii+518 pages. Price, $2.50

A thought-provoking textbook for the advanced student of rhetoric, with more than one substantial contribution to the philosophy of composition; yet so clear in structure that none can fail to follow; so human in detail that freshmen have been known to read more than the assignment.

The Evolution of Industrial Freedom in Prussia, 1845-1849

By HUGO C. M. WENDEL, Ph.D., Instructor in History in New York University. In preparation.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS

32 Waverly Place New York City

women" confesses his love for her. Henceforth her life is a constant failure, a suffering from lack of mental balance, for which she finds only a partial cure in a marriage contracted at the cost of a compromise with her feelings. The lyrical element is uppermost in the suggestive portrayal of Tine's tragic figure. The descriptions of the house and garden of the Van Ravensbergs, where Tine has her still fight of the soul with life's cruelty, are touched with the pathos of autobiographic reminiscence. In Tine the author has revealed herself. This tendency towards self-portrayal and lyrical effusion, though the source of many beauties in detail, has warped the book as a whole. In the first part the composition is faultless, and to it the title in both its real and symbolic meaning is fully applicable. But the author, once engrossed in the analysis of her own self, continues, in the two following parts, the psychological study of Tine's tortured soul in a multitude of details, often, indeed, suggestive and interesting, but out of all proportion to the introductory volume, in which not Tine alone, but a great many other women and men were introduced as representative figures of that life of pretense which the author, as her title shows, intends to portray as a masquerade. The author, by gradually concentrating her interest on the nervous suffering of Tine, makes the reader lose sight of the vivid scene in which she was to be the most pathetic figure. Not Tine in the scene but the scene itself should have remained the centre of interest, and the harmony of the whole is disturbed by this growing prominence of the heroine which hides the scene from our sight.

The book, though far from faultless in its composition, deserves to be introduced to a wider circle of readers than the limited range of its language permits. Foreigners will take a special interest in it because of the typical Dutch milieus with which it makes them acquainted. They are described with delicate feeling and sympathy for the peculiar poetry of Dutch surroundings, which, small though they are, form a part of this wide world, and in which the same great human passions, to which the Hollanders, of course, react in their peculiar way, are the rulers of life and the begetters of its sorrows and its joys.

J. L. WALCH

The Hague

(Continued on page 400)

THE REVIEW'S EDUCATIONAL SECTION IS A BI-WEEKLY FEATURE.

James Shirley, Dramatist: A Biographical and Critical Study

By ARTHUR HUNTINGTON NASON, Professor of English in New York University.

Among the dramatists of the reign of Charles the First, James Shirley stands pre-eminent: the last of the Elizabethans, the prophet of the Restoration. Born in the spacious times of great Elizabeth, in the very year in which Raleigh and Lord Howard of Effingham took and sacked Cadiz; schoolboy, university man, and teacher, in the reign of James the First; favorite dramatist of the court of Charles, friend of the King and champion of the Queen; follower of the Duke of Newcastle in the Civil War; and then, through the Protectorate and the first six years of the reign of Charles the Second, schoolmaster again and miscellaneous writer: James Shirley, in the course of three score years and ten, embodied in himself as man and dramatist, something of the chivalric spirit of the Elizabethans, something of the impetuous loyalty of the Cavaliers, something of the fine patience of the great poet of the Puritans.

In this study of the life and works of Shirely, the endeavor is threefold: first to examine the little that we know of Shirley's life, to determine, fact by fact, the value of the evidence, and, on a basis of this critical examination, to construct a chronology more accurate than has been hitherto available; second on a basis of this revised chronology, to restudy the dramatic works of Shirley, in order to determine, if possible, the course of his development as a dramatist; and, third, from this same examination of the plays, to determine the distinctive characteristics of his dramatic works. The result is a new and most interesting picture of this the principal dramatic poet of the reign of Charles I.

Cloth. xvi+472 pages. Choicely illustrated. Price, $5.00.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS

(Selling Agents)

32 Waverly Place New York City

The Run of the Shelves

THERE are greater achievements doubtless in the world of drama than Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy's "Army with Banners" (B. W. Huebsch), but one doubts if there are greater exploits. It blends incongruities and actualizes fantasies in a manner that allows no rest and sets no bound to admiration. Written in 1917, it was produced April 9, 1918, in New York City at the Theatre du Vieux Colombier. As a play it is far from exemplary. It is long and its action is naught, and the culmination, arriving finally at the end of five dilatory acts, has the effect of being prostrated by the fatigues of its journey. Some of the characters speak in a double diction which from moment to moment is enriched or impoverished. The play is mediæval in setting, quasi-modern in manners, and millennial in its purport. There are seven characters, of whom five are earthworms and two are saints; one of the saints is whimsically meek and one is piously mischievous. About three-fourths of the play consists of the raw dialogue of low characters; the rest is in a fashion apocalyptic. How are these things to be reconciled? By overcharging the naturalism till it becomes in its turn a form of extravagance and by turning the idealism into whimsicality by the insertion of quirks and crotchets; after which the whimsicality and extravagance join hands. The savor of reality in a play which flouts the probabilities at every turn, the savor of delicacy in a play which fairly tramples the refinements under foot, are things that make one rather proud of Mr. Kennedy. The play closes with the coming of the Lord in a burst of sunshine and heavenly music. But its possession of a religious bottom may be questioned. Its saints are quite as much elves as saints. The Christianity which it rebukes is sour and formal and lying and greedy beyond a doubt, but the Christianity which it praises is capering and audacious and a little mocking and condescending. Admitting that the caterpillars can not save us, we may yet be oversanguine in the hope of salvation from the butterflies; 1917 demanded other helpers.

Miss Flora Klickmann, of London, whose "Lore of the Pen" is offered to the American public by G. P. Putnam's Sons, is an editor who undertakes the tutorship of the immature and uninformed contributor. Miss Klickmann's experience has made her keenly sensitive to the follies of aspirants; it has apparently left her without any proper sense of the general folly of aspiration. It is very hard to conceive that the grade of intelligence to which her instructions are addressed could turn those instructions to the profit of successful authorship. The groundless confidence in himself with which the raw contributor begins is often succeeded by an equally groundless confidence in the efficacy of teachers, and the book, which will almost certainly prosper, will prosper in too many cases by the extraction of cherished dollars from the meagre purses of persons whom its counsels can not help. It is quite true that people capable of writing books that sell sometimes display elementary ignorance. Miss Klickmann, for instance, in the second sentence of her preface, and therefore the second of her book, employs the solecism "as though the difference . . . is" and the tautology "newspaper journalism." But while it is true that in this topsy-turvy world the learned are often uninformed and the gifted often incompetent, one feels that one should reckon on their powers even when one is coping with their aberrations. Miss Klickmann's work is adapted not only to people without knoweledge but to people without brains. There is an iteration of the familiar, an elaboration of the simple, an elucidation of the clear, which hardly agrees with Miss Klickmann's own picture of a "nervous, hurrying age" in which sentences and articles must be "sped up." It is curious that an age so hurried should find time for so many repetitions.

Miss Klickmann is zealous for training and presses very hard the familiar and favorite analogies between the untrained writer and the untrained violinist or dressmaker. Now there is some truth, but more fallacy, in these comparisons. The equipment of a strong writer divides itself into three parts. There is, first, the part he shares with other educated people, a very large element, since his instrument, language, unlike the violin, is everybody's instrument used daily and hourly in every species of transaction. There is, secondly, the part, often the large part, which even his fellow-craftsmen do not share, the part which rests on his peculiarities as an individual. There is lastly, between the other two, and reduced to a narrow strip by the encroachments of its neighbors on either side, the third part, shared with his fellow-artists, but not shared with the educated public. The slightness of thin residue is sufficiently revealed in the meagreness and indigence of almost all the pompous textbooks on the vaunted art of composition. The thinness of Miss Klickmann's own teaching lends more color to the novice's cheerful supposition that anybody can write than to her confident assumption that teaching is indispensable. Both notions are exaggerations, but the point to be made here is that the relation of the tyro to the adept in literature is not the relation between the novice and expert in shoemaking, breadmaking, or carpentry. In literature, even where the difference in capacity is far greater, the difference in training is far less. So small is the latter difference that talent is often evinced in the anticipation by instinct of the very methods which practice and theory laboriously drill—or laboriously fail to drill—into the unpliant and unfurnished mind. Teaching of composition is a pitiful thing. Tolstoi was a shoemaker and a man of letters; it is far harder to write good books than to make good shoes: yet Tolstoi would have been ashamed to teach shoemaking in the fashion in which he would have been obliged to teach writing.

"The Opium Monopoly" (Macmillan) is the title of a little book by Miss Ellen H. La Motte in which facts and figures are given to show the extent to which the British Government is directly responsible for the production, sale, and distribution of nearly all of the world's supply of opium. In British India the growing of the poppy plant is officially encouraged by the Government; the manufacture of opium from its juice is a Government monopoly; and the drug is disposed of by monthly sales to the highest bidders. The largest purchasers at these sales are the Japanese who, while strictly controlling the use of opium within their own islands, introduce it into Korea and smuggle it in very large quantities into China through the ports of Dairin and Tsingtao, which they control. In the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States more than fifty per cent. of the public revenue is obtained from the traffic in opium; in Hong Kong one-third. In British India itself something over $15,000,000 is annually derived directly from this trade; and this does not include the "excises" on drugs and liquors, which in 1915-1916 amounted to some $50,000,000. Since 1917 Great Britain has permitted China wholly to exclude Indian opium from its markets, but in the "Settlements" and "Concessions" at the various treaty ports opium divans and drug shops licensed by the foreign Powers continue to supply the drug to those who wish to use it. Miss La Motte's book is intended as a severe indictment of Great Britain's policy with regard to opium. Her account would, however, be a fairer one if consideration were given to the British side of the case as presented, for example, by Sir John Strachey in his "India: Its Administration and Progress."

Probably the introduction for most of us to "mio Cid" was made through Southey's "Chronicle of the Cid," which melted into an indistinguishable mass the "Cronica," the "Poema," and the "Romances." From it little idea of the Poema could be gained, although Southey, it is true, printed in an appendix some really wonderful scraps of translation by John Hookham Frere, an earlier Fitzgerald remembered now especially for his then and since unapproached renderings of Aristophanes. Into such a perilous adventure R. Selden Rose and Leonard Bacon have now entered with the "Lay of the Cid translated into English Verse" (University of California Press) one of the semi-centennial publications of that university. The metre, "warts and all," is that of the original, but it would have been well if the translators could have found, as Spanish editors have done and as Hookham Frere did, some way of marking the cæsura. The translation is left to speak for itself without notes of any kind, and the short introduction, half historical, half literary, has almost as little bottoming; there is not a word on the text; there are two words on the date, and the inquisitive reader is left with almost no clues to further information. He may well wonder who is the Pidal casually mentioned on p. xii, and he should know, if only for his wonder and gratitude, that the "Poema," like "Aucassin et Nicolette" and Catullus, is one of the miraculous survivals through a single MS. from the older world. He will probably know himself that the remark about the Cid, quoted on p. xiv, was not made by Don Quixote, but by the Canon (Don Quixote, Parte I, Cap. xlix). All the wisdom in that wisest of Spanish books was not that of the Knight. But, all such things having been said, the translation is a solid piece of work and to be received with gratitude.

FRENCH NOTES

After an interval of two years the sale of the late Jules Claretie's library, which he was over a half century in collecting, was concluded last month in Paris. The catalogue for this sixth section of the library listed 283 volumes devoted to poetry and 768 to the theatre. Many volumes on these subjects were disposed of at the earlier sales. A large number of the plays were enhanced in value by envois d'auteur and by inserted autograph letters.

A recent number of the Revue des Deux Mondes contains an article by Professor Gustave Lanson on Lamartine, apropos of the centennial of his "Méditations," where the name Elvire appears frequently as that of the poet's inamorata. When this collection of elegies and lyrics first appeared, it was taken for granted by the more sentimental readers that there was of course but one Elvire. But M. Lanson shows that there were not less than four women who

(Continued on page 402)

DYNAMIC SYMMETRY: THE GREEK VASE

By JAY HAMBIDGE
Editor of "The Diagonal."

An explanation of the fundamentals behind active symmetry in design. Fully illustrated.

"The rapid spread of the system of Dynamic Symmetry will lay the foundation of our artistic salvation."
WALTER G. RAFFE.

Cloth, $5.00

HELMETS AND BODY ARMOR IN MODERN WARFARE

By BASHFORD DEAN
Curator of the Armor Collection of the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art.

The first authoritative account of the important part played by armor in the World War. This volume, with its many unusual and striking illustrations, is published by permission of the United States War Department.

Cloth, $6.00

A GRAY DREAM
AND OTHER STORIES OF NEW ENGLAND LIFE

By LAURA WOLCOTT

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said of Laura Wolcott's work that it was the "best since Hawthorne." The sketches in this book are chiefly of New England life in the thirties and forties, a stern enough time, but lightened up by the author's quiet humor and kindly observation. Lovers of New England will find here the same charm and atmosphere that is theirs in Cranford and Old Chester.

Cloth, $2.25

Spring List of selected titles sent on request.

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS

143 Elm St., New Haven, Conn. 19 East 47th St., New York City

(Continued from page 401)
touched the heart of the sensitive poet. M. Paul Souday's commentary is that Lamartine loved more than once; but this does not mean that he did not love profoundly." But M. Lanson lets it be seen that he thinks it would have been better, at least from the poetic standpoint, if there had been but one Elvire.

Comœdia, the Paris theatrical daily, states in a recent number that when the Théâtre Français produced Victor Hugo's "Hernani," after a long interruption, a curious incident occurred. It will be remembered that at the end of the fourth act the group of soldiers, conspirators, and nobles acclaim the new emperor with "Hurrah for Germany!" But at the dress-rehearsal two of the actor-conspirators refused to give this shout, whereupon the director and some of the older players tried to get this ultra-patriotic twain "to follow the text"; but in vain, especially as this same theatre at a recent revival of "Ruy Blas" substituted, at the end of a verse, campagne for Allemagne, and had Queen Maria of Neuburg say, instead of "Pas un livre allemand," which, by the way, was not very complimentary to Spain and her literature.

Pas un livre amusant, tout en langue espagnole,

In the Temps for March 5 and the Revue Contemporaine for February, M. Paul Souday and M. André Thérive differ as to whether Sainte-Beuve and Renan were on really friendly terms. The former pronounces their friendship "touching and lasting," whereas the latter contests this assertion and speaks of "the feline duplicity of the hermit of Montparnasse." In the Minerve Française of last October M. Thérive treated the same subject. It seems to us that M. Souday comes off second best in the argument.

On March 30 was celebrated at Paris the tenth anniversary of the death of the French poet, Jean Moréas, and the Revue Critique and the Minerve Française devote special numbers to his memory. Though the publishing department of the Mercure de France has issued not less than eight volumes of his—short stories, essays, plays and poems—there still remains among his papers enough finished material to fill two or three additional volumes, which his literary executor, M. Raymond de la Tailhède, has promised to bring out.

A peculiarly interesting man has just disappeared from the scientific world of Paris. M. Marcel Dieulafoy was a civil engineer, a lieutenant-colonel, a member of the Institute, and a traveler, whose explorations in Persia brought about the discovery of the palaces of Darius and Artaxerxes, the bas-reliefs of which form part of his celebrated Asiatic archæological collection in the Louvre. In this last work he was ably seconded by his wife, who always wore male attire. The tall, slim husband and the rather squatty wife, both neatly attired in their Prince Alberts, gloved and topped with silk hats, were well-known figures in the Passy quarter of Paris, Mme. Dieulafoy always awakening the often indiscreet curiosity of the passers-by who could not exactly make out "the queer little gentleman."

Last August the President of China informed the University of Paris that the Pekin Government would contribute annually 20,000 francs for the establishment at the Sorbonne of a department of Chinese studies, and last month the French Government announced that it would contribute a like sum. President Deschanel is the patron of the new department, which opens with three courses of lectures—the History of Chinese Civilization, the Applied Sciences in China, and Chinese Painting, Music, and Poetry.

During the war the American Library Association organized a fine book service for furnishing reading matter to our Expeditionary Forces in Europe. Its headquarters were in the spacious mansion in the Rue de l'Elysée, formerly occupied by the Papal Nuncio, overlooking the gardens of the Elysée Palace, the White House of France. In this connection Mr. Herbert Putnam, the Librarian of Congress, who was the principal agent in bringing this about, wrote us recently:

> The library is remaining at the Rue de l'Elysée. The American Library Association has undertaken to maintain it during the present year and residents of Paris, that is to say especially members of the American and British "colonies," have organized a Committee and subscribed nearly 200,000 francs towards a further maintenance. An arrangement has been, or is being, effected between this Committee and the authorities of the American Library Association, which will insure not merely the maintenance, but the development of the collection and suitable professional administration of it. The interest of the American Library Association is something more than in a library for local use; it is in a bureau of information available to any inquirer from any part of Europe, upon American library methods, and the promotion of the knowledge of American institutions and affairs, in addition to such service as may be rendered to American commissions that may be operating in Europe in relief, commercial and educational undertakings. Mr. Burton E. Stevenson, head of the Chillicothe, Ohio, library, who so efficiently managed the Paris enterprise during the war, is returning, leaving in temporary charge Mr. Henry O. Severance, librarian of the University of Missouri. The general direction of the administration still remains on this side; not with me, however, for I withdrew from the War Service last October; but with Mr. Carl H. Milam, until recently head of the public library at Birmingham, Alabama, who succeeded me with the residue of the work.

Books That Appear in the Spring

An amiable critic of current literature has complained that the satirists are all poking fun at the "new" things, at the vers libristes, the futurists, the expounders of the soviet. This is most unfair, he thinks; the province of satire is to ridicule things as they are, the worn-out systems of the past. He might have a hard time to prove it—satirists have a fashion of tilting now at the new, and now at the old, and when either side complains, or whines "We don't object to the ridicule, but to the manner of it," that side is confessing the weakness of its position. When we are permitted to select the weapons of our enemy we have him beaten at the start. If the radicals in literature, in painting, and sculpture, or in politics, can not survive laughter, they may as well begin to shout "Kamerad!"

Is it because what they call radicalism is so often merely a campaign towards the triumph of a school? If I were invited to choose between drinking absinthe with M. Gauguin, Miss Amy Lowell, and Mr. Max Eastman, or taking a dish of tea with Sir Edwin Landseer, Miss Felicia Hemans, and George III, I should be hard put to it, the company would be so delightful at either table. Absinthe, although it sounds wicked, is as insipid to me as tea. But I might expect to hear as much liberalism, as much sympathy with freedom and democracy, in one place as the other. M. Gauguin's friends tell me that Heaven didn't know everything when it made man somewhat thinner in the ankle than the thigh, but that they have changed all that. Miss Lowell's admirers call my attention to the fact that a white beard on the chin of Longfellow is the sign of toryism and reaction; attached to Walt Whitman it means democracy and progress. And Mr. Eastman, growing eloquent against tyrants who wear golden crowns or plug hats, wishes to commend me to one who wears a greasy cap.

George Ade is one of the satirists complained about, and Heywood Broun is the plaintiff. Both of them have books in the spring lists. Mr. Ade's "Hand-Made Fables" (Doubleday) is a bit more mellow, a trifle more ponderous, than in the days (1899!) when his first fables were published. But he is still telling the truth, to the discomfort of pretense and humbug. When I listen to readings of Rabindranath Tagore I am still reminded of Mr. Ade's preacher who quoted the great Persian theologian Ramtazuk, "that the Soul in its reaching out after the Unknowable was guided by the Spiritual Genesis of Motive rather than by mere Impulse of Mentality." Mr. Broun's book has a title halfway between Victor Hugo's "Things Seen" and one of Eugene Field's poems, "Seeing Things at Night." In other words, he calls his book "Things Seen at Night" (Harcourt), and it presumably discusses some of the plays—and other things—which a dramatic critic may expect to see. Mr. Broun's observations of books and plays are better, not worse, for being unweighted with solemnity, and his humor never deserts him, except momentarily when he asks to have the artillery of the satirists trained only upon conservatives and academicians.

F. P. A. has a rather well-worn catchword for the title of his new book, "Something Else Again" (Doubleday), but the selections will, as usual, present the cream of his newspaper column, and his deftest verse. Of Albert Bigelow Paine's compilation, "Moments with Mark Twain" (Harper), it is certainly not priggish to say that the best thing about such a book is that it may cause you to read the books from which the extracts are taken. Mr. Paine's life of Mark Twain is yet to be esteemed as it deserves; it tells of adventures more varied than Lockhart related in his Life of Scott. Both books have their tragic and heart-breaking chapters.

If you can enjoy the rebels without hating the tories, or take tea with the tories without despising the rebels, you may have pleasure in the nicety of Walter De La Mare's "Collected Poems" (Holt), or in Vachell Lindsay's new book, the very name of which is glorious—"The Golden Whales of California" (Macmillan). Walt Whitman's genius for splendid titles—flamboyant titles, I suppose some would say—is repeated here. But it is a tame thing to sit down and read Mr. Lindsay's poems, after hearing him recite them. In "Others, for 1919" (Brown), edited by Alfred Kreymborg, there is a circus in verse, the genuine acrobats, the clever clowns, and the mere freaks. It is to poetry what the exhibition of the Independent Artists is to the Academy. How many of the poseurs therein would not gladly write such finished verse as in Arthur Guiterman's "Ballads of Old New York" (Harper), if they had the ability and the honest respect of the artist for his art?

The announcement of Winston Churchill's "The Green Bay Tree" (Macmillan) is interesting to readers who enjoy the religious-political novel; less earnest souls will look eagerly for "Mrs. Warren's Daughter" (Macmillian), by Sir Harry Johnston. This is Vivie Warren, daughter of Mrs. Warren of infamous repute, in Mr. Shaw's play, and we are assured that she comes out all right in the novel. Of course she would;

(Continued on page 404)

BRENTANO'S SPRING BOOKS

THE PEACE CONFERENCE DAY BY DAY.
By C. T. THOMPSON. Introduction by Col. House.
The first American book covering every angle of the American participation in the conference. Startling in its revelations and unique in its disclosures. About $2.50

WOMEN AND THE NEW RACE.
By MARGARET SANGER
Burning truths about family limitation. About $2.00

STUDIES IN SPANISH-AMERICAN LITERATURE.
By ISAAC GOLDBERG, Ph.D.
"The book with which to end our abysmal ignorance of South American cultural life."—New York Times. $2.50

CHINESE PAINTERS.
By RAPHAEL PETRUCCI
A complete, fascinating, and authoritative book, beautifully illustrated. $2.75

W. B. WILSON AND THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.
By ROGER W. BABSON
A survey of the department, a study of labor problems, and a striking biography. $2.00

A LITHUANIAN VILLAGE.
By LEON KOBRIN
Intimate pictures of strange life, touching the universal heart. $1.75

SELDWYLA FOLKS.
By GOTTFRIED KELLER
Three quaint novelettes, impregnated with all the naivete of the Swiss peasantry. $1.75

THE COSSACKS.
By Capt. W. P. CRESSON
The only authoritative book published on the history and country of the Cossacks—absolutely essential to an understanding of the present Russian situation. $2.50

THE FIVE BOOKS OF YOUTH
By ROBERT HILLYER
"Beauty in that mood which listens for the echoing undertones of life and nature." $1.50

PAX.
By LORENZO MARROQUIN
A stupendous South American novel. Love, action, big business—a dynamic picture of life. $2.00

WITH OTHER EYES.
By NORMA LORIMER
A fascinating love-story, with the country of Arthurian legend as a background. $1.90

THE CLANKING OF CHAINS.
By BRINSLEY MacNAMARA
A daring anaylsis of Sinn Fein, combined with a dramatic and unique love-story. $1.90

SEA CHANTEYS AND TRAMP BALLADS.
By HARRY KEMP
Vivid, virile songs of the sea and of tramp life, by a true poet-wanderer. $1.50

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF FRANCIS LEDWIDGE.
With a Preface by LORD DUNSANY
The complete poems of the great Irish soldier-poet. $2.50

MESLOM'S MESSAGES.
Received by MARY McEVILLY
Vital, palpitating, aflame,—the transmitted thoughts of a 15th century Hindu. $1.50

THE SPIRIT OF THE NEW PHILOSOPHY.
By JOHN HERMAN RANDALL
The associate pastor of the New York Community Church presents here a vigorous, thoughtful book, summarizing the tendencies and conditions of the age. $1.75

SHORT TALKS ON PSYCHOLOGY.
By PROFESSOR C. G. SHAW
A collection of short, pithy talks on the application of psychology to every-day subjects, such as work, charm, the pay-envelope, etc. $1.50

LITERARY SNAP SHOTS.
By RICHARD BUTLER GLAENZER
Short, epigrammatic word pictures of contemporary authors. A unique book. $1.25

PLAYS OF THE "47 WORKSHOP." Second Series.
Edited by PROF. G. P. BAKER
A new collection of one-act plays, revealing high dramatic excellence, breadth of appeal, and adaptability to the stage. $1.25

LIVING WATERS.
With an introduction by Dwight Goddard. Messages from the spirit world breathing the consciousness of the reality of God as a loving Presence. $1.50

EINSTEIN'S THEORY.
By PROFESSOR LORENTZ
The first succinct, practical volume for the layman who wishes a comprehensive knowledge of the Einstein physics. $1.00

STANDARD OPERA GLASS.
By CHARLES ANNESLEY
A new and revised edition, brought strictly up-to-date, making this the most complete book of opera synopses ever published. $3.00

Publishers BRENTANO'S 5th Ave. & 27th St. New York

(Continued from page 403)

she was so coldly virtuous and calculating that her mother's easy-going lack of all respectability was tolerable by comparison. Who are the other characters? In "The Gay-Dombeys," Sir Harry Johnston had the whole Dickens gallery to draw upon, and a fascinating book he made—in part a good story, and in part a literary and political puzzle. Many a pleasant evening could be spent in identifying the persons of the tale. In Rider Haggard's "The Ancient Allan" (Longmans) the author is reversing the process of the Elsie books—they carried Elsie from childhood to her grandmotherly days. Now, Allan Quatermain, friend and comforter when our worst troubles were improper fractions and Harper's School Geography, is being projected by his creator into an earlier incarnation, in the reign of the Emperor Hwang. Wallace Irwin has a little fun with the drawing-room Bolshevists in "Trimmed with Red" (Doran), while Arthur Train's "Tutt and Mr. Tutt" (Scribner) will contain, I hope, some lawyers and rascals as lively as those in "True Stories of Crime" and "The Confessions of Artemas Quibble."

It is customary, in commending a book to-day, to say that you read it under fire, in a trench at the front, with German shells bursting round. I can not say I read Christopher Morley's "Kathleen" (Doubleday) that way, when it first appeared in a magazine, but I did read it while in a guardhouse (not, I aver, as a prisoner) and sitting under a stove-pipe which had just been drilled with a Springfield bullet, let off in the course of experimentation by one of the guard. "Kathleen" is a capital story (Mr. Morley refrains from mentioning pipe-smoking, to the best of my recollection), and it kept me from pondering too nervously upon how soon some one of the guard might perforate his commanding officer, as that person sat steeped in literary calm, behind the thin pine boards which divided the orderly room from the rest of the shack. The republication of two books by James Branch Cabell, "The Cords of Vanity" and "The Cream of the Jest" (McBride), recalls the stupid prosecution of his "Jurgen." Many books, suppressed or attacked, are no great loss; their persecution is an affront to liberty, not to art. In the instance of "Jurgen" it is different; there is imagination, humor, beauty in it, and a suggestion of eeriness that is like Dunsany's best. It was unwisely advertised by its friends; fervid persons brandished it before the "Puritans," with the lamentable result. The defense of it has sometimes been disingenuous; to deny its double meanings is as hypocritical as Comstockery itself.

Professor William E. Dodd's "Woodrow Wilson and His Work" (Doubleday) is a good partisan volume; if you trust the author you are led to the conclusion that nobody has opposed the President except those actuated by greed for money or thirst for human blood, but it is a good partisan book, nevertheless. Sir George Arthur's "Life of Lord Kitchener" (Macmillan) is promised. "George von L. Meyer" (Dodd), by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, and "Some Letter of Augustus P. Gardner" (Houghton), contain interesting sidelights upon our foreign and domestic politics. Observations upon Presidents Taft and Roosevelt are contained in Mrs. Larz Anderson's "Presidents and Pies" (Houghton), and informal biographical material about Mr. Roosevelt in "Talks with T. R." (Houghton), by John J. Leary, Jr., and "The Political Adventures of Theodore and Me" (Macmillan), by William Allen White.

An attempt to clear away the ancient grudge against England is the purpose of Owen Wister's "A Straight Deal" (Macmillan). Philippe Bunau-Varilla in "The Great Adventure of Panama" (Doubleday) lays the refusal of Colombia to ratify the treaty with this country to German intrigue. It needs rather more evidence to make it strong enough —especially as the defenders of the theory that our Government was in the wrong about Panama, would hardly care, now, to find proof that we and not Colombia were right. Philip Gibbs's "Now It Can Be Told" (Harper) searches over the notebooks of this able correspondent and tells us what the censor would not permit to be published before the armistice. It is that war is terrible; high-explosive shells have a frightful effect upon the human body; and that the manners of men under the awful strain of war are not always nice. A useful book if it serves to keep anyone from thinking that war is glorious and much to be desired; a pestiferous one if used by pacifists to prove their contention that the safety of our bodies is the end and aim of existence. Sir Reginald Bacon's "The Dover Patrol" (Doran) is one of the books which I am sure I wish to read, when I can get a chance, and Bashford Dean's "Helmets and Body Armor in Modern Warfare" (Yale Univ. Press) should be one of the curious literary by-products of the war.

A new Kipling book is announced, "Letters of Travel" (Doubleday). "Modes and Morals" (Scribner), by Katharine Fullerton Gerould, is another annoyance to the radicals. Professor George L. Kittredge's "The Old Farmer and His Almanack" (Harvard Univ. Press) has happily been reprinted. A new index to St. Nicholas is announced (H. W. Wilson Co.). It might be dangerous to own. I have a few volumes—covering that golden period when Cleveland and Harrison were Presidents—and if some caller finds them, some caller who was of the St. Nicholas age in the years 1880 to 1888, I get no more out of him. At midnight I hand him his hat and coat, and push him out. He keeps murmuring "Just a minute, just a minute—here's that story by Frank Stockton I used to read."

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

The Ship's Library

I CAME aboard the transport reviling my luck. My locker and bedroll were in France and I had neglected to bid them good-bye; I had nothing but musette and kit-bag, in which I had been living for a month. The limping old Mudjekeewis was the shabbiest tub in the service, slow, devoid of comfort. Her engines took a day off every week. Her smoking room was given over to clacking typewriters which manufactured colored tissue paper orders for the decoration of the main companionway. The white and gold music room was no place for one who was constitutionally unable to derive solace from craps or poker. But when I discovered that the ship's library had survived the ravages of war, I began to see the hand of providence. As I reviewed the backs of the fifty and odd most respectable volumes in tough brown calf, my locker and bedroll "fell from my back and began to tumble, and so continued to do" till I thought of them no more. I was free as air in spite of the livery I wore. I tossed a polished copy of "Mr. Midshipman Easy" into my berth, cast off my shining greaves and brass-mounted regalia, chinned myself on the T-iron that ran across the top of the stateroom, swung my legs over the edge of the berth and dropped after them. I opened the porthole to the deck and the summer night, disposed tobacco and other necessities in the wall-pockets, started the fire in a well-crusted briar bowl, and forthwith I was in company with an old friend whom I had not seen for years—"By nine o'clock that evening Mr. Jack Easy was safe on board his Majesty's sloop Harpy."

With him I sailed for uncounted hours, a midshipman six weeks in the service who practically single-handed captures a vessel, cuts loose on a cruise in her, quells his mutiny, and captures more ships. It is like a child's dream of piracy, like the picture of the chubby four-year-old with cocked hat, sash, and pistols, standing with folded arms on the quarter-deck surrounded by bearded cutthroats and ruffians who bend to receive orders from the baby lips. The dream rises from the child's desire to escape restraint. Here is the sailor as an overgrown child, slipping free of the iron discipline of the navy and gamboling through a dream of heroic conquest of Spaniards and French, pirates and bandits, howling gales and crashing surf. "Jack knew that his life depended on holding to the yard, which he did, although under water." Or again, "Our hero and his comrade had both drawn their pistols, and just as they burst open the door the old gentleman who defended himself against such odds had fallen down. Jack seized one of his assailants by the collar of his coat and held him fast, pointing the muzzle of the pistol to his ear; Gascoigne did the same by the other." And who could have guessed that the old gentleman had a beautiful daughter and chests of coined gold! On and on it flowed, a racing stream of action, melodramatic but always lively and artlessly engaging; leagues of open sea, with sun, wind, and cloud that fail not from the face of it, the wind on your cheek and the spray in your teeth, breezy stretches of flight and pursuit across whole oceans of blue water. It was midnight and more before my three roommates came in and began to unbuckle the harness of war, prating of sevens and elevens, of broken flushes and fallen kings. A barren recital; a noise and a shaking of dry bones! What were their paltry stakes to me? Why, there were fourteen thousand Spanish dollars on the Nuestra Señora del Carmen alone, not to mention prize money, and Donna Agnes was safe aboard the privateer.

But the privateer was sold, Jack Easy was married and done for, and it behooved me to ship again. I looked in vain for "Wing and Wing"; I longed for Clark Russell (I could have relished "A Three-Stranded Yarn"), but was fain to embark on a land voyage. I took up with "Guy Mannering," and set out with the Colonel in "the brief and gloomy twilight of the season," on the road from Dumfries to Kippletringan "through a wide tract of black moss extending for miles on each side and before." We came safely to Ellangowan; the heir was born and his perilous fate foretold. The sound of a jazz orchestra recruited from among the enlisted men came down the gangway like the chorus of a summer swamp, mosquitos, peepers, and hylas—"zing, zing, zing, zing, ze-e-e-!" The cigarettes of the deckwalkers drifted past the porthole like fireflies, the smoke of my pipe swirled out, and genial scraps of profanity floated in. From the walls of Ellangowan we "saw a lugger with all her canvas crowded standing across the bay, closely pursued by a sloop of war that kept firing on the chase from her bows, which the lugger returned with her own stern chasers." Dirk Hatteraick landed, Kennedy met his death, and the heir was carried off. Meg Merrilies came and went with stately maledictions and oracular scraps of ballads. Dominie Sampson expressed his elementary

(Continued on page 406)

PHILIPPE BUNAU-VARILLA, the engineer of the old French Panama Canal Company ¶ Organized the Panama revolution ¶ Signed the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty between Panama and the United States ¶ And finally was wounded in defence of his country at Verdun.

There never was a more romantic story than his of "the great adventure of Panama" and its connection with the Great War—of the trail of the Kaiser's government in the Caribbean—of starting a Revolution from the Waldorf-Astoria—of his relations with Roosevelt and Hay, and the final happy ending of one of the great dramas of history.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE OF PANAMA

And its Relation to the World War

By PHILIPPE BUNAU-VARILLA

$1.75 at all bookstores Published by

DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO , Garden City, N. Y.

(Continued from page 405)
thoughts in ponderous Latin, and his elementary emotions in ponderous capers. Mr. Pleydell brought himself and a brace of wild duck to supper, and whispered to the cook his "poor thoughts" about the sauce. With them all I was well content. The cover of any novel of Scott's opens like a magic casement on a fair prospect of a safe passage to the islands of the blest and a happy sojourn there. Only you mustn't be in a hurry. If you expect sixty miles an hour, high tension, and the clatter of a flat wheel, you won't get what you want. Don't embark on the old three-decker if you have the speed-mania of realism. I like realism as I like beer; it is a good drink, and there are times when it is just the thing, but when the table is spread with silver let beer remain below stairs. The true romantics bring me the vintages of Burgundy. Scott is Chambertin—or Richebourg—anyway, he is the king of them all. Stevenson is Clos de Vougeot, either still red or sparkling. From Anthony Hope I get an occasional glass of sparkling Volnay—and even the ordinaires come from the Côte d'Or. Sip them gently; let them settle into your being with finality, with warmth and a happy glow—if you want to get drunk quickly and have it over with, choose another bottle. I was loth to tuck the book in among the cork jackets over my head at the midnight incursion of noisy roommates. The F. A. lieutenant had "cleaned 'em up," and we were to have a nightcap. I had supped with Mr. Pleydell and had my liquor in a smuggler's cave, but I accepted my modest share of his winnings since I could not share mine with him.

Again I explored the narrow shelves. The steward began to recommend his wares. "John Halifax, Gentleman"? Bah!—Richardson and milk! "The First Violin"? No, Brontë and water. "Westward, Ho!"; "The Cloister and the Hearth"? Just the thing; take them both—no restriction on hoarding food for the imagination. Here are scenes roomy and bustling; for stage the one has the whole Spanish Main, the other the entire continent of Europe. Of "The Cloister and the Hearth" my memory from earlier readings held only dramatic scenes of action, the escape from the tower, the fight with the bear, the stealthy hand pinned to the doorpost by a bolt from Denis's crossbow. Now I think of it as the Middle Ages passing in review, a flickering stream of life in every form, under all conditions, crowded inns and swarming streets of villages and cities, hut and palace, university and monastery, highway and footpath. It is not a placid stream; too often I found myself shooting a series of rapids with nerves taut and muscles braced. I was tempted to lay it aside till a time when I might want a thriller and be too lazy to seek one at the movies, but it was impossible to leave such a tale half told. With the calming aid of the even rise and fall of the ship under me, and restful periods of vacant gazing through the porthole to watch the sea's "long moon-silvered roll," I came safe and rather breathless to the end—and promptly shipped with Amyas Leigh for the Spanish Main. Here were stalwart fair-haired heroes, militant Christians such as think little and mope never. Either they are right by instinct or else magnificently wrong. They are chivalrous and romantic, but they do not concern themselves very greatly or very long about love. They have no time to stand tied to apron strings; great deeds are toward, and women and children had better stand out of the way. What shall we say of a romance in which a heroine, all that the heart could desire in the earlier chapters, is burned by the Spaniards as a Protestant heretic in the middle of the book? Merely that if you read the tale at the right age (whatever your years), the matter does not trouble you much; it is lost and left behind in the swift forward surge of the action, the bustle and activity of scenes of arrival and departure, brilliance and pageantry of crowds of soldiers and courtiers, the spirit and manhood of sailor and knight, magnificent fighting by sea and land, and the peril of enforced marches across unknown continents. We thrill with these exploits when we read them in the unemotional pages of history; here they are not unemotional; Kingsley presents them instinct with life and color, "vivid and resolute."

On the last night of the voyage there was no poker, no craps, no reading; we stood at the rail watching the shore lights come up out of the dark till nearly one o'clock, when we anchored off Quarantine.

"When I get my *dis*charge papers," said the F. A. lieutenant, "I'm just going to put on long pants and narrow shoes, and put my feet up on the mantelpiece where I can admire them."

"Me for the overalls," said the Q. M. captain, "and digging in the garden."

"My specifications," said I, "call for a stationary bed with a reading light, and anybody that wants to can bring in my meals."

I was thinking of the Clerk of Oxford who preferred his twenty books to the polyphonics of a jazz orchestra. They were old books, and he kept them at the head of his bed, sagacious man.

ROBERT PALFREY UTTER

"BOOKS AND THE NEWS" FURNISHES, EACH WEEK, A SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY ON TIMELY TOPICS.

The Nature Lover

THE nature lover of 1920, whose interest has been aroused, and attention focused on the appearance and lives of the plants and the animals of this earth of ours, is to be both envied and pitied. Envied, because of the wealth of literature and illustration, guiding and helpful, at hand; pitied, because of the narrowed field of work and the diminished necessity for personal endeavor.

In past years one would rush off to the nearest berry tangle or grove, in the early morning before school, find birds and describe them, recording size, color, song, and habits on stray scraps of paper. Then, at the week's end, go to the Natural History Museum, and after careful search, and analysis of notes whose sincerity outweighed their clarity, there would come conviction that the bird was a fox sparrow and not a brown thrasher! That kind of thing brought the same thrill as my first Baedekerless walk in London, when Westminster took form and flashed into recognition without warning or mapped anticipation. It was an alchemy of method which transformed the drab confidence of certainty into the poignant delight of discovery.

In those early years the writings of J. G. Wood filled one's mind with much truth and considerable error, and one revelled in the lurid, stiff-necked creatures in the plates of De Kay and others. Thoreau and Burroughs were text-books as well as essays, and I used to make classified lists of the birds in "Wake-Robin." For tales of animals in strange, foreign lands there were Fenn and Hudson, Kingston, Bates, Waterton, and Belt. Years afterward came the identification books, with colored plates and keys, condensed summaries of seasons and songs, patterns and plumage, notes and nests. And when Chapman's Handbook appeared, the high-water mark was reached, for to-day no other has approached it.

But the law of compensation is inflexible, and the places where formerly, when eyes failed, one could resort to a 22-calibre shot cartridge, are now become a no man's land, fenced either with real barbed wire, or with blatant signs making trespassing a sin and flower-picking immoral. So to every succeeding generation the country near at hand becomes less like wild planet land and more like a museum. This is inevitable, and only those who love nature enough to make sacrifices of time and effort win through to the few wild places left in far distant corners of the world.

It is possible to detect faint adumbrations of a cycle of change in nature interest. At first nature books were for readers in libraries. Gilbert White and Audubon were read far more frequently in an arm-chair before a fire than in anticipation of a coming walk, or expected direct acquaintanceship. But closer contact began to be established, as soon as people ceased for a moment their struggle for wealth or position, and, looking out upon the strange world beyond factory and bank, fashioned the queries "What?" and "Why?" The demand began to be met at once, and ushered in the era of identification books, the colorful host of "How-to-Knows." And now the interested layman can call by name many of his lesser fellow creatures, bound like himself by gravitation, and with him breathing and eating and playing upon our planet. "What?" being answered in part, "Why?" still remains, and to-day, strengthened by the staff of identification, we have begun to trudge hopefully along the path of interpretation.

To-day the literature of biology is of appalling extent. A specialist finds it difficult to keep up even with the writings of his own limited field. Inquiry in any direction reveals regiments of volumes and cohorts of periodicals awaiting the reader. And in the midst of this technical desert—a desert absolutely necessary and desirable for the advance of knowledge—the layman finds now and then a rare oasis of balanced popular literature, not in words of one syllable, nor of sentimentalized nature, but of real literature, of facts so clothed in simple dignity, so interpreted, that their appeal is instant and universal. I recall especially Levink's "Antarctic Penguins," Hudson's "Idle Days in Patagonia," "The Story of Radium," Slosson's "Creative Chemistry," Roosevelt's "A Book-Lover's Holidays in the Open," as well as the writings of Vernon Kellogg, Thompson Seton, the Peckhams, Wheeler, and J. Arthur Thompson.

In certain ways the cycle becomes a closed spiral, and to-day we can often do no better than to reach up to the books on the higher shelves, blow the dust off the tops, and reopen those wonderful pages of Audubon, Fabre in the original, Izaak Walton, Gilbert White, Darwin, and Huxley.

We realize eventually that the law of compensation works both ways and the devastating advance of civilization outstrips itself by means of its superlatively efficient means of travel, and thus brings the very wilderness of the antipodes to the sophisticated doryard of the nature lover. Roosevelt has summed this up in a single perfect paragraph:

> The grandest scenery of the world is his to look at if he chooses; and he can witness the strange ways of tribes who have survived into an alien age from an immemorial past, tribes whose priests dance in honor of the serpent and worship the spirits of the wolf and the bear. Far and wide, all the continents are open to him as they never were to any of his forefathers; the Nile and the Paraguay are easy of access, and the borderland between

(Continued on page 408)

NEW PUBLICATIONS!

Some new titles in The MODERN LIBRARY, 85 cents each, 6 cents for postage. A Modern Book of Criticism, edited by Ludwig Lewisohn; The Cabin, by Blasco Ibanez; two volumes of plays by Oscar Wilde with introductions by Edgar Saltus; Walter Pater's The Renaissance. (Send for catalog.)

Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub, by Theodore Dreiser $2.00

A Book of the Mystery and Terror and Wonder of Life
"'The Court of Progress' (in this book) is one of the most drastic satires ever printed in this country. It ought to be printed separately and distributed by the millions."—New York Times.

The Release of the Soul, by Gilbert Cannan $1.75

Mr. Cannan considers this new book, which has just been finished in America, as the fullest and most sincere expression of his own soul.

Beyond the Horizon, by Eugene O'Neill $1.50

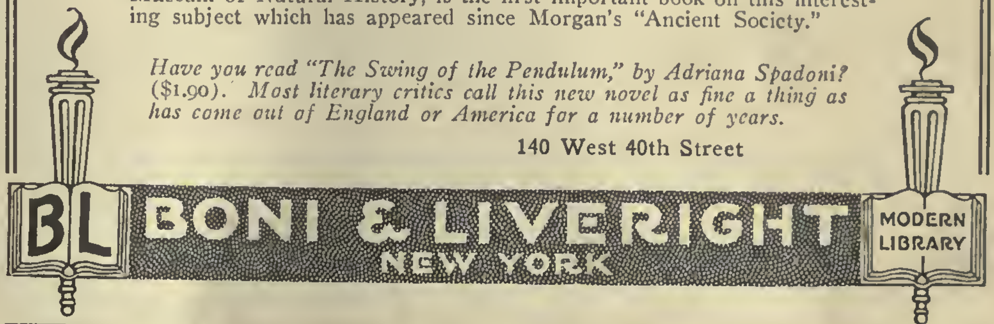
"There can be no question that this is a work of uncommon merit, distinguished by general superiority."—New York Evening Post.

Primitive Society, by Dr. Robert H. Lowie $3.00

This fascinating book by the assistant curator of Anthropology of the Museum of Natural History, is the first important book on this interesting subject which has appeared since Morgan's "Ancient Society."

Have you read "The Swing of the Pendulum," by Adriana Spadoni? ($1.90). Most literary critics call this new novel as fine a thing as has come out of England or America for a number of years.

140 West 40th Street



A New York Librarian

SAYS:

THE REVIEW:

"I have been watching THE REVIEW as it has appeared weekly on the news stands, and am now convinced that it is too important for us not to have it regularly on our shelves. Will you kindly, therefore, enter our name for one year's subscription, the bill for which I am today forwarding to our treasurer. If possible, I would also be glad to have you send to me the back numbers of Vol. II., with the exception of No. 47, for April 3, 1920."

THE REVIEW
$5 a year

140 Nassau St.,
New York

From NEWTON to EINSTEIN

By BENJAMIN HARROW, Ph. D.

An interesting, clear, simple, non-mathematical explanation—in the language of every-day life—of our

Changing Conceptions of THE UNIVERSE

It will enable you to understand the newer ideas of modern scientists on space, time gravitation, nature of light, Lodge's ether, theory of relativity, and the fourth dimension.

84 pages. Portraits and Illustrations. $1.00

At your bookstore or from the publisher.

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY
25 PARK PLACE NEW YORK
After May first at 8 Warren Street

JUST PUBLISHED

Do The Dead Still Live?

or

The Testimony of Science Respecting a Future Life

By

DAVID HEAGLE, Ph.D., D.D.

The author has sought to present in up-to-date structure the entire argument for immortality, drawing from all possible sources, not only using the familiar contributions to assurance furnished by philosophy, poetry, and the Scriptures, but finding exceedingly important material of more modern origin in the fields of science, especially in biology, physics, physiology, and psychology. The spiritistic phenomena, brought into renewed prominence as a psychological by-product of the great war, come under review.

$1.50 NET

If your bookstore cannot supply you, order from the publisher.

THE JUDSON PRESS
1701 Chestnut St. Philadelphia, Pa.

savagery and civilization; and the veil of the past has been lifted so that he can dimly see how, in time immeasurably remote, his ancestors—no less remote—led furtive lives among uncouth and terrible beasts, whose kind has perished utterly from the face of the earth. He will take books with him as he journeys; for the keenest enjoyment of the wilderness is reserved for him who enjoys also the garnered wisdom of the present and the past.

WILLIAM BEEBE

Problems of Labor and Capital

II—Honest Ballots for Unions and Employers' Associations

A RECENT statement issued by the Industrial Council for the Building Trades in Great Britain reads as follows:

> Industry needs no truce, no compulsory arbitration, no provisions for postponement of disputes. What it needs is confidence and a courageous forward movement, supported by the constructive genius of both sides in common counsel. Industrial peace must come, not as a result of the balance of power with a supreme court of appeal in the background. It must arise as the inevitable by-product of mutual confidence, real justice, constructive good-will.

One of the greatest obstacles, if it is not the greatest, in the way of collective bargaining agreements is the lack of confidence on both sides. This lack is due in great measure to a belief on each side that the other is organized in an undemocratic way and is led by a group of organizers, in the case of the union, or a clique of large employers, in the case of the employers' association. Confronted with the suggestion that collective bargaining might lead to industrial peace, an employer engaged in an industry which has never attempted collective bargaining usually declares a willingness to deal collectively with unions, but refuses to deal with the particular union in his trade because of the type of leadership which, it is alleged, controls the workmen. It is a common belief among employers—and to a great extent the facts justify the belief—that the members of the unions do not freely choose their leaders, that they are, indeed, often under the domination of agitators and demagogues. The fact that many leaders of local unions have been successfully bribed by employers in the past, coupled with the fact that many employees confidentially state to their employers that they should prefer to continue at work were they not in fear of the leaders of the union, has gone far to destroy the confidence. The labor unions, on the other hand, with no less justice, have lost faith in the leadership of the employers. They have contended for years that in all employers' associations a few large employers have control through a small executive committee. Organized labor is of the opinion that small manufacturers are often denied a voice in the management of the employers' associations.

Reasons for the lack of confidence on both sides, then, exist in plenty. It is not often, to-day, that the leadership either in the union or in the employers' association is genuinely representative. The leaders on both sides, in a great majority of organizations, are elected without a sealed ballot, and, if there is a sealed ballot, there is no guarantee of an honest count. The secret ballot and an honest count is no less important in industrial reform than it was in political reform. Secrecy and honesty should apply, too, quite as much to votes on strikes or lock-outs, as the election of officers.

Instead, we have a situation typically as follows. If it is proposed in the union to make a demand upon the employers, an employee must possess exceptional daring publicly to address the union in opposition to the proposed demands. On a question of a strike, it is true, there is apt to be a division of opinion, and a small minority might feebly mumble its dissent. But in many unions the more representative skilled workmen not only fail to record opposing votes on questions of prime importance, but actually refrain from attending the union's meetings. In some industries employees opposing a demand for increased pay or shorter hours have even suffered assault at the hands of their more aggressive fellows.

The situation is equally serious among the employers. Action looking toward a lockout, or the refusal of the workmen's demands, is agreed upon either by a rising vote or by a call of "ayes" and "nays." Representatives of small concerns, through timidity or other reasons, follow perforce what appears to be the sentiment of the larger concerns. Furthermore, the usual constitution and by-laws of the employers' associations, with a view to greater efficiency, create executive committees vested with full power and not subject to review by the association as a whole. It is not unusual for such an executive committee of five to decline a proposal of arbitration without even presenting the question to the several hundred members of the association.

Though the honest count may be harder to obtain than the secret ballot—so it has proved in political life—in both the employers' associations and in the unions, the secret ballot is the first step toward effective understanding between them. And it is unlikely that either the unions or the employers' associations would be heard to argue against the mandatory installation of secretly cast and honestly counted ballots. The method of enacting legislation which would make this mandatory in such organizations is contingent, possibly, upon bringing under Government supervision all organizations of employers or employees. The plan most generally discussed is that of the compulsory incorporation of unions and of employers' associations. Whether such compulsory incorporation is impracticable and likely to prove barren of the results sought will be discussed in a subsequent article. The alternative proposal of mere compulsory licensing of all employees' and employers' associations will be set forth. The choice between them should be made to depend on which gives the better promise of establishing swiftly and finally a control of the affairs, both of the union and of the employers' associations, which is not only genuinely representative at this moment of its election but continues to be representative through seeking, frequently and in all frankness, validation of its acts at the hands of the body which created it.

MORRIS L. ERNST

Books and the News

Primaries

THE primary elections have transformed our Presidential campaigns into something resembling a general election in England. As they extend over a period of five or six months it is possible to see their merits and defects. Their virtues, as contrasted with the old convention system, were negatively displayed in 1912, when the managers of the Republican Party contrived to give the members of the party a candidate who it was clear was not wanted. Their defects, in doubling the work, expense, and effort of the campaign, are always apparent. Perhaps their greatest merit is that indicated by Mr. Charles Willis Thompson, in the book mentioned below: they tend to make a candidate honestly declare himself, and so do a great deal to destroy that hoary old humbug of American politics, based upon a perversion of the historical facts about Washington—the "reluctant" candidate, "in the hands of his friends," protesting against his nomination in public, but privately pulling every string in sight. Whatever else might happen, this sham, in all his shades and degrees, would have to disappear if there were complete Presidential primaries.

Frederick W. Dallinger, in "Nominations for Elective Office in the United States" (Longmans, 1897) contributed

(Continued on page 410)

DM NEW DODD, MEAD BOOKS DM

HARVEST By Mrs. Humphry Ward

Author of "Helena," "Missing," etc.

Mrs. Ward's heroine is a striking woman of thirty, one of England's woman farmers. At the period of the full ripening of her life, there comes to her a wonderful love affair. But in her girlhood she had married badly, tragically. That is the dark cloud that hangs always on her horizon. Mrs. Ward wove the warp and woof of this story in a way that showed her ripened and mature art at its best.. Illustrated. $2.00

MANY JUNES By Archibald Marshall

Author of "The Honour of the Clintons," "Sir Harry," etc.

Another of those leisurely, sane and delightful stories of real, everyday people, in the telling of which Mr. Marshall excels. As the New York Times says: "Readers of Archibald Marshall soon learn that to read one of his novels is like being introduced into a pleasant home and sharing the lives of its inmates." $2.00

THE GREAT MENACE: Americanism or Bolshevism?
By George Whitefield Mead

The Great Menace is the subtle, determined movement for the complete overthrow of the present social order, including the Church, and the creation of an "Industrial Republic." Mr. Mead discusses this insistent and vital problem in a sane and enlightening way and his book carries a powerful message to loyal and intelligent Americans. $1.25

THE COLLECTORS' SERIES Edited by H. W. Lewer

Written by authorities, these volumes are designed both for the beginner in collecting, and the more experienced collector. They are profusedly illustrated. Each $2.50

The China Collector

A guide to the Porcelain of the English Factories. By H. W. LEWER.

The Glass Collector

A Guide to Old English Glass. By MACIVER PERCIVAL.

The Stamp Collector

A Guide to the World's Postage Stamps. By STANLEY C. JOHNSON.

The Earthenware Collector

A Guide to Old English Earthenware. By G. WOOLLISCROFT RHEAD.

THE SILVER AND SHEFFIELD PLATE COLLECTOR By W. A. Young

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY, New York

Publishers for Eighty Years

DM DM

BOOKS With Vision

IT is significant that never has the social and religious conscience of the world been so stirred as at the present time and nowhere is this so apparent as in this country. Men and women in all walks of life are reaching out for the reality of the vision that was the result of the world struggle. No longer can the spiritual aspect of life be disassociated from the economic, and it is to prove the truth of this that some of the clearest minds of the day are working.

The following books, chosen from the extensive lists of The Abingdon Press, while divergent in theme, all have this thought in common.

Some Aspects of International Christianity

The Mendenhall Lectures, Fifth Series, 1919

By John Kelman

There are questions of the most vital importance on which every man must form an opinion. The bearings of these questions are not confined to the regions of expert knowledge; and there is a place for the impressions of the man on the street—his general sense of moral values, his common-sense view of relative importances, and the free play of his conscience upon the questions of the hour as he understands them. It is in his name and from his point of view that I have prepared these lectures.—From Author's Preface. 12mo. Cloth. In press.

Steps in the Development of American Democracy

By Andrew Cunningham McLaughlin

A study of democratic origins that flashes a vivid light upon the problems of the present day. A high-hearted call to America to play her part and act the democrat in the world life. 12mo. Cloth. Net $1.50

The Church and World Peace

By Bishop Richard J. Cooke

A strong and timely discussion of the church in relation to the League of Nations and World Peace. 12mo. Cloth. In press.

The Rebirth of Korea

The Reawakening of Its People, Its Causes and the Outlook

By Hugh Heung-wo Cynn

"'Mansei! Mansei! M-a-n-s-e-i!' 'Ten thousand years for Korea! Long live Korea!' Thus in the midst of mighty shouts the Korea that had been 'dead and buried' for eight and a half years 'rose from the dead' at two o'clock in the afternoon of the first day of March, 1919." With these striking words Professor Cynn begins his authentic account of recent happenings in Korea—a story at once graphic and compelling, pathetic and inspiring. 12mo. Illustrated. Cloth. Net, $1.50

The Spiritual Meaning of "In Memoriam"

An Interpretation for the Times

By James Main Dixon

A vital and original study and appraisal of Tennyson's great poem. An interpretation not only of Tennyson but of the basic philosophy of an enduring civilization. 12mo. Cloth. Net, $1.00

Premillennialism

Non-Scriptural Non-Historical Non-Scientific Non-Philosophical

By George Preston Mains

A terse and trenchant critique of premillennial claims. It will be difficult for the advocates of this aggressive cult to confute the reasoning of these logical and close knit arguments. 16mo. Cloth. Net, $1.00 to the series of Harvard Historical Studies an excellent history of the development of the nominating system. He describes the abuses of the caucus and the primary, the abuses of the convention, and the proposed remedies. The book's one fault to-day, of course, is its date of publication.

New York THE ABINGDON PRESS Cincinnati

(Continued from page 409)

Somewhat later, but still before the Presidential primaries had been tested, there appeared one of the few books devoted singly to the primary—Charles E. Merriam's "Primary Elections" (University of Chicago Press, 1909). This is a small book, of about three hundred pages, but it traces the primary in this country from its earliest forms; it has a bibliography referring to articles and to separate chapters in books; and it summarizes the laws in various States so far as there were any such laws when the book was published.

In the "Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science," January, 1913, Volume III, No. 2, may be found a report of a debate upon the primary—a debate in which Professor A. B. Hart participated, and various active politicians offered their comments. An extensive study of the primary in one State may be found in "The Direct Primary in New Jersey," by Ralph S. Boots (Published by the Author, 1917). This also contains a bibliography.

In the Debaters' Handbook Series Clara E. Fanning has edited "Selected Articles on Direct Primaries" (Wilson, 1918). This is very good for its compilation of articles and arguments for and against the direct primary, its list of further references, and its tabulation of the opinions of politicians. It is more up to date than most other publications on the subject; many of its discussions are based upon the actual workings of the system, rather than upon theories.

Charles Willis Thompson's "The New Voter" (Putnam, 1918) has a chapter on the direct primary; it also discusses in the form of conversations the "things he and she ought to know about politics and citizenship," and should prove digestible to the reader who usually finds politics tough and dry. Another new book, on a related topic, is "How the World Votes; the Story of Democratic Development in Elections" (2 vols. C. A. Nichols Co., 1918), by Charles Seymour and D. P. Frary. It describes political parties and elections all over the world.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

The University President

AT the moment, it is said that no fewer than seventeen presidents of American colleges and universities have resigned or announced their intention of resigning. With so many important positions soon to be filled again—the presidency of Yale, of Cornell, of the University of Minnesota, and so on—the question of the right man for leader in education, and the proper functions of such a man, calls for thoughtful discussion. It is not often discussed on the basis of principle alone, and it should be discussed on no other. Personality, tact, qualities that defy analysis, pertain to the individual case; they do not enter into a general consideration of the topic.

First of all, should the position of college or university president exist at all? Certainly not, with the indiscriminate functions now attached to it. Strive as he may to save himself as a leader of scholars and a promoter of scholarship, the American college president—at the beck and call of the undergraduate, the parent, the impecunious instructor clamoring for an increase in his stipend, the world clamoring for tangible "results," and expecting vast external growth in the "plant"—finds himself unable to keep up more than a show of the contemplative life, and sooner or later—insensibly and slowly, or promptly and with open eye—makes his compromise with the crowd and with Mammon; if indeed he has not fully compromised himself beforehand in order to win the position. The position as it now exists is truly anomalous. It originated in the small colonial institution that was modeled after the English college, and, by accident as it were, has been transferred to institutions that have grown, at least in externals, to resemble the populous and many-sided university of Continental Europe, with a polytechnic school superadded. The president of an American university combines the functions of the head of a small college with those of the Vice-chancellor of an English university and those of the Rector of a German, though not with those of the head of the Collège de France. But the term of the Vice-chancellor of Oxford is four years, ordinarily enough to spoil his best energies for the rest of his life, as was the case with Jowett. And the tenure of office for the Rector of a German university is one year. The post has often been refused by eminent men, such as the geographer Ratzel, who preferred not to interrupt their usefulness in research and publication even for so brief an interval. No man can adequately perform the duties of an American university president as they are now generally conceived, having come to be what they are by force of circumstances, through the numerical growth and ever-increasing complexity of institutions, and through the process of uncritical imitation, each man deeming that he must undertake all the activities of his predecessor and of his fellows who are similarly placed.

The first thing to suffer is his scholarship. The rare individual like Pepper of Pennsylvania, or Harper of Chicago, working nineteen hours a day, and able to tire out three stenographers, may succeed in preserving an active interest in the specialty for which he was trained. As a rule, however, an elevation to the presidency of a large institution has ended the participation of the new incumbent in systematic research, and therewith his complete understanding of the men who form the true kernel of the university.

There is much to be said for abolishing the position; for university administration by some form of commission government, with a changing committee and a rotating chairman. But since we are not likely to see it generally abolished in the near future, the question of what is expedient under present conditions becomes more pressing. How can the position be transformed from one that no productive scholar dare accept into one the incumbent of which will not lose his scholarly soul?

In two ways. First, by limiting the tenure of office to four or six years. Secondly, by relieving the president of every function (save his duty to scholarship) of which he can easily be relieved. The budget of the university, for example, though subject to his approval—yet not to his alone, nor even his in the main—should not be his production. He should not in effect have the financial responsibility of the organization; and, above all, it should not be considered his duty to secure funds for the institution. And again, the responsibility for the relations of the institution with all sorts of individuals—students, their parents, and the like—should not be his. Three-fourths of the duties now performed by him should be the affair of a secretary of the university and a secretarial staff. At a Continental university there is a clerical force that the average person sees but twice a year

(Continued on page 412)

BOOKS

BOOKS

FIRST REFLECTIONS ON THE CAMPAIGN OF 1918

By Major R. M. Johnston

An entertaining discussion of the organization of the A. E. F. and a constructive criticism of its work in France, by a former officer of the Historical Section, General Staff. Price $1.00.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE

By Lt.-Col. Jennings C. Wise

An authoritative account of the operations of American troops from April 1 to August 13, 1918, by a former member of the Historical Section of the General Staff attached to the A. E. F. With original maps and sketches. Price $1.50.

ARMY MENTAL TESTS

By C. S. Yoakum and R. M. Yerkes

A study of the methods of psychological examining in the Army, and a discussion of the practical application of intelligence tests. This book will be of special interest to personnel managers and psychologists. Profusely illustrated. Price $1.50.

Fall Books Still in Demand

De Morgan's

THE OLD MADHOUSE

"No English-writing novelist since the days of Dickens and Thackeray has won such a peculiar homage as William De Morgan."—New York Times. Price $1.90.

Charnwood's

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

This is the book which formed the chief source for Drinkwater's famous play. Price $3.00.

Romain Rolland's

COLAS BREUGNON

"To live in the company of Breugnon is a tonic," says The Bookman, and The Review says, "Seven or eight hours of delight." Price $1.75.

AT FAME'S GATEWAY

By Jennie Irene Mix

An absorbing romance with an unexpected ending. It is full of action, humor and vivid characterization. The action takes place in an oil-boom town and New York City. Price $1.75.

THE GIRL FROM FOUR CORNERS

By Rebecca N. Porter

The very human love-story of a girl who, alone, has to make her way in a great city. There is ample incident in this stirring narrative and the plot moves with a swiftness that American readers enjoy. Price $1.75.

WILDERNESS SONGS

By Grace Hazard Conkling

Songs of joy and of sorrow, of war and of peace, of children, and of the hills and the woods and the fields by the author of "Afternoons in April." Price $1.50.

MANY MANY MOONS

By Lew Sarett

"The loon and the lingo, the sand and the syllables of North America are here. 'Many, Many Moons' says yes to life."—Carl Sandburg. Price $1.50.

THE CAIRN OF STARS

By Francis Carlin

Delightful Irish poems filled with the wit and the spirit and the legends of old Ireland. Price $1.60.

THE WORLD'S FOOD RESOURCES

By J. Russell Smith

Consulting expert for the War Trade Board

An important and comprehensive study of a world-wide problem. This book gives a vivid account of the history and distribution of the main sources of food. Profusely illustrated. Price $3.50.

ALL AND SUNDRY

By E. T. Raymond

Brilliant, witty word-pictures of famous contemporaries, including Foch, Wilson, the Prince of Wales, Conan Doyle, and others, by the author of "Uncensored Celebrities." Price $2.25.

JANE AUSTEN

By O. W. Firkins

An analysis of her novels from a twentieth century point of view, a special study of her realism, and an account of her life, her method of work and her narrow little world. With an Appendix, List of References and a complete Index. Price $1.75.

MASKS

By George Middleton

The sixth volume of one-act plays of modern American life by the author of "Embers," "Tradition," "Polly with a Past," "Adam and Eva," etc. Mr. Middleton is a recognized master of the one-act play. Price $1.60.

Recent Reprints

DAWN AND OTHER BRIEF PLAYS

By Percival L. Wilde

Short, sharp and decisive one-act plays of modern life. Perhaps the most popular collection of plays for acting in the Little Theatres. Price $1.60.

THE TORCH AND OTHER PATRIOTIC PAGEANTS

By Misses Thorp and Kimball

Four pageants suitable for children's patriotic festivals. They have stood the test of frequent performance. Price $1.60.

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY

Publishers of THE UNPARTIZAN REVIEW

19 West 44th Street New York City

Please mention THE REVIEW in writing to advertisers.

(Continued from page 410)

who render most of the services with which the time of our university leaders is squandered; that force is not a part of the administration proper.

By relieving the president of unnecessary burdens, we should make it possible for him to know his faculty. A man in his position may commonly be fairly well acquainted with one thousand persons; but the thousand or five hundred members of a university faculty are not usually the persons whom the president knows well, or desires to know best. The present nature of his position leads him to wish for an influential acquaintance outside the institution. He is likely to know all the trustees better than he knows all the faculty. He usually knows but a few of his faculty well. He ought to know every one of them, down to the newest assistant, before knowing any one else in the world. As it is, instructors come and go, meeting the head or chairman of a department often after the barest contact with the president, sometimes with none whatever.

By relieving him of all needless burdens, we should also render him free for a certain amount of intensive study in the field that was his before he became president; such freedom is even more necessary than that he should try to teach. In this way he would retain his ability to estimate the promise of candidates for positions on the faculty, and especially of those at the bottom of the ladder, from whose ranks are to be drawn the professors of the future.

Meanwhile, if the duties of the university president are to be reconstructed, a much better system should be introduced for the selection of faculties, and the advancement of the men already composing them; that is, if there can be said to be any system at present. Promotion should in some sense be an affair of the academic community, not a departmental one. This, as well as the selection of new professors who are called from other institutions, should be arranged at least by a committee of the faculty concerned, with the advice and consent of the president. His should be the veto power, but his vote in favor of a candidate should not be worth more than the vote of a member of the committee who understands the subject to be taught. As an executive, he should see to it that competent men examine every line the candidate has written, in order to determine, in the first place, whether the man is at bottom a scholar, and, in the second, whether he has the ability to communicate that sound learning which is a part of character.

Our country has run too far in the direction of what is called "administration." Everywhere we have developed a kind of genius for rendering administration complex and difficult. That the national tendency has invaded the realm of education hardly needs remark; there the mechanism of administration has become so involved as almost to throttle independent scholarship. Given the real scholar and teacher, the mechanism of teaching is simple. And whatever "administration" may signify at Washington, or in the collection of an income-tax, in the university it means, not government, but service.

The chief function of the university president is to be the intellectual leader of the institution—of its faculty, who are the intellectual leaders of the students. His first duty is to create a current of ideas in the organism of which he is the head. In choosing our university leaders, let us go to Europe in order to learn what sort of men are taken on the Continent for the heads of educational institutions, and what they do after they have been raised to places of eminence. And having chosen real scholars, let us make it possible for them to retain their scholarly leadership while they occupy the posts to which they have been advanced. Make the pay in money less, and the pay in honor more.

The president of an American university is, or should be, the intellectual leader of what is at once an aristocracy and a democracy of intellect and spirit. A true democracy is possible among scholars. How strange that, in this American commonwealth, the one place where true democracy might hope to flourish so frequently tends to become a pure bureaucracy, or an affable tyranny in the guise thereof.

PROFESSOR

Universal Training

THE war has taught us the possibilities of universal training for civic responsibilities. An excellent article on the subject in the April Atlantic by Mr. Frank E. Spaulding has now the additional merit of timeliness. Four years ago somewhat similar suggestions were made timidly here and there, but the country had not yet been shown what the instruction of the draft army could accomplish; even the advocates of preparedness, with the emergency of war before them, felt that anything not strictly military was out of consideration. Now, with the war over and with peace nevertheless no nearer than when war was on, the moment is peculiarly "psychological" for people to think nationally on such a subject as education. A new crop of cures for national ills, political, economic, social, springs up almost every night; but, fortunately, the American people, in spite of their good-natured toleration of quacks, have the habit of looking solidly to education for permanent results.

Whatever may be the pros and cons of purely military training, not many persons who visualize the problems that face us remain still unconvinced of the educative value of a year of compulsory training of some sort. It would serve as a redeemer of those physically below par. It would make sure, as isolated schooling with its variations could never do, that every man before he reached voting age spoke the English language and knew something of American institutions and ideals. It would supply, if properly conducted, technical skill to millions who would otherwise go untrained or poorly trained. Much more than this, it would bring together from every walk in life and subject to an indelibly democratic influence young men at the most formative period of their lives.

Indeed, it is not conversion to the general idea that people need so much as a specific plan. This Mr. Spaulding gives. His article, moreover, is not merely a statement of a plan for universal training, but reviews admirably, if briefly, the whole problem of its title, "Educating the Nation." The year of training for "civic responsibility" would therefore come as a related part of the whole scheme, concluding logically the years devoted to "essential elementary knowledge, training, and discipline" and to "occupational efficiency." Thus conceived and viewed in perspective, it takes on a reasonableness which it would in many cases lack if it were an isolated year stolen from a man already in full career. The plan has further merits: it provides a sufficient flexibility to meet the needs of those who would go to college and of those who would not, as well as of those, at present the majority, who would not even complete the regular secondary stage. Another important point is the advocacy of a Federal Department of Education, with its head a member of the Cabinet. In this connection the author speaks of "a certain degree of national direction," when he appears to mean "an uncertain degree"; but this uncertainty is not to be regretted for the present: in fact, it will scarcely be possible to determine the degree till the office is in working existence.

One serious defect of the plan is that the final year of training is to provide only for the "male youth of the land." Even though military training is part of the scheme, women gave abundant evidence during the late war that they were indispensable in war work which required special instruction. Furthermore, why should they be deprived of the benefits which the plan would bestow, and why should the country not enjoy a quickened sense of service in the "better

(Continued on page 414)

Longmans, Green & Co.'s New Books

"The most notable autobiography of the year just ended."—Springfield Republican.

Impressions That Remained—Memoirs

By ETHEL SMYTH, Mus. Doc. In two volumes. 8vo. With Portraits and other illustrations. $10.50 net

"It is a wonderfully facinating record of a fierce, passionate and courageous life."—Springfield Republican.

John Redmond's Last Years

By STEPHEN GWYNN. With Portrait. 8vo. $5.00 net.

"Captain Gwynn's work is one which every student of modern politics should read, and read at once. There has been no more important publication on the Irish question during recent years." —The Times (London).

Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death

By FREDERICK W. H. MYERS. A new and Abridged Edition by S. B. and L. H. M., with a Portrait and Biographical Sketch. Crown 8vo. $2.50 net.

With the present widespread interest in spiritualism and psychic phenomena there should be a special welcome for this cheaper edition.

Modern Science and Materialism

By HUGH ELLIOT, Author of "Modern Science and the Illusions of Prof. Bergson," "Herbert Spencer," etc. 8vo. $3.00 net.

"Mr. Elliot's unquestionably able book . . . states his stern ideas with the utmost simplicity and clarity."—Springfield Republican.

Morning Knowledge

The Story of the New Inquisition

By ALASTAIR SHANNON, Prisoner of War in Turkey. 8vo. Pp. xiv+366. $5.00 net.

This book presents a new philosophy of life, the essence of which may be briefly stated by the doctrine that Truth is not to be found through the medium of Logic, but must be created through that of Love. It was written mainly in dialogue form, when the author was confined as prisoner of war in Turkey.

The History of Trade Unionism

By SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB. 8vo. New Edition. $7.50 net.

This is more than a new edition, and would be more correctly described as a new book in which the work of 1894 is incorporated. The story from 1660 to 1890 has been rewritten with much new material, whilst the important developments from 1890 down to the autumn of 1919 have been elaborately dealt with.

New Novel by the Authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R. M.," "The Real Charlotte," etc.

Mount Music

By E. Œ. SOMERVILLE and MARTIN ROSS. $2.00 net.

"Readers of the never-to-be-forgotten Experiences of an Irish R. M., of In Mr. Knox's Country, of The Real Charlotte, and the other Somerville and Ross books, will find in this one a continuation of the delights contained in the others. . . . There is enough and to spare of fun, satire, and keen observation of character. . . . The reader will learn more about Ireland from reading Mount Music than from acres of Parliamentary oratory and Blue Books and . . . he will not know he is learning it. He will be having too good a time."—New York Times.

Salve Mater

By FREDERICK JOSEPH KINSMAN. Crown 8vo. $2.25 net.

Dr. Kinsman, who spent twenty-four years in the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was for eleven years Bishop of Delaware, recently resigned his post and was received into the Roman Catholic Church. In this book he gives the reasons which induced him to make this change. It includes also a criticism of the writer's own position in the past, and some discussion of various matters relating to Anglicanism and to Roman Catholicism.

Outspoken Essays

By the Very Rev. WILLIAM RALPH INGE, C.V.O., D.D., Dean of St. Paul's. Crown 8vo. $2.25 net.

"It is one of the few books of our times that will be read and studied fifty years hence. We believe that its influence will be profund, and profoundly Christian. . . . For Dr. Inge has something of a prophet's insight, courage, power to arrest attention, and strong personality. . . . It is a work of rare excellence and importance."—The Times (London).

The Confederation of Europe

A Study of the European Alliance, 1813-1823 as an Experiment in the International Organization of Peace.

By WALTER ALISON PHILLIPS, M.A., Lecky Professor of Modern History in the University of Dublin, Member of the Royal Irish Academy, Author of "Modern Europe," etc. Second Edition. 8vo. $5.00 net.

"The author has given us in this volume a distinct contribution to the cause of international organization."—Advocate of Peace.

A Handbook to the League of Nations

By Sir GEOFFREY BUTLER, K.B.E., M.A., Fellow, Librarian and Lecturer in International Law and Diplomacy of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., M.P. 8vo. $1.75 net.

"The book must inevitably become a hand book for the thoughtful students of the great theme it considers."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The Problem of Evil

Being an attempt to show that the existence of Sin and Pain in the world is not inconsistent with the Goodness and Power of God. $2.25 net.

By the Rev. PETER GREEN, M.A., Canon of Manchester; Chaplain to H. M. The King. Crown 8vo.

A New Quatermain Story

The Ancient Allan

By Sir H. RIDER HAGGARD. Colored Frontispiece and Wrapper. $1.75 net.

In this new story of ancient Egypt, Sir Rider Haggard brings back for still another adventure—and such an adventure—the immortal Allan Quatermain. To quote Allan himself, "This is the weirdest of all my experiences."

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., Publishers, 4th Avenue and 30th Street, New York

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED
LACKAWANNA
THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

(Continued from page 412)

half" of its citizens? A couple of generations ago the men might have replied gallantly to such a question, "Ah, the women! They do not need it!"—but now that we have reduced woman to a human being, who works and experiences cerebration, who pays taxes, who votes or is about to do so, we must care also for her education in civic responsibility. Not only are there many lines of technical work in which she takes an important part; she needs also the physical benefit, above all the democratizing experience of mixing for a year with young women from all walks of life. It may be contended, to be sure, that to double the number to be provided for would double the cost, while to supply special training for women, so different from that for men, would greatly complicate the problem. Such a contention may have a temporary, practical cogency, but it has no more logical force than a contention in favor of restricting the number of men called to one-half the actual number available. Sooner or later the year of training should include both sexes.

This would not be true, of course, if the training were to be purely military, but though there is provision for military training in the Spaulding plan—perhaps wisely if it is to meet with favor at the present time—the emphasis is rightly placed on training for civic responsibilities in time of peace. It is not merely that military training, by itself, is not constructive or productive in the normal life of a community or nation, or that, as the imminence of war recedes, it tends to become perfunctory, even vicious; the best training for war, as for peace, it has been found, involves a great deal that can not even remotely be called military. One of our schools, during the war, was greatly agitated over the question of what sort of war-work it should adopt. The boys naturally wanted to be as military as possible, but they did not take kindly to close-order drill, recommended by an army officer. It happened just then that a great man, back from the front, visited the school and reported that he had left the British soldiers in Houtholst Wood chopping trees and building pontoons. Noticing that there was a serious shortage of fuel in the neighborhood of the school, he said, "Why don't you chop wood, like the British soldiers?" — then added wisely, "You can call yourselves an engineer corps if you like." This is scarcely the whole field of military effort, to be sure, but it may serve to remind the fearful that military training may be more constructively useful than its name would imply, and to remind the zealous champions of isolated military training that any scheme of universal service which does not provide mainly for the occupations of peace will fail.

There is one important point on which Mr. Spaulding might have placed a different—or at least an additional—emphasis. "In no sense," he says, "would this year be a year out of the life of each one, a year simply donated to the service of the nation, or to preparation for such service. Quite the contrary: this year, considered solely from the standpoint of the individual's advantage, would prove to be the most profitable year in the life of every young man." It may be quite necessary to call attention to the benefits which the individual will enjoy (and they are unquestionable) if only to meet the objections which might be made my many members of the A. E. F., who apparently represent much of the opposition to universal training at least of a purely military character. That is, it might be impossible to "sell the idea" if the man who is to pay taxes to support it, and is to give his time as well, does not clearly realize that he will benefit personally. The most important feature of any such plan, nevertheless, is the fact that every citizen will have not merely an opportunity but an obligation to give himself, to give more than mere cash, to his country. During the recent draft, though many received great benefits and appreciated the fact, none went with the delusion that he was going primarily for the benefit to himself. It was an act of service, and from it resulted an exaltation which, though too often temporary, did actually make many men into finer stuff. It is a grave question whether this idea, fundamental in any plan of universal service, can be "infiltrated" successfully if the work is launched with other avowed motives. Without universal service as the idea behind universal training, any plan is likely to be still-born.

WALTER S. HINCHMAN

Education for the Cotton Industry

As one passes from Richmond, Virginia, to Birmingham, Alabama, one is never long out of hearing of the whistle of the cotton mill. By its sound, over half a million people are called to their daily toil, largely people of Anglo-Saxon lineage, called from an agricultural life among the hills and mountains of North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee down into the industrial centres of the Piedmont. The homes of these operatives are a part of the mill property, and the mill superintendent is in many respects their absolute monarch, benevolent or otherwise according to the individual bent of his character. These superintendents, and the lesser officials under them, are men who have risen from the ranks during the generation now passing away, and the call for new leaders to take their places is heard throughout the textile mill region.

The most hopeful answer, so far, is the founding of the Textile Industrial Institute, of Spartanburg, South Carolina. In connection with it, a model cotton mill has been constructed, providing a self-help department for students and a practical laboratory for textile work, thus constituting an endowment for the school. It is claimed to be the best built, best equipped, and best organized cotton mill in existence, and will be operated as a kind of "service station" for the cotton industry of the entire South. Incidentally, it is experimenting with the plan of eliminating the cost-increasing middle-man by selling its product direct to the consumer through the parcels post. Its promise of helpfulness to the entire cotton industry is vouched for by the fact that cotton mills generally, as well as the manufacturers of cotton working ma-

(Continued on page 416)

DIVIDEND NOTICE

Westinghouse Electric
& MANUFACTURING COMPANY

A Dividend of two per cent. ($1.00 per share) on the COMMON Stock of this Company, for the quarter ending March 31, 1920, will be paid April 30, 1920, to stockholders of record as of April 2, 1920.

H. F. BAETZ, Treasurer.

New York, March 24, 1920.

Investment Offerings

THE well-diversified list of bonds, notes, and preferred stocks contained in the current issue of our monthly booklet, Investment Recommendations, will assist you in making opportune investments with attractive yields.

Our BOND DEPARTMENT will be pleased to send you this booklet on request, and to consult with you concerning your individual investment requirements.

Guaranty Trust Company of New York
140 Broadway
Fifth Ave. & 43rd St. 268 Grand St. Madison Ave. & 60th St.

Capital and Surplus..... $50,000,000
Resources more than.... $800,000,000

Oldest Banking House in the United States

The house of Alex. Brown & Sons was founded in the year 1800—120 years ago.

For more than a century the house has steadfastly maintained the highest standards of financial service for its customers.

Investments are offered only after the most careful and efficient investigation.

Large estates can best be protected and are frequently much benefited by a special study conducted by investment experts.

This is particularly true at the present time on account of changed values due to the war and subsequent conditions.

We make investment studies without charge, recommending such changes as conditions or new tax laws render advisable.

The strictest confidential relations are adhered to in our transactions with customers.

ALEX. BROWN & SONS
(Oldest Banking House in the United States)
Baltimore, Maryland

THE ROAD TO UNITY AMONG THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES

By CHARLES W. ELIOT, LL.D.
President Emeritus of Harvard University.

This address demonstrates that creeds and dogmas have always failed to produce either uniformity or permanence in religious thought and practice and predicts that if the divided churches would submerge their theoretical differences they would find society generally favorable to union for the worship of God and the service of man.

It is particularly fitting that this book should appear at the moment when the attention of the laymen of the several denominations is concentrated upon the future welfare of the churches.

80 Pages. $1.00 Net. $1.10 by Mail.

Books of Permanent Worth

Send for Complete Catalogue.

THE BEACON PRESS
25 Beacon Street Boston, Mass.

RADICAL propaganda finds in the present period of world changes a greater opportunity for its spread and potent influence than it has known heretofore.

THE REVIEW was founded to dispute the teachings of the intellectual radical journals. They have made dangerous headway even among loyal Americans.

THE REVIEW is making real headway in the work of tempering radical aspirations to the condition of true liberalism and of promoting constructive measures instead of destructive experiments.

THE REVIEW
$5 a year

140 Nassau St.,
New York

(Continued from page 415)

chinery, have made liberal donations to its construction.

This model mill, just going into operation, is to be operated entirely by the student body of the Textile Industrial Institute. The plan divides them into two sections, each with its own superintendent, overseers, section hands, loom fixers, and operatives. These organizations will operate the plant on alternate weeks. For the week of work in the mill, the student receives pay sufficient to support him for two weeks. The section in charge in any given week is subdivided into two shifts, each working ten hours a day, but for four hours of this time the shifts overlap. By this arrangement the student runs his job alone for six hours, runs it and teaches a student of lower rank for two hours, and works as a learner on a new job, under a more advanced student, for the remaining two hours. In this way no student is put in charge of any new work until he has had a turn at it under direct supervision of one who has already had experience. Everything from the opening of the bale of raw material to the taking of mailbags of the finished product to the train will be done by students, and no student will be admitted to the classroom work who is not willing to work alternate weeks in the model mill.

In its classroom work the Institute does not aim to give a general education, but frankly confines itself to its narrow specialty. Its text-books are those of the textile industry alone, with the exception of a somewhat broader outlook in the commercial department, where the principles of cost accounting, etc., of course have a more general application. As the primary purpose is to provide leaders for the industry, not simply to increase the efficiency of the rank and file, the classroom work gives opportunity for specialization in such branches as loom-fixing, designing, bleaching, dyeing, mercerizing, carding, and spinning. On the financial side, it is not the intention to treat the model mill as a mere adjunct of the school, not necessarily self-supporting, but to keep it steadily on an efficient production basis.

GRACE ORB

MISS ORB describes a very commendable educational project, all the more commendable because it is just what it purports to be—education for a highly specialized purpose only—and because it is just where it ought to be—within the precincts of the cotton industry itself, dealing with those who have already given themselves to that special industry, and not attempting to form an integral part of a more general and fundamental course of education. No thoughtful person would wish to belittle the importance of special education of just this type. But it should pass for what it is—technical preparation for a particular task, and not that education of broader scope which must be sought from studies not so closely harnessed up with the material necessities of the present hour. The important thing is to realize that they are two different things.

THE University of the State of New York is engaged in active coöperation with the public schools for the conservation of birds and trees. A recent bulletin, sent to all the schools, is filled with material well adapted to interest school children, from the pens of John M. Clarke, of the State Museum; Homer D. House, State Botanist; Edward F. McCarthy, of the State College of Forestry, and George D. Pratt, Conservation Commissioner. The birds, we are told in this bulletin, are the main reliance for holding in check the noxious insects which constitute the greatest menace to the food supply of mankind. The Visual Instruction Division of the University has a list of 700 lantern slides to lend, illustrating 162 species of the birds of New York, made from living specimens of the birds themselves, their nests and eggs in normal position, their habitat, etc. A proper utilization of this opportunity would be of immeasurable value in putting bird conservation on an intelligent basis.

MISS L. W. HILL, formerly director of physical education at Wellesley College, called much needed attention at the recent State Conference of Massachusetts high school principals to the "Relations of Correct Muscular Habits to Personal Efficiency." Of one hundred and ninety-seven high schools which responded to a questionnaire one hundred and twenty-three reported that they had no gymnasiums, and of these ninety reported no courses in physiology, hygiene, or health habits. These figures, though they do not cover all the schools of the State, are fairly representative of a region which in educational matters is among the most forward-looking.

What is perhaps equally significant, physical education, where it does exist, is often little more than a name. It is not merely that competent instructors and adequate equipment are rare. In many schools where there is a possibility of better things physical training is still classed with athletics as something to be permitted if the pupil has satisfied the scholastic requirements. It may be that our Puritan inheritance tells us to distrust anything which might prove to be fun. At all events, it is unusual, almost unknown, to find a school where a pupil is given more physical training, even more athletics, because he is doing poorly in his studies; though such a prescription might conceivably, if not commonly, be the best one.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 50 New York, Saturday, April 24, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 417
Editorial Articles:
"The Review" and the Treaty 420
Governor Smith's Opportunity 421
The Vatican 422
Turks and Germans 423
Greek at Oxford 424
Lord Bryce on Turkey and Armenia 425
The Naval Inquiry. By S. P. 426
The Bolsheviks' Horn of Plenty. By Jerome Landfield 428
Correspondence 430
Book Reviews:
"The Real Nature of Man" 433
America Unveiled 434
Italy Warm and Cold 434
The Autumn of the Middle Ages 435
The Run of the Shelves 436
Heine's Buried Memoirs. By Michael Monahan 438
"Impressions de Voyage." By Caspar F. Goodrich 440
Drama:
Andreyev at the Neighborhood Playhouse. By O. W. Firkins 441
Problems of Labor and Capital:
III.—Compulsory Filing of Collective Bargaining Agreements. By Morris L. Ernst 442
Books and the News:
New American Books. By Edmund Lester Pearson 443

GENERAL WOOD'S campaign for the Presidential nomination rests fundamentally upon what he has done. The signal success of his administration in Cuba, his leadership in the organizing of officers' training during the years preceding the war, and his efficiency in the execution of every duty that has devolved upon him constitute a very respectable claim to support. But a candidate, either for nomination or for election as President, is judged not only by what he has done but quite as much by what he says. In response to a formal request by the New York Tribune, General Wood has answered the question "What do you regard as the most important issues of the Presidential campaign?" in two columns of utter banality. If he had said in a few words that he regarded it as premature, or for any reason unwise, to define the issues at this time, the answer might have been disappointing, but it would not have been ridiculous. To talk about twenty things, and say nothing worth while about any of them, is a desolating performance. It would not take many exhibitions of that kind to put General Wood out of the running.

MR. HOOVER, if he should be nominated at Chicago, will have one specific advantage that will make great play in the campaign. All the candidates will doubtless talk about cutting down the enormous expenses of the Government, but Hoover is the one man whose promises on that subject will be taken at anything like par. Not that others may not be equally sincere, and also fairly able; but bringing down the vast structure of governmental expense is a task which calls for much more than sincerity and fair ability. The public has been too often disappointed, in the States and in the nation, to put more than a very faint trust in the expectations aroused by even the most well-meaning pledges of economy. The prospect of a budget system, now very favorable, is an encouraging element, to be sure; but no system will automatically work out the great task before us. In the field of administration and coördination, in the field of scientific adjustment of ways and means, Mr. Hoover is a master. It is coming to be recognized, too, that Government expenditure is a not inconsiderable factor in the high cost of living. The candidate who embodies in his own person a real pledge of improvement in this vital matter will have a preferential standing with the voters which it will take mighty solid claims on the part of his opponent to overcome.

ONE of Senator Johnson's managers states that he is "authorized to say for the Senator that it is not intended to let him be nominated for a hitching-post." Whether the contemptuous designation of "hitching-post" is justified or not, Mr. Johnson is quite right in declaring that he wants the Presidential nomination or nothing. The Vice-Presidency is in fact an office of very great importance, for experience has but too often taught us that the succession to the Presidency is not a merely theoretical attribute of it. The nominee for Vice-President ought to be a man of Presidential calibre. But by the same token he ought to be a man whose candidacy is in keeping with, and not in contrast to, that of the head of the ticket. The very worst thing that the Chicago Convention could do would be to make its ticket a "good Lord, good Devil" combination.

HERESY-HUNTING legislation at Albany may have one consequence which will put the New York lawmakers into the class of those who build better than they know. They are doing their best to discredit the existing political institutions of America, but it is quite possible that their performance may result in giving an unexpected "boost" to one of the most essential of those institutions. The bills which are designed to exclude the Socialist party from the official ballot, and to disqualify the individual members of that party from holding public office, appear quite clearly to collide with the civic rights guaranteed to all citizens by the Constitution of the State of New York. If those two bills are passed, there can be very little doubt that the courts will promptly and emphatically make waste paper of them, and then won't it be delightful to see what the radicals will have to say about that fossilized remnant of mediævalism, the American judiciary!

LLOYD GEORGE and Millerand are fighting a duel at San Remo, with their Italian and Belgian colleagues in attendance as witnesses.

Opportunism is pitted against consistency, each buttressed with an equal amount of sagacity. The tactician of expediencies has found a strong antagonist in the Frenchman, who stubbornly refuses to join him in his living from hand to mouth. Lloyd George looks a day, Millerand a generation, ahead, and confronted with so widely different perspectives, they will hardly succeed in viewing in the same light the objects of their common observation. The policy towards Germany is one, the treatment of Turkey is another. A year ago Lloyd George used the threat of an economic blockade to meet the danger of Spartacism in Germany; to-day he has recourse to it again as a preventive against a militarist revolt. France always insisted, and still insists, on the necessity of military coercion to repress any attempt on Germany's part to violate the peace terms she has signed. In the Turkish problem French suspicion of British aims is at the bottom of the dissension. As to the chief punitive measures to be taken the two Premiers seem to be in perfect agreement, but the question how to deal with the new situation that will arise after the signing of the treaty threatens to prove a source of fresh discord.

"SUBSTITUTES for cocktails" the disappointed hard drinker would doubtless call the little sallies into the emotional which are now so plentiful. Warm regard for Bolshevism, which is insinuated here and there by decorous people, is the most peculiar phase of this outburst. It is not explained by the confused information coming from Russia. It springs from the heart and the imagination. The overthrow of the Tsar's Government let loose an idea of brotherhood which proved to be all too stimulating to many mortals. Somehow, somewhere Liberty was to set up its residence on earth, and the tyranny practised by the Bolsheviks has not been quite able to destroy the vision. One recalls the lookers-on at the festival of the Romanticists during the few decades after the French Revolution. Pantisocracy, Shelley's new plan of government, the dreams of the Schlegels thrilled in those days the hearts of many who had no intention of practising the new proposals for living. From these they merely extracted a heady sort of vicarious experience. If there is haunting beauty to be found in the Bolsheviks' order of government, we pray that some artist may perpetuate it in verse or fiction so that the emotional in man may worship it at a distance instead of, as now, flirting dangerously with it as a possible ingredient of our democracy.

IT is difficult these days not to be the bedfellow of a radical, especially the sentimental radical. As a liberal, you may be constantly fighting his views, and yet as you confront the various practical issues of the day, there he is by your side. You opposed the Treaty in the form in which it came from Versailles, and so did he—but for a different reason. You have a kindly feeling for Mr. Hoover, so has he. You think that the five Socialists should not have been excluded from the Albany Assembly, so does he. You disapprove of giving soldiers the bonus, he does too. Yet the more he is with you, the more you are against him. For you realize how dangerous is his propaganda, which, in the name of liberalism, is seeking not only to prevent the return to power of reactionary forces, but to wipe out those prerogatives of the individual which have been the cornerstone of our democracy. The situation is one which requires all good Americans to have a real reason, and not merely a vague feeling, for the politics which they espouse.

THE movement to put the men of the nation into overalls discovers at the outset one grave disadvantage —the first step, and one which bids fair to cost more and more, is the purchase of a suit of overalls. Denim, being made of cotton, is not cheap now, and by the time the ingenuity of tailors has had opportunity to conspire with the natural vanity of man a really natty suit of overalls will cost almost anything you choose to pay. If the weather is warm enough to wear the new garment in lieu of a suit of alleged wool, well and good; cotton is the only wear for hot weather. But if the overalls are worn in the old-fashioned way over one's ordinary clothes, economy sickens and dies. There is more to be hoped from a general consent to go on wearing old clothes. Possibilities in that direction have not yet begun to be realized. The patched suit, the battered hat, the quite impossible shoes have not yet appeared. Let them come forth. The business demands courage, but it need involve no lowering of morale. The spirit of the summer holiday will put us through, the spirit which delights to honor the camper whose sartorial ruin is most nearly complete. It is not necessary to make this the occasion for the upbuilding of an elaborate clothes philosophy, though there may accrue to society some indirect benefits from anything which will remind both those who, formerly ill-dressed, are now at least expensively dressed and those who, accustomed of old to go well-clad, now hold their patch a badge of honor, that clothes do not make the man. Whatever benefit accrues will be chiefly to the individual, who thus has it in his power to save a little money for something else, and who in many ways will profit through having the advantage of this particular bit of economy brought strikingly to his mind.

ANOTHER army that has not demobilized with the cessation of major hostilities is the Salvation Army. They go marching on, and, that they may march the better, they are planning to ask the public, in May, for ten million dollars. To make up this sum a good many pennies will have to rattle into the old tambourine, but a good many pennies are needed if such enterprises as the recently dedicated Memorial Training College in the Bronx are to be successfully carried forward. Beyond doubt, the pennies will be forthcoming in a sufficient abundance. The Salvation Army has made good. The immortal cruller proclaims it.

Success, however, is not without its perils, and the Salvation Army might profitably ponder the history of the Friar movement, which, though it is a matter of some eight hundred years ago, still carries a lesson that is worth heeding.

SWEDEN'S experiment with an exclusively Socialist Cabinet will be watched by her neighbors with intense interest. The Socialism of the new Ministers is of that moderate type which during the war did not refuse to share the responsibility for the Government with the liberal party. The political crisis, which put an end to the coöperation of the entire left, was brought on by the friction between Liberals and Socialists over the municipal taxes bill proposed by the Socialist Minister of Finance Thorsson. Hjalmar Branting's acceptance of the King's request to form a new Ministry was the logical, though not generally expected, solution of the crisis. Branting's programme, as outlined by him to a correspondent of the Associated Press, has little of the revolutionary in it. Socialization of certain branches of production and commerce is, of course, a plank in his platform, but the question will first be thoroughly investigated by committees composed not entirely of friends of such social legislation, but also of able men of other opinion. He wants the Parliament to determine to what extent the development or evolution of the country shall go in accord with the Socialist programme. Without the Liberals' support the Socialists will not be able to realize their legislative plans. It remains to be seen whether Branting's moderation can resist the pressure from the left wing of his party which, if Minister Thorsson's taxation schemes should be defeated, will demand, as they openly declare, the dissolution of the Parliament and new elections so as to obtain an absolute Socialist majority in both Chambers. "This Government is for the whole of the people and not a party government," said Branting to his interviewer. The Premier's more radical comrades will put his impartiality to a severe test.

MR. MIRZA'S communication on the Anglo-Persian treaty, which appears in our correspondence columns, combines with an expression of distrust in England's sincerity a just appreciation of the cultural task which the English-speaking people perform. The Persian nation has a great history, and is, for the part it played in the distant past, entitled to the respect due to culture and age. But former greatness, the traces of which are preserved in its monuments, lays obligations on the people which it has failed to fulfill. The peasant and the fellah are in a miserable plight, and the men in power are ready to barter their own honor and their country's freedom for money. In a country where high and low are thus demoralized the right of self-determination should be applied with the greatest caution. For the determining factor would be the small intelligentsia from which the backshish-taking Cabinet members are recruited, and the peasant's and the fellah's lot would remain just the same. English supervision of the government, though humiliating for the educated class, may redound to the welfare of a larger portion of the people than would benefit by absolute political independence. We do not defend the treaty by which Great Britain, contrary to the spirit of the League of Nations Covenant, has gained control of Persian affairs, but disapproval of the course taken should not make us blind to the advantages which may be won at the goal.

MIGRATORY birds are no longer at the mercy of the most lax State legislation, or absence of legislation, with which their habits may bring them into contact. The Supreme Court has handed down a decision sustaining the migratory bird act, passed by Congress in 1918. This act put into effect, with suitable penalties, our treaty with Great Britain, negotiated shortly before, for the protection of birds whose seasonal movements involve both British and United States territory. The law was attacked by authorities of Missouri, on the ground that it interferes with the sovereignty of the State and the property rights of its citizens. The decision is an important victory for the policy of wild life conservation, and clears the field for whatever Congressional action may still be necessary to protect migratory birds from extinction on American soil.

EXTERMINATION of any form of bird life not positively harmful is becoming more and more repugnant to right-thinking people; but when it threatens the most beautiful of all birds, just because they are beautiful, the wrong is greatly aggravated. Add to this the most revolting cruelty in the methods by which extermination is being accomplished, and it might seem that nothing could delay the adoption of preventive measures. But where both feminine fashion and selfish financial interests are involved, the problem is not so simple, as we have learned from the long fight necessary to secure such protective legislation as has been adopted in our own country. In England, just before the war, Sir Charles Hobhouse had pushed to the committee stage in the House of Commons a bill to restrain what the Spectator denounces as "the barbarous and grossly uneconomic trade" in bird plumage for millinery purposes, but the stress of war legislation crowded the matter out. The fight has now been renewed, through bills introduced into the House of Commons by Colonel Yate, and into the House of Lords by Lord Aberdeen, with an apparently fair chance of favorable action. At present London is the great feather market of the world, and about the best the interests involved can say by way of defense is that if the trade is driven from England, it will go to Paris and Amsterdam. One recalls the defense which Cowper put into the mouths of the slave traders long ago:

> Besides, if we do, the French, Dutch and Danes
> Will heartily thank us, no doubt, for our pains.

The editor of the Spectator suggests that women who wear the feathers of the albatross should read "The Ancient Mariner" once a year, to develop a duly haunting sense of remorse.

"The Review" and the Treaty

MR. JAMES M. BECK'S letter in the Review for April 10 has brought out several interesting letters which appear in our issue of to-day, some upholding and some opposing Mr. Beck's view of Senator Lodge and of the treaty. One of our correspondents makes a point concerning the whole position of the Review throughout the treaty debate which is worthy of special attention. He complains that our treatment has not been "definite and clear" and has been lacking in a "large conception" of the subject. We freely admit that there is a great deal of truth in this criticism. But we do not feel that we have anything to apologize for.

From beginning to end there has been in our mind one dominant thought. The world was in the presence of a situation of such appalling gravity that any language that could be applied to it would fall short of the reality. To bring to bear upon it the united wisdom and good will, the united power and resources, of the leading nations of the world was from the start, and is to-day, the supreme need of the hour. If anyone had predicted on the day of the armistice that division of opinion in the United States was going to result in international paralysis extending over a period of eighteen months or two years, and that at the end of that time our country would still be in the nondescript position that now confronts us, he would have been pronounced a ridiculous pessimist. But if, in some way, people had become convinced that there was real danger of such an outcome—that, in fact, this thing was sure to happen unless we got together on some practicable basis—what would have been the attitude of men of sense upon the question? Can there be any doubt that they would have stood together as one man and insisted that a way be found to avert such a calamity?

"Large conceptions" are very well in their place. But there are times when that is truly the largest conception which centres itself upon the practical need of the moment. Mr. Wilson had been feeding the world on the East wind of his large conceptions, with practical results that there is now little joy in contemplating. Then came the "100 per cent. Americans" of the type of Borah and Johnson, with their large conceptions of America, the hem of whose garment must not be soiled by any touch of obligation to work in concord with other nations to save the world from chaos. Mr. Wilson's large conception was to the effect that by a stroke of the pen all the nations of the world could be brought immediately into Utopian harmony. Mr. Borah's and Mr. Johnson's large conception was that that same stroke of the pen would reduce America to a state of servile dependence, a condition in which her best blood was to flow on Old-World battlefields at the behest of a council of foreign statesmen. It was a small conception, perhaps, that both these views were the product of an inflamed imagination. It was an uninteresting view to hold that the League Covenant was neither the herald of the millennium nor the doom of liberty. But to one who did hold it, nine-tenths of the disputes upon which the great flood of oratory and argument has been expended were matter of indifference in comparison with the supreme need of practical action.

That supreme need the Review has recognized from the beginning. The one reservation that it has felt to be important to make in the Covenant was that relating to Article X. Upon the exact definition of the obligation which that Article imposes, with and without the proposed reservations, and of the degree of obligation which we ought to be willing to accept, we have, to the best of our ability, repeatedly expressed our views. We have regarded nothing else in the way of reservations as vitally necessary, and have said so.

What we have regarded as vitally necessary is that President and Senate should get together on any basis that was possible. It must be remembered that before the treaty was completed the two points chiefly insisted on by objectors to the original form of the Covenant were that our participation should be terminable upon short notice, and that the Monroe Doctrine should be safeguarded. In the treaty as submitted, both these points had been conceded; in a form open, indeed, to some objection, but surely the slight modification required offered no fatal obstacle to the adoption of the treaty. With these points covered, and with Article X interpreted or modified by a reasonable reservation, there was nothing in the Covenant which, in a dispassionate view, furnished occasion for patriotic alarm—unless, indeed, such alarm was justified by any form of League whatsoever. Borah and Johnson were fundamentally opposed to any League; their position, whether right or wrong, was a perfectly intelligible and respectable one. The Lodge position, on the other hand, was one that made mountains out of molehills; and we saw little profit in applying a microscope to the molehills.

The great question before the nation, from first to last, was this: Was there any possible way of putting the treaty through without danger to the future of the country? Mr. Wilson had—very wrongly in our judgment—made the League Covenant part of the treaty. To reject the Covenant and save the treaty was absolutely out of the question. It only remained to consider whether any reservations which Mr. Wilson and the Allies might reasonably be asked to accept would suffice to make the treaty safe for America. Borah and Johnson have consistently answered this with an emphatic No. The Republican "mild reservationists" answered it with a distinct Yes. Mr. Lodge has all along been virtually saying both Yes and No. It is true that on the face of the record he stands opposed to the "irreconcilables" and in favor of acceptance with reservations. We believe that in fact he has been desirous of such acceptance. But he has not made the country feel that he was sincerely devoted to that object. Probably at least half the people who applaud what he has done are thankful to him not because he has modified the Covenant, but because in their opinion he has destroyed it. Not for one moment has he made the country feel that he regarded the adoption of the treaty as an object of supreme moment. Yet nothing would have been easier, if such was really his conviction, than to make it perfectly clear to all. Had he done so, he would have had behind him the overwhelming support of public sentiment.

The country has never sympathized with President Wilson's position that the Covenant must be adopted without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. Had Mr. Lodge made it plain from the start that there were certain definite and reasonable changes that he wanted, but that if these were made he and those who followed him would be heart and soul for the treaty, he would have put the President into an absolutely untenable position. Mr. Wilson's obstinacy might have been proof against even such a situation; but the blame would have rested squarely and exclusively on his shoulders. Mr. Lodge has presented the figure not of a great captain leading his forces towards a clear objective, but of a guerrilla chief harrying his opponent by a series of haphazard manœuvres, and winding up at the end in a position dictated by chance rather than by design. Indeed, at the close, he presented the queer spectacle of matching the President's insistence that not an i should be dotted nor a t crossed, by his own insistence that unless every i was dotted and every t crossed just as he had done it the treaty could not be allowed to go through.

An intense conviction that the League of Nations is a bad thing, root and branch, is full justification for the position of the irreconcilables. And a conviction far less extreme would in ordinary times justify an indefinite amount of hesitation or obstruction. But in the situation of the world as it was at the close of the great war, and has continued ever since, all considerations of remote possibilities of evil shrink into nothingness alongside the stupendous evils that have come, and that will continue to come, through our failure to take our place alongside the other great nations in the restoration of settled conditions in a distracted world. To discuss the treaty as though it were a fresh proposal, upon which every one could seek to engraft his own views of what is theoretically best, is to substitute for the duties of statesmanship the exercises of a debating society. There is no little resemblance between the clamor for perfection in the treaty and the clamor of the pacifists during the war for an exact definition of its aims. The business during the war was to make war; the business after the war was to make peace, and gradually to restore the world to a normal condition and a normal state of mind. If anybody can see in the minutiæ of the various minor reservations an object as important as that, he is quite welcome to the enjoyment of his "large conception." As for ourselves, the bigness of the immediate duty has quite dwarfed any interest we might otherwise have taken in the intellectual disputations to which those minutiæ have given rise.

Governor Smith's Opportunity

WHAT seemed at the opening of the session of the New York Legislature to be a hasty act of folly has proved to be the precursor of a series of deliberate violations of the first principles of American liberty. Four bills, all of them bearing the name of Mr. Lusk, chairman of the Senate Legislative Committee, and aimed at the suppression either of Socialistic teaching or of Socialistic activity in the political field, have been running a triumphant course in the Legislature. Two of them have been passed, and there is no doubt of the speedy passage of the other two. It rests with the Governor to decide whether these bills shall actually disfigure the statute-book of the State of New York, at least with the consent of its chief executive.

No greater opportunity for an act of courage, and of signal importance to the future of American institutions, has presented itself to any American Governor in many years. What evil genius has taken possession of the Legislature, and impelled it to the adoption of a course repugnant to the deepest feelings of every man who knows what civil liberty is, we can not undertake to determine. But we feel confident that a ringing word from Governor Smith, asserting the inviolable principles of freedom and the fundamental rights of citizens in a republic would meet with an enthusiastic response, and break the spell under which the bulk of the members of the Legislature have been following the lead of a few shallow politicians.

It requires no legal learning, nor anything but an ordinary sense of the spirit of our institutions, to realize the sinister nature of these bills. But fortunately the Bar Association of the City of New York has a standing committee whose duty it is to report on the character of proposed legislation of importance. This committee, consisting of nine eminent lawyers, chosen, of course, with no reference to any such question, has registered its unsparing condemnation of the bills. Of the education bills, the committee says:

> These bills may be aptly described as bills to Prussianize the educational system and the intellectual activities of the State of New York, although it may well be doubted whether the late Imperial German Government, destroyed by the over-development of its regulatory powers, even in its heyday ever perpetuated such a frank and undisguised attempt at casting into a rigid mould the thought and intellectual development of its subjects.

The essential feature of one of the education bills is that which forbids the operation of any school, or the giving of a course of instruction on any subject, except under a license from the Board of Regents, which license shall not be granted unless the Regents are satisfied that the instruction proposed will not be "detrimental to the public interest." The obvious consequence of this, as the Bar Association committee says, is that the members of that board are to be permitted to suppress any and all opinions with which their preconceived ideas do not correspond. The other education bill empowers the Commissioner of Education to revoke the certificate of qualification of any teacher in the public schools if, in his opinion, the teacher is not "loyal to the institutions of the United States and of the State and laws thereof." And upon the exercise of this blanket power of indefinite proscription no check is placed, since there is no provision for a hearing on proceedings for the granting or for the revocation of a certificate.

The two political bills are even more extraordinary in their character. One of them excludes from the definition of a party under the Election law any organization which advocates "principles, doctrines, or policies" that "tend, if carried into effect, to the destruction, subversion or endangering of the existing governments of the United States and of the State of New York, and of the rights, privileges and institutions secured under such constitutions." The other bill makes ineligible to public office any person who is a member of such organization. There is evidently no limit to the possibilities of this proscriptive decree. There is hardly any change of a really important kind that does not tend to endanger some of the "rights" or "privileges" or "institutions" which at a given time are secured by the Constitution of the State or of the United States. If such a law had been in operation before the Civil War, no advocate of the abolition of slavery could have sat in Congress, or even in a State Legislature. Members of any association devoted to the propagation of Henry George's doctrine of the single tax would be ineligible to public office today if the principle of this bill were put into execution. And there have been times when in the opinion of large numbers, sometimes indeed of a majority, of the people of some of our States, members of the Catholic Church came very distinctly under the ban which the bill pronounces. But without invoking these examples —which, however, are by no means fantastic—it ought to suffice for any man grounded in the principles of liberty to recognize that the bill is intended to suppress the voice and to extinguish the political rights of those of our fellow-citizens who honestly believe in the principles of socialism. If the bills become law the State of New York will have the shameful distinction of having set the first example of a kind of tyranny to which not only the liberal nations of Europe, but the despotic government of Prussia, had not found it necessary to take recourse.

The most flagrant evil of these measures lies in their departure from the American tradition, their betrayal of the principles of liberty. But they are as pernicious from the standpoint of expediency as from that of principle. Every enemy of our institutions will have reason to rejoice in their passage. The Socialist and the Communist will find in them the seed of thousands of conversions. Even more welcome will their enactment be to the unavowed Socialists and Communists who, without perhaps knowing just what they are after, delight in discrediting the existing order. They will exultingly point to these laws as confirmation of all that they have been saying about the eclipse of liberty in America. Those who have felt, as we have, that these assertions were in the main exaggerations and vain imaginings will find it impossible to deny that, so far as the Legislature of the leading State in the Union is concerned, the charges have received substantial confirmation. Those are doing the best work for the strengthening of our Government, and for resistance to the Socialist danger, who speak out without mincing matters upon this course of folly and outrage. The New York Tribune in particular is splendidly performing this duty. Again and again, in the course of this anti-Socialist madness, the Tribune has lifted up its voice in most emphatic protest. Of the Lusk bills it declares that "they represent apostasy to all the deep principles of Americanism." In spite of all that has happened, we still believe that the action of the New York Legislature is a political freak, and that "the deep principles of Americanism" will before long triumphantly reassert themselves. To Governor Smith is given the rare privilege of making himself the spokesman of those principles in a way that will be of vital service to his State, and that will gain for him the respect and admiration of the whole country.

The Vatican

OF the two great international organizations, the Roman Catholic Church and the Socialist Internationale, it is the Church alone that has stood the test of the war. The rigidity of the Socialist doctrine drove a wedge between its orthodox and its temporizing adherents. But the Mother Church has not lost part of its fold to a third Catholic Internationale. It has, on the contrary, come out of the war with its power and prestige considerably increased, in spite of the overthrow of ancient dynasties which had always been looked upon as pillars of the Curia. The fall of the Hapsburgs, the reduction of Austria to a small and powerless state, the change from monarchic to republican government in Germany, meant a diminution of influence for the Vatican necessitating an entire re-orientation. But the Roman Church has always shown great pliability in adapting itself to unavoidable reverses. The readiness with which the German Centre Party accepted co-responsibility for the Government with the Socialists affords a striking example of that elasticity which easily yields where resistance would bring on disaster. In Belgium also Roman Catholic Ministers sit in the Cabinet which counts Socialists and Liberals among its members. And in Italy Signor Nitti receives the support of the Roman Catholics newly organized as a political party. The universal fear of the red danger has facilitated this change in political conduct, as the other parties readily accepted the coöperation of the Catholics, who, as members of an international church, were better organized than they to oppose the spread of Communist tendencies.

The Vatican, therefore, could view with indifference its exclusion from the counsels of the Peace Conference. The veto of Italy, which prevented the Curia from being represented at Versailles, could not prevent its power from affecting the destinies of the new Europe. France had to recognize it officially by the resumption of diplomatic relations with the Vatican. The anti-clericalism of Combes had proved a cause of weakness to France during the war; it had alienated clerical sympathies in neutral countries, and thus prepared a fertile soil for German agitation against France. A reconciliation with Rome would strengthen the country's international position. The return of Alsace-Lorraine afforded a welcome pretext for such a step. For these provinces the Concordat was still in force, and as their population is preponderantly and devoutly Catholic it would have been a reckless and foolish policy to arouse its resentment by extending the effects of the rupture with Rome to the recovered territory. So Millerand chose the wiser course, which is no "truckling to the papacy," as l'Humanité called it, but a step in the interest of France. For by the use of this pretext it regained the good-will of the Vatican, which the French Government needs in reestablishing its former right to extend its protection over the Catholic missions in the Near East. As the League of Nations' mandatory over Syria, France would lack prestige in the eyes of the Christians of that country if her protectorate over those missions were not recognized by the Holy See.

In her policy with regard to Poland, France has a natural ally in Rome. The revival of Poland is a compensation to the Vatican for the fall of the Hapsburg and German dynasties. For the Poles, in their long resistance against the encroachments of the Greek Orthodox Church of Russia and German Protestantism, have tenaciously adhered to their Roman Catholic creed and may be reckoned among the faithfulest of Rome's fold. French political interests in the satisfaction of Poland's ambitions coalesce with the interests of the Vatican in the establishment of a strong Roman Catholic state.

England also can ill afford to ignore the influence of Rome. It has been said that the last word in Irish politics is with the Roman Church. The approaching conference between the Irish Bishops and the Curia may have a beneficial effect on the solution of the Irish problem. A deliberate campaign of murder can not command the approval of the Church. If by the influence of the prelates in Rome the action for Home Rule is restricted within legal bounds, it will be possible for the British Government to yield where, under present conditions, yielding would be interpreted as an admission of fear.

Thus the Holy See brings its influence to bear on the gravest problems that Europe is called upon to solve in the near future. No invitation to join the League of Nations has been sent to the Pope. Not representing a nation, His Holiness was not eligible to its membership. But the Church of which he is the spiritual head, and which, unlike the League, has a strong hold on the hearts of the masses, plays a real and effective part as a bond of union among the nations.

Turks and Germans

THERE is a close analogy between Greece and France in the positions they have assumed toward Turkey and Germany respectively. The war of revenge, against which the French Government is moving heaven and earth to guard the country, is no less to be feared by Greece from the side of Turkey. But Greece is not allowed to take her own precautions against Turkish reprisals, as France did a fortnight ago. Lest the resistance of the Turks should be intensified by their being placed under the control of a hated neighbor, the Entente will supervise Turkey's future behavior; but, as the Entente shrinks from the sacrifice which such a supervision entails, it hopes to reduce the necessity of it by a reduction of the terms to be imposed upon Turkey.

It is questionable whether leniency will have the effect of making the Turk more amenable, and a less dangerous neighbor for Greece. The lesson which Germany's recent history has taught us makes one skeptical on that score. Just when the Entente, at the instigation of London, had initiated a more lenient policy towards Germany, involving economic support for the country's reconstruction, the Junker and militaristic elements made an attempt to restore the old order, which was, and would again be, a menace to France. To these people the shame of defeat is intensified, rather than softened, by a clemency which they themselves would not have shown had they been victors. Besides, the parties which are bent on revenge, the Nationalists in Turkey, the Junkers in Germany, are in opposition to the Government which bears the responsibility for submitting to the imposed peace terms. A successful attempt on their part at ousting the submissive Government will endanger the execution of the peace, whether its terms be justly severe or lenient. No mercy from the side of the Entente will withhold them from making that attempt.

The disclosures of Marshal Foch about the camouflaged army which, under Noske régime, was organized in Germany, furnish an amazing proof of insincerity on the part of the former Cabinet. It matters little whether Noske was dupe or accomplice. He was officially responsible for the carrying out of the peace terms providing for the reduction of the army, and the violation of these, whether in spite of his control or with his connivance, tends to prove that the militarist party is still a real power in the country. The failure of Herr Müller's Government to punish the leaders of the Kapp revolution is another indication of its lack of authority over the partisans of the old régime.

In Turkey matters are of a similar ambiguity. The Government which is to sign the treaty is powerless in Anatolia, where Mustapha Kemal with his nationalist forces defies both the Sultan and the Allies. Kemal, unlike Ludendorff, makes no attempt at camouflage. He will deny the binding force of peace terms signed by the Cabinet in Constantinople. If the Entente shall fulfill its promise of protection for Greeks and Armenians, it is not by the mitigation of peace terms that it can do so, but only by showing Kemal its determination to enforce them, if necessary, by violent means. The victory gained at so great a sacrifice can not be maintained by cheapening the price to be paid by the defeated.

Greek at Oxford

ARISTIDES, we are told, was ostracized from Athens because certain classes of his fellow Athenians were annoyed to hear him continually spoken of as "the just." There are those to-day who would gladly ostracize what is left to us of ancient Greece, for a similar reason. It irks them to hear Greek continually mentioned as a superior instrument of higher education. To persons in this frame of mind, the news that students may hereafter compete for the academic honors of Oxford University without the study of Greek doubtless comes as a source of joy. Aha! The enemy has at last been forced from his chief stronghold! Nunc est bibendum (bibulousness metaphorical, of course) nunc pede libero pulsanda tellus.

But it would be rash to assume that Oxford and Old England are thinking to drop out of their future that part of Greek life and thought—its marvelously effective language and eternally vital literature—which has been so fruitful an element in making England and Oxford what they have been in the past, and what they are to-day. The statute recently passed by the Oxford Congregation does make it possible that the honors of Oxford may be taken hereafter without Greek. That the privilege will be followed, however, by a very serious reduction in the attention given to Greek studies is not an inevitable conclusion. In the newer universities of Great Britain, where classical studies have not been compulsory, there has been of late a very marked growth of interest in both Latin and Greek. In the six midland and northern English universities, for instance, the number of students in both these tongues has more than doubled in recent years; and the pages of the Educational Supplement of the London Times, during the past few weeks, contain evidence that the discussion of the new Oxford statute has at once set in motion a very active agitation in favor of Greek studies. Says a recent writer in the Times:

> The Oxford decision will mean not less Greek, but more, since all who love Greek and who realize what it has meant, and means, to the world will cease to rely on a compulsion that was outworn, and come to rely on a teaching which can not be outworn—the teaching that Greek, and all that Greek implies, is a gift which the new democracy can not forgo.

The currents of human history have so run as to throw upon the great universities of England the responsibility of educating men for the solution of many of the most vital problems of all time. In the building up of her mighty empire, her military and naval commanders, her colonial officials, her diplomatic representatives and the agents of her great business organizations, have had to meet and adapt themselves to every important race and type of human kind. In organizing the lands and peoples gradually incorporated into her empire, and fitting them for eventual autonomy in local interests and increasing participation in imperial control, she has had to adapt herself to almost countless types of local government, and to develop numerous and constantly changing variations in the relation of outlying parts to the central body. Such have been her tasks, and unless she had met them with a fair degree of success, the chances are that the world to-day would be shivering in the chill shadow of an uncurbed Prussian despotism. And the effective leadership in these great tasks which have meant so much to the world's progress, not to that of England alone, has been taken in an extraordinary degree either by Oxford men, or by men educated after the Oxford type, in which the intellectual achievements of the Greeks—the most acute, most original, and most versatile of all ancient races—have always formed a very important part.

One example out of many, the marvelous administrative career of Lord Cromer in the reorganization of a corrupt and impoverished and chaotic Egypt, finding rest and renewal of strength and keenness of insight for his all but superhuman task in the pages of the Greek poets, orators and philosophers, shows how little validity there is in the assertion that classical studies disconnect the mind from the life of to-day, and unfit the student for participation in its practical problems. In a recent pamphlet issued by the Bankers Trust Company of New York, setting forth the opinions of leading financial authorities in Great Britain on the tremendous problems of post-war finance and the restoration of Europe, the foremost place is assigned to the views of Walter Leaf, Chairman (or President, as we say) of London County, Westminster and Parr's Bank, which carries deposits of over a billion dollars, and which was, of course, one of the strong supports of British finance during the war. But to many men in various lands, Walter Leaf is known chiefly, if not solely, by his accomplishments in the field of Homeric scholarship.

With the supposed aid of the Oxford compulsory requirement now eliminated, the friends of classical studies will feel an obligation to active propaganda, and this will possibly prove to be the more effective method of the two. It must be remembered that Greek has not been compulsory in the English schools, and that the students of these schools were not confined to Oxford for their future education. On the whole, we may be fairly confident that England will remain essentially true to the conservatively progressive principles on which her civilization has been built up, and that while she will admit into her educational system such new elements as may prove desirable, she will not eliminate that which has proved its fundamental and continuing value by many generations of experience. Greek is an intellectual leaven of which no high modern civilization can afford wholly to deprive itself.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Lord Bryce on Turkey and Armenia

[Mr. R. Fulton Cutting has received, and has kindly permitted us to publish, the following letter from Lord Bryce, of whose expert knowledge of the Turkish Empire and deep concern for the future of Armenia no American needs to be informed.]

Dear Mr. Cutting:

IN reply to your questions I send you an outline—brief, because I am pressed by urgent work—of the causes which have brought about the present situation in the Near East, and of the steps which the friends of the Eastern Christians deem necessary for their safety.

The Turkish Empire has been the storm centre of European politics for a century, because the treatment by the Turkish Government of the subject Christian races has been an evergrowing scandal and horror. The oppression and cruelty of Turkish rule caused the Crimean War in 1853; the Russo-Turkish War in 1877-78; the War between the Greeks and the Turks in 1897; and the Balkan Wars of 1912-13, these last having had a good deal to do with the outbreak of the Great War of 1914. The leading European Powers repeatedly summoned the Turks to reform their Administration, and the Turks repeatedly promised to do so, but never attempted to fulfill their promises. Whenever resentment at oppression flamed out into an insurrection of the subject races, the Turkish Government had only one expedient. It was massacre—indiscriminate massacre, accompanied by horrible cruelties. They massacred the Greeks in 1822, and the Bulgarians in 1876, and the Armenians in 1894-95-96, and again, on a far vaster scale (for nearly a million perished), in 1915. Emboldened by the impunity which they have enjoyed, they have now begun afresh the work of massacre in Cilicia, where many thousands of Armenian Christians have been slaughtered in the last few weeks.

Their motive and their policy are simple and scarcely concealed. They want to have an Empire inhabited only by Moslems, and their way of accomplishing that is to exterminate the Christians—men, women, and children. The British Blue Book of 1916, containing the evidence, largely drawn from American sources and from German missionaries, constitutes the most hideous record of slaughter and enslavement, of outrages perpetrated upon women and children, that history recounts. No provocation had been given, and all Christian subjects who could be reached were destroyed—Nestorians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, and in some districts Greeks also, as well as Armenians. The regions where these things were done have been left since the war ended in the hands of the Turks, because the Allies had not troops enough to occupy them. The two chiefs among the bloodthirsty ruffians who directed the massacres from Constantinople, Enver and Talaat, have escaped, but their followers and partisans have regained control in Constantinople and are terrorizing the remnants of the Christian population throughout Asiatic Turkey. Nearly eighteen months have elapsed since the armistice and the terms of the treaty are not yet settled. The delay is excused on the ground that the Allies hoped the United States would take a mandate from the League of Nations for Armenia, or for Constantinople, or for both. But the non-ratification by America of the treaty with Germany has prevented any decision as to the part (if any) that America will take in the settlement.

Two questions have arisen. What is to be done with Constantinople and what is to become of Armenia? Eighteen months ago everyone supposed that the Turkish Power would be extinguished in both. It was a danger to the peace of Europe, it was a curse to its subjects. Its faults were incurable, because the Turk, as a ruler, is an irreclaimable savage. Yet to-day there are those who plead that the Turkish savage should be allowed to remain in Constantinople because there are—it is said—Indian Moslems who would be offended if the Sultan were turned out of the city which his ancestors conquered from the Christians some centuries ago. It is amazing that any weight should be allowed to this arrogant pretension of persons, alleging themselves to speak on behalf of Indian Moslems, to dictate the policy of the Allies, and let the massacres of innocent Christians go unpunished. And it is all the more amazing because Constantinople is not a sacred city to the Moslems like Mecca or Medina or Jerusalem. It is not even a Moslem city—the bulk of the population having always been Christian. The Indian agitation has been a factitious one, got up mainly from political motives, and never ought to have been yielded to. We are not surprised to hear that the decision to let the Sultan stay has been received with amazement and indignation in America. It has been generally hoped here that the influence of the United States in the councils of the Allies would have averted such a disaster.

There remains the question of Armenia. To leave the Turk in power there would be not only a disaster but a crime. It would also be a grave breach of faith with the Armenians, who were, after the massacres of 1915, asked by the Allies to fight on their side, and thousands of whom did volunteer, and fought valiantly, and died in the Allied cause. The Turk has soaked the Near East in blood and reduced much of it to desolation. More than half the Christian inhabitants have perished, and a large part of the Moslem inhabitants —Kurds and others—have also been driven by the Turkish Government from their homes. The Armenians are an energetic and industrious people; and if, as is expected, the refugees whom American liberality has been keeping alive out of reach of the Turk during the last four years are enabled to return to their ruined villages, they may in time repair the losses suffered. But they must have a helping hand. Some civilized Power must undertake to furnish officers who can organize a gendarmerie to supply officials who can set up some sort of administration, to furnish funds to set the people on their feet again. We, in Britain, having already undertaken to look after Mesopotamia and Palestine, the responsibility for which no one else was willing to assume, can not undertake Armenia also. Let me say in passing that it seems to be supposed in America that we have made a profit out of the war by taking Mesopotamia. It is all the other way. So far from making any gain we have incurred a heavy liability, with no prospect in sight of any return. There was not and there is not, so far as I can see, any desire in England to occupy these countries; they were taken merely because they could not be allowed to go to rack and ruin. They are in no sense Turkish but Arab, and there is no Arab Government capable of administering them.

We who are friends of the Eastern Christians rejoice to know from the recent meeting in New York, and from many other American sources, how strong and general is the feeling in the United States for the liberation of Armenia. I have just received assurances from Canada that the feeling there is no less active and general. Though, owing to an unfortunate chain of circumstances, America has not so far found herself in a position officially to express her sympathy and actively exert her influence, we can not but hope that this influence will, somehow or other, make itself felt. How that is to be done you can judge better than we. As to the difficulties which have prevented the British people (who, as I believe, feel as strong a sympathy as you do with the Eastern Christians and as strong a detestation of Turkish rule) from securing all they desire, I could say much, but perhaps it is better to refrain. Meantime it is believed that the Allied Powers propose to liberate what was Turkish Armenia, and we trust this decision will include the Armenian part of Cilicia, which has been the scene of the most recent massacres. It is, moreover, essential to the peace of the East that the militant Pan-Islamic propaganda, so dangerous to that peace, should not be allowed the vantage ground which a Turkish dominion contiguous to Persia and Central Asia would furnish. The urgent and still unsolved question is —who shall undertake a mandate under the League of Nations to find a staff of officers fit to reorganize administration and look after the maintenance of internal order? Whether the League undertakes this, or whether some minor Power can be persuaded to do so, money will be needed until the country can, after a few years, begin to pay its way. Four or five million dollars a year might suffice, but the European Allies are now staggering under a load of debt, and the League is not yet in possession of funds. Whatever the difficulties may be, some solution must be found. It is surely impossible for civilized Christian nations to let these unhappy countries fall back under the heel of their oppressors, impossible not to extend a helping hand to those ancient Christian races who have now, after protracted suffering borne with unfailing constancy, an opportunity of regaining freedom and peace. I am,

Very faithfully yours,

JAMES BRYCE

London, March 25

The Naval Inquiry

THE naval inquiry precipitated by Admiral Sims's criticisms is producing the usual exchange of personalities and equivocations. And it has been ill reported in the press. As it nears its conclusion, however, it appears clearly that Admiral Sims has substantiated all his main positions. His criticisms are directed to the first seven or eight months after the declaration of war, and are solely concerned with the conduct of naval affairs at Washington. There are three main allegations:

First—the war caught the Navy unprepared.

Second—there was for months after war was declared no general plan of operations.

Third—as Force Commander for European waters he was unduly interfered with, insufficiently informed, and often not properly supported.

As to the general unpreparedness of the fleet at the outbreak of the war, it was merely a part of the deliberate neglect of the nation's military security by the Administration. Secretary Daniels had the temerity to declare that the ships were "ready from stem to stern." As a matter of fact, it took three months to get the fleet fairly ready and to start thirty-two destroyers for Ireland. They got there about the middle of July. For three months previous the Allies had been losing towards a million of tonnage a month, much of which might have been saved had our destroyers been ready to jump quickly into the critical area off Ireland. Admiral Sims's estimate that prompt aid in the anti-submarine campaign would have shortened the war by three months is conservative.

Details of the neglected condition of the fighting fleet were supplied by Admirals Fulham and Plunkett. Eager as a boy to build new ships, Secretary Daniels was never interested in manning them. Admiral Fulham's battleships on the Pacific station were all in reserve; his battle-cruisers, though supposed to have their peace complement, were so undermanned as not to be able to move from dock. In June of 1916 Admiral Fulham wrote the Chief of Operations that a declaration of war then "would find the navy in a state of pandemonium and absolute inefficiency." Repeatedly Secretary Daniels had cut out of Navy bills proposals for necessary increase of personnel. In May, 1917, with war on for a month, Secretary Daniels proposed suspension of enrollment in the Reserve Force. At that moment the Navy had about half the men necessary to run the ships, and there was in sight no other way of procuring them.

That the Navy itself was as ready as its reduced forces permitted goes without saying. That is the Navy's constant job, and it is used to it. That, with war a possibility from the autumn of 1914, Secretary Daniels not only made no effort to man his ships, but opposed his naval advisers at every point when they pleaded for men, is the index of his incapacity for his high place. Even the apologists for the Administration only argue that the neglect of our military business from 1914 to 1917 was philanthropically intended, or fall back on the still lamer contention that Congress and the nation would not have permitted our existing regiments to have been recruited and our existing ships to have been manned to war strength. With either apology history will make short work. Admiral Sims's most serious allegation is that the Navy Department entered the war without a working plan of operations, and had nothing approaching such until July, 1917. This is proved to the hilt.

We appear to have the testimony of Admirals Wilson, Fletcher, and Rodman to the contrary, but only apparently. Admiral Fletcher inadvertently let the cat out of the bag. There was a plan—was it not in three hundred typewritten pages? Had it not gained mellowness through three years of waiting? Speaking strictly by the book, there was a plan. It took no account of exclusive submarine warfare, was based on the presupposition of free use of all types of ships. It had no reference to the actual situation at our entrance into the war. Nobody ever thought of acting on it. But it was a perfectly good plan, considered apart from events and the actual emergency. Admiral Rodman, with a sea dog's waggishness, speaks of the plan as being "later modified to meet existing conditions." He fails to state that any modification of the plan resulted from natural and progressive decay of the three hundred pages in the musty files of the Bureau of Operations.

Captain Harris Laning's testimony whisks this smoke screen down the wind. He was in Operations, precisely the strategic bureau, until July, 1917, and thereafter in the executive and personnel branch, the Bureau of Navigation. In that brief and forceful utterance of which few flag officers seem capable, he tells the exact facts. On February 18, 1917, war being certain, he wrote to Admiral Benson:

> We have little or no preparation for handling a situation like the present, where the immediate menace is confined to submarine effort. Without any other plan in mind than that developed to meet a situation in no way similar to the present situation, the Navy Department as a whole is proceeding with its task as if there were nothing new in the situation. . . . Aren't we failing in our duty if we don't do all we can to meet the emergency? The first step to meet it is to have a plan and an organization ready to carry it out. Can't we have it?

After a fortnight Admiral Benson requested Captain Laning and other subordinates to present plans. On March 13, as he admits on the very defective information then possessed by the Department, Captain Laning presented his plan. It was a reasonable defensive plan based on the facts of submarine warfare. It would have afforded a basis immediately for economical action and could readily have been modified to meet the unanticipated need of an offensive in foreign waters. Such was Admiral Benson's judgment when with slight modifications he approved the Laning plan and laid it before Secretary Daniels, who disapproved it. Thus the Navy worried along without a plan.

About the middle of April Admiral Sims sent the Department from London the fullest information about the appalling submarine sinkings. It was a reasonable estimate, as things were going, that England would be starved out in a matter of five months. Accordingly Admiral Sims proposed the first plan based on knowledge of the actual military situation. All shipping for England and the theatre of war had to pass near southern Ireland. There the sinkings were most serious. Accordingly he recommended that all suitable light craft should be sent over for aggressive operations in this critical area. Within a week Washington offered him six destroyers. In despair he appealed, on April 27, to Ambassador Page, through whose representations he received, after the middle of July, thirty-two destroyers that rendered the first naval aid to the Allies.

Here Captain Laning's testimony affords an edifying bit of chronology. In the face of the fact that most of our destroyers might have to go to Ireland, the Navy estimates went to Congress without any considerable appropriation for anti-submarine craft. Captain Laning called Secretary Daniels's attention to this grave defect, and requested an emergency appropriation of $250,000,000 to cover the case. It was a moment when Congress would have given the Navy whatever it asked. Secretary Daniels declined to transmit the request to Congress. The result was that the contracts for the new destroyers were not placed until we had been six months at war.

The layman should not need to be told of the necessity of an operating plan. Until the Navy knew what ships were to be made ready, where they were going, what service was expected of them, it could not make the necessary calculations for personnel, ordnance, and supply. The result was a scramble of all the navy bureaus to achieve a maximum programme and not be caught short. In time and money it was a terribly wasteful process, but it was the only one Mr. Daniels left open. Thus the Navy staff overrode law and regulations, competed with each other and with the army, disregarded the Secretary, and heroically bungled through to a belated success.

The testimony abounds in delicious bits about the methods of ignoring Mr. Daniels. He frequently ordered recruiting stopped. Of course we went ahead. We needed the men, Admiral Palmer testified. The Secretary refused authority for training stations, and such magnificent organizations as Pelham and Great Lakes arose almost surreptitiously. His incompetence had the saving grace of amiability. He didn't mind being ignored. Often he was unaware of what was going on without his authority, and whenever he saw any unauthorized effort going well he gracefully took the credit for it. His head never grasped his job, his restlessness hindered others from doing it for him effectively, but his heart was in the right place.

On July 19, 1917, three months after the war began, the Navy at length transmitted a general plan to Admiral Sims.

Into the failure of the Navy Department to give loyal support to Admiral Sims we need not go elaborately. The facts as brought out by the correspondence amply bear out the charges. They refused him a staff for months and then sent him an inadequate one; they declined to let him give provisional ensignships to willing and competent Americans abroad. They diminished his prestige with his own force by withholding the usual right of promotion. They negotiated over his head with the French and British Admiralties. They failed to inform him of additions to his fleet. They interfered with his local tactical dispositions. It is a discreditable chapter, due mostly to blundering. From day to day Washington hardly knew its own mind. Yet Admiral Sims is right in insisting that their attitude of distrust was such that their only correct course was to have removed him. He had at once the chagrin and the relief of seeing Admiral Rodman come over in the autumn of 1917 to check him up. Admiral Rodman reported just what Admiral Sims had been reporting for six months. Washington believed Admiral Rodman, and decided to act as if the Navy were at war, and things began to go well. Admiral Sims's strategy was adopted in its essentials. He had at least the inner rewards of him who endureth.

S. P.

The Bolsheviks' Horn of Plenty

ALTHOUGH Bolshevist propaganda in this country is persistent and carefully coördinated, and its volume is very great, there is little of it that may be regarded as deserving rebuttal. In fact, to undertake to answer it would only be to dignify it unduly and give it unmerited attention. But occasionally there appears an article which is so cunningly contrived and so prominently placed as to carry weight in the business community and which, therefore, can not be allowed to pass unnoticed. Such an article is that which appeared in the Nation of April 10 under the title of "Our Future Trade with Russia," written by Mr. Albert Coyle, who is described as a prisoner taken by the Soviet army last summer from the American forces on the Archangel front, and to whom is ascribed a knowledge of the Russian language which "opened many interesting doors."

The general thesis of Mr. Coyle's article does not differ greatly from the view held by economists everywhere. Russia has a vast reserve of undeveloped natural resources both in foodstuffs and in raw materials. Reconstruction in Europe is dependent upon the development and exportation of these resources. For this development and exportation, the rehabilitation of Russian railways is prerequisite. So far there is no dispute. But when Mr. Coyle develops his thesis and draws the conclusion that these desirable results can be obtained by recognizing the Soviet Government and opening up immediate trade relations, he furnishes data and follows a line of reasoning that display either ignorance or dishonesty.

In introducing his subject, he calls attention to the strain under which the Soviet Government has been laboring during the past two years and then marvels that it has emerged victorious, "actually stronger economically than at the outset, and immediately prepared to conduct commerce with the rest of the world." If Mr. Coyle would take the trouble to consult the files of the official journals published by the Soviet Government during the past few months, he would learn that they frankly admit, first, that, economically, owing to nonproduction, Russia is on the verge of a complete collapse and in infinitely worse condition than in November, 1917; and secondly, that the Soviet Government is not "immediately prepared to conduct commerce with the rest of the world." Reference to later paragraphs in Mr. Coyle's own article corroborates this.

Calling attention to the "iron regimen" of the Soviet Government—and "iron" is a very mild appellation for it—he points to its two results: "(1) The amassing of large stocks of foods and raw materials which could not be transported for consumption or utilized for manufacture; and (2) the creation of the greatest vacuum of consumers' wants that the civilized world has ever known." The first of these two statements is simply not true. Large stocks of foodstuffs have not been amassed, because the peasants in the regions occupied by the Bolsheviks have ceased to cultivate more land than was necessary to provide for their own needs and have carefully concealed their small stocks against Soviet requisition. The regions in question are for the most part those which normally import a portion of their foodstuffs from the more fertile black land region. It is ludicrous for the Soviet authorities, on the one hand, to claim that large stocks of foodstuffs have been amassed and, at the same time, complain bitterly of the starvation of the cities. The harvest of last summer was indeed a fine one, and the southern regions, then in control of Denikin, produced a surplus which competent observers estimated at 3,000,000 tons.* These regions have now fallen into the hands of the Bolsheviks and in all probability the peasants have succeeded in concealing their grain so well that little will inure to the benefit of the Soviet authorities.

Mr. Coyle's second conclusion as to Russia now being the "greatest vacuum of consumers' wants that the civilized world has ever known" is one of the very few true statements in the article.

Following his introduction, Mr. Coyle sets forth an array of statistical material calculated to deceive the public into believing that he is giving a scientific basis for his argument. His data, however, strongly suggest the familiar style of the stock-selling prospectuses of "get-rich-quick" concerns, and his figures will not bear analysis. So, for example, he states that the largest coal field in the world is the Kuznetsk in Siberia, whereas the explorations made there are not sufficient to determine anything of the kind; but even if it were, it is so distant as to have no influence upon European Russia. Certainly it will furnish no coal for export. The Donetz basin in South Russia is, to be sure, the largest coal field in Europe, and in it is found a very considerable proportion of anthracite. In the future this field may be developed to export coal to Europe, but it is interesting to read what Mr. Coyle writes with reference to present conditions. He states that during the first few months of 1919, 4,000,000 poods of anthracite had already been mined from the Donetz basin. 4,000,000 poods means only about 73,000 tons, not an important production for several months in the largest coal field in Europe. The fact is that under the first Revolution, owing to labor troubles and sporadic attempts at workingmen's control, the production fell greatly below the normal of about 2,250,000 tons per month.† But the real ruin of the Donetz production followed the assumption of power by the Bolshevik régime; it is this that explains the production for the first few months of 1919 to which Mr. Coyle refers. When the Volunteer Army under Denikin recovered the Donetz coal basin, production was immediately increased to more than ten times the Soviet production, so as to take care of railway and local needs, and this would have been still further increased had transportation facilities been available for its export. The statements of Mr. Coyle concerning the Moscow coal basin, peat, and schist beds are still more ludicrous. He mentions that the Moscow coal basin last year produced 38,000,000 poods of bituminous coal. Translated into English, this means 700,000 tons, but there is practically no bituminous coal in the Moscow region. The coal there is lignite, or brown coal, which is of very inferior value as a fuel and can only be used in connection with higher grades.‡ The million tons of peat produced, together with this lignite, was so unsatisfactory that the factories stopped for want of fuel and the people of Moscow suffered terribly from the cold last winter. His report that the discovery of immense schist beds in Samara and Simbirsk regions has opened up an important supply of fuel and tar products suggests particularly the prospectus of the "get-rich-quick" promoter. There are, to be sure, some oil-bearing schists in the neighborhood of the Volga. They have been known for years, and it may be possible that some day in the future a means will be found for extracting the oil from them at a cost that will make it a commercial enterprise. Just now, however, the geological report concerning them was resurrected from the archives for propaganda purposes.

---

*See Report on Economic Situation in South Russia, by B. Ivanov, to the Russian Council of Trade and Industry, London, December 2, 1919.

†The 1914 coal production in the Donetz Basin was 1,683,800,000 poods, or about 30,000,000 tons. Annual of Ministry of Finances, 1915, page 503.

Space is lacking to take up in detail Mr. Coyle's other statistical misinformation, and this analysis of the fuel situation must suffice to show his general method. But attention must be called briefly to his report on textiles, because upon this he bases the conclusion that the Soviet Government has in its possession materials to exchange for foreign goods. He states that the report of the Supreme Economic Council shows that the Turkestan cotton crop this year is 5,000,000 poods (365,000 bales). It may be. The normal production was more than four times this amount and, at that, provided but two-thirds of Russia's own consumption, the remainder being imported from abroad.§ He then says: "Flax increased to 4,000,000 poods, which, including reserves, makes a total of 5,500,000 poods, about half of which will be utilized by Russian industry and the balance held for export." The flax production of Russia in 1913 was 32,455,500 poods,‖ so that the "increase" to 4,000,000 poods is remarkable. In 1913 the domestic consumption was about one-half of this, or 16,000,000 poods. It will be interesting to find out how Mr. Coyle arrives at the deduction that one-half of 5,500,000 poods will suffice for Russia's needs and permit the balance to be exported. The 2,750,000 poods indicated (50,000 tons) would make but a small impression in the foreign market, but even in regard to this Mr. Coyle is overoptimistic—to put it mildly. If he had read the Petrograd Izvestia, the official Soviet journal, for January 13, 1920, he would have found the following statistics in regard to amounts of flax and their location:

District.	Soviet Warehouses.	Coöperatives.
Vologda	31,416	89,081
Kostroma-Yaroslav	148,972	92,727
Bezhetsky	401,408	707,432
Rzhev	213,514	569,868
Vladimir-N. Novgorod	67,038	6,936
Smolensk	205,279	595,775
Staroruss	107,670	215,540
Vitebsk	45,827	13,734
Total	1,221,124	2,291,093

By their own showing, then, the Soviet Government and the Soviet Controlled Coöperatives have but 3,500,000 poods of flax, and that is scattered all over Russia.

The subject of textiles should not be passed without calling attention to another egregious error. He says: "In order to clothe the army, these [textile] mills have had to be kept in operation, several of the largest still being under the able superintendence of the English spinners who directed them before the Revolution." The truth is that these mills have not been kept in operation and that the attempt of the Soviet Government to nationalize them and operate them under a central administration resulted in closing down practically all of them a year ago. As to the "able superintendence of the English spinners," I can quote to him a cablegram received last week from Mr. B., formerly proprietor of a mill of 100,000 spindles, who has just escaped into Finland. He wires: "Plant perfect order. Liquid assets squandered. Spindles stopped year ago."

So much for Mr. Coyle's statistical data. Let us turn to some of his generalizations and conclusions. He calls attention to the fact that the American businessman has not been blind to the value of Russian commerce, but that there have been "good and sufficient reasons why he has permitted Germany and Britain to corner approximately two-thirds of Russia's import and export trade." These good and sufficient reasons he finds to be, first, the "various import duties to provide sufficient crown revenues"; secondly, that German and British firms had cornered many of the most lucrative markets in such a way "that the American found himself facing a closed game preserve"; and thirdly, that American firms were also at a great disadvantage because of their inability to secure competent representatives who knew the Russians and their language. As to the first point, Mr. Coyle needlessly goes out of his way to play upon popular prejudice. The tariff duties imposed under the ministries of Vishnegradsky and Witte were not to provide crown revenues and were never so disposed. They were imposed as a part of the protectionist programme designed to stimulate Russian domestic production. As to his second point, it has only to be explained that the reason why the Germans succeeded in the Russian market was not because of special privilege or by possessing "a closed game preserve." It was simply because the Germans studied the markets, acquainted themselves with the Russian needs, and met these needs in an intelligent and energetic manner. British trade was largely confined to exporting coal to Russia and importing certain raw materials. It had little to do with manufactured articles. His third point is unfortunately true.

He then goes on to state that the Revolution has suddenly swept away all of these barriers, and that, since foreign trade is now a monopoly of the state, all tariffs are illogical and unnecessary. Furthermore, "since the state now owns all sources of natural wealth, foreign concerns have lost their corner on certain valuable markets and commodities." Evidently when he wrote this sentence he overlooked the fact that, a few paragraphs before, he had quoted the words of Chicherin to the effect that the Soviet Government was ready to grant concessions and permit foreign capital to exploit the mines and forests of Russia. Mr. Coyle is firmly of the opinion—at least he says so—that if the Soviet Government is recognized, trade can begin at once. In his words "there is only one country which can immediately exchange with us value for value. And that country is Russia." But a little further on in his article, he slips into the contradictory statement, "we must not forget that Russia's export commodities are not now in storage at ports of clearance. In many cases their sources are several thousand miles inland and they could not be immediately transported in large quantities." To meet this contingency he recommends the extension of a short-term credit to the Soviet Government "to enable it to utilize our first shipments of rolling stock for the collection and transportation of goods it wishes to exchange with us." Considering that the Soviet authorities have repudiated the foreign debt of Russia, and that includes $187,000,000 lent by our Government, to say nothing of the millions of Russian Government obligations held by private citi-

‡Cf. Russian Year Book, 1915; p. 194. Also B. Ivanov, Report, previously cited.

§Russian cotton crop of season 1915-16 was 20,600,000 poods, or 1,487,000 bales. In season 1914-15 Russia produced 1,242,000 bales and imported 528,000 bales. Van der Muhlen, Cotton Industry of Russia.

‖National Economy, 1914, page 112. Published by Ministry of Finances.

Amount of flax exported in 1913, 16,632,000 poods (about 275,000 tons). Annual of Ministry of Finances, 1915, page 553.

zens in America, this proposal to extend a short-term credit to a defaulting creditor shows charming naïveté. One wonders what the frugal French peasants, who lent their hard-earned savings to the Russian Government to build the Trans-Siberian and other railroads, would think about it.

A further conclusion of Mr. Coyle is that "if we immediately send Russia sufficient farm machinery, we shall not only facilitate the collection of the July harvest in the Southern black soil belt, but also enhance the Northern yield in September and October." Considering the length of time required to manufacture and transport this agricultural machinery to Russian ports, Mr. Coyle's estimate shows a childlike optimism; but when one also realizes that even if the machinery reached Russian ports this summer, it could not be transported to the interior and distributed until the railway system had been rehabilitated, the absurdity is still more manifest. Even here we have another statement of Mr. Coyle's in corroboration, for, speaking of the textile industry, he says, "yet, due to lack of transportation, new garments in the provinces are practically unknown outside of the army." The transportation of Russia will not suffice to carry garments, and yet he proposes to distribute agricultural machinery throughout the country!

Is any further comment on the Nation's much advertised "authoritative" article necessary? Making every allowance for the Bolshevist sympathies of that journal, I can not believe that its staff is so devoid of intelligence that the patent contradictions and misstatements in the article could have escaped their attention. Since the public is likely to be gravely misled, will not Walter Lippman and Upton Sinclair, guardians of newspaper truth, please take notice?

JEROME LANDFIELD

Correspondence

Reactions to Mr. Beck's Letter

Major Putnam Objects

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the Review for April 10 you have brought into print a letter from Mr. James M. Beck, in which he makes protest in regard to certain criticisms, in your editorial "The Wreck of the Treaty," of the action of Senator Lodge. It is Mr. Beck's opinion that this criticism is without justification.

During the years after the sinking of the Lusitania, Mr. Beck rendered loyal and patriotic service, in coöperation with the citizens who constituted the American Rights League and others, in arousing the righteous purpose of the country in order that America might do its duty in the world's war. Mr. Beck held with us that America was shamefully late in coming into the war, and that this delay of two years or more in our war action, and a further delay of more than twelve months, due to our lack of intelligent preparedness, after the decision for war had been arrived at, in beginning the coöperation of America, brought upon Europe and upon America itself a serious risk of domination by Prussian imperialism.

At the time of the discussion in regard to America's coöperation in the war, Mr. Beck was prepared to recognize that America had a duty to perform as a member of the family of nations, in helping in the fight to maintain civilization and to protect national liberties and representative government on both sides of the Atlantic. He was doubtless ready also to recognize that such action was not only a duty but constituted a vital interest for the Republic. It is difficult to understand why he and his group should not realize that a similar duty rests upon the Republic in regard to coöperation with our late Allies for assuring the peace of Europe and of the world.

The responsibility for the shameful delay in taking our part in the organization of the world for peace rests with Senator Lodge and his associates.

Mr. Beck himself appears to be of opinion that the present situation of America is unsatisfactory, not to say humiliating. Having made great sacrifices in the war and rendered enormous service to Europe and the world, America is now without a friend among the non-aggressive states of the world.

The President's management of the treaty has been ill-advised in the extreme. He ought, of course, to have taken with him to Paris representatives of the Republican Party to be selected by the leaders of the party. If men like Senator Root, Mr. Taft, and Senator Lodge himself had been asked to coöperate in the framing of the treaty in Paris, the compact would have come to this country not as a Democratic measure, but as a national decision. The blame for the rejection of the treaty, an action which leaves the United States outside of the civilized world, rests, however, with Lodge and his Republican associates. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, as made up under Republican direction, included a group of bitter opponents of the League, men who had opposed America's action in the war. It is difficult to see the justice of praising the leadership of Senator Lodge when the result of this leadership has been to allow the action of the Senate and the policy of the country to be determined by a group of fourteen or fifteen obstructionists led by such a "statesman" as Senator Reed, of Missouri.

The treaty as presented to the Senate is not Mr. Wilson's treaty, although Lodge and his associates have so described it. The difficulty with Lodge's leadership is that he has made the issue a personal matter between himself and Mr. Wilson. He said frankly: "I am fighting Mr. Wilson." The wise and proper action of the United States has been interfered with, and civilization itself has been blocked because of the self-sufficiency of two men, President Wilson and Senator Lodge.

The treaty, however, as presented to the Senate, is a message from Europe. Mr. Wilson has simply acted as a messenger in bringing the document with him from Paris. No single state concerned has found itself satisfied with the provisions of this treaty, but all the states, excepting only the United States, have been ready to sacrifice their own personal preferences rather than not to see some compact or agreement put into shape. Several of these states are accepting, in coming into the League, risks and burdens much greater than any that could come upon the United States, the strongest and richest nation in the world. If each of the other Allies had undertaken to nationalize the agreement as the United States Senate considered it essential to Americanize, and even to Hibernianize, the agreement, there would, of course, have been no possibility of arriving at any conclusion at all: the debates would have gone on indefinitely. The opponents of the treaty include not a few patriotic citizens like Mr. Beck whose apprehensions and criticisms bring very keenly to memory the protests and arguments of the opponents of the Constitution in the great debates of 1787-89. The opponents of the League include also, however, practically all of the groups which opposed America's action in the war. Mr. Hearst, with the influence of his chain of newspapers, the pro-Germans, the pacifists under the direction of papers like the Nation and the New Republic, the men who contended that "America had no duties in Europe" and who look upon the world from what may be called a "district" point of view, men of whom Senator Reed is a type, the Socialists and the I. W. W. —all these are opponents of the League, and it can hardly be satisfactory to a patriotic citizen like Mr. Beck to find these men in accord with his position and with the purpose of Senator Lodge.

The letter that a month or two back came to us from Lord Grey was pathetic in its appeal. The demand for help was as urgent as that brought by Mr. Balfour in the spring of 1917. England can not carry alone the burden of adjusting the problems of Europe. She needs, and has a right to depend upon, the coöperation of the United States. Lord Grey said in substance: We do not think it worth while to question the changes proposed in the treaty. We will put to one side the discourtesy and lack of confidence shown in these reservations. The essential thing is to get now the help that is needed and to have America do its part in helping to adjust the problems of the world.

We Americans should recognize that this is not only a duty, but an essential interest for the Republic. The action that will enable this duty to be performed and these interests to be protected has been blocked, as said, because of the President's bad management and self-sufficiency and because Senator Lodge and his associates have persisted in making the issue personal and partisan. We can not accept the view that leadership of this kind is wise or patriotic, or that it gives any evidence whatsoever of intelligent, or even decent statesmanship.

GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM

New York, April 15

A Rap for "The Review"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

If you will permit me to speak plainly, I would say that Mr. Beck has afforded the Review opportunity to see itself as others see it. All the way through the matter of the "League of Nations" the Review has been less good than it should have been. It should have seen that there were three different grounds it might have taken: that the League should be adopted—and shown the reasons; that the League should not be adopted—and shown the reasons; or that the welfare of our Government as a political structure demanded some of the things proposed and could not admit of others—and made them clear. But the Review was not definite and clear in the matter in any large conception of it, and consequently failed to rise to its opportunity.

C. D. HIGBY

Erie, Pa., April 14

Thanks to Senator Lodge

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

On subscribing for the Review, I took occasion to congratulate myself and your other readers upon the existence, character, and purpose of such a paper. You kindly assured me in reply that you would be glad to hear from me at any time.

I can at least express the great satisfaction which I take in the Review when I wish to add one to those "whom no man can number" in dissent from your estimate of Senator Lodge and his service for our nation. I am confident that Mr. James M. Beck expresses the grateful convictions of the great majority of your readers and of the whole people.

I write this because it is a gratification to express a personal appreciation of this eminent statesman and his success in keeping us out of a disastrous national entanglement—while it gives me opportunity to say how much I like the Review.

A. F. BEARD

New York, April 11

As to American Independence

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Mr. Beck's letter in defense of Senator Lodge was much appreciated in large part by many. But what some of us would like to know is wherein the late victory of the Senate over the President resulted in "saving the independence of America." We can not see that either England, France, or Italy has sacrificed its independence or its national sovereignty by entering the League, and certainly what is freedom enough for those nations which stood so much more of the brunt of the war than we did should be freedom enough for us. And what some of us are far more concerned about than the question of our independence or our rights, important as this may be, is the question of our *inter*dependence and our obligations to civilization. We dislike to think of ourselves as too good or "too proud" to soil our hands with "purely European questions," for in these days there are no purely European questions. Whatever is vital to civilization or to the peace of the world is our concern, and many of us are considerably ashamed of the stand which our once honored country seems to be taking in the face of to-day's world-unrest.

JARED S. MOORE

Western Reserve University,
Cleveland, Ohio, April 14

The Newberry Trial

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The scant comment of the New York press, with one or two trenchant exceptions, on the Newberry conviction is ominous when it is recalled that a jury in the Federal Court found him guilty, together with a score or more of his party adherents, of conspiracy against the Corrupt Practices Act.

The testimony at the trial, which lasted many weeks, showed a vast outlay of money in every conceivable way, from subsidizing the press to giving gasoline, unasked, to ministers of rural churches—proof of attempted bribery so rank as to excite feelings of disgust in the mind of the unpartisan citizen.

That Ford employed the same tactics during the campaign is no excuse; on the contrary, it doubles the offense against the law and public decency.

To make the affair even more sinister, Newberry's manager (jointly convicted) issued and published a statement, as soon as the verdict was rendered, in which he defied the judge and public prosecutor, and flouted the law under which the conviction was had.

Have Goldman, Berkman, or other "Reds," deported or undeported, ever uttered more seditious words or done anything more calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt?

W. E. V.

Princeton, N. J., March 25.

Wild Life Preservation

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I strongly endorse every word of your editorial of April 17, on "The Preservation of Wild Life." Your proposal for a national commission on ways and means is a great idea, and I hope that I shall live to see it carried into effect, on an ideal basis. Whenever the 5,000,000 sportsmen and hunters of America can be made to realize the fact that their own sport is on the toboggan slide and going straight to Oblivion, they will want just such a saving factor as you propose.

The present destruction of game, through absurd hunting licenses, wicked bag limits, and (some) criminal open seasons, I regard with great alarm and anxiety. In a short time my views will be in type, and ready for distribution. I believe that the game shooters of America now must cut down their killings by 50 per cent, or they will exterminate their own game and sport. Will they do this before it is too late?

A national commission, as broad and as well grounded as you propose, could serve a host of admirable purposes—provided the States would pay heed to its warnings and advice. Perhaps some day it will represent the last call to the exterminators to "Beware!" and "Put on the brakes!" Naturally, the Commission should consist of fearless experts, and be, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. Its members should be as Theodore Roosevelt was—never afraid, and seldom cautious. If it could not make up its mind to act with all the boldness that emergencies demand, then it should not be born. If it would hew to the line, "cry aloud, and spare not," then the friends of wild life should prepare for it a rousing welcome; for on that basis it is sorely needed at this critical hour.

WILLIAM T. HORNADAY

New York, April 18

The Anglo-Persian Treaty

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The probability of Great Britain's making a protectorate of Persia through the instrumentality of this treaty has been frequently mentioned in the press and diplomatic circles. The fact that it was negotiated while the Peace Conference was discussing "the real blessings and permanent advantages of concord between the nations," which was to guarantee forever the "political independence and territorial integrity of great and small nations alike," has aroused displeasure not only in Persia, but in America and France and in England as well.

Positive denial is made by Lord Curzon with regard to having a protectorate over Persia, but the fact is that this treaty, although recognizing the independence of Persia, takes away by its terms all of her independent rights and robs her of her sovereignty. This opinion is frankly admitted by the Paris Temps which, in commenting upon this question, says "Since Persia promises to confide its army only to British officers and its finances only to British specialists, it has no longer force or resources to exercise its sovereignty."

In view of these realities, this treaty appears, therefore, of sufficient importance to quote here its full contents.

On August 9, 1919, the following treaty was signed by the Persian Government and His Britannic Majesty's Minister at Teheran:

It is hereby agreed between the Persian Government on the one hand and His Britannic Majesty's Minister acting on behalf of his Government, on the other hand, as follows:

1. The British Government reiterates in the most categorical manner the undertakings which they have repeatedly given in the past to respect absolutely the independence and integrity of Persia.

2. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, the services of whatever expert advisers may, after a consultation between the two Governments, be considered necessary for the several departments of the Persian administration. These advisers shall be engaged on contracts and endowed with adequate powers, the nature of which shall be a matter of agreement between the Persian Government and the advisers.

3. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, such officers and such munitions and equipment of modern type as may be adjudged necessary by a joint commission of military experts, British and Persian, which shall be assembled forthwith for the purpose of estimating the needs of Persia in respect to the formation of the uniform force which the Persian Government purposes to create for the establishment and preservation of order in the country and its frontiers.

4. For the purpose of financing the reforms indicated in clauses two and three of this agreement, the British Government offers to provide or arrange a substantial loan for the Government of Persia for which adequate security shall be sought by the two Governments in consultation, in the revenues of the customs, or other sources of income at the disposal of the Persian Government. Pending completion of negotiations for such a loan, the British Government will supply on account of it such funds as may be needed for initiating the salient features of reforms.

5. The British Government, fully recognizing the urgent need which exists for the improvement of communications in Persia, both with a view to the extension of trade and the prevention of famine, is required to coöperate with the Persian Government for the encouragement of Anglo-Persian forms of transport; subject always to the examination of the problem by experts and to agreement between the two Governments as to the particular projects which may be most necessary, practicable and profitable.

6. The two Governments agree to the appointment forthwith of a joint committee of experts for the examination and revision of the existing customs tariff with a view to its reconstruction on a basis calculated to accord with the legitimate interests of the country and to promote its prosperity.

Primarily, this treaty is claimed to be unconstitutional and legally of no effect from the Persian point of view, as it was concluded at a moment when there was no parliament* (Mejliss) to ratify it. Secondly, it was negotiated at the time when the British troops were in possession of the Persian territory. Thirdly and finally, the present Persian Cabinet is not, constitutionally speaking, recognized by the Persian people. Their appointment, in order to be effective, must be confirmed by the Persian Parliament. This Cabinet has not as yet been presented by the Shah to the Mejliss, and the fact that the majority of the Cabinet members are devout adherents of the old pre-constitutional régime of Persia and subject to backshish makes them not only unpopular but extremely suspicious. According to the information, which is believed to be quite accurate, the present Persian Cabinet not only disregards constitutional powers and limitations, but, since its term of office, has exiled, merely on account of disagreeing with their views, over sixty former ministers and members of the Mejliss. Among this list there are the names of Mohtashemas Saltaneh, several times member of the Foreign and the Finance Department; Mamtazol Molk (Gen. Mortza Khan), ex-minister of Persia to the United States, and ex-Minister of Education at the time of his exile; Mamtazol Dovel, ex-president of Mejliss; Mostashor-ed-Dovleh, ex-Minister of the Interior. It is thus seen that the Persian troubles are not from without but from within. All the blame rests on the dishonest and unreliable government officials whose business is in giving or receiving backshish, and deceiving the Persian people.

As for the material help that Persia can obtain from England at the present time, there seems to be a great deal of pessimism. Some people believe that it will take Great Britain many decades before she can recoup herself financially from the effects of the Great War, and in advancing money to Persia just now she must have a motive in view. It is said that England will advance annually, at seven per cent. interest, 2,000,000 pounds for a period of twenty years, and, as a guarantee for the payment of this loan, Persia will pledge all her revenue and customs receipts. That Persia does not get sufficient consideration to warrant her in making this treaty is to say the least. In fact, England with only 2,000,000 pounds obtains control of a country with an area of 638,000 square miles, an empire more than twice the size of the State of Texas.

In view of what has happened in Persia in the past with regard to that famous tobacco concession of 1890, which caused the assassination of Nasred-Din Shah in 1896 for selling this important product of Persia to the British capitalists for money to be used for his own pleasures, and in view of that Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907, which divided Persia between Russia and England under the terms of "Spheres of influence" and "Specific penetrations," which was the cause of the Persian uprising, what assurance, it may be asked, can there be that the same course of procedure will not take place with reference to this new treaty if it is put in operation? There is only one thing to prevent it, and that is the revolution.

The seriousness of such a cataclysm can hardly be overestimated. An uprising in Persia against the British rule would spread like fire in India and Egypt. It would have a sweeping effect upon millions of inhabitants in these countries. As the English hold in these lands is no firmer than the walls of Jericho, a strong revolutionary wind can shake it flat to the earth. Persia has always found much sympathy in India, not only on the ground of close ethnic relations, but on account of cogent religious ties (both being the Shies and followers of Mohammed). A revolutionary movement would, therefore, be effectively supported by the Shies and welcomed by the Sunnies.‡

On the other hand, it must be remembered that the safety of the world depends on the English-speaking people, therefore a strong English rule with the coöperation of the United States will undoubtedly secure the natural rights of the Persians, and it will much improve the condition of the peasant and the fellah who are now in a miserable plight.

YOUEL B. MIRZA

Washington, D. C., April 15

---

*Art. 24 of the Persian Constitution states that "Treaties, Conventions, the Granting of Concessions or Monopolies, either commercial, industrial or agricultural, whether the other party be a native or a foreigner, can only be done with the approval of the National Assembly or Parliament.

†Cf. Gibbon's "The New Map of Asia," p. 277.

‡The number of Mohammedans is variously estimated at from three hundred fifty to four hundred million. They are divided into several branches and sub-branches, but the Sunnies and Shies are the greatest of all Islamic political parties. Persians and Mohammedans of India are Shies.

Book Reviews

"The Real Nature of Man"

Education During Adolescence. By Ransom A. Mackie. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE bibliography of some two hundred and sixty numbers appended to this book confirms the reviewer's conviction that the recent German and American literature of education is a new scholasticism, no less tautologous in its supererogatory verbosity than the old—and much less logical and more futile, its divagations being controlled by nothing so definite and coherent as the basic study of Aristotle.

Mr. Mackie is a fervent disciple of President Stanley Hall and composes his book for the greater glory of that "focus of international interest and admiration," who sets the seal of official approval upon his own apotheosis in a commendatory introduction. A medley of extracts and résumés taken from the writings of President Hall himself and of lesser contributors to the pedagogical seminary floats on a turbid stream of denunciation of "the stone wall of conservatism" and the older culture with its supposed shibboleths of exclusive classics and mathematics and discipline for discipline's sake. The new era for which this older education will no longer suffice is to introduce a psychogenetic pedagogy based on the psychology of adolescence which will ask as the genetic psychologists have long been doing, "what is the real nature of man," and proceed to "reëvaluate everything in terms of man's innate capacities and spontaneities." From this revolution will come, among other things, the practical suppression of Latin, which "cripples the vernacular," the reading of magazines and such books as Ellwood's "Sociology and Modern Social Problems" instead of the English classics, and the substitution of the "crispy, staccato, lingua franca of youth" for "the language and style of Burke, Macaulay and Addison which would not be tolerated in Congress."

Iteration is the method employed to drive home these saving truths. On few pages are we allowed to forget that education must study the needs and nature of the child, not the logic of the subject, that it is preparation for life, not preparation for college, that adolescence is effervescence and abhors precision, that it is indispensable to "vitalize" the school and "socialize" the recitation. The polemic against Latin is as incessant as it is in the class rooms of the schools of education. Herbert Spencer's elementary arguments are reproduced with the elegant variations and the dainty metaphors of Professor Alexander Chamberlain, and with no hint of the considerations by which they must be qualified or of the literature in which they have been answered. The invidious appeal to the high school to revolt against the tyrannous domination of collegiate prescription is reiterated with utter disregard of the actual facts of the present situation. And neither President Hall nor his disciple feels any scruple in presenting the problem of "disciplinary values" in its crudest and most question-begging form with no warning to the reader of the extent to which all psychologists who respect their reputations have "hedged" in the matter by liberal concessions to the teachings of plain common sense and experience.

Education, as in other books of this class, is taken in the lump. The occasional perfunctory recognition of different kinds of education is sustained by no effective, continuous discrimination of the various types, grades, and economic social or cultural subdivisions of education in the concrete. It is just education. The new education is to be primarily and predominantly vocational. Some leisure may remain for more general and cultural studies, provided that they are modern, social, and, above all, inexact. The studies that may be prescribed or approved for all students are contemporary English, carefully guarded from all contamination by English classics or confusing Latin etymologies, sociology or civics, and history, studied by the problem method and in the socialized class room. By the problem method in economics pupils "can analyze expenditures of their own families" and "formulate the expenditure of fifteen hundred dollars a year for a family containing four children." Applied to history the problem method (in defiance of Quintilian and Mr. Trevelyan's "Clio, a Muse") casts everything in the form of a proposition to be proved. "Prove that the time from 1783 to 1789 was 'the critical period' in American history." "Prove that the Renaissance was a period of tremendous change in Europe." "We devoted eight days to this problem." "In the third lesson we proved that there was a revival of architecture in the Renaissance." Though the new psychology has exploded the superstition that there is any disciplinary value or mental training in classics and mathematics, it appears that it is otherwise with history taught in this fashion. "It supplies a kind of intellectual training that can be secured in but few other ways." It even apparently reinstates the discredited "faculty psychology," since it "enlarges the student's mind, cultivates his perception, stimulates his memory, and trains his judgment."

Such unvocational study of literature, sociology, and history can do no harm if redeemed in the socialized class room from the tyranny of pedantic dictation from above and the superstitious accuracy which is the vice of the classicist. President Hall's experience as a writer has convinced him in his own immortal apophthegm that "accuracy atrophies." If he had delayed to verify his references and correct his own or his typewriter's spelling of the queer words which his desultory reading and his Germanized culture deposited in his notebooks, the stream of inspiration might have dried up before those mighty reservoirs "Adolescence," "Jesus the Christ," and "Educational Problems," were filled. In his own words, again, "the school-bred habit of accurate and painstaking familiarity with a few things such as professors of literature inculcate . . . would greatly slow down my pace and cool my ardor." His study of the adolescent mind has convinced him that adolescence is naturally expansive and recalcitrant to the restraints of accuracy. And the fosterings of this salutary defense-reaction in the youth of American high schools is the first task of a reformed and psycho-genetic education that spurns the yoke of Latin and mathematics. It is perhaps in unconscious subservience to this aim that these pages still retain a few of the gems that so profusely adorn President Hall's own more ambitious work. The "consensus of opinion" may serve once more to illustrate the uselessness of Latin. A "floating plankton" may remind the reader that, as Xenophon said of Socrates, though the master regarded such knowledge as useless, he was not himself unacquainted with it. And the defiant repetition of the statement that Plato "reproached" Aristotle as a reader shows how little the true philosopher is to be awed from the career of his humor by the carping cavils of a classicist.

There are, of course, some good ideas in the book and much praise of things that in due place and proportion are praiseworthy. The "socialized recitation," for example, may be a helpful device if regarded only as a corrective of the kind of teaching, if it still survives, that calls for a verbatim recitation of paragraph 3 on page 50 of the history or the grammar. But every teacher who, in Rooseveltian phrase, is worth his salt, knows that without intelligent direction and the check of peremptory closure, class-room discussion rapidly degenerates into the time-wasting triviality of the experience meeting. Even Plotinus found this out when he socialized the discussion of Platonic love in his class room.

Good or plausible ideas are as plentiful as blackberries. No one who takes notes in a library can miss them. And nothing is easier than to praise idealism, modernism, reform, "life," and "vitalization" in the abstract, and denounce in general terms pedantry, prescription, and conservatism. It is the work of intelligence to coördinate, harmonize, relate, and adjust conflicting ideas and ideals, and to praise and censure educational methods and practices with nice discrimination of time, place, measure, and purpose. I find nothing of that kind of reasoning in this book, and little in the literature of which it is a sample.

If this be thought a harsh and illiberal judgment, I will apologize when anyone points out in the book any ideas that are at once new, true, and significant; any truths that are not either truisms or irresponsible exaggerations of partial aspects of truth; any considerable sequence of coherent argument or discussion that takes due account of exceptions and qualifications, or does even-balanced justice to the consideration of every side of the question. Meanwhile, the author and President Stanley Hall may cheer themselves by the reflection that one dissentient review will do little harm. The book will doubtless be welcomed as a "contribution to educational science" by the spokesmen of the large and, I sometimes fear, growing public that flocks to the lectures of Sir Oliver Lodge, that subscribes to the memory-training course of the gentleman who remembers the names and the telephone numbers of the Rotary Club of Seattle, and is not offended by full-page advertisements of Pelmanism from the pen of one who but a few years ago was the official guide of American patriotic opinion.

PAUL SHOREY

America Unveiled

OUR AMERICA. By Waldo Frank. New York: Boni and Liveright.

ONE strives with patient endeavor to learn what all this foaming cascade of syllables is about. It appears that things are in a dreadful mess and have been so for the last two hundred years. Puritanism, pioneering, and materialism would seem to be the chief causes. A great Darkness lies upon the land. But let no real lover of America despair. The night is pierced here and there by the gleam of signal fires, lit by revolutionary minute men, and within the mass of the dark people the impulse of new aspirations begins to stir. "The Old Guard—martyrs like Eugene Debs, William Haywood, Emma Goldman—religious, nostalgic for prisons—find at last the brains and culture of a younger generation to fertilize their martyrdom."

"Nostalgic for prisons" is a fetching phrase, which brings up visions of the Prisoner of Chillon, Torquato Tasso, the Man with the Iron Mask, Silvio Pellico, and other victims of long immurement in earless dungeons. But fetching as it is, the observant reader can not but wonder what it is doing here. For homesickness for prisons is not a common complaint, and it is developed, if at all, in only one way. Now it happens that of the trio named, Mr. Debs, prior to his recent conviction, had undergone only one imprisonment—a six months' term in Woodstock jail nearly twenty-five years ago, in the summer and autumn of 1895; Mr. Haywood, kidnapped from Colorado, had been held in the Boise penitentiary until he was freed by a jury verdict; while Miss Goldman, more lucky or more tactful than the others, had been conspicuously scant of the experience necessary for acquiring this dower of martyrdom.

How, then, might they have acquired this imputed nostalgia? The author scorns to explain. And by what characteristic symptoms has it been shown? There is no answer. Is there, the observant reader may ask, in any speech or writing of either of the two who had suffered brief terms of imprisonment—and neither is what might be called a reticent man—any expression of regret for the loss of a loved home, any reminiscence of regaining freedom with a sigh? Again there is no answer. One may wonder, also, if the true and unmistakable symptoms of this "nostalgia for prisons" are to be found in the resort to all legal means of defense; in consent to the solicitation of defense funds; in application for writs of habeas corpus; in appeals from verdicts and decisions. May not such activities rather seem, to the ordinary person, the symptoms of a form of claustrophobia—of a stubborn and unreasoning prejudice against any confinement whatever? But it is too much to require of a revolutionary writer—a harbinger of the Great Dawn—that he cancel a phrase so fondly conceived out of regard for an objection so trivial. That the words have only a dubious intrinsic sense and no fitness to the instances given is a small matter; what counts is the fetchingness of the phrase. There is much more of this kind of thing. This America is a land whose people bear the singular distinction of being in both their first childhood and their second. They "are still in the baby stage of playing with their toes" (p. 196), and yet "Everywhere is the impotence of senility" (p. 230). The penury of America is manifold. The people have no soul, no spiritual or æsthetic energy. "All of the peasant and proletarian peoples of Europe have this deep potential energy, religious, esthetic. . . . Here America, of all lands, is poorest" (p. 231). America has, indeed, nothing except motion pictures. "The whole world now has its cinemas. America alone has nothing else" (p. 214). Its universities are "for the most part the incubators of reaction" (p. 209)—a curious comment in view of the fact that virtually all the parlor Bolsheviki are college bred. Its press is venal, and the multitude who might naturally catch the meaning of the gifted revolutionary seers and prophets is unable because it "is too enslaved and enfeebled by the poisonous pabulum with which Business persistently has fed it" (p. 209). But there is no need to go on. It is all bad (except for Walt Whitman, "Bill" Haywood (p. 228, 230), Oswald Garrison Villard (p. 228), Van Wyck Brooks, the late Randolph Bourne, and a few others), has always been, and will always be unless something is done about it. There is some discrepancy between the unrelieved pessimism shown on some pages and the qualified hopefulness shown on others; but no attempt at harmonizing this difficulty can be made here. On the whole, the book is a terrific indictment. Not in many a day has so resounding a slap been delivered on the wrist of your Uncle Samuel.

Almost anybody, it may be thought, gifted with a lack both of inhibitions and of misgivings, could write such a book. But to think so is to fall into grievous error. This offering is, for the time, a unique accomplishment. It reaches to heights, depths, and lateral expanses of the fantastic not heretofore attained, and at times it seems to be pushing out for a fourth dimension. Its fellow is not likely to appear for some time.

W. J. GHENT

Italy Warm and Cold

SOULS DIVIDED (Ella non rispose). By Matilde Serao. Translated from the Italian by William Collinge, M.A. New York: Brentano's.

TALES OF MY NATIVE TOWN. By Gabriele D'Annunzio. Translated by Prof. Rafael Mantellini, Ph.D. Introduction by Joseph Hergesheimer. New York: Doubleday, Page & Company.

IT may be held that what divides the Latin from the Anglo-American is less a diversity of feeling than a diversity of taste or, to speak more modestly, of habit. We northerners do not give ourselves away with gestures and superlatives. Our eyes are not permitted to flash or our tongues to hasten. We are at some pains to master an air of good-humored but skeptical tolerance. We are terribly afraid lest somebody suspect that we do not see the joke and we are incessantly though furtively on the watch for that joke, which we know must be about somewhere, in any place, at any time. A Martian might discover in us a sort of frozen adolescent self-consciousness such as older races have outgrown and cast off. He might find something of pathos in the waste energy we put to the concealment of passion, whether for love, for beauty, or for virtue. Or he might find that, on the whole, the famous joke was "on us"—Romeo the cub and Juliet the flapper being visible to him, and very much at home, somewhere on our premises.

"Souls Divided," the English version of "Ella non rispose," is described by its sponsors as "an impassioned love story of an unusual kind." I do not see in what sense it is unusual unless in quality. Stories of this general kind have been written often enough in English, and have had their great audiences; but for a long time these have been audiences of the vulgar. It is for shop-girls and stenographers of the tenderer sort that our movies and newspaper syndicates turn open without stint the flood gates of sentiment. Only among such a class does Shakespeare's race now frankly prepare to shed its tears when the prompter calls. Not a single gleam of humor "saves" this Italian study of ill-fated passion. No code of restraint subdues the record to the cautious murmur exacted of ourselves by literary breeding. It is all upon the high horse of romantic feeling, a prolonged outburst of the emotion we "Anglo-Saxons" still endure from the poets, whose business it is, in lyrical moments, to give themselves away, though we hardly brook even the shortest flights of prose. Paolo, the lover, who is forever done for by a voice, and Diana, the beloved, who sacrifices all for duty to her family and never tells her love till it is too late for the lover to hear the sad secret—these are the very staff of tragic romance. Standards of literary breeding are variable, but the "human heart" is a constant. The author must have been justified in her prophecy that her book would win response from simple souls the world over—"souls who shall have shed silent and solitary tears of human pity with me, and for me, over the luckless love of Diana and Paolo."

Mr. Hergesheimer's introduction to "Tales of My Native Town" has, excellent as it is, something of the tone of apology, or apologia which so often is heard in official introductions and prefaces. This wonderful article (the theme runs commonly) by so famous a hand, shows certain traits of the author which have been taken exception to by prudes or provincials: they are not blemishes to the generous eye. Moreover, in addition to the qualities for which the Master has been given general credit, here are others which the dull world has ignored. Gabriele d'Annunzio, for example, is "perfectly within his privilege" in expressing the minutiæ of lust, disease, and physical abnormality—good medicine, we take it, for a race like ours which, with a "natural but saccharine preference for happiness," systematically veils the unpleasant. And further, whatever his coldness and brutality of method, his work is animated by "a saving spirit of pity, the valid humanity born of understanding." I wish I could feel this, as Mr. Hergesheimer does. For me D'Annunzio's coldness is inherent. His intellectual understanding of his fellow-beings seems fatally limited by the fact that his real ardor is for himself or for such causes—beauty, freedom, amorism, as may have the good fortune to be identified with himself. D'Annunzio "the man" worships the Italy which has produced D'Annunzio and set a stage for him. D'Annunzio the artist worships what Mr. Hergesheimer calls "the beauty of sheer living as a spectacle" because it offers itself to be conveyed, as a spectacle, by his supremely skillful hand. Conveyance, on the whole, is the word. Mr. Hergesheimer rightly contrasts these tales with the short stories of American convention. They are not trimly completed bits of action, but "coherent fragments": "He has not lifted his tales into the crystallized isolation of a short story; they merge from the beginning and beyond the end into the general confusion of existence, they are moments, significantly tragic or humorous, selected from the whole incomprehensible sweep of a vastly larger work, and presented as naturally as possible. However, they are not without form, in reality these tales are woven with an infinite delicacy, an art, like all art, essentially artificial. But a definite interest in them, the sense of their beauty, must rise from an intrinsic interest in the greater affair of being. It is useless for anyone not impressed with the beauty of sheer living as a spectacle to read 'Tales of My Native Town.'" Granted; but it hardly follows as the night the day that all persons who are duly impressed with the beauty of sheer living are bound to find it in these particular tales, or sketches by a mighty sensualist dreamer of our day. In their English dress, certainly, they are not overwhelming. One can with a fairly good conscience own to the impression that, with all their marvel of detail, several of them are oppressively squalid and even tedious: squalor and tedium having, of course, their part, a relative part, in the spectacle of living.

H. W. Boynton

The Autumn of the Middle Ages

Herfsttij der Middeleeuwen. Door J. Huizinga. Haarlem: H. D. Tjeenk Willink & Zoon.

The study of the past has its chief fascination in what it reveals about the origins of the present. It is the germ of the new that we look for in the old. The discovery of early manifestations of the romantic spirit in the age of Swift, of the Renaissance in the poetry of the Thirteenth Century, give zest to our study of "Gulliver's Travels" and the "Roman de la Rose." The systematic search in mediæval history for early symptoms of modern culture made it seem as if the culture of the Middle Ages was only the advent of the Renaissance. But in history, no less than in nature, death is coincident with the birth of a new life. Old forms of culture die off at the same time and in the same soil in which the new find the food for their efflorescence. The historian, therefore, is not restricted to one way only of envisaging the past. The writer of "Herfsttij der Middeleeuwen" has chosen to study the fifteenth century in France and the Netherlands as the decline of an era towards death and dissolution, seeing the gorgeous pageant of its life overcast by the shadow of the approaching night.

In Mr. Huizinga the artist and the scholar work together. While looking at the past, the one is no less susceptible to its picturesque beauty than the other is fascinated by its lore. The scholar guards the artist against romantic vagaries, and the artist colors the scholar's record with the realism of his vision. It is the artist, again, who has taught the other to reject the economic interpretation of history as the only true and complete presentment of the past. The book, though the author refrains from stressing that claim, is a brave and brilliant attempt to discover the essence of life no less in the flattering dream which the livers loved to make of it than in the crass realities which their dream had to color. A careful and unimpassioned study of mediæval legal documents has taught us that the romantic picture of the chivalrous late Middle Ages was a distorted vision of that period. Feudalism and chivalry had had their day before the close of the thirteenth century. It was the commercial power of the communes and the power of the kings supported by it which were the ruling factors in the political life of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. But the people whose lives made up the history of that age were themselves not conscious of this social decline of the nobleman's status. They still recognized in a martial nobility the chief element of the social structure. The glamor of prowess colored their vision of the time they lived in, and for our knowledge of its cultural life that illusion has the value of historic truth.

This book, then, is a picture of the fifteenth century, not as the economic interpreters of history have taught us to see it, but as the people of the age saw it themselves. The record of their illusions and delusions is the author's theme, and his sources not the dusty documents of the archives, but the literature of the poets and the records of the chroniclers, the journalists of those early days. Georges Chastellain was one of them, the greatest of all Burgundian historians. He was a Fleming by birth, a native of the district of Aalst. But he wrote in French, being the recorder of princely deeds and knightly adventure. His work is the truest mirror of the life and the thought of his time as they appeared to a shrewd, clear-sighted onlooker. This man, bred in the fields of Flanders, the home of a proud democracy, still lived by the belief that God had made the people to labor, to till the soil, or to live by trade, the clergy to teach the true faith, and the nobility to exalt virtue, to maintain justice, and, by their deeds and moral life, to be a mirror to others. The traditional vision of society lingered on, uncorrected by its glaring contrast with reality. This clever representative of his age and people did not even see, in his naïveté, that his own chronicle belied that fanciful picture of divine ordination, so little was the critical faculty developed in its intellectual élite. Among the nobility whose deeds of prowess he lauded were men who had risen from the ranks of the "tiers état," or, as he called it, "le tiers membre qui de soy n'est gaires capable de hautes attributions, parce qu'il est au degré servile." And among the bourgeoisie he knew people with a truer conception of honor than his own chronicle shows the nobility to have known and practised. To the mediæval mind life, from its highest to its lowest manifestations, is fixed in immovable, eternal forms, and these forms, not their contents, are the essential thing.

Experience can not destroy this conception of society as a tripartite structure, of which each part has its permanent attributes. That prevalence of form over substance pervades all mediæval thought. Every notion becomes isolated, and is given a form and a fixed place in the immutable hierarchy of things, every function receives its visible organ. The King of England had among his "magna sergenteria" an office for holding the king's head when he crossed the Channel and got seasick.

The art of the period reflects that same tendency to visualize everything conceivable. In the paintings of the Van Eycks the presentation of the elements of sacred lore has been carried to the highest point of realism, each detail being the setting for a wealth of more diminutive miniatures. The mystical content evanesces and leaves its brilliant outward show behind. It is an art of consummate skill in execution, but void of ideas. In the opinion of the author the naturalism of the Van Eycks, which is usually explained as an early symptom of the approaching Renaissance, is the maturest growth of the late mediæval spirit, not a beginning but an end. Its material perfection could not be improved upon, and as it was inexpressive of the deeper emotions of life, it lacked the living element from which a new art could take its birth.

This character of finality, of completion beyond renewal, attaches also to the moral and religious life of those days. Of a whole-hearted enjoyment of life's gifts, such as Rabelais, the robust herald of a new age, was to preach in the next century, the era of Gerson and Thomas à Kempis was no longer capable. What it had left of passion and vitality burst out in mystic exaltation or in bestial debauch. Gerson, himself too balanced a pessimist to be subject to these outbursts, was well aware of the fact that both extremes sprang from the same root: "Amor spiritualis labitur in nudum carnalem Amorem." The soul, having been absorbed in the contemplation of God, lost its will, the Divine will only remaining, and in that state of exaltation the mystic could not commit sin, though he should follow carnal cravings. Such was the belief of the Fratres liberi spiriti, of the Turlupins, and similar sects of hysterical madmen who, while professing to serve God, lived a life of diabolical debauch. Gerson, the famous Chancellor of the University of Paris, wrote a "Discours de l'excellence de virginité," taking his argument from a deeply pessimistic picture of man's misery. Contempt of the world is praised as the wisest attitude towards life, and life's propagation condemned as a folly. In the austere features of the kneeling donors on the triptychs of the Van Eycks one can read their denial of the beauty and the glory of life, which the Renaissance was joyfully to assert.

The Run of the Shelves

THERE are two million men in the United States whose feeling toward books on the war is that of the raconteur waiting for the other fellow to finish a story in order to begin on his own. Every one saw and felt things well worth telling to the fellow who wasn't there; nine out of ten hope to write books of personal reminiscence. Two men who have done it with no unusual qualifications so far as their experiences go are Captain Ewen C. MacVeagh and Lieutenant Lee D. Brown of G-3 and G-1, respectively, Headquarters Staff, Second Corps, who write jointly of "The Yankee in the British Zone" (Putnam). They are announced as "trained observers," and the reader concedes the title, adding that of trained or naturally facile writers, for they have dressed their material with real skill. They find for it an ostensible core in the discussion of Anglo-American relations in the Amiens sector, where the Second Corps was brigaded with the British, a subject that would not make more than a magazine article were it not attractively clothed in personal reminiscence and anecdotal history, a rippling obligato to war of information and anecdote cleverly played up each to the other. It deals with nothing essential; the world can move on without it except as it may add a drop of lubrication to the gears where American affairs mesh with British. Read it and you have seen nothing happen, but you have haunted the point de liaison between British and American troops, loafed in company street and officers' mess, wherever Yank and Tommy mixed and mixed 'em up. You have idled amiably for a time on the sunny side of war, but it is a very real side of war, a pleasant, comfortable rest camp for the reader who has been personally conducted through much of the other side. In one way the book stands as a model to aspiring compilers of reminiscences. The personality of the authors is nowhere directly presented. It is always elusively just below the surface, seen only in glimpses between surface reflections, until the curiosity of the reader is genuinely aroused and finds only meagre satisfaction.

For the great tribe of collectors of Stevensoniana, Mr. George E. Brown's "Book of R. L. S." (Scribners) will be a precious vade mecum. Here, under alphabetical heads, information is given regarding the publication of essays and books, the places connected in one way or another with Stevenson's life, and the friends he met on the way. A good deal of human interest is packed into this little encyclopædia, as indeed human interest is almost synonymous with the mystic initials, R. L. S., whatever may be the critical judgment, outside of Scotland, finally pronounced on the owner of those initials as a writer.

"Villa Elsa" (Dutton), by Stuart Henry, who most decidedly does not handle his subject with gloves, is described in its sub-title as "a study of German family life." The publisher explains it as "a genuine study at first hand of the real Germany of the twentieth century by an American writer who lived there for many years," and the author gives, in a private letter, this account of himself and his book:

> Despite its form as a novel, with love, spies and action, it is meant to be a profoundly serious book. I not only lived and studied in Deutschland but, for a quarter of a century, have had much to do with German businessmen. This has forced me to learn to know German character more thoroughly than the usual "literary feller" or critic who has had small chance to get acquainted with Germans, either intimately or in their large cross-sections. Needless to say I regard the problem of the German race as a mighty serious and dangerous one, not to be lightly tossed off through smug indifference or clever epigrams.

In "Beaumarchais and the War of American Independence" (Boston: Badger) Miss Elizabeth S. Kite clearly sets forth the facts concerning Beaumarchais's invaluable contribution to the success of the American Revolution. One of his biographers, the French Senator, M. Lintilhac, wrote in 1887: "We are surprised that no descendant of Beaumarchais was invited to represent France at the unveiling of the Statue of Liberty, upon whose pedestal his name would not be out of place alongside that of Lafayette. With John Bigelow, I may well ask if Americans have done their whole duty towards the memory of Beaumarchais." It is plain from Miss Kite's two volumes that we have not.

Even so early as 1775, Beaumarchais foresaw the gravity of the conflict between the colonists and the mother country and pointed out to the French Government where its interests lay. Little by little it shared his view and told him to go ahead and aid the insurgents, but without compromising the French Government, which gave him a subvention of a million francs. Before the end of 1776 he had brought together with all possible secrecy his first cargo, consisting of 200 cannon, some mortars, 25,000 rifles, and 200,000 pounds of powder. After running many risks, his three ships reached America. Beaumarchais received no payment, however, nor did Congress even thank him. He had put 5,000,000 francs into the undertaking, and sent an agent to America, who, after remaining there three years, returned empty-handed. To prevent a fiasco and an international scandal the French Government again came to his aid with a subvention. Beaumarchais's chief occupation throughout 1783 was the removal of the obstacles in the way of the playing of the "Marriage of Figaro," but he did not neglect his claims against America. The bills of exchange which he had received from Congress in 1779 were far from satisfying him. Four times—in 1781, 1787, and 1793—Congress sent agents to verify his accounts; but nothing came of it, and forty years passed before his family finally succeeded in obtaining 800,000 francs of the 2,280,000 which were claimed.

Miss Kite modestly says in her preface that her volumes are based wholly on the printed works of Frenchmen bearing on the subject, one of which, however, she failed to see, for the simple reason that it was passing through the press in Paris while her own books were being printed in Boston. M. Jules Marsan's "Beaumarchais et les Affaires d'Amérique" (Edouard Champion) prints for the first time some thirty letters of Beaumarchais, all of which are connected with the American episode in his life and all of which strengthen in various particulars Miss Kite's contention.

"Le Livre Pratique des Spirites" (Paris: Revue Contemporaine), by M. Achille Borgnis, who informs the French public that he is a "laureate of the New York Institute of Sciences," marks him as being either very naïve or very tricky, perhaps both. He holds spiritualistic sittings in his own apartments, supported by "a young lady who plays the piano," by "my secretary, M. Maurice, who has charge of the lights," and by "a medium who has been tried and found to have the power." To these sittings he admits only "those who are believers or who are neutral and open to conviction"; all "scoffers must be vigorously refused admittance." No wonder that under such conditions this "guide," as he calls himself, and "laureate of the New York Institute of Sciences," aided by the young lady of the piano, the secretary of the lights, and the medium of the cabinet, obtains "manifestations that astonish all those who participate at my sittings." Cicero materialized on one occasion, and we are given a picture of his apparition. In fact, there are nearly a score of these pictures scattered through the book; but their value disappears to "a scoffer" when he learns that "these are not the results of direct photography, but are produced from drawings made during the sittings. The spirits informed me that they were opposed to being photographed. However, when I begin a new series of sittings, it is my intention to employ photography." On one occasion Mary Queen of Scots appeared on the scene, when she spoke in this rather unidiomatic language: "In spite of sad circumstances, I wish you and everybody happy Christmas." Another favorite materialization is that of "a fakir, a fine Hindoo"; and one is tempted to ask if the "fakir" may not be M. Borgnis himself.

That seventeenth-century worthy, Lambertus van den Bosch, headmaster of the Latin school at Dordrecht, must have been a popular master in the eyes of the Dutch youngsters who studied the classics under the sway of his ferule. He seems to have preferred contemporary to ancient literature, as is the way of the adolescent age of all generations. And his was not a sneaking love of profane modern writers, indulged "en négligé" and disavowed where his dignity as a scholar had to keep up appearances; unblushingly he proclaimed it on the title pages of numerous translations, the best of which was one of Don Quixote, the first to appear in Dutch, and never surpassed for picturesqueness of language by any later rendering. The quality of the rest of his work is in inverse ratio to the number of his writings, and in Holland it would be a hazardous undertaking for a publisher to bring out a reprint of a work by Van den Bosch, his Don Quixote alone excepted. An American scholar, however, has found it worth his while to edit a drama of the old schoolmaster. But Prof. Oscar James Campbell's purpose is not the literary rehabilitation of the author, but, as the title explains, to ascertain "The Position of the Roode en Witte Roos in the Saga of King Richard III" (University of Wisconsin Studies in Language and Literature. Number 5). Not the Dutch play itself, but its possible English source and the relation of that source to the extant English plays on the same subject is the editor's excuse for his interest in Van den Bosch's rhetorical and lifeless drama.

In an interesting introduction to the reprint the writer compares the Dutch play, which was printed at Amsterdam in 1651, with the chronicle tradition and with the three dramas referred to above: the Latin "Richardus Tertius" of Thomas Legge (c. 1573), the "True Tragedy of Richard the Third" (c. 1590), and Shakespeare's version of the story. The upshot of his ingenious investigation is thus summarized by the author:

> The resemblance which the Dutch play shows in turn to the Chronicles and then to each of the three English plays in points peculiar to them, shows, first, that the Roode en Witte Roos belongs to the English dramatic, as distinct from the historical, tradition of Richard III.

Professor Campbell accounts for this many-sided relationship by postulating the former existence of a fourth English play which must have held a middle ground between the Senecan production of Legge and the Shakespearean conception.

> This lost play Shakespeare must have known and used, now and then, to point material which he derived largely from Holinshed. This fact would help to explain the strong Senecan flavor of Richard III, which has led numerous critics to believe that it must be the direct descendant of an earlier play.

In the case of Van den Bosch, however, our extensive knowledge of his life and work must be taken into account; Professor Campbell, in this respect, has taken his task too easily. "A man," he writes, "who made a business of miscellaneous translation as did Van den Bosch was obviously not a trained dramatist. A play bearing his name is perhaps, then, even more certain to be a translation than his other admitted adaptations." But the possibility of the Roode en Witte Roos being an independent dramatization by Van den Bosch of a chronicle version can not thus lightly be dismissed. The play in question and a translation of the English morality "Lingua" were not his only contributions to dramatic literature, as the writer seems to assume. In 1645 he published "Carel de Negende, anders Parijsche Bruyloft," for which no other source has been found than "Thuani Historiæ Sui Temporis," and in 1649 he dramatized an episode from Hooft's prose history of Florence under the rule of the Medicis in "Rampzalige Liefde ofte Bianca Capellis." The fact that Van den Bosch had twice made an independent attempt to remodel historical prose into drama before he wrote the "Roode en Witte Roos" affords, at any rate, an argument in favor of the assumption that his third historical drama was the product of the same method. The resemblances which the writer has pointed out between the Dutch and the English plays are not so striking as to make a thorough comparison of the former with all the chronicle versions superfluous.

Professor Campbell's translation of the Dutch text is, on the whole, a successful performance. Where he has misunderstood a passage, it is not an insufficient knowledge of the Dutch, but rather the involved rhetoric of Van den Bosch, which is at fault.

M. Romain Rolland, who is again residing in Paris, writes in a recent letter:

> If I exiled myself for a few years to the land of Jean Jacques, believe me it was not because I had a penchant for the Swiss mind and still less for its present literature, which, except in the case of the genial—I here use the word as the adjective of genius—Spitteler, does not appear to me to be very interesting. I went there in order to let it be seen publicly that I did not approve of a fratricidal war, which the future will be all the more inclined to pronounce monstrous when all its fatal consequences begin to appear.

Heine's Buried Memoirs

Among the lost or suppressed works of genius none has offered a more tantalizing bait to literary curiosity than Heine's Memoirs of his own life, frequently alluded to in his letters and other writings. As Heinrich Heine wrote very much and always charmingly about himself, the acute reader will not suppose that I am overlooking the pages of autobiography entitled "Confessions," which were dictated about a year before his death. My present aim is to direct attention to a work of Heine's prime—not one of his last and decadent period.

As far back as 1837 the poet refers to this work in a letter to his publisher, Julius Campe. "I am busy day and night," he writes, "with my great book, the romance of my life, and now for the first time I feel the full value of the papers that were lost in the fire at my mother's house. I had intended to publish this book later, but . . . it is to be the next book given to the public. You know I am no braggart, and I prophesy the most extraordinary results" (from this book). A few months later, writing to his Uncle, Salomon Heine (with whom he was then in uncertain relations), the poet thus alludes to the work: "I have taken care that when we are all in our graves my whole life shall be known for what it has been."

The book so portentously referred to was long a subject of apprehension to Heine's wealthy relatives in Hamburg, to whom he was something of an enfant terrible and by whom his literary genius was held in small esteem; and the poet's occasional hint at publication may have been intended to keep them in proper disposition toward himself. I do not like to believe that he deliberately used it in terrorem, at least until the break that followed Uncle Salomon's death. It should be added, however, that there were many other persons, outside the intimate Hamburg circle, who heard with quakings of the spirit any rumor as to the threatened publication.

In 1839 Heine writes to Campe that he has decided to postpone the bringing out of his Memoirs; but in 1840, writing to him, Heine admits having used a part of them in his work on Börne, a rather inferior production, in spite of some brilliant pages, and disfigured by personal malice; it was later in great part suppressed.

In 1840 we get a significant and meditated statement as to the Memoirs in a letter to Campe, as follows:

> I am quite happy and calm inwardly. I am used to abuse, and I know that the future is mine. Even if I were to die to-day there remain four volumes of the story of my life, my Memoirs, which show forth all my thoughts and endeavors, and if only for their historical matter, for their true exposition of the most mysterious of transitive periods, will go down to posterity. The new generation will want to see the swaddling clothes that were its first covering.

This seems to indicate that Heine had finally resolved upon a posthumous publication of the book.

In 1845 the bitter dispute with his cousin, Karl Heine, relative to a financial provision for the poet (Uncle Salomon was now dead), broke out, and besides causing Heine great anguish of mind, hastened his end by the reaction upon his physical state. Writing to J. H. Detwold, Heine mentions a first offer of compromise by Karl, the condition being that he submit the MS. of the Memoirs to be "supervised" at Hamburg.

He writes to Campe (October, 1845):

> I am still in a most unpleasant position as regards my cousin, Karl Heine, for I do not agree with the form of payment. I will not agree to conditions— I will not forgo the least particle of my dignity as an author or of the freedom of my pen, even if as a man I allow myself to be subjected to family considerations.

A few months later he informs Campe that he had tried the way of kindness pointed out to him by friends and by his own heart, in order to arrive at a settlement with his cousin; while the latter persisted in his injustice. Heine adds these memorable words:

> I have followed my softer feelings, while the cold voice of experience hissed in my ears that rarely is anything won from the hard men of money by tears and supplications in this world, but only by the sword. My sword is my pen.

In the same letter, he says:

> Yes, I have been working for some days at a horrible memoir in which the insolence of Karl Heine is shown up. I shall drop my action [he was threatening to go to law with his cousin], so that it may be seen that it is no longer a question of money. . . . I am calm, for I have done everything that a man can do for love of his wife, and more.

Again he writes to Campe (1845):

> As for the undertaking which I am prepared to sign, it does not matter much how binding you make it. I shall never, at any price, deliver up anything that I write to the censorship of my relations.

In this final stage of the negotiations between the poet and his family it is significant that not a word is said as to the destruction of any existing manuscript Memoirs.

The upshot of the inheritance-quarrel was that Heine obtained a satisfactory settlement both for himself and, following his decease, for his wife Mathilde. On the other hand, though he is reticent as to the point, it seems probable that he complied with certain of Karl's wishes respecting the Memoirs.

What these wishes were, or what the conditions of the agreement reached by the poet and his kinsman, is not precisely known. But after Heine's death the manuscript fell into the hands of Uncle Salomon's family, who made such disposition of it as they saw fit. It is believed that for many years past the papers have been sealed up in the archives of the Imperial Library at Vienna. Nor has official reserve ever suffered a hint to escape as to when, if ever, publication will be permitted.

William Sharp, in his "Life of Heine," alludes to certain Memoirs, "which the poet tells us that he himself destroyed." Evidently Mr. Sharp is here at fault, and most likely his reference is meant to cover "the papers that were lost in the fire at my mother's house"—as quoted above from Heine's letter (1837) to his publisher, Julius Campe.

That Heine expected his Memoirs would be published after his death and counted upon it to the very end, is placed beyond doubt by a piece of strong evidence. I allude to the incident related by Camille Selden in her little book of reminiscences of Heine, entitled "The Last Days." "Camille Selden" was the pen-name used by a young German lady, not otherwise clearly identified, who acted as reader for the poet in the last stage of his illness. She is said to have been a person of culture, charm, and beauty, as beseemed the "Mouche" of the latest poems, and the poet seems to have felt a remarkable tenderness for her. Lovers of literature must always be grateful to this Unknown for giving the poet his last romance and his latest inspiration.

Camille Selden, then, relates how she entered Heine's room one day early in that fatal February, 1856, after he had

(Continued on page 440)

Quality Standards

For over 30 years Quality has been the one and dominating purpose of the C-W institution.

That is why Crocker-Wheeler motors are the unvarying choice of experienced manufacturers and engineers.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

RADICAL propagandists in the present period of world changes are striking at the very foundation of American institutions.

The most enterprising of these are the intellectual radical journals. They are making dangerous headway, even among loyal Americans.

THE REVIEW was founded to dispute the teachings of such journals and is making real progress in its work of keeping alive the true principles of American liberty.

Sample Copies on Request.

THE REVIEW
$5 A YEAR

140 NASSAU ST.
NEW YORK

(Continued from page 438)
undergone a dreadful attack of his disease affecting both mind and body, and found him scribbling furiously on large sheets of paper with a pencil that seemed to her sharp as a deadly weapon. She continues:

I heard a cruel laugh—the laugh of satiated revenge. I looked at Henri: "I have them," he cried, "dead or living, they shall not escape. The tiger's claws shall survive the tiger."

Heine thus referred to his Memoirs on which he had been even then working; and the story, though a shade melodramatic, may be accepted as true. There is no lack of testimony that he attached great importance to this "book of his life," as he called it. Most significant witness is offered by Alfred Meissner, to whom Heine once showed a box of MSS., remarking: "Look you! There are my Memoirs. Therein I have been collecting for many years a series of portraits and frightful silhouettes. Many know of this box, and tremble. In it is shut up one of the best, but by no means the last, of my triumphs."

Such is the unsatisfactory tale of Heine's personal Memoirs, which the connoisseurs of literary scandal value at a higher rate than the lost "Confessions" of Byron. There can be little doubt that the matter of these unpublished manuscripts is worthy of Heine's fame, for the writing was begun when his powers were at the full. And as he scarcely ever wrote anything without literary value, even in his character of the modern Aretino, the harsh and long-continued interdict on his own life-story must be resented by every lover of literature.

MICHAEL MONAHAN

"Impressions de Voyage"

A STAY of but twenty-four hours at Honolulu is scant warrant for a discussion of the affairs of our Pacific Ocean outpost; still, if enjoyed by a visitor returning after an absence of many years, it may furnish grounds for a comparison between his recollection of what was then and his impressions of what is new.

There has, happily, been no change in the natural aspects of the enchanting island of Oahu, which holds the capital of the Hawaiian group. The bold promontory of Diamond Head marks, as of old, the point where vessels coming from the East swing around to the northward and head for the narrow channel which leads across the bar to the docks at the city of Honolulu. The noble skyline of the mountains that, running east and west, divide the island into the smaller plain between them and the sea from the wider plain between them and the northern end of Oahu. At right angles to this chain runs another and loftier ridge close to the western edge of the island. At the intersection of these two, the land falls away into a more level expanse whose peculiar yellowish green proclaims its devotion to the culture of the sugar cane. The summits of these mountains are arid and treeless, but running up their valleys the varied colors of the vegetation bespeak an intensive cultivation of the rich, red volcanic soil. Palms wave their crested plumes at intervals, dividing banana groves, orange orchards, pineapple farms, and market gardens, or adorning country places. The famous "punch bowl," once a crater, overlooks the city, while behind it and a little to one side is the Nuuanu Valley, which climbs up, up, up, some 1,200 feet to "Mt. Pali," a gap in the east and west mountain range just mentioned. In the twinkling of an eye there bursts upon the vision one of the finest views known to the writer, himself a traveler with no slight experience. A tier of high peaks frames the picture on the left. From the observer's feet the land drops almost sheer to the northern plain, a succession of splendid plantations, each wearing its own distinctive hue, stretching down to the blue ocean which, after churning itself into milk-white foam streaked with unusual opalescent hues where it meets an outlying coral reef, rolls on to break into surf on the white sand beach dotted with bathers. The ceaseless roar of the waves tells the inhabitants that the sea is ever ready either for works of benevolence or appalling disaster, as suits its varied mood. The whole of this enchanting spectacle is bathed in brilliant light, except where the scurrying trade-wind clouds throw their shadows on the land, ofttimes discharging a burden of mist and rain, and frequently using the sun's rays to add a rainbow to a panorama already quite perfect. What the traveler sees from the Pali is well worth the trouble of the long journey from home to Honolulu. The writer recalls but one comparable landscape—the "Chinese View," lying between "The Gavin" and "The Sugar Loaf," near Rio de Janeiro.

During the fifteen years elapsing since he spent a Christmas in this exquisite island, the writer, due to the brevity of his halt, could only note sundry surface indications. Even in this respect he may err widely; he makes no claim to accuracy in these random "impressions de voyage." A distressing symptom—as he saw it—was the decrease in the native population, possibly relative and not absolute, and the astounding growth of the Oriental elements. The Chinese and the Japanese are fast absorbing all the smaller businesses. Japanese women clad in kimonos and straw sandals are everywhere, and the supply of Japanese babies, slung in shawls behind their mothers' backs, seems inexhaustible.

How the city has increased in the past fifteen years! Apparently, three or four fold. Where farms and market gardens formerly marked the slopes behind it, handsome villas are now built and building. No wonder, either, for here one may live in a delicious and practically unvarying climate of warm, not hot, days, cool nights, and in a Garden of Eden offering rides, drives, picnics in every direction, and boasting a country club from the veranda of which one overlooks an alluring golf course melting away into an incomparable vista of verdant loveliness which ends only in the distant sea horizon of darkest blue.

It was inevitable, of course, but the sturdy native pony is almost never seen now; the motor has displaced him and in numbers which surpass one's power of guessing. Think of Honolulu with traffic policemen at each street crossing! Shades of Captain Cook! Motors in turn have demanded and secured better roads everywhere, so that the trip around Oahu which, on horseback, once required several days of the writer's time—a glorious experience it was, by the way—is now easily made by automobile between lunch and dinner.

The trolleys have kept pace with the growth of the town; the lagoon, once known as Pearl Harbor, is gradually being developed into a naval station, with the largest of our drydocks already completed. The agricultural resources of Oahu might have been expected to attract a strenuous commercialism, but those who knew the Hawaiian Islands in days gone by may be pardoned when they miss the once simple, easy life that has given place to the fierce competition of trade and the introduction of grave ethnical problems arising from the need of coolie labor. What pangs and travail the solution may bring upon this community remain to be seen. Already a strike by the local Japanese Federation of Sugar Workers sounds the warning note of what may occur.

None the less, the tourist, from the porch of the modern Moana Hotel, watches the bathers on the safe beach at Waikiki and the native, standing erect on a plank far out, at tremendous speed riding towards the shore, driven on its incoming crest by the rushing breakers as they climb over an outlying reef.

His meditations are interrupted by the resident at his side who, after explaining that the Cook and Castle families are noted for their wealth, claims supremacy for Honolulu in that it alone has a diamond head, a pearly harbor, the largest punch bowl in the world, a Castle on every corner, while all its Cooks are millionaires.

CASPAR F. GOODRICH

At Sea, between Honolulu and Guam, Washington's Birthday.

Drama

Andreyev at the Neighborhood Playhouse

THE Neighborhood Playhouse appears to have a quick eye for that rather elusive thing—the popular element in the literary drama. I could not have expected that Andreyev would succeed in Manhattan, nor that Americans, whom the classics impress so little, would be quick to respond to a travesty on the classics. But the welcome given to the "Beautiful Sabine Women" on Grand Street is more than adequate; it is lavish. The success is not reduced by the unusual and seemingly untoward circumstance that the parties to the action are not persons but groups—husbands, wives, captors, who employ persons as their spokesmen and delegates. The Greek chorus, which was actor as well as choir, habituates us to the use of one such group, but, except, dimly, in the "Suppliants" of Æschylus and Mr. Galsworthy's "Strife," I scarcely recall a second instance in which the collision of two or more groups has released the dramatic impulse of the play.

The three acts are compressible into one; indeed Acts II and III might be fairly described as a very slow curtain to Act I. The obvious satire turns on the willingness of women to be snatched from the milksop by the daredevil, and their unwillingness to confess this willingness to the insolent captor. Their surrender at the close of Act I is plain, and the Sabine husbands, whose reclamations are particularized in the two ensuing acts, are such evident and arrant nobodies that their burlesque march to Rome is seen from the start to be a march towards ignominy.

The play is called a satire, but satire has called farce to its aid, or, to speak more precisely, farce has been called in to the aid of the playmaker but to the injury of the satirist. I have no quarrel with farce; I am perfectly amicable even to that grade of farce which permits itself allusions to registered letters and to encyclopædias in the Rome of the eighth century B.C. The jumbling of epochs need not be harmful; what really harms is the jumbling of purposes. The original purpose of this play was not farcical, but comic; it meant, on the surface, at least, to bring out, through comedy, the resistance of the mind of woman to that masculine coercion to which the frame of woman and also the heart of woman acknowledge their docility. The two purposes do not combine, and the farce halts the comedy.

It is said that behind the farce and comedy lurks political allegory. The

(Continued on page 442)

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED

LACKAWANNA

THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

THE PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS was incorporated in 1910, "in the interests of Princeton University, to establish, maintain and operate a printing and publishing plant for the promotion of education and scholarship." Since that time it has published nearly one hundred books, all recommended by a committee composed of members of the Princeton faculty as worthy contributions to their subjects. On its list of authors appear the names of Grover Cleveland, Elihu Root, Joseph Choate, Theodore Roosevelt, Arthur Woods, Paul Elmer More, Edwin Grant Conklin, George W. Goethals, Allan Marquand, Leonard Wood, William Starr Myers, and many others. The subjects dealt with include art, history, poetry, business, finance, politics, government, essays, philosophy, education, psychology, and social betterment. Orders are received from the four corners of the globe; Princeton University Press books have been translated into French, Spanish, and Japanese; the demand for them on the part of intelligent readers is broadening constantly; in England they are all published by the Oxford University Press.

We should be glad to send you a booklet we have prepared, describing our work and progress in greater detail; also our complete catalogue of publications, and announcements of new books as they appear.

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
PRINCETON, N. J.

(Continued from page 441)

Romans are Russian reactionaries, the Sabines are Constitutional-Democrats, and the Sabine women are promises—promises the substance and force of which the reactionaries, in the first decade of this century, snatched away from the Constitutional-Democrats. Whether Andreyef is voucher for this key I can not say; one would like to think that he was aware of the shallowness of this form of depth, a form that can not even claim the characteristic merit of shallows—transparency. I was glad that the joy of the Neighborhood Playhouse audience, which was a complete and satisfying joy, was undisturbed by problems of interpretation. Even in a Roman play one hardly cares to take the part of haruspex or soothsayer. Moreover, in such combinations, the allegory serves as sinker to the nonsense much oftener than the nonsense acts as float to the allegory.

The acting was rapid and spirited, and the evenness of its quality, which was noticeable, did not prevent the observer from finding or fancying a slight margin of superiority in the female parts. I found beauty in Mr. Frank Stout's bright, vivid, and as it were, exclamatory setting; but I should have liked it better in "Hernani" or "Siegfried" than in the "Beautiful Sabine Women." Against that haunting and romantic background, the farcicalities in the play seemed as irrelevant as the chicken-bones and egg-shells which the shuddering Ruskin found, in the wake of excursionists, on the Alpine glaciers.

The "Glittering Gate," a one-act piece by Lord Dunsany, opened the programme. A burglar, on some ledge or scarp of nowhere, picks the locks of Heaven's gate before our eyes. The boldness of the invention is remarkable, and the distance that our realistic Anglo-Saxondom has traveled in the last twenty-five years is measured by the fact that its boldness startled nobody. We were all quite ready to believe. If we did not quite believe in spite of our readiness, I think it was because we waited—and waited vainly—for Lord Dunsany to set us the example. Faith is somehow not his attribute. He has a real, though slight, originality; but when he throws open the door upon some sombre vista of eccentric and enticing picturesqueness, he says, "Look in" rather than "Come in." In this play the burglar literally opens the gate, but behind it nothing is to be seen but blue space and the clearness of the unapproached stars. The lesson is wise and timely. Heaven baffles the aggressions of men less by resistance than by removal; Utopia vindicates its etymology. The setting, by Mr. Warren Dahler, which was half the play, was a good half; and the acting, if it did not satisfy, sufficed.

O. W. FIRKINS

Problems of Labor and Capital

III. Compulsory Filing of Collective Bargaining Agreements

THAT the public is the third party, not to be ignored in the warfare between unions and employers, becomes clearer after each struggle between them. Even where the public welfare is only remotely concerned both labor and employers recognize the advantage of satisfying what is known as "public opinion." Both unions and employers' associations spend fortunes in advertising with the hope that the weight of evidence may incline it to their side. More than this should be done: all collective-bargaining agreements, with all their modifications and amendments, should be made a matter of public record. Such agreements should be filed with the governmental agency having charge of the mediation and arbitration of disputes, such as, for example, the Bureau of Mediation and Arbitration of the Industrial Commission of the State of New York. If the agreement is inter-state in scope, then the proper depositary is the corresponding Federal bureau.

The advantages of such public filing are many. In the first place, it will furnish a public record of inestimable value to attorneys and others who are called upon to prepare contracts between one or more employers and groups of employees. Although the legal profession has ready access to many other types of contracts, such as leases, deeds, wills, and trust agreements, which have been tested in the courts for generations, there is nowhere in existence a compilation of collective-bargaining contracts. In spite of the accumulation of information which is at the hands of the legal profession on other subjects, many contested cases arise annually merely because the intention of the parties has not been clearly expressed. It is not surprising that in the comparatively new type of contract involved in a collective-bargaining agreement, in itself a difficult instrument to draw, disagreement and confusion should arise.

In the second place, the public agencies which have been charged with the settlement of industrial disputes have been comparatively ineffective because of the fact that they are called into the conflict between the employers and the employees after it is already well advanced.

Through the public recording of all such instruments, the agency charged with mediation and arbitration would have a calendar of prospective "trouble-dates" and could in advance use its machinery to reform, modify, or continue the agreement then in existence. Many collective agreements provide for notice of renewal or of proposed modifications at dates previous to expiration of the contract. A Bureau of Mediation could apply this effective device on a large scale.

Finally, many industrial disputes are aggravated, if they are not actually caused, by a belief on one side or the other, or both, that the original agreement has been modified by oral statements or correspondence. In practically every industrial disturbance, following a period of comparative peace under collective agreements between unions and employers, there appears a clear-cut issue as to the terms of the existing agreement. The public recording of all such agreements would estop either party from claiming that the agreement, as recorded, was not the entire contract between the parties, since no modifications or amendments that had not been filed could be regarded as valid.

This proposal is subject to certain queries. If the filing of all such written agreements is mandatory, will there not be created a desire to avoid reducing to writing the terms of the understandings? The negative answer to this question lies in an examination of our everyday business practices. Transactions on the stock exchanges, and the sale or consignment of precious stones, for example, are conducted without writings or even receipts, and conversely, where the personal relations of the parties has not permitted a development of confidence, everything tends to be reduced to writing. The advantages resulting from clear, unequivocal understandings, and the impossibility of operating under an oral collective-bargaining agreement containing provisions as to hours, wages, apprentices, holidays, overtime pay, rights of discharge, and innumerable other provisions relating to conditions of employment is not within the realm of dispute.

Again, would each and every collective agreement become filable? Should a profit-sharing plan in a single plant or office be made public? The answers to such questions can be found in the adoption of the following principle: Every agreement between three or more employees and one or more employers, if reduced to writing, and if it affects the terms of employment, should be filed. There is no apparent desire on the part of the employers for secrecy in matters of profit-sharing schemes. In fact, employers seem to be vieing with each other to procure publicity in such matters. Where then lies the danger? If the plan goes so far as to give all employees the right to an accounting, or if not that, at least discloses the net profits of the employer, may it not be presumed that the employer who has advanced so far in this direction will also find no objection to the public recording of agreements?

On the part of organized labor the public filing of agreements will doubtless meet with approval. In addition to the specific advantages of such a plan, the organized labor movement will be benefited by the seeming stamp of Government approval which will result from such public filing.

MORRIS L. ERNST

Books and the News

New American Books

TO name, as I have been asked to do, ten or a dozen American books of the past three or four months, is sure to make one keep on the watch for the national point of view, to think carefully what is really American, and what is imitative. Sometimes the imitative book represents a passing American tendency. How many of the novels and essays that you read are American, and how many of them are English? You may be surprised if you make a count. Books reach across national boundaries—fortunately

(Continued on page 444)

THE LIFE OF
LEONARD WOOD

By JOHN G. HOLME

Net, $1.25
at all bookstores

DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.

"A·B·A" CHEQUES GO ROUND THE WORLD

Hotels, stores and transportation companies everywhere know and accept them.

Those who use them are independent of banking hours, free from the annoyance of money exchange and protected from loss or theft. Your countersignature, written in the presence of the acceptor, automatically identifies you. Without it the cheques are valueless.

In denominations of $10, $20, $50 and $100. Conveniently carried in a small, compact wallet. Issued by the American Bankers Association, composed of 20,000 leading American Banks and Trust Companies.

"A·B·A" American Bankers Association Cheques

For further particulars write

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY
New York City

Essential

for every university and public library:

Essential

for every student of English Drama:

Nason's "JAMES SHIRLEY, DRAMATIST"

the only adequate biographical and critical study of the principal dramatic poet of the reign of Charles I.

Cloth. xvi+472 pages. Choicely illustrated. Price, $5.00.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS

(Selling Agents)

32 Waverly Place New York City

(Continued from page 443)

—so much that an investigator of recent biographical works in English said that the four best biographies of the past year or two were an American and an English autobiography, the life of an Englishman by an American, and the life of an American by an Englishman. These were: Henry Adams's "Education," W. H. Hudson's "Far Away and Long Ago," Professor Cross's "History of Henry Fielding," and Lord Charnwood's "Abraham Lincoln."

For the new American books, "The Letters of Henry James" (2 vols. Scribner, 1920) is named with misgivings, and yet not without the feeling that it belongs in the list. An American who died a British subject, and had the insignia of the Order of Merit brought to him on his sick-bed, may seem a strange choice. Certainly no American is willing to give up other Americans, like Sargent and Whistler, also exiles, who contributed to the art and culture of other lands, and of the whole world. Henry James's exasperating obscurity, which appears in many of these letters, did not keep him from thinking clearly enough on the war. And, an arch-stylist, he never was deceived by the myth about the "exquisite English style" in which our diplomatic correspondence with Germany was conducted, from 1914 to 1918.

John Spargo's "The Psychology of Bolshevism" (Harper, 1920) should be added. In "The Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1919" (Small, 1920), edited by W. S. Braithwaite, we have a reflection of the current poetry, and in Vachell Lindsay's "The Golden Whales of California" (Macmillan, 1920), a single, striking volume, strong in its American flavor. The crash of its jazz poem about Daniel and the lions could never be duplicated by anybody born far from the sound of negro camp-meetings. Rockwell Kent's pictures for his "Wilderness; a Journal of Quiet Adventure in Alaska" (Putnam, 1920) are, sometimes, conscious, grandiose, and too near William Blake for comfort. Often, however, they are excellent; the end-papers best of all.

To keep up with recent magazine fiction read "The Best Short Stories of 1919" (Small), edited by Edward J. O'Brien. For essays, "Modes and Morals" (Scribner, 1920), by Katharine Fullerton Gerould, have the rare quality of irony. Mr. Huneker's "Bedouins" (Scribner) belongs in this list, and W. E. B. Du Bois's "Darkwater" (Harcourt, 1920), for its interpretation of the negro. Although not a new book, in the customary sense, A. Edward Newton's "The Amenities of Book Collecting" (Atlantic Monthly Press), deserves in its new edition a second reading. If you missed it at first, so much the better for your enjoyment now.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street
Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
CHARLES E. HAYDOCK, Vice-President and Manager
MRS. KEY CAMMACK..........Assistant Secretary
RUSSELL V. WORSTELL.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

LEONARD WOOD

ON NATIONAL ISSUES

Complied by EVAN J. DAVID

$1.50 at all booksellers

DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 51 | New York, Saturday, May 1, 1920 | FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 445
Editorial Articles:
Lawmakers Found Wanting 448
If the Overallers Are in Earnest 449
The Newberry Verdict 450
Branting Prime Minister 451
Behind the Financing of China. Part IV. By Charles Hodges 452
Propaganda and the News. By W. J. Ghent 453
Asia, Europe, and Bolshevism. By Dr. Paul Rohrbach 455
M. Millerand, the French Premier. By Othon Guerlac 456
Correspondence 457
Book Reviews:
Champ Clark's Reminiscences 460
Satire and Soothing-Syrup 461
Ireland's Future 461
Adventures in the Past 463
The Run of the Shelves 463
Drama:
The Unreviving London Stage and Its Revivals. By William Archer 465
On Profiteer Hunting. By Henry Hazlitt 466
Jazz a Song at Twilight. By Clement Wood 468
Educational Section 470
Books and the News: Sport. By Edmund Lester Pearson 472

THE distinctive development of the past ten days in the Presidential nomination field has been the increased prominence of President Wilson. His letter on the treaty to one of the Kansas delegates-at-large to San Francisco; Mr. Jim Ham Lewis's warning, in his address at the Kansas Convention, that "the country must be ready to see the convention at San Francisco put Wilson as its candidate before the nation as a protest" against the defeat of the treaty; the announcement made by the New York World that the President intends to return the treaty to the Senate "some time this summer," accompanied by reservations of his own—all these things point to something like a certainty that Mr. Wilson, if his health holds out, will play a very big part in the political developments of the next few months. If the last of these statements is well founded, the one thing to be hoped for by all patriotic Americans is that the President's proposal, whatever it may be, will be considered and acted upon solely according to its merits, and not as a continuation of the unhappy contentions of the past ten months. As to the Presidential campaign itself, it seems to us as clear as it ever was that no profitable method can be found for turning it into a referendum on the treaty. If Mr. Wilson should not be a candidate, the issue would be merely confusing; and if Mr. Wilson should be a candidate, while the issue of the treaty would undoubtedly be a genuine and live one, it would be overshadowed by the personal issues involved in the question of his own re-election.

COMMENTING on the results of the Michigan primaries, we pointed out that the proper view of Senator Johnson's vote was to regard it as cast for him on the one side as against four prominent candidates on the opposite side; and we stated that "Johnson beat Wood by a plurality of perhaps 45,000, but he fell short of the combined vote of the four by about 55,000." The complete returns have been slow to come in. They show that while Johnson's plurality over Wood was almost precisely what the earlier returns indicated, the combined vote of the four surpassed Johnson's by a much larger figure than we stated. Johnson polled 156,939 votes; Wood 112,556; and Wood, Lowden, Hoover, and Pershing polled an aggregate vote of 245,458. Thus Johnson fell short of the combined vote of what may well be called the four normal Republican candidates by nearly 90,000; his vote was 156,939 out of a total of 402,397 for the five. Johnson is cast for a big rôle at Chicago; but he does not command majorities, or anything like majorities, in many States.

BUNCOMBE is the only wear for a Presidential campaign—that must be the conviction of the House Democrats and "insurgent" Republicans who have concocted a bill to raise money for the proposed bonus by means of a retroactive war-profits tax. The bill would impose a tax of 80 per cent. upon the whole amount by which the income of an individual or corporation for each of the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 exceeded pre-war income. This sort of raid on incomes of past years which have already yielded to the Government what it thought fit to exact, and which have been spent or used upon the supposition that the recipient had them at his disposal, is so preposterous that there is not the slightest danger of its being actually imposed by any Congress and President that may be elected next autumn, unless the country goes crazy in the interval. The bill is not meant to be passed, but to serve as a "good enough Morgan till after the election." But it won't be even that.

DEPRAVED as we all know the American press to be, some of us will be surprised at the exposure of its calculating wickedness which comes from Italy. But the truth must be faced, however disagreeable and unexpected. Occasional items of a disturbing character in regard to labor unrest in Italy have been appearing in the newspapers, but most people, in their innocence, have looked upon them as stray items of news, like so many similar ones relating to other countries, including our own. But the Giornale d'Italia understands the thing better. A campaign of false news, it tells us, is being carried on by American newspapers against Italy, and the motive for it is obvious. "Naturally," it says—and there is a world of meaning in the word—"naturally, the principal reason of this campaign is to depreciate still further the value of the lira, thus imposing on us usurious prices for products which we are forced to buy from abroad." That news is systematically suppressed, that nobody is allowed to hear a word from radical leaders, that the labor men's side of a strike dispute is never to be found in the news columns of our capitalist press—with all this we have long been familiar. But even our most wide-awake reformers have not suspected a depth of depravity which would cause those organs of Satanic plutocracy to manufacture a series of false news dispatches for what is, after all, even to Mr. Morgan or Mr. Rockefeller, the comparatively minor object of lowering the value of the lira.

THE League of Nations has refused to accept a mandate for Armenia on the ground of inadequate resources. An advertisement in a Detroit weekly reveals the cause of this lack of funds: "The League of Nations, Wall Street, and other financiers are paying Wood's campaign expenses to get your vote. Vote for Johnson, who smashed the fake League of Nations, who stands for free speech, a free press and free America, Ireland included." This makes it quite clear why the League can not become a mandatory for Armenia. But it does not explain whence the League, since it was smashed by Johnson, derives the financial strength to support Wood's campaign. Or was this self-contradictory statement inserted with the express purpose of showing what free speech is capable of under a Johnson régime?

AT the San Remo Conference, peace between London and Paris was renewed by a give-and-take on either side, though in this transaction between the stubborn Millerand and the pliable Lloyd George it was the Frenchman who made the smaller sacrifice. By yielding on the subject of the German payments, which will now be fixed at a lump sum, and by promising that France will declare in unmistakable terms that she has no intention of annexing the left bank of the Rhine, he received in return Lloyd George's support of his insistence on the disarmament of Germany, and the continuance of the Commission of Control which the British Premier wanted to be discharged. Millerand has scored yet another point by eliciting from Lloyd George a flat denial, which it seems difficult to reconcile with recent utterances of his, that he wished to have the treaty with Germany revised.

THE renewal of peace between the Premiers will have a stabilizing effect upon affairs in Germany. The lack of authority of Herr Müller's Government is in part due to the agitation of those who, foreseeing an estrangement between England and France, opposed the Government's endeavors to execute the peace terms. The frustration of their hopes, and Lloyd George's outspoken support of Millerand's refusal to have the treaty revised, will deprive that opposition of its backbone and help to strengthen the Berlin Government. Whether it will gather strength enough to carry out the disarmament in the teeth of the army's resistance remains to be seen. The fate of Germany lies now in the hands of Ludendorff and his party. If they consider it, in their blindness, a patriotic duty to refuse obedience to the Government, civil war and foreign intervention, to which Lloyd George is now pledged, will be the results. The Prussian militarists have never impressed the world by their political foresight, but the situation created at San Remo is so clear-cut, and the consequences of an infraction of the treaty so plain to be seen, that even these purblind meddlers of the old régime can not fail to perceive them and act, or rather refrain from action, accordingly.

THE silence of the insurgent press regarding the new Soviet labor code is dark and profound. Even such journals as have heretofore made a practice of printing certain documents of an alleged revelatory character, in order to shame and defy the hated capitalist press, have balked at the labor code. Of course, a Soviet code which transforms all male labor into slave labor may be thought, even by the most frantic pro-Bolshevist editor, to be a trifle extreme and therefore something to be kept from its readers. But having swallowed so many camels in the way of Bolshevist outrage upon human rights, to strain at the gnat of labor enslavement must seem to ordinary persons a bit absurd. Of the two stock justifications for such measures, with which the pro-Bolshevist editor has heretofore always been ready, the first, "protection against counter-revolution," is obviously unhandy for the case in point. But the other, "the exercise of proletarian self-discipline," fits like a glove. For a long time it has been evident, from the columns of the less mealy-mouthed of our insurgent contemporaries, that the essence of "proletarian self-discipline" lay in unhesitating obedience to any arbitrary order of the oligarchy of thirty-four. Why the present silence? Why the failure to apply the rule, or theory, or principle, to a comparatively trifling matter like the enslavement of labor? Here is a puzzle which only Time will solve.

IT was a noble gesture, quite in the grand style, with which the Freeman, the latest entrant in the field of insurgent journalism, qualified its acceptance of the welcome extended it by the Nation. "Thank you very kindly," it said, in effect. "Your language attests the generosity of your heart, but unfortunately it reveals some grave defects of understanding. You welcome us to the field of 'liberal journalism.' Know, then—and may this statement serve not merely as a gentle reproof to yourselves but as a stern warning to others—that we are not liberals; we are radicals. There is a fundamental difference between the two, which a schoolboy should be whipped for not knowing. Thank you again most kindly, but in the future please be a little more circumspect in your use of terms." Thereupon the differences are carefully expounded. It appears that liberals believe in the political state, whereas radicals scorn it and all its works; and it further appears that liberals recognize but two factors in wealth production, labor and capital, whereas radicals, with scientific precision, recognize in addition a third factor, the land. Far be it from us, even though we doubt the sufficiency of the distinction, to challenge it openly. But if one's attitude toward the political state is a prime test, then the Nation, in this verdict of exclusion from the ranks of the radicals, has suffered a cruel and unusual punishment. More than once it has emphatically proclaimed the uselessness of the state and the need of merging ourselves in that large and joyous nebulosity, the Great Society. We can not but admire the grand manner of the Freeman in this important episode; but at the same time we feel bound to protest against a hasty and an unjust judgment.

STRANGE, as we have had occasion to remark before, are the mental workings of sentimental radicalism. One of the editors of the Survey, reviewing, in a recent issue, a biography of Debs, admits the legal guilt of the Socialist leader. "But after that is admitted," he says, "the contrast between our attitude toward the German Socialist, Dr. Liebknecht, and Eugene V. Debs is striking. When Liebknecht went to jail because his Socialist principles opposed all wars America applauded an honorable man. Our toleration does not extend to Debs even though he is a much milder type of Socialist than Liebknecht turned out to be. History is full of such irony." But where, either in the classical or in the derived sense of the term, is the irony? That Debs is a "much milder type of Socialist" than the Liebknecht of the winter of 1918-19, who sought the armed overthrow of a representative Government, would be difficult to prove in the face of his passionate indorsement not only of Liebknecht but of Lenin. Indeed, his most devoted partisans will indignantly resent the attribute of revolutionary mildness given him. But this point aside, there is the plain fact that the Liebknecht of 1915-16 denounced the military aggression of the German Government, while Debs in 1918 denounced the measures taken by the United States Government against that aggression. To straight-minded folk the distinction is clear enough. One course of conduct tended to frustrate the German Emperor, while the other tended to sustain and strengthen him. The popular attitude was a logical response to the facts: Liebknecht was applauded, while Debs was condemned. If history is full of such instances, so much the better for history, with its attestation to the general common sense of mankind.

BETWEEN the two extreme notions that a man with a diploma has finished his education and that before he can begin it he has a good deal to unlearn, lies the truth that he has indeed made some progress but must still keep in touch with the progress of the schools or lose much of the ground he has gained. Princeton's proposal to send to all her graduates full reports of the work that is being done by her professors is evidence of the growing realization of the necessity of "continuation" schooling. In another field the New York Post-Graduate Medical School has for nearly forty years provided increasingly effective graduate instructions for the practising physicians of the country. When it is considered how much has been accomplished by this institution on an endowment which yields only $20,000 a year, the hope is well grounded that, with an endowment of two million, it can set up in New York a centre to which medical men throughout the world who formerly looked to Vienna and Berlin will gladly and profitably repair.

SIGNS multiply that the birds are at last coming into their own. The decision of the Supreme Court upholding the Migratory Bird law, and thus making effective the policy inaugurated by the British-American treaty of 1918, has been followed by the announcement that the Rockefeller Foundation has deeded to the State of Louisiana 85,000 acres of land, partly swamp and partly dry, to be used as a refuge for migratory birds and a game preserve. It is a magnificent gift, and an evidence of sound and farsighted judgment on the part of the trustees of the Foundation. The land available and favorably situated for such preserves, or "sanctuaries," without sacrifice of other interests, is ample in quantity, if suitably protected, to prevent the actual extinction of any species of our birds and land animals. It is to be hoped that the next few years will see an enormous increase in the total area and general distribution of these tracts of absolute safety, where the "open season" is twelve months long, and belongs to the birds and animals, not to the hunter.

THE reduction of illiteracy among children of from 10 to 14 years of age in the eleven Southern States during 1900-1910 was approximately 33 per cent, and it is believed that the new census will show another marked decline. The last decade has shown a great increase in child-welfare laws. In 1910, except for inadequate measures in Kentucky and North Carolina, there was no compulsory school attendance law in any of these eleven States. Now every one of them has such a law. Notable changes have also been made in health laws and child-labor laws. Very recently, Alabama, which for so long a time had stood out determinedly against child-welfare laws, enacted four measures of importance. Child labor under 14 years is now prohibited, and an eight-hour maximum day for children up to 16 years is ordained; a department of child welfare, with a child-labor division, has been created; extensive improvements have been made in the compulsory education law, and the local health administration bodies have been reorganized for more effective functioning. The fight for child welfare has been a long and stubborn one; but it is now resulting in a succession of victories which a decade ago only the most hopeful looked for in so short a time.

Lawmakers Found Wanting

IF the future of representative government in America were to be judged by recent experience at the capitals of the nation and of its foremost State, it would present a dismal outlook. The case of Albany is so hopelessly bad that it gives no occasion for discussion. Confronted with extraordinary need for helpful constructive measures, the New York Legislature has failed to do anything to which even party advocates can point with any semblance of satisfaction. To those looking upon its record with dispassionate judgment, it can almost be summed up in the statement that the Legislature has done those things which it ought not to have done, and left undone those things which it ought to have done. Even if it be granted—as may indeed be true—that the one striking bit of legislation passed (apart from the heresy-hunting), the bills for the relief of tenants in the housing crisis at New York City, was a good and useful measure, the credit which can be assigned to the Legislature for it is of the slightest. For the bills were passed in response to a tremendous wave of popular pressure, and might just as well have been passed if the State had been under a government by mass meeting, and not by representatives selected to exercise thought and judgment on public affairs. Having done what the people demanded in their exigency, the Legislature did not stir a finger to better the situation out of which the exigency had arisen.

At Washington the long-drawn-out nightmare of the treaty discussion in the Senate has naturally overshadowed all other aspects of the Congressional session. There has, of course, been much valuable, as well as necessary, work done in relation to many of our governmental interests. But there has not been perceptible any large purpose, either in the direction of a return to normal conditions of governmental expenditure, or in that of other great measures called for by the extraordinary circumstances of the time. Under the pressure of a fixed time-limit, a railroad bill has been passed which is as good as could have been expected, and for their efficient work upon which some Senators and Representatives, notably Senator Cummins, deserve high praise. But few will claim that, whatever may have been done in a number of particular and even important fields, Congress has risen to anything remotely approaching the need of the time. As for the matter of the treaty itself, fully as we are convinced that the heaviest burden of responsibility for its failure must rest upon President Wilson, it is impossible to point to the conduct of the Senate as a whole, or to the leadership of either party in it, as presenting a shining contrast to the attitude of the President.

In the circumstance that both at Albany and at Washington Legislature and Executive stood in party opposition to each other, there is ground for consolatory, but also for disturbing, reflection. That opposition undoubtedly suffices to explain a great part of the impotence that we have witnessed. One may comfort oneself with the thought that the paralyzing effect of such a situation is the exception, not the rule, in our system of government. But the exception is too frequent to be viewed with complacency. Granting that, the separation of powers which is fundamental in our Constitutional structure results in a balance of good, it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the price which has to be paid for the attainment of that good. It has been part of the misfortune of Mr. Wilson's career that, recognizing, as he has always done, the great drawbacks of this separation of powers, he has acted upon the assumption that he could remove those drawbacks by ignoring, or almost ignoring, the fact that the separation exists. So long as the ship of state was sailing in smooth waters, the theory that he actually was captain and helmsman and mate all in one worked fairly well; but in the time of storm and stress that simple method of exorcising all difficulties very naturally ceased to be effective. So long as we have our present system, we have got to work according to its rules; if the system is to be changed, it must be changed deliberately. And it should never be forgotten that the other system—the British parliamentary system—has its own checks and balances, though of a very different nature from ours. To introduce the predominance of the Premier without his responsibility, is a plan whose boldness is not greater than its crudity.

Unfortunately, whatever consolation may be got from ascribing some part of the failure either at Washington or at Albany to party disharmony between the legislative and the executive power, a vast amount of it remains unaccountable in that way. It was to no such cause that Speaker Sweet's preposterous programme concerning the Socialists was due, nor the following that he received in the Assembly. In the Senate at Washington, the absence of impressive and coherent leadership in the treaty fight is not to be explained by the fact that the majority of the Senate was Republican while the President was Democratic; nor was the utter nonentity of Democratic leadership in the Senate attributable to that cause. The truth is that we are at this moment in an extremely poverty-stricken condition as to the quality of our representative assemblies. It is quite possible that the average calibre of the members of Congress and of such a body as the New York Legislature is as good as ever it was; and in point of political morality and personal honesty the standard is probably much higher than it has been in the past. But of outstanding personality, of men who mean something more than the humdrum every day member, there is a woeful scarcity. There is hardly a man in either house of Congress—not to speak of the New York Legislature—whose words are eagerly looked for, or whose judgment exercises powerful influence upon any considerable section of the public. Whether this is a passing condition or a permanent one, there is little means of judging; but it is a patent fact, and one which sober Americans can not afford lightly to dismiss from their thoughts.

If the Overallers Are in Earnest

IT seems fairly clear by this time that overalls are not in themselves destined to spell salvation. It is chiefly as a symbol of the desire—and what, we judge, is practically far more important, the necessity—for economizing that the overall movement is generally discussed. If that desire exists in sufficient degree—still more if that necessity exists in sufficient degree—something is going to happen of considerable importance, overalls or no overalls. But it ought not to be impossible to utilize the sudden burst of general interest in the subject for the promotion of a clearer understanding of the problem.

Probably of all the motives assigned for the overall movement the one most frequently and conspicuously put forward is the determination to check retail "profiteering." There is reason to believe that retail profits are in a large range of cases higher than there is any need of their being. How much higher, and to what extent the excess is to be attributed to anything which justly deserves the opprobrious epithet, are questions wide open to conjecture. But certain it is that of the millions of persons who have welcomed the overall movement, the majority are convinced that a large part of what they are suffering is due to the exorbitant profits of retailers.

But to fight these profits, if they are anything like so unreasonable as is generally believed, a method is open far more effective than any spasmodic display of abnormal frugality can offer. There is no reason to suppose that people in general will continue long to exercise that virtue which, under the pleasing excitement of a concerted drive, they may for a time enthusiastically exhibit. A certain amount will indeed have been saved, and that is so much to the good; provided it is really saved and applied to the reduction of debt, or the increase of production. But presently we shall have retail "business as usual" again, and percentages of retail profits will be about the same as before. On the other hand, if the protest against these profits has a sound basis, and if the overallers are sufficiently in earnest to be willing to put thought and pains, as well as feeling, into their movement, they can produce results of a far more permanent character.

It is a most striking circumstance that, through all this agitation over retail profiteering, one hears hardly a word of the possibility of consumers' coöperation. It is true that coöperative stores never have been able to make much headway in our cities, but this has been largely due to the fact that on the whole the well-being of our people has been such as to make the 10 per cent. saving, or thereabouts, which is all that the Rochdale stores in England have been able to effect, too unimportant in the eyes of our free-and-easy people to stimulate them to the skilled and continuous effort required for the successful management of such an enterprise. But matters are very different now. Millions of persons in the middle walks of life are suffering keenly from the inadequacy of their unincreased, or slightly increased, incomes to meet the enormous advance in prices, so that even a saving of 10 per cent., if it can be effected, will be a matter of great importance to them. And if anything like what is usually alleged about the retail business of these war and post-war years is true, a far greater saving ought to be possible. Furthermore, the very conditions which make life so hard for thousands of persons of the salaried classes would make available for important parts of the work of management the services of large numbers of men and women who are seeking a change from their present under-paid occupations.

To start, and to carry on with efficiency and success, a coöperative store requires, besides a firm and clear-cut purpose, the devoted labor of a considerable number of competent and trustworthy managers of the undertaking. If, however, the overall movement is something more substantial than a bit of child-like enthusiasm for a novelty, and if the grievance against the retailers is a real one, surely there ought to be forthcoming a sufficient number of persons willing and able to perform those functions for reasonable pay. Nevertheless, from what we know of the American temper in such matters, we should be loth to express any expectation that the thing will be done, or even seriously attempted. But there is another thing that might be done to effect the same object, and which makes a far less exacting demand whether on seriousness of purpose, on thoughtfulness in planning, or on special personal qualities in those who carry on the undertaking. A great stock company might be formed upon ordinary business principles, but dedicated to the purpose of establishing reasonable rates of retail profits. Every person who has joined, either literally or figuratively, in the overall movement expects to save, by economy in the course of the next few months, a tidy little sum of money. In the city of New York alone there may well be supposed to be—if the movement amounts to anything at all—a million persons who should save not less than an average of fifty dollars each. It would take much less than fifty million dollars to start a great general store, or chain of stores. Even one such store, with a capital of two or three million dollars, would, if successful, set an example that would be of powerful and cumulative effect in the control of prices. There have been times when the objection might have been raised that such a store would be disastrously handicapped by discrimination against it on the part of manufacturers and jobbers. But such discrimination would to-day be made impossible either by specific provisions of the law or by the imperious demand of public opinion.

The question before the people is partly one of fact and partly one of their own earnestness and competence to deal with facts. It is easy to keep howling about profiteers. It is easy to egg on the officers of the law to hunt down here and there some individual who is no more a criminal than anybody else in the same line of business, and send him to jail or drive him to suicide. It is easy to parade in overalls, and, as the experience of the other day showed, still easier to stand on the sidewalk and watch other people parade in them. What people do not find easy is to do a little sober and continuous thinking. Apart from that unfamiliar and distasteful exertion, it is really just as easy to form a stock company as it is to do any of those other more congenial stunts. It remains to be seen whether the modicum of thinking and working necessary for the purpose is going to be done.

The Newberry Verdict

WE print on another page a letter from Mr. Hal H. Smith, counsel for Mr. Blair, who was treasurer of the Newberry committee and disburser of the fund which led to the indictment and conviction of Mr. Newberry, Mr. Blair, and others connected with the campaign. Mr. Smith objects to the editorial comment in the Review for March 27 on the outcome of the trial.

His first objection is that it was stated that Mr. Newberry's letters showed that "he had full knowledge of the large sums used and gave constant advice as to their expenditure." As to this point, we may quote from the charge of Judge Sessions, as reported in the Detroit News at the time:

> If the jury was satisfied that Mr. Newberry, at or about the time he became a candidate, was made aware of the cost of the campaign, and that it would be in excess of the amount allowed by law, and if he thereafter advised, counseled, procured or participated in the unlawful expenditure, they would be warranted in holding him guilty.

On the evidence presented, including a mass of letters and telegrams from Mr. Newberry, the jury was satisfied that Mr. Newberry had taken active and unlawful part in the expenditures under investigation. As to the effect of these letters and telegrams, one of the jurors was quoted by the Associated Press representative, immediately after the rendering of the verdict, as saying: "The defense itself had supplemented the scanty Government proof that Mr. Newberry himself had taken an active part in the campaign, and shown by his own writing that he directed almost every important move." The words of the Review, in their natural interpretation, were in harmony, we think, with the evidence given and with the apparent interpretation of that evidence by the Judge and the jury. We did not say, of course, that Mr. Newberry had advised or directed the commission of a specific criminal act. The offense lay not at one specific point but in a totality of items of which most, if not all, would have been separately permissible, so far as the criminal law is concerned. In point of morals, the Review could not make the same concession.

And this brings us to Mr. Smith's second objection, that it was said that "the wealth of Mr. Newberry himself was lavishly used in violation of the law and of political decency." The exact words of the Review were, "the wealth of Mr. Newberry himself, his family and his friends, was lavishly used in violation of the law and of political decency." The difference is quite evident: we were referring to the campaign fund, and its use, as a whole.

Of course the criminal law must be strictly interpreted, and the accused must have the benefit of every doubt. Yet the jury promptly arrived at a verdict of conviction. But when the Review spoke of the violation of political decency, it had in mind far more than the criminal law can ever hope adequately to cover. If neither Federal nor State law had forbidden the expenditure of the entire sum involved, we should still feel obliged to characterize such expenditure as a violation of political decency. The very lavishness of it was intended to frighten away possible competing candidates. Mr. Newberry himself wrote, during the campaign, "I am glad Mr. Warner is scared out. As long as we keep up our publicity work, it will be harder and harder for a new man to get a start." We shall not stop here to enumerate the various forms of expenditure testified to in the trial and described by Mr. Newberry and his supporters as "publicity work," or advertising. "Definition" of these terms ceases to define, if it is stretched sufficiently to include such activities as, for example, the paying for solicitation of names for the nomination of an extra candidate to oppose Mr. Ford in the Democratic primaries. Such uses of money always have been corrupting to any electorate, and can never be anything else.

We can not agree with Mr. Smith, however, in the opinion that the jury convicted the defendants merely on "the theory that the expenditure of a large sum of money was wrong." Both Congress and the Michigan Legislature have put that theory into the form of very definite statute law, and it was under this that the jury rendered its verdict. Nor can we find any evidence that the trial itself was "a hideous concession to popular clamor and to the prejudice against wealth." We venture the opinion that most men of wealth are themselves fully convinced that a restraint on this particular employment of wealth is altogether wholesome and necessary.

Into direct bribery—"corruption" as it would be thought of under the forms of criminal law as developed in the past—men like Mr. Newberry would not enter. That particular kind of "moral turpitude" can not rightly be laid to their charge. But it is their misfortune not to have grasped the higher conception of duty and propriety in such matters which is gradually bringing the law to a higher level, and with which political practice must conform just as fast as it becomes law, if no faster. Candidates for office should note, too, that the day has closed when they could come off morally clear in the court of sound public opinion through the plea that they were ignorant of what their own agents were doing. It is their positive duty to know, and the public good demands that they be held to that duty. A political campaign conducted in brutal disregard of these nicer moral distinctions, which can not always be easily covered by positive law, may be far more corrupting in ultimate effect than the coarser crimes of direct bribery and intimidation.

Branting Prime Minister

"WHEN the Communists maintain," writes Karl Kautsky in his "Terrorismus und Kommunismus," "that democracy is in practice the domination of the bourgeoisie, one might answer them that the dictatorship of the proletariat is in practice a return to pre-bourgeois, barbaric club-law. Democracy, with its universal suffrage, is not the domination of the bourgeoisie. The latter, in its revolutionary period, did, indeed, introduce a class franchise, but after a long and heavy struggle the proletariat obtained universal suffrage. This is a fact of common knowledge, which the Communists, however, seem to have forgotten. Democracy, with its universal suffrage, points the way by which the class war may be changed from a war with the fist into a war with the brain, where only that class can conquer which is its opponent's intellectual and moral superior. Democracy is the only way towards that higher form of society which socialism means to civilized man."

Kautsky is the Nestor, and the most learned, not only of German but of European Socialists, and his word still carries authority among the leaders of the Labor parties of various nationalities. His vindication of democratic government as against proletarian dictatorship is shared by a large majority of the intellectual exponents of Socialism. It is everywhere a minority that, captivated by this magic catchword of uncertain meaning, clamors for their party's accession to the Third Internationale of Moscow. In Switzerland a resolution to that effect was actually carried by the Socialist Congress, but defeated again by a referendum among the members of the party. A similar resolution, moved by the delegates from Paris, was rejected by the French Socialist Congress at Strassburg. At the Easter Congress of the Belgian Socialists only one-fourth of the votes were cast for the resolutions proposed by Jacquemotte, the spokesman of the Leninists. The majority agreed with Kamiel Huysmans, who declared that "the advocates of the Third Internationale can only divide the proletarians." This is, in fact, their only achievement: they have caused a cleavage in Labor by their advocacy of a Russian Socialism which can not appeal to the average workmen of Western Europe who, in spite of Marxian doctrines and religiously memorized definitions of capitalism, class war, etc., has much more in common with the bourgeois of his own country than with the "free" proletarian of Russia.

In Sweden evolutionary Socialism has reached a stage which it has not attained in any other country of Europe. The development has been extraordinary in its rapidity. It is only a few years ago that Premier Staaff, the leader of the Liberal party, was forced to resign and hand the reins of Government to a conservative successor, and now the Socialist Hjalmar Branting is at the head of affairs, with a Cabinet of Socialist Ministers only. The Swedish nation does not yet stand on the threshold of the Socialist millennium. "The general ideas of the Social-democratic party have not gained sufficient adherence among the people and their representatives to make a Government like this Socialistic one of ours a parliamentary necessity." In these words Branting admitted the precarious position of his Cabinet, which compels him to restrict his Socialistic programme to those projects which he may expect to realize with the help of the Liberal party, such as the reform of municipal taxation, treatment of the housing problem, reform of the defense system necessitated by Sweden's accession to the League of Nations, and socialization of some branches of production and commerce, which is tentatively thrown in along with the rest.

A bourgeois Government under Socialist disguise, Branting's Cabinet is called by the radical wing of his party. There is some truth in the taunt. But those who make it should at least admit that Branting and his colleagues have not donned the disguise to conceal their identity from a hostile bourgeois mob, but only to win the goodwill and support of a peace-loving nation whose democratic constitution, of bourgeois make, has enabled them to rise to their present position. It is up to them to convince the people, by the practical results of their legislative and administrative activity, of the excellence of the Socialist doctrine. The proof of the pudding is in the eating; by merely hearing the recipe read the people can not be persuaded of its excellence.

That the left wing of the party disapproves of Branting's acceptance of the Government need not be wondered at. It is a matter of general experience that the Socialist who shoulders responsibility for the management of the country's affairs loses his dogmatic rigidity and is apt to slide back to bourgeois moderation. To-day's conservative rulers are the radicals of yesterday, when they were not yet in power. Hence the fear of the extremists lest the party by coming into power should stray from its dogmatic seclusion and become fused with the bourgeois liberals and radicals. In order to prevent such falling off the extremists have stated their minimum demands, and if Mr. Branting does not comply with these at their own speed they will probably call a political strike to force his hands. These reformers of Lenin's school will not believe that Rome was not built in a day, nor will they believe, which is worse, that in a day Alba Longa could be destroyed.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Behind the Financing of China

(IN FOUR PARTS—PART IV)

THE reopening of the closing door in the Far East is the purpose of the revived American financial activity which resulted in the Consortium. Its success or failure determines the fate of Japan's persistent efforts to revive the spheres of influence which, since 1900, have been demonstrated to be inimical to the peaceful development of the Chinese Republic. Its significance is fully grasped by the Elder Statesmen and their star-chamber associates dominating the Cabinet from behind the throne. And it is for that reason that they speak of Japan's "special position" in the Far East. Japan's "special position" is incompatible with the Consortium.

Had it not been for the war, Japan would appear to-day as a minor economic factor with no other than political claims for participating in the inevitable coöperative financing of China so nearly consummated in 1914. Japan is aware that the war broke down the balance of power in the Far East. Its prolongation gave the Japanese military party the opportunity to resuscitate the discredited diplomacy which based itself on regional monopolies under rival Powers. If this involves the impairment of China's integrity, it involves also the virtual leadership of Japan.

The problem, then, is whether Japan's affirmation of her "special position" can be reconciled with a necessarily coöperative financing of China. Its solution must take into account the generally successful tactics of the Japanese statesmen. (1) They attempt to block the proposal prejudicial to their interests by direct opposition. (2) If this fails, they skilfully turn to indirect methods of obstruction. (3) As a last resort, they unqualifiedly accepted the proposal "in principle," and then drive the best bargain they can with regard to its application in practice. (4) This compromise becomes the starting point for a new set of manœuvres with hope that the thousandth chance may prove the reward of a venturesome statecraft.

The repudiation by Japan of the terms of the Inter-Group Agreement of May, 1919—her nullification, in fact, of the Consortium—carried Japanese statesmen to the point where American pressure forced them to a compromise. Her original opposition had been based on the determination of the military party in Tokyo to keep intact the Japanese hegemony over Manchuria, Mongolia adjacent to the Three Eastern Provinces, and presumably the ex-German rights in Shantung. Bowing to the inevitable, Japan's Foreign Office was instructed to seek the best way out.

It is no secret that the British Government, late in November, 1919—doubtless prompted by her Japanese ally—cited the Ishii-Lansing Agreement as justifying the exclusion of Mongolia and Manchuria from the scope of the Consortium under our implied recognition of Japan's "special position." Our Government at once informed Britain that such recognition was not intended to imply a monopoly or a priority of economic or industrial rights. Attention was expressly directed to the concluding clauses of this much-discussed agreement, which specifically and without qualification—the State Department so declared—preserved the principle of equality of commercial and industrial opportunity through the whole of China. This, of course, was but the State Department's formal reiteration of ex-Secretary Lansing's public testimony giving the lie to the sedulously circulated official statements of the Japanese Government that the United States had accepted the "special position" doctrine in 1917.

The reasonable interpretation of Japan's reaffirmation of the Consortium is that she recognizes the case has gone against her. Granted Japan has been given considerable latitude in the definition of her vested interests in North China, the fact remains that the United States has retained ample means to bring the Japanese War Office cabal to time. And without much more than she obtains under the present state of the Consortium, her dream of empire in Eastern Asia must remain in great part a dream. The future of her rail-and-iron policy lay in the acquisition of the dormant Russian rights for future construction in North Manchuria and Mongolia, as well as in her unfettered ability to weave a web stretching from Shantung into Central Asia on China's other flank. But these are schemes upon which no "substantial progress" has been made; accordingly, Japan really loses the key to her expansion westward on the continent planned for the next hundred years.

Japan's attitude as defined in her semi-official pronouncements springs from her need to protect "vital Japanese interests." Under the old conditions, it is true, ruthless competition among the Powers did threaten Japan's position in the East. But under the Consortium all legitimate interests of Japan are conserved. The Consortium does, however, threaten the strategic points of Japanese expansion within her neighbor's domains. Japanese imperialism, pushed into a corner, justifies itself by declaring that other nations in the past have employed aggressive tactics against China. Obviously, for the peace of the future a broader point of view than this is needed in the Far East. Japan, or any other Power, can not set herself against the coöperative handling of the Chinese problem, which is striving to redress old wrongs and insists upon renouncing new aggressions.

The Consortium will once more make the Open-Door policy, formulated by Secretary Hay two decades ago, a vital factor in support of China's integrity. It is essential to peace in the Pacific. Under American leadership the Consortium means the democratizing of money-power in the East. The State Department—barring the possibility of the President's reversing our position as a token of friendship which is to lead Japan into better ways—has achieved its ends; for Japan has been aligned with us on the fundamental proposition that China's future development must be handled by joint action. In so far as the Consortium, with American leadership, can demonstrate to Japanese business that its future is brightest under conditions which assure to Japan China's friendship, the support of the Powers, and a vast share in the work itself, it offers a way to break the grip of the War Office junto. That means everything to China, to ourselves, and to a stable world.

CHARLES HODGES

Propaganda and the News

THE chorus of protest against the alleged suppression or falsification of news by the capitalist press has its ridiculous as well as its serious phase. No person who has devoted himself to unpopular causes, no person who has employed himself in the gathering and handling of exact information, will deny that there is ample cause for complaint. Unfortunately, however, the complainants do not, as a rule, come into court with unsoiled hands. They are mainly the revolutionary, radical, and pseudo-liberal journals that are playing the same game they attribute to others. What they really object to is the suppression or falsification not of facts per se, but of facts or fabrications conceived by them to be favorable to their own programmes, causes, or theories. By their own habitual practice they confirm this statement. From the frothiest revolutionary sheet to the most pretentious of the critical journals they pick and choose the material useful to their purposes and trim unuseful material to the same end. To the inconvenient fact they are, as a rule, coldly inhospitable or actively belligerent. They ignore it, or they assault it, and mutilate it beyond recognition. They are the advocates of a double standard. For themselves to sort and reject and trim is highly ethical. They do it in the name of truth, justice, democracy, loyalty to the people (or to the working class), and devotion to the cause of one or another of a score of "isms." But for the capitalist press to do a similar thing, with no pretense to a higher morality, is anti-social.

One must distinguish between the two general classes of journals which are parties to this controversy—the one, usually a daily, which is chiefly a purveyor of news, and the other, usually a weekly, which is chiefly a purveyor of opinion and propaganda. Of course, neither keeps to an exclusive field; the daily has its editorials, and even the most opinionated of the weeklies gives space to what it calls news. The propaganda journal, while reserving the right to give its readers only what it thinks is meet and fit for them, denies this right to the news journal and insists that the latter furnish an adequate and impartially written record of happenings.

The contention is, on the whole, sound, even though the circumstances under which it is made are so absurd. We have a right to demand of the purveyors of news that they give us the facts. It is the general conviction that they do not do this. Their delinquency is not so great as Mr. Upton Sinclair pictures it in "The Brass Check," or as Mr. Walter Lippmann, by repeated innuendo, implies it to be in "Liberty and the News." It is, however, a real one. Men disagree, of course, as to what matters are inadequately or unfairly treated in the news; but they agree that the news is qualitatively or quantitatively affected by the editorial attitude. The average reader who is in accord with the editorial attitude on a particular subject usually finds the news treatment of that subject satisfactory; the reader who is not in accord finds the treatment inadequate or unfair. The ignorance and inexperience of reporters, the complexity of subjects or situations dealt with, the conflict of testimony from which news accounts must be written, the sometimes amazing obtuseness of copy-readers (who prepare the "stuff" for the printers)—these and other factors contribute to the result. But to most men, and especially to those who are or have been on the inside, the factor of the editorial attitude is chief.

I can not undertake, for the present, to sustain this view, which is disputed by the defendants, further than to say that the editors and writers on the propaganda journals furnish in themselves a sufficient confirmation. It would be singular if the proneness to manipulate the news to accord with their policies, which they so clearly show, should not in some degree at least be shared by the editors and writers of the news journals. Nor can I now enter upon a consideration of remedies. The matter about which I am here mainly concerned is a comparison of the reliability of information given on the one hand by the news journals and on the other hand by the journals of open or disguised propaganda.

One who seeks the truth about any happening in which a political or a social issue is involved must give his days and nights to the scrutiny of many sources of information. What one newspaper or periodical furnishes him is contradicted or omitted by another; and for every point of view there is offered a special set of alleged facts. One must test and compare; one must strive to know the interest—material, doctrinal, or sentimental—which the journal or its special writer holds in the matter; and if one can not get this from outside sources, one must learn to detect it between the lines of the account. It is an endless and an awful task; but if an approximation to the truth is really wanted, the task will be undertaken.

The testimony here offered is that of one who has spent a great number of his days in the gathering and compiling of what is known as exact information. It is also the testimony of one who, by conviction and long habit, is a partisan of a particular school of social radicalism; and, still further, of one whose interest in the manifold phases of radicalism has made him an avid reader of propaganda. The mournful judgment must be recorded that most of the stuff labelled "information" appearing in the radical and pseudo-liberal press is utterly unreliable. Much of it is flagrantly false; much of it is fragmentary, true enough in itself but false in its implication; much of it is trimmed, colored, "doctored" to accord with a particular view. Sometimes, indeed, the insurgent periodical prints facts or figures of great value which have been suppressed or distorted by the regular news journals; but for every service of this kind that it renders it perpetrates a score of offenses against the truth.

There is every reason—except an ethical one—why this should be so. The bias of the insurgent reader and the bias of the insurgent editor are usually in accord, and the result follows. The reader wants facts, near-facts, or fabrications that sustain his social theory, that confirm his suspicions, that feed his prejudices, and that warm up his antipathies. The editor or writer on an insurgent periodical who does not understand this truth and conform to it finds himself without a job.

The capitalist news journal appeals to a more general audience. It must, in the nature of things, give a fairer presentation of the news. There are, it is true, in most newspaper offices certain recognized tyrannies that must be obeyed—the department-store tyranny, the index expurgatorius of "enemies of the paper," and that other index—the list of good men and true, "friends of the paper," who must always be spoken of with respect. There is, also, the obvious fact that most daily newspapers—especially those which are members of the Associated Press—are upholders of the capitalist system, and that that system is not deliberately made to appear at a disadvantage in the news. But though the editors and owners are committed to the prevailing system, all the reporters and news writers are not. Indeed, many of them are radicals of one sort or another. The popular notion (as it appears in the insurgent journals) that all of these persons are more or less conscious prostitutes, selling their souls in order that they may hold their positions, is insulting fiction. There are men enough, and too many, indifferent as to what they write so long as it brings rewards; but, as a rule, it may be said that the reporter on a capitalist news journal, at once sympathizing with insurgency and indulging in the luxury of a conscience, who does not know how to write his reports fairly without jeoparding his job, is deficient in common sense. In his attempt to write honestly he fares immeasurably better than he would if he were employed on a Socialist, radical, or pseudo-liberal journal.

Insurgent editors and writers acknowledge the fairness of the capitalist news service when it suits them to do so—when the material given is useful to their purposes. They depreciate or denounce it when the material is inconvenient. With all allowances made for the obvious derelictions of the regular news journals, it is still to be said that they print the news. Along with much that is trivial, much that is mere baseless gossip, and much that is deliberately colored, they print most of the worth-while information (other than statistical—and some of that) upon which we rely. The news accounts in the insurgent journals are, in the main, notoriously undependable; they are discounted, even by the insurgent following, when sincerely seeking the truth.

Instances, covering no more than the last two years, of the stupidly dishonest ways in which the news is manipulated or suppressed by the insurgent journals could easily be piled up in sufficient volume to fill an entire issue of the Review. Strikes, the I. W. W., Russia, Mexico, Germany, the Allies, the Peace Conference, Belgium, Czechoslovakia are subjects upon which a particular activity of commission or omission is habitually shown. The enthusiastic credence given to the testimony of hand-picked and pap-fed correspondents regarding Russia, and the entire ignoring of the testimony of the most intelligent and trustworthy Socialist regarding that land, has been characteristic of the insurgent, and particularly the Socialist, press, since November, 1917. A similar policy has been followed regard ing Mexico, though, very recently through the breaking out of an amus ing controversy in the columns of on of the most radical of the revolution ary journals, some essential fact well known to others, have been com municated to the insurgent worl They were, of course, unwelcom facts, and the informant was sharpl rebuked by his opponent.

Then there are Belgium an Czechoslovakia. All Socialist, sem Socialist, "radical democratic," an "intellectual radical" journals migh be supposed to be interested in th fact that these countries, under gov ernments in which democratic Socia ists have a large measure of powe are making rapid progress. The tes timony regarding Belgium is v luminous; regarding Czechoslovaki hardly less so. Of the latter countr Charles R. Crane has been recentl reported as saying that "it is polit cally the sanest and healthiest spot i Europe." In the days before 191 the insurgent papers, and particu larly the Socialist party papers, woul have given columns and pages to th exploitation of such news. But, as matter of fact, nearly every Socialis paper and almost all the papers in th other branches of insurgency hav wholly ignored the subject. Why Because all these papers are i greater or less degree the partisan of Bolshevism. To praise, even t mention, the orderly, legalistic Socia Democratic progress in Belgium an Czechoslovakia would be impliedl to condemn the sort of thing that ha happened in Russia. To omit all men tion is the safer course; and besides it gives more space in which to de nounce the capitalist press for it suppression of the truth.

As a constructive radical, I shoul prefer to believe that the greater vi tue of practice, no less than of pre cept, is to be found in at least som of the organs of radicalism. Bu long experience and a reasonabl close application to the subject com pel me to say that in this matter c the manipulation of the news th radical journals are much worse tha the capitalist journals.

W. J. GHENT

Asia, Europe, and Bolshevism

IS Russian Bolshevism a danger for the non-Russian world? Yes, and no. For some Powers it is a great one, for others it is hardly a danger at all. As a military power it no longer signifies much, and its armies can be dangerous only to internally feeble states. Except in a limited way, its propaganda westward has little force remaining. Towards the East, on the other hand, its propaganda has gained in strength, and Great Britain, now the real ruler of West, South, and, part at least, of Middle Asia, will be the first to notice its effects.

The situation in Soviet Russia is very peculiar. To the foreign onlooker the Bolshevist state gives an impression of tremendous power. It has defeated, one after another, the Russian generals who, from the south, the east, and the west, made an attempt to restore the old Russia. Yudenich, who advanced within sight of Petrograd, possessed no real strength, at most 20,000 unreliable troops, and the victory over him was gained by the Bolsheviki with the tanks which, in the spring of 1919, the French, when evacuating Odessa, had left behind on the quay of the harbor. Kolchak and Denikin were much stronger, but they failed owing to peasants' risings in their rear. The best work for the Soviet Government against Denikin was done by the Ukrainian peasants who were stirred to resistance by the uncompromising Great-Russian nationalism of Denikin and his opposition to the national spirit of the Ukraine. Hence the land he had reclaimed from the Red forces was left, in the rear of his advancing army, to a hostile population, which lamed his action against the Reds.

Military campaigns on a large scale against a well-equipped enemy are impracticable for the Bolsheviki because of the dilapidation of the Russian railroads. Local lines are not worked any more, and on the main lines run, a few times a week, exclusively Government trains, in which private travelers can obtain passage by means of excessive bribes or by forged passports. Nor could the ammunition factories produce the supplies that would be required for a real fighting campaign. They are kept going by the lure of what under present Russian conditions may be called fantastically luxurious board and lodging for the workmen. In spite of all its violent measures to stimulate production the Soviet Government has not succeeded in keeping the remnants of Russian industries fit for the upkeep and supply of numerous armies. All figures which they publish about their fighting forces are greatly exaggerated. Besides, the Soviet troops would be a poor match for an efficient and well-equipped enemy. Their discipline has been restored by barbaric severity, but no troops can fight well which know themselves greatly inferior to the enemy in material equipment.

The weakest spot of Bolshevism in Russia (apart from the fact that the resuscitation of its industry is a task beyond its strength) is the passivity of the peasants, who form more than 80 per cent. of the population in Soviet Russia. The peasant cares not for Bolshevism and Communism; he has left the old Russian community of the village, the "mir," a few strong and well-to-do individuals having usurped control of the villages and kept the poor and the dispossessed in subjection. The peasants lack, indeed, all urban manufactures, but they can provide for their clothing and their food from what they produce themselves; only a few iron utensils, such as needles and axes, they have to buy at exorbitant prices. Economic conditions in rural districts of Soviet Russia are most primitive, but the peasant subsists independently of the Bolsheviki, who control only the principal towns and the railroads. In making a forecast of Russia's future one must not lose sight of the fact that the bourgeoisie, the great landowners, the capitalists of the cities, and the industries are altogether ruined, that the landowners can never return, and that a peasant democracy of a crude, semi-Asiatic type is the most likely form of constitution for Russia after the fall of Bolshevism. The duration of the Soviet Government will largely depend on its skill to eke out the dwindling remnants of railroad stock and industrial plants. It need not fear any military aggression from outside, as the new border States evolved from the old Russia lack the necessary power, and the workers of both England and France are set against armed intervention in Russia. It is easy to see why the Soviet Government is so anxious to resume commercial relations with the Western World. A recuperation of means of transportation and a revival of Russian industry by the establishment of new plants would seat the Bolsheviki more firmly in the saddle. But it is a mistake to expect that Soviet Russia, in its turn, will be able to meet large orders for the European market. There is no surplus of grain, as the peasants produce no more than they need themselves. There is plenty of wood in the forests of the north, but the lack of means for its transport puts it out of the reach of the foreign trader.

In spite of its internally weak position, the Soviet Government is energetically active on all sides. In the west its chief object of aggression is Poland. If military superiority were to turn the scale, Russia would not be able to cope with Poland, but the rulers in Moscow know that the Polish army, the Polish workmen, and, in part, the Polish peasants are not impervious to the political propaganda of the Bolsheviki. The Polish army is numerically stronger than the forces which the Soviet Government, by an extreme effort, could muster against it. It is also better equipped and has some eminent French staff officers. But as a fighting instrument against a Bolshevist army it is unreliable, and an offensive of Soviet troops on the Polish front would probably be accompanied by labor revolts and peasants' riots in Poland itself. Another factor making for internal weakness is the inclusion of so many non-Polish races within the new Polish frontiers. A Bolshevist advance would probably not be brought to a standstill until it had reached the German provinces of Poland, where the people are more advanced and more accustomed to an established political order. Germany herself may be expected to have no difficulty in resisting a Bolshevist invasion, as the new German army, the Reichswehr, can be relied upon and is superior in military efficiency to the forces of the Soviet Republic.

But the Bolshevists' schemes are far more ambitious in the east than in the west. Asia is to be won for Bolshevism. This idea is less fantastic than it might seem at first glance. In Asia the Bolsheviki want to strike a blow at England. Lenin recently delivered an address at Moscow, in which, among other things, he said that the Communist propaganda among Oriental peoples must be changed and adapted to their peculiar psychology. In order to vanquish Europe, Bolshevism ought to force for itself a way towards the Far East, and there crush, first of all, the power of Great Britain. England now rules from the Caucasus to India; but she does not only rule, she exploits the Asiatic peoples. Under her direct or indirect government she unites nearly the entire Mohammedan population of Asia. The Islamic world knows only one antagonist: England. Early last winter Mohammedan representatives, who had come to Moscow in the deepest secrecy, entered there into a compact with the Soviet Commissaries for the purpose of a joint propaganda in behalf of the "liberation of Asia" from the Bosphorus to Malacca, and to the northernmost frontiers of China. In the autumn of 1919 the Soviet Government had already established a special committee for Turkestan and Afghanistan. The Commissary for Asia in the Foreign Office at Moscow is a Mohammedan, Karachan. The railroads running from Russia to the Afghan frontiers are almost entirely in the hands of the Bolsheviki. In Moscow they have established a university for Bolshevist propaganda in Asia, for which the Soviet Government has appropriated fifty million rubles in gold and one billion paper rubles. Young-Turkish delegates, emissaries of Mustapha Kemal Pasha, Afghans, Persians, Caucasians, Indians, Chinese, come and go at Moscow and in the Asiatic sub-committees of the Soviet Government, and the Islamic agitation joins with that of the Bolsheviki in the cry: "Away with the suppressors!" who to the Bolsheviki are the capitalists, to the Moslems the foreigners and faithless.

The strength of the Bolshevist advance in Asia is in the absence among the Orientals of any feelings of nationality, which form the principal check to their progress in Europe. According to the Bolshevist press of Moscow, a propaganda train, with the well-known female agitator Balabanowa (to judge from her name, a woman of Tatar descent) at the head of the mission, left Moscow recently for the Orient. The train was given the name "The Red East." The mission is equipped with an abundance of material for agitation, among other things with movie films, and numbers a great many popular orators of various nationalities and creeds, Tatars, Kirghizes, Bashkirs, Afghans, Persians, Indians, able to speak the numerous tongues of Asia, and driven by ardent fanaticism. Their aim is the overthrow of British power in Asia. That achieved, they hope for a crushing reaction in Europe. Eccentric though these plans may seem, and verging on the fantastic, they must not be underestimated or ridiculed. The English are far from regarding them as harmless. The growing anxiety about the Bolshevist danger in Asia finds a vent in the British press. The surest test as to whether the Bolsheviki make successful progress in the East will probably be the Entente's change of attitude with regard to the revision of the peace treaties with Central Europe.

DR. PAUL ROHRBACH

Berlin

M. Millerand, the French Premier

ALTHOUGH the average reader over here is more interested in Presidents than in Premiers, on the other side of the Atlantic it is the Premiers that count and not the Presidents. That is why M. Millerand received very little attention as long as he was only a Prime Minister. A prize fighter and a midnight folly dancer easily beat him in the space granted by our dailies and in the curiosity of the public. Now, however, that he has tackled and settled a big railroad strike and appeared before Europe as the most outspoken and resolute advocate of the full enforcement of the treaty of Versailles, his name is beginning to emerge in the world's limelight.

M. Millerand is a Parisian born in Paris, a most uncommon thing nowadays among those who call themselves Parisians. That was in 1859 and makes him just two years younger than M. Paul Deschanel. Little is known about his early life except that he studied in two good lycées of the capital, took his law degree at the University, and entered the bar, where he obtained an honor which seems in France to be the first sign of a great political career: he was elected "secretary of the conference," the conference being a sort of debating society organized and administered by the Paris lawyers. Before him Grévy and Ribot, and after him Poincaré and Barthou bore the same title.

When he entered politics, in the early eighties, and began to write for the newspapers, the French Government was being run by the men who to-day are looked upon as the patriarchs of the Third Republic—men who have boulevards named after them and statues erected in their honor both in Paris and in the provinces. But Gambetta and Jules Ferry, who, after their death, were universally acknowledged as wise statesmen, were then the object of the most bitter attacks of an impatient youth. Paris was as it always has been from the dawn of history, a city of opposition. Hardly any one who was not an extremist, in one direction or another, had any chance of election. The most popular papers were those which carried on a continuous and often scurrilous campaign against the Government. The municipal council was controlled partly by wild demagogues and ex-communists, and the deputies of the capital came mostly from the extreme parties.

Millerand was brought up in that atmosphere; being a Parisian, he naturally was of the opposition and, more than likely, enjoyed with all his contemporaries the witty and scathing articles in which Rochefort was then showing up now Gambetta, now Jules Ferry. Clemenceau especially was in those days the hero of the young radicals. Millerand enlisted under his banner and, for the first few years after his entrance in Parliament, sat under him at the extreme left and learned from him the deadly warfare in which Clemenceau was past master.

Perhaps it is his temperament, perhaps also his experiences of early life, that threw him in the opposition, first with the radicals and afterwards with the Socialists. At any rate, as a young lawyer, he became immediately the advocate of the revolutionary groups who were then being prosecuted by a conservative Government which believed in the "big stick." His first criminal case was in 1882 when he defended some striking miners of Montceau les Mines guilty of violence. His name became widely known. Like Viviani and Briand later, he was to be, from that time on, the favorite criminal lawyer of all the militant workingmen.

When he joined Socialism, around 1890, Socialism was getting to be all the rage. Students, literary men, professors, artists were flocking to the ranks of the new faith. Jaurès abandoned for it the moderate and opportunist party, where he could have had anything he wanted, and Millerand left what he thought was a sterile parliamentary guerrilla for what he considered a wider and more worthy field of activity.

To show that he meant business, he lent the already great authority of his name and his talent to the Socialist ticket. In 1892 he went to Lille to support the candidacy of one of the most pronounced Marxists, Paul Lafargue, and, the following year, he was elected as a Socialist by the same district that had voted for him as radical and later was to elect him again as a half-conservative. When, a few years later, the Socialists needed a man to expound their doctrine, it was to Millerand that they appealed.

He explained one day his adherence to Socialism by his ambition to give to the Socialist party "more cohesion and more discipline, a better sense of realities and also to render France and the Republic the service of disciplining these masses too easily accessible to the appeal of violence." He said that, however, ten years later, when he was already leaving the party, having failed in his endeavor to discipline it. He stayed with it until 1900 and, although he did not commit himself too much, he shared in the glory of his party when, under Jaurès and Pressensé, it waged the admirable fight for justice in favor of a poor Jewish officer, victim of clerical and military fanaticism. That was the "heroic period" of French Socialism, period of militancy, of enthusiasm, and of illusions, a period during which the Socialists won, at times the admiration of all liberal republicans.

For its noble attitude the Socialist party was rewarded in the person of Millerand. When in 1899 Waldeck-Rousseau formed his Ministry of "republican defense" to liquidate the Dreyfus affair, he took this Socialist into his Cabinet. It was a bold stroke; hence the scandal and the uproar were great. If Millerand had remained an extreme radical, that would have seemed very plausible; but he was a Socialist, a sensible, practical, business-like Socialist, to be sure, but an orthodox Socialist nevertheless. Was it not Mil lerand who, a few years before, in 1896, at St. Mandé, had, in an epoch-making address, laid down the law of the party, the immovable dogmas the acceptance of which was compulsory if one was to be counted a Socialist? And among those doctrines was the gradual suppression of private ownership, the abolition of the wage-earning system, etc., etc. M. Waldeck-Rousseau overlooked the St. Mandé speech. He knew Millerand to be a sound, hard-working, pragmatic type of man; he had heard him many times in the courts. He knew he must give the Socialists a place in his Cabinet and he chose the Socialist who seemed the least afflicted with "ideology."

It did not take long for Millerand to find out that his party was not quite as accommodating as himself about this collaboration with the "bourgeois" Government. In convention after convention, from 1901 to 1903, his case was brought up, discussed, his actions condemned, his personality upbraided. He appeared once as an accused man to hear Hervé (who now admires him unreservedly) indict him for desertion and treason to the "cause." Millerand attended for a while these tribunals of the Holy Socialist Inquisition, defended himself as best he could until, in January, 1903, he was officially expelled. He called himself, from that time on, an independent Socialist, whatever that may mean, and it means very little if we are to judge by the case of the two other "independent" ones, Briand and Viviani, who have also lost the faith and who seemed since to have found the bourgeois Government a pretty good makeshift, while waiting for the millennium that they once preached.

It is only fair to state that, during his passage in the Ministry of Commerce, this Socialist carried out some of his ideas of social reform; law on protection to women and children, law on the liability of employers, law that gave the ten-hour day to more than a million workmen, bills on compulsory arbitration, bills for workingmen's pensions; all this shows that he had not betrayed his friends during his two years of coöperation with the "bourgeois." It is necessary to state, likewise, that he has always condemned recourse to violence. To the miners of the Loire he dared to say, in 1902, that Socialism should expect "the liberation of humanity from its own efforts and from its own free and tenacious endeavor" and not from a revolutionary outburst.

That is enough to prove that Millerand was getting ready for an active and consistent coöperation with the parties of "orderly progress." In 1910 he was the Minister of Public Works of M. Briand, and in 1912 the Minister of War of M. Poincaré. From that time on, his last Socialist friends abandoned him. His effort, two years before the war, to awaken and maintain the military spirit in France by the musical parades every Saturday night, and by a special attention given to the morale of the soldiers, made him the butt of the sarcasms and quips of his former associates. Millerand was accused of being a "nationalist," and the accusation, if it be one, is not absolutely wrong. The Parisian has always combined an ardent chauvinism with very advanced political views. Millerand's name is undoubtedly linked with the patriotic revival that characterized the years preceding the war.

However that may be, Millerand's passage in the War Office had won for him the confidence of the army and of its chiefs. When Caillaux and later Viviani came into power, he was replaced by some one else. But, at the end of the first month of the war, his methodical mind, his intelligence, and tenacious labor brought him back to the same department, where it then took a man capable of coping with the colossal problems with which France was then confronted. M. Millerand made good in the organization of the task of giving the army quantities of ammunition that had to be prepared on a scale never dreamed of before. His services were not forgotten, even if they were, in the course of events, dispensed with. He gave way to Galliéni when the disappointments of the campaign brought a change in the Government.

He did not stay long out of governmental activity. When, in 1919, a few clumsy officials were threatening to make a mess of the delicate and momentous work of the administration of Alsace-Lorraine, when again it took a man out of the ordinary to start things right in the new province, to facilitate the transition and to decide on the compromises necessary between the old régime and the new, Clemenceau turned to his former lieutenant, who had, since those early days, like his chief himself, learned much about the art of government. There, too, he made good and his prestige was at its highest. Therefore, when Clemenceau retired and the new President of the Republic had to choose his first Prime Minister, Millerand was on all sides mentioned as the logical candidate.

At the elections of November, 1919, he had been elected in Paris on the ticket which was known as the "national block" and which contained members of almost every party except the Socialists. It was a paradox to have Millerand, the former radical and the ex-Socialist leader, elected on such a conservative ticket. The other paradox was to have Deschanel, the foremost opponent of radicalism, appeal to Millerand to form the first Cabinet of his presidency.

The Ministry that he brought together seemed at first disappointing. He had been concerned more in gathering around him competent workers than parliamentary stars. He even had the audacity to seek his associates outside of the members of Parliament. For Minister of Finances he took a banker, for agriculture an agronomist, for the ministry of liberated regions an administrator who already knew the difficulties and needs of that department. The reception given him was not enthusiastic. But the very slim majority that he received on his first appearance soon grew to large proportions. His shortcomings in the formation of his Cabinet were soon forgotten when the Parliament saw him govern and heard him express his views on his policy towards labor, on the carrying out of the treaty, on the French policy in the Near East.

At San Remo he is representing the unanimous sentiment of the French people with the exception of the very group of which, twenty-five years ago, he was the most prominent spokesman.

And that is the third paradox of his career: to see this erstwhile foe of capitalism ruling France with the support of all the conservatives inside and outside of Parliament.

That is an object lesson on the vagaries of Socialism that ought not to be overlooked, and which has its value even outside of France.

OTHON GUERLAC

Correspondence

Zachary Taylor and Herbert Hoover

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In 1848 the Whig party nominated General Taylor for the Presidency. His availability was simply due to the fact that he had been a hero in the Mexican War. He was not a member of any political party and was wholly without any partisan preferences. He had never even voted for a Presidential candidate. The only claim that the Whigs had upon him was the fact that he once stated that if he had ever voted at all, he would have cast his ballot for Henry Clay in 1844. The General, with a certain naïve superiority to partisanship, accepted the nomination from any and every organization that put him forward as a candidate. He even went so far as to accept nomination from a company of Southern Democrats who were dissatisfied with the nomination, by their own party, of Lewis Cass for the Presidency. This got General Taylor into considerable trouble with the anti-slavery Whigs of the North, but the difficulty was smoothed over, as he was too available a candidate to discipline.

As you remember, General Taylor was elected, and for the fifteen months during which he occupied the White House he made a very good Chief Executive.

Herbert Hoover has, of course, a much greater claim to be regarded as a Republican than General Taylor ever had to be regarded as a Whig, but among the questions that have been asked by Hoover's opponents is one, "Has he ever voted at an American Presidential election?" He has done so, whereas General Taylor had not.

X

New York, April 23

The Bonus

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

This morning I went down "automobile row" and noticed the almost interminable string of autos of the most expensive makes. I talked with a college professor of physics and he told me that the average American was so flush with money that he bought a car for its upholstery and varnish, with slight attention to the scientific construction of its engine. I lunched at the club and heard men talk of transactions involving thousands of dollars as if talking of chalk and marbles. I happened to be caught in the outrush from a matinee performance and noted the smug, complacent, overdressed air of the men and women.

And then I came home and read in the Review: " . . . the public is not going to be pleased with the spectacle of men of whom it longs to be proud scrambling in the gutter for coppers." And then I wondered if I had not got hold of the Nation by mistake. I read that paper for twenty-five years and gave it up because of just about such rot as the above quotation.

I sat at table with a young man to-day who had been to the war, but those lines and creases were never on that face when I knew him best, before the war. I have seen others maimed and limping through life; others, kith and kin of mine, abide in the soil in France, blessed martyrs to a noble cause, and I envy them. I have seen acquaintances of mine, men who spoke little English, some voluntarily and others through compulsion, going off to fight for us who remained at home. And I have seen the new look of intelligence, a newer and broader conception of America, beaming in their faces on their return.

I am a teacher by trade, and I need not tell your readers what that means in a financial way, but I am loath to believe that one of my class of laborers would begrudge a penny used to make life easier or happier for the men who went to the front that the principles which we teachers have taught these many years might live and flourish in this country. Nor can I believe that rich, prosperous America—America with a memory and with a conscience—feels otherwise. The spokesman of the ex-service men may have been indiscreet in his utterances. We owe compensation to our soldiers and sailors, and it is a wicked shame to compare them to beggars "scrambling in the gutter for pennies."

E. L. C. MORSE

Chicago, April 10

[Mr. Morse's appreciation of what the American soldier has done for us is shared, even though he might not be able to express it so well, by every American worthy of the name. It is probable that if the Government had mustered out the soldiers with considerably more than the belated and paltry $60 they received, some of the present demand for additional compensation would not now be heard. If the Government had not fallen down on the work of rehabilitation, the present demand would be still more reduced. If a way could have been found to prevent the undue enrichment, whether in profits or in wages, of those who are now squandering their money on automobiles and other luxuries, that demand would be less widely heard. But if all these things had been done and not done, there would still be a demand for money made on behalf of the soldier, this year, next year, and for the next fifty years. It is safe to say that demands of that sort are in great part manufactured by a comparatively few individuals and are seconded in large measure by boys with no other idea in their head than the naïve one that if something good is going round they want theirs, while they are opposed by a majority of the thoughtful men who wore the uniform. If we oppose such a movement it is not because our feeling toward those who represented America in the field and on the seas is a whit less cordial than Mr. Morse's. Our opposition rests on large grounds of sound public policy, some of which are set forth in the editorial on "Justice and the Bonus" in the Review for April 10. EDS. THE REVIEW.]

A Woman's View of the Bonus

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The doughboy had no monopoly of hardships. Not only did millions who stayed at home during the war suffer from the increased cost of living, as you say, but an incalculable number rendered services and incurred dangers quite equal to those of drafted soldiers. Let me give two examples out of a multitude which might be cited.

I myself throughout the war (not merely after the tardy entrance of the United States), and while engaged in the fairly arduous task of earning a modest living, spent literally all of my leisure and strength and a good deal of money in a monotonous and very obscure form of war work for which I never have received and never shall receive any other reward than that of knowing that I did my bit to win the war. Shortly before the armistice my doctor told me that if I did not end this drain on my strength, which was resulting in serious illness, I should die, and die soon. I have not yet recovered from those terrible years; perhaps I never shall. I am not aware that there is any movement on foot to give me a bonus or "adjusted pay."

Soon after the United States declared war a friend of mine, a woman of 25, gave up the interesting and congenial occupation by which she was earning her living and from a sense of patriotic duty went to do very delicate and dangerous work in a smokeless powder factory, where, as she well knew, any minute might bring death. Her wages were $15 a week, enough to feed and lodge her, but not to cover all her expenses. The last time I saw her, some months after the end of the war, she was looking for a job. I know of no plan to give her a bonus or "adjustment of pay."

The American soldiers were incomparably the best paid in Europe (their pay was just twenty times that of their French comrades); they were excellently fed, clothed, and cared for; they had the very enviable opportunity of foreign travel and of observing one of the supreme crises of human history at close range, and when one contemplates the picture of Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., Red Cross, and Salvation Army vieing with each other to tempt the doughboy's palate with home-made dainties and to rescue him from ennui with concerts and the movies, and then turns to look at other armies, for example, at the Serbians during the appalling retreat to Albania, an American begins to feel a little shamefaced. No American soldier had to suffer, as did French, Belgians, Serbians, and Rumanians, the moral anguish of leaving his family and property a prey to enemy invasion; no American troops fought for as much as eighteen months, only a minute fraction of them went through a winter campaign, and large numbers never reached the fighting line at all. It was the potential, not the actual, exploits of the American army which turned the scale of victory.

Those soldiers who have come back to us crippled or mutilated richly deserve adequate pensions and the best of "reconstruction" work, but if the country is going to give a bonus for losses and suffering caused by war service, let all who lost and suffered be rewarded—which brings us to the reductio ad absurdum.

B. D. C.

New York, April 11

A Case of Relaxed Vigilance

To the Editors of The Review:

The thinking public, to say nothing of the medical profession, will view with astonishment and just indignation your publication of the diatribe of Dr. John Hutchinson in the Correspondence columns of the Review for April 17.

To the uninstructed the words of one doctor are as valid as any other's, and to such this wholesale attack on all that is modern in progressive and preventive medicine will gain great weight from its appearing in your journal. Is the Review to be classed as an antivaccination journal? If the thing is published as a jest I submit that this is not made sufficiently apparent, and is very ill judged and ill timed. Did you look up Dr. Hutchinson's qualifications as a critic of scientific medicine? If the policy of the Review is exemplified by this publication, I should like to be informed of the fact.

Thos. R. Boggs

Baltimore, Md., April 19

The Newberry Verdict

To the Editors of The Review:

The writer is a subscriber to the Review. I have been very much pleased with the general tone of its editorials and its articles. I felt that it had a very important place in American journalism and have taken occasion to say to my friends that it ought to be encouraged, but I can not refrain from expressing my disapproval of the editorial comment in your issue of March 27th on the subject of the Newberry trial.

I say this, appreciating the fact that I may be prejudiced in this matter, for I was counsel for the treasurer of the Newberry committee, Mr. Frank W. Blair, who disbursed for that committee $178,000. The editorial indicates that the knowledge of the person who wrote it, as to what took place at the trial, was extremely inaccurate.

For instance, it is said that Senator Newberry's letters showed that "he had full knowledge of the large sums used and gave constant advice as to their expenditure." I think the most that the prosecution claimed in this respect was that Senator Newberry's letters showed that he was in close enough touch with the campaign so that he must have known that more than $3,750 was expended, but no one has claimed that he gave "constant advice as to" the expenditure of such sums. In fact, the letters were offered by the defense because they did not refer, in any place, to the expenditure of any money.

Again it is said that the wealth of Mr. Newberry himself was lavishly used in violation of the law and of political decency. There was not a word of evidence in the case that Mr. Newberry's wealth was used, as there was nothing to connect his name with the contributions. His brother and his friends made contributions and that money was used. We might disagree as to the definition of "political decency," but it is well to remember that the court, on its own motion, struck from the case the count of the indictment which dealt with political corruption.

It was undisputed that more than $3,750 was used in the campaign. Upwards of $50,000 was expended for advertising, directly to the newspapers. Perhaps an equal amount was expended in the distribution of literature. Approximately $40,000 was paid out in various counties for the distribution of petitions, of cards, of literature, hiring halls and holding of meetings. All of these expenditures, and in fact every dollar of the expenditures, were within the Michigan statute known as the "Corrupt Practices Act," if they are expended by the committee and not by the candidate. The charge was that the defendants and Senator Newberry conspired together to cause to be expended more than $3,750. It was on this technical charge that the defendants were convicted. Perhaps I ought not to say this. I do not believe the jury thought there really existed such a conspiracy. What they did do was to convict these men on general principles, upon the theory that the expenditure of a large sum of money was wrong. This is exactly the part of your editorial to which I take exception.

Has it come to pass that one who is not known to the public and who resorts to otherwise perfectly legal methods of advertising, and whose friends resort to otherwise perfectly legal methods of advertising to bring his name to the attention of the public, is thereby a criminal? It is easy to talk of the use of wealth in politics, and I agree with you that when that wealth is employed to corrupt the public, it should be punished; but when it is used only to bring home to the public the merits of the candidate, and when the recognized avenues of the press and the post office are so employed, how has the public been corrupted?

In this particular case, Mr. Ford was known to everyone, and Mr. Newberry, who to our minds has always been a much more deserving citizen, was not known. By what means does he become a successful candidate for office if not by legitimate advertising, and why should his friends be condemned if they expend the funds necessary to advertise him and procure his election?

Of course, the singular thing of this case was that Senator Newberry and his friends were convicted—at least that was the technical verdict—of conspiring to cause Senator Newberry to cause to be expended more than $3,750. The court holds that he did not have to be the originating cause; if he participated in the activities of the campaign that resulted from that expenditure, with a knowledge of that expenditure, then he had caused it to be expended just as much as if he had solicited the subscription in the beginning.

You can easily determine where this theory would leave a candidate for office.

I did not intend to discourse at length on this trial. It is to me a hideous concession to popular clamor and to the prejudice against wealth. I regret very much that the Review, which I thought was above such things, has fallen in with this popular view and has given to it the endorsement of its conservative columns and deservedly wide influence.

Hal H. Smith

Detroit, Mich., April 19

C. T. Winchester

To the Editors of The Review:

It is with regret that I note that none of the literary weeklies has so far mentioned the recent death of Professor C. T. Winchester, for nearly fifty years head of the department of English literature at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn. I say with regret because he was one of the small band of truly literary teachers of literature. To sit in his classroom was at once an education and an inspiration. His voice was like one of those voices at Oxford of whom Arnold wrote so eloquently in his essay on Emerson. In our American universities, in our departments of English literature, we now have, if you will, "more knowledge, more light," but such a voice as that of Winchester is most rare. In very few cases is the great author tried by his peer. Shakespeare becomes a curiosity of Elizabethan English, and we learn everything about Chaucer except his literary qualities. Professor Winchester was a peer of literary greatness. To read his books, "Principles of Literary Criticism" and "A Group of English Essayists of the Early Nineteenth Century," is to be acutely conscious of this. His exquisite literary taste and judgment, his rare faculty of imparting literary enthusiasms—which never included mediocre authors—drew to him a band of disciples limited only by the number of students in attendance at Wesleyan. Several times he refused flattering offers from great universities. His work, he said, was at Wesleyan.

The loss of such a teacher of literature is a calamity; but in the shadow of those mountains which he loved, beyond the Connecticut River below Middletown, his memory will need no laurel.

Harry T. Baker

Goucher College, Baltimore, Md., April 23

Book Reviews

Champ Clark's Reminiscences

My Quarter Century of American Politics. By Champ Clark. Two volumes, illustrated. New York: Harper and Brothers. 1920.

WHAT the majority of readers are most likely to appreciate in these volumes is their wealth of interesting anecdotes and incidents, not only of politics but in many other fields, and by no means confined to the twenty-five years named in the title,—all told in a way that is quite Champ Clark's own, in spite of his incorrigible overworking of a great many commonplace expressions, as for example in the following reference to a case of murder: "The times were sadly out of joint, everything was topsy-turvy, and in some way, through some sinister influence, he went unwhipped of justice, though he richly deserved to stretch hemp." Murders, duels, and fist-fights claim at least as high a percentage of his space as they do in the actual life of the period with which he deals, to say nothing of exciting, though less bloody, encounters of opposing counsel in his own law practice, or suggested by it. One chapter is devoted by title to "cloak room stories," but a very large share of the work might have been put under that heading without raising any question of propriety in the mind of the reader.

Literary allusions and quotations abound. In the very first chapter, the fact that the author was born on the fateful 7th of March, 1850, calls for Whittier's "Ichabod" in full; his boyhood loss of a dog, on a false charge of sheep-killing, brings in Senator Vest's "beautiful Oration on the Dog," along with Byron's "'Tis sweet to hear," etc.; his Kentucky boyhood sports draw four lines from "Locksley Hall;" his "surgical operation," as he calls it, on his own name, Beauchamp cut down to Champ, brings in the inevitable line from Shakespeare; his own early circumstances introduce, by way of a quotation from Lincoln, Gray's words, "the short and simple annals of the poor;" a wise saying from Patrick Henry enters from the pages of Wirt's biography, presented to him by his father; and the Duke of Wellington's alleged ten-word description of the battle of Waterloo introduces his own statement about "pounding away" at certain things, which he desired to accomplish. And in this same first chapter are incidental allusions to the Proverbs of Solomon, the Epistles of St. Paul, Robert Southey, Charles Dickens, William Pitt, Charles James Fox, George D. Prentice, Horace Greeley, Carl Schurz, Colonel Roosevelt, Colonel Watterson, and a host of others who stand on the border-line between literature and politics.

Mr. Clark's lively interest in "scholarship" suggests that he might have become, if never a consecutive logical thinker, at least a man of much erudition, had he consistently followed an early bent in that direction. In Kentucky University he studied Greek under Professor Neville, whom he calls "the third handsomest man I ever saw," and at the end of the first year he stood by the side of William Benjamin Smith, the mathematician and biblical scholar to be, with a grade of 100. "That was one of the happiest days of my life—happier than when I was elected to my first office, happier than when I was first elected to Congress or elected Speaker, happier than any other days of my life, except the day when I was married, and the days on which my children were born." A little shooting affair, fortunately not fatal, growing out of stronger provocation than his Kentucky temper could brook, separated him from Kentucky University before graduation, and his college education was completed at Bethany College, in West Virginia. How far he carried his classical studies he does not say, but in his occasional use of bits of Latin he does not always remember that "circumstances alter cases," grammatical as well as otherwise. Nevertheless, Professor West, of Princeton, was justified in quoting him as a good friend of classical studies. To the late Dr. William Everett, Mr. Clark appropriately assigns a very high place in Congressional scholarship. In his mind, the most "astounding revelations" of Dr. Everett's learning were instances of "first aid" to congressmen in trouble with the pronunciation of unusual words. B. Gratz Brown is attested as one of the most scholarly of Missouri's governors by the fact that "he wrote a book on higher mathematics as a mental recreation."

In characterization, whether of men or things, Mr. Clark runs freely to superlatives. Congressman DeArmond had "the sarcastic faculty perhaps more largely developed than in any other man that ever sat in either branch of Congress." Of Blaine, "A more brilliant man never figured in American politics," and his "Twenty Years in Congress" is "the best historical work ever written by an American." Charles James Fox was "the greatest debater that ever spoke the English tongue," and Burke, "taken up one side and down the other, was perhaps the greatest transatlantic orator that ever spoke the English tongue." Transatlantic, mind you; for in our own land, within the life of our Republic, "the divine gift of moving the mind and heart by the power of spoken words has been bestowed upon more men than in all the rest of the world since the confusion of tongues at the unfinished tower of Babel." "One of the finest epigrams ever uttered," Mr. Clark heard from the lips of George H. Pendleton, as follows: "The sweetest incense that ever greeted the nostrils of a public man is the applause of the people." This suggests a translation of a certain passage in the "Antigone" of Sophocles, heard in the college days of the reviewer, "An unseen odor steals upon my ear."

It would be easy to pick some pretty serious flaws in Speaker Clark's code of political morals, but they are of the head rather than the heart. He is honest and patriotic "up one side and down the other," but there is gradually developing a revised definition of honesty and patriotism in politics, which frowns on many things that seem wholly unobjectionable to him and to the older school to which he belongs. He denounces some unnamed congressman said to have sold his quota of garden seeds and pocketed the price, instead of distributing them to his constituents, as "a miserable scoundrel for whom the penitentiary is too good;" but he is blind to the essential dishonesty of the whole seed distribution business, nor does he realize that he is discrediting his own moral insight when he tells of his efforts to secure Government appointments for one or another of his constituents, either to reward them for personal services to him, or to remove them as possible rivals for his own position. He thinks of himself, and is eager to be thought of, as a reformer; and yet his understanding of the problems of political and social reformation is such that he can say of William Randolph Hearst, "No great reform has been accomplished, or even advocated, in this country, in a quarter of a century, without the powerful and aggressive aid of his newspapers and magazines."

Mr. Clark might well have spared his two or three pages of lamentation over the "political suicide" of John G. Carlisle, who lost his hold on his Kentucky constituents by his support of the gold standard, during the second Cleveland administration. Carlisle was a far abler man than Mr. Clark, and when forced by the exigencies of his official position to go to the bottom of the financial problem, and its immediate relation to the country's welfare, his logical mind brought him at once out of the haze in which Bryan, Clark, and so many others continued to wander, and enabled him to render a service of immeasurable value to the country at a very critical time. Carlisle knew in advance what the cost of that service would be to him personally, and he had the courage and character to pay that cost without flinching. His memory calls for no word of pity in the matter but only of praise. The careful student of history will lament the blindness of his constituents, and his splendid self-sacrifice.

Satire and Soothing-Syrup

Hand-Made Fables. By George Ade. Illustrated by John T. McCutcheon. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

"GOOLD and silver fluctuates," said Mr. Dooley, "up wan day, down another; but whisky stands firm and strong, unchangeable as the skies, immovable as a rock, at fifteen or two f'r a quarther. If they want something solid as a standard of value, they'll move the Mint over to the internal rivinue office an' lave it stay there."

It was a generation ago that he said it, in the days of free silver and sixteen to one. Now the bottom of the whisky barrel has dropped out, and the price has blown up, but Dooley still issues his observations which pass current at their face value. The Katzenjammer Kids are old enough to have kids of their own, but still they do their juvenile turn, as did their forebears, Max and Morris, for a generation before them. Alphonse and Gaston now exhibit their manners as Percy and Ferdy, and Gloomy Gus, to keep abreast of the times, has become Gasoline Gus. Fables in Slang have not shown a fluctuation in twenty years. Change and decay in all around we see, but humor stands firm and strong, unchangeable as the skies, immovable as a rock. If you need something solid as a stabilizer amid the pitching and rolling of all about you, try the new crop of Hand-Made Fables. It makes a man feel at home in his generation, and not out of place in that of his children.

At first glance it invites comparison with the past. On the jacket are two vignettes of McCutcheon's in his familiar wood-block style, by no means so rough-hewn as they would appear. In one a lady with hour-glass waist, swathed to the chin in a basque and to the heels in a flaring skirt, is ogled by a man in frock coat and high hat, who carries gloves and cane. In the background is a horse-car which an agitated citizen pursues in frantic haste; presumably there will not be another for an hour. In the other street scene the lady wears a few clothes somewhere between her chest-measure and her knees. She is accompanied by grandma similarly arrayed. The ogler turns to look at them over the loose back of a belted coat, but the long narrow bows of his shoes point forward. The second glance disarms any comparison with the present. The preface informs us that "although the period in which these fables appeared enveloped the Great War and lapped over the Great Unrest, the author has proceeded upon the theory that old Human Nature continues to do business, even during a cataclysm." Thus directed, the reader takes from the shelves the crop of twenty years ago, "More Fables, 1900," and is not surprised to find that if the two books were to masquerade in one another's clothes, there would be little to betray the trick. And the fact sets him to wondering about the titles. Slang, so the purists tell us, is characteristically ephemeral. Fables in slang should teach by humor; they class themselves as satire, and if satire is successful it should be content to pass from memory with the abuses it has destroyed. What we seem to have in these books is an ostensibly ephemeral form in frothy language, whose most striking characteristic is its durability—like a carved statue of a glass of soda-water with the bubbles forever winking at the brim. To all appearances we are lashed with satire; in effect we are fed with soothing syrup.

If slang is the ephemerid of language, then twenty years are in its sight but as a day. Mr. Ade calls his diction slang, but if slang is the current phrase, clean-cut when newly minted, but soon worn smooth and discarded, then his ware is not so much slang as the embroidered phrase, the vernacular writ large. He rarely mints a phrase that gains currency, and phrases already current are blank canvas for his embroidery, or empty bladders for him to inflate and gild. Sometimes the phrase is cryptically concealed under the embroidery, as "convert the Fliv into a Baby Doll." More often his work is like structural ornamentation, and if the original metaphor has any real imaginative basis, he follows the original lines—the term "scream" as applied to "loud" clothing returns to something like the original in "if Colours could be converted into Sounds her Costume would have been a Siren Whistle." In "More Fables" only two genuine bits of current slang impress the reader of to-day; "chestnut" because he is surprised to find it surviving so late as 1900; and "no one could tell him where to get off," first surprises one that it is so old, second that old as it is it is neither dead nor respectable. The new volume has such verbs as "to periscope," to "mop up," and a few other new expressions. Half a dozen have died, six have been born; where is the noisome corruption of language of which the purists complain, and where the winged and barbed phrase fresh every hour of which slang loves to boast!

See then the humorist with his tongue in his cheek dealing with the permanent elements of human nature in language essentially unchanged since the Spanish War, which we open with popping of corks and gulp in haste lest the bubbles should cease hissing. He does it by a process that might be called playing both ends against the middle. The first of the Hand-Made Fables would seem to teach that somehow good may be the latter end of total abstinence; the twenty-fifth apparently indicates just the opposite. Like Senators and popular proverbs they can be set off in neutralizing pairs. Sometimes the sting of the satire and the counter-irritant come in the same fable, as in the case of the local reformer who is ostracized by 200 per cent. of his fellow citizens who afterward wait on him to ask him to return to his functions; or that of the returned exile who first judges in sorrow that the world he knew of old has reformed, then to his shame that it has not. The inference is that common sense lies between extremes. The effect is satire that everyone enjoys because no one is hit; the shell always lands on your next-door neighbor's house, and you whoop when you see the splinters fly, and he is whooping too because he thinks it is your house.

Ireland's Future

Ireland a Nation. By Robert Lynd. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

The Clanking of Chains. A Story of Sinn Fein. By Brinsley MacNamara. New York: Brentano's.

MR. LYND is a brilliant London journalist, literary editor of the Daily News, a member of the group of young Irishmen who have carried not only their artistic talents but their unquenchable love of their native country into the vocation of literature across the Channel. When the present writer used to meet him twenty years ago, he was a central figure—almost an oracle—among college students in Belfast who were breaking away from the "Ulster tradition." In depicting Ireland he has the sure touch of one who grew up among the scenes he has to describe, and who now looks back upon them after mixing with the wider world. In this book Mr. Lynd expounds the Irish national spirit to English and American readers, and, if his pages have at times the intractable vehemence which belong to his nationality, they are no less lit up with the wit and sparkle that seldom desert a man of his race.

He gives us a vivid account of the sources of discontent in "John Bull's Other Island," an informing study of the Sinn Fein movement from its inception down to the revolt of 1916, a dissection of the Ulster problem with some very mordant criticism of that gospel of violence whose first aspect was Carsonism and which reappeared among the Irish Volunteers. Passing from political subjects, Mr. Lynd resumes his favorite calling of literary critic, and in five chapters, entitled "Voices of the New Ireland," he sketches the varying moods of the Irish literary renaissance. P. H. Pearse, Mrs. J. R. Green, T. M. Kettle, Dora Sigerson, George Russell (known to all magazine readers as "A. E.") are discussed with a clearness and a discernment which must appeal to everyone, apart from either sympathy or resentment towards the views with which these writers are identified. It is a book of much charm, with many good things that remind us of Mr. Chesterton at his best, and one may conjecture that G. K. C. has had a very strong influence in moulding Mr. Lynd's style. The reader does not need to be warned that this influence has its dangers. We may say of Mr. Chesterton, as someone has said of Wordsworth, that "he is great when he is on the heights, but then he is so often not on the heights."

The chief fault to be found with this volume is one that appears in its very title. If "Ireland a Nation" is not a question-begging phrase, it is at least one that requires very careful explaining for those who hate to mask realities behind names. Mr. Lynd likes Lord Northcliffe's scheme for making Ireland a Dominion rather than Mr. Asquith's Home Rule Act. "But," he says, "it suffers from the defect that it implies that England has the right to impose on Ireland a settlement other than Ireland herself desires." What he would himself propose is to put the Act of 1914 into immediate operation, and leave the members of a freely chosen Dublin parliament to "hammer out a constitution for their country, republican or colonial, according to the national will." About the present discordance of this "national will," about the prevailing orgy of crime, about the probable consequences to the world of setting up a Sinn Fein republic, he has almost nothing to say! These matters are to him apparently irrelevant, so long as the rubric of "self-determination" is followed. Unhesitating Home Rulers may agree in fixing the chief blame for the existing chaos just where Mr. Lynd fixes it. But we had to deal with facts as they are, and one of the curses of our age is just this reliance upon some slogan which we think we are using, but which is in truth using us. By all means let us vent our rage against the narrowness of Unionists. But let us not forget what Ibsen has so suggestively taught us about the blind worship of cast-iron formulæ.

Mr. MacNamara in "The Clanking of Chains" has furnished, no doubt without intending it, a useful corrective to Mr. Lynd. Whether he meant this as a novel with a purpose may perhaps be questioned, and the purpose—if there was one—is not quite easy to diagnose. The book is in the first instance a picture of the rival movements and tendencies of Irish life during the years from 1913 to 1917. One might have predicted that before long that seething period would be presented in a work of fiction, and Mr. MacNamara has the gift for this in a high degree. The scene is laid in the village of Ballycullen, where the hero—Michael Dempsey—is a young clerk in a grocery store, who feeds his mind each evening by candlelight "upon the more ferocious portions of Irish history." He acquires an intense hatred for the English invaders, works himself into ecstasy about his country's martyrs, and broods darkly upon an Irish triumph in the future which will be at the same time revenge for the past. In a play about Robert Emmet and Sara Curran, staged by the Ballycullen Dramatic Class, he declaims Emmet's speech with a fervor that astounds his audience. Old Parnellites and doughty survivors of Fenian and Land League times display a delight mingled with hopelessness. And of course there is a girl, who sees Emmet reincarnated in Dempsey, with a coming Tom Moore who shall celebrate herself as Sara Curran. Michael is enraptured with Sinn Fein in its earlier and quite peaceful form, when the motto "Ourselves Alone" meant no more than a gospel of self-reliance and self-development as against depending on England and English political alliances. Thus his programme is at first one of arousing interest in Irish history, Irish folklore, Irish language, Irish industries, that the soul of a nation so long half dead may be made to renew its life. He is no preacher of armed revolt, but limits himself to such modest schemes as getting the Ballycullen smokers to use only matches made in Ireland! Some mock, however. The liquor men dislike the provision of literary and historical attractions that may compete with the bar. The local sergeant of police is impressed with the greatness of the British Empire, and thinks it would be better to urge all young Irishmen to join "the Force," so that meetings should be "composed of peelers rather than patriots." The job-hunters see more jobs if the country remains under the British Crown, and are strong supporters of constitutional Home Rule. The farmers, who have bought out their land under the Wyndham Act, have ceased to trouble themselves about nationality, and think the Emmet stuff is out of date. Even the girl begins to wonder whether Sara Curran was not well advised to marry a British officer, and tentatively walks out with another young man who, believes in making the best of things as they are. At these ominous signs Michael Dempsey loses heart. The Carsonite drilling in Ulster stirs him to the thought of an Ireland fighting for herself, and his joy knows no bounds when he learns of the Curragh Camp mutiny. "Was it not really in keeping with the old, heroic, rebel traditions?" Ireland, he thinks, can be saved only by those who will die for her. But the nationalists of Ballycullen are too strong for him and an attempt to upset the local organization leads to his being harried out of the village. With a heavy heart he goes abroad, and his fickle fiancée goes with him.

The story is very vivid and very interesting. Irish village life is satirized with considerable skill. But one wonders what exactly Mr. MacNamara intends us to infer. He seems very bitter about the faults of the Redmondite League, and what apparently makes him hopeless regarding Ireland's future is her servitude to the party tradition, party methods, party dreams. Even that pure and bracing air which belonged to the original Sinn Fein has, he thinks, been polluted by reversion to the mental habits of the stifling parliamentary past, so that those who would be free are still embarrassed in every effort by the clanking of old chains. Emigration seems to be his own counsel to the better spirits, as it was Dickens's counsel in "David Copperfield" to the disappointed English Chartists. But then, as now, this was a counsel of despair, and it is not by those who despair that a constructive solution can ever be reached. Just as the British Labor Party has devised a better plan than universal expatriation for the workingmen, so the resources of civic wisdom may surely yet find something better for Ireland than that her best sons should quit her shore. John Redmond made a gallant effort, and though amid the delirium of the war he failed when just on the point of success, one may hope that the same high principles of conciliation will be tried again when the atmosphere has cleared. If Mr. MacNamara will look into Mr. Lynd's book he may see that there are chains quite different from those of which he has written, but quite as fatal to a genuine settlement.

In these disordered times there is perhaps no fetter which clanks more destructively round the neck of those who would make progress than the fetter of some old maxim that men follow in the dark. Nationhood, self-determination, and the like are some men's food and other men's poison. That each people should, so far as compatible with the world's safety and well-being, fix its own form of government is obviously just, and we may well cry shame upon those who would say of it—as of the Conscription Law—"This shall not apply to Ireland." But it is also a maxim that can be pressed to the world's undoing. If it is to mean that every little group which chooses to magnify its group-antagonisms must be constituted into an independent state, and that every selfish whim can be turned into a sacred right by being called "national aspiration," then we have evolved the surest recipe on record for promoting international quarrels. It is idle to object by saying "Where will you draw the line?" We must draw this here, as everywhere else, by intelligent forecast of consequences, using the best light we have.

Herbert L. Stewart

Adventures in the Past

Luca Sarto: A Novel. A History of His Perilous Journey into France in the Year Fourteen Hundred and Seventy-One. By Charles S. Brooks. New York: The Century Company.

His Majesty's Well-Beloved: An Episode in the Life of Mr. Thomas Betterton as Told by His Friend, John Honeywood. By Baroness Orczy. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Burning Glass. By Marjorie Bowen. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

The Forging of the Pikes: A Romance of the Upper Canadian Rebellion of 1837. By Anison North. New York: George H. Doran Company.

The Matrix. By Maria Thompson Daviess. New York: The Century Company.

IF it is the habit of reviewers to speak condescendingly of the historical novel or to dismiss it with more or less good-humored disdain as "costume romance," it is also the habit of a considerable number of story-tellers, year after year, to go steadily and self-respectingly about their natural business of reanimating or regalvanizing the past, as the case may be. And this of course means that a considerable number of novel-readers, a steady if not clamorous constituency, continue to find the home of their fancy in the past. Call it cowardice, or languor if you will, a dodging away from "reality" into the scented and rose-lighted land of never-more. But understand what your disdain lets you in for, how it cuts you off (in theory) from generous enjoyment of many of the greatest story-tellers and their stories. Reflect whether "Ivanhoe" and "Henry Esmond" and "Westward Ho!" mean nothing more than names and moods outgrown, to us who are adult and of the twentieth century. Which would we the more readily part with or could we the more comfortably spare, in that consciousness of experience from which our lives draw secret nourishment: "The Three Musketeers" or "Anna Karenina?" —"Tono-Bungay" or "The Talisman?"

A test, to be sure, rather than a main question. In a sense it is precisely not the question. For if we could have done with comparing the incomparable, we should retain contempt for neither. . . . The historical novel, at all events, by no means cries out for defense, if one can judge from the continued support it receives from publishers become by all accounts more cautious. People write books, and publish them, because people read them. And it is still possible for a writer like Charles S. Brooks, having gained recognition as a whimsical essayist, to lay the scene of his first novel safely in the past and on foreign soil. When you settle down to spin a yarn of an Italian artist's sword and garter adventures in fifteenth-century France, you leave behind all concern with the disposition of your neighbor's wash, though it dangles before your eyes through the square of your study window. Sordid fact and humdrum reason are kicked under the table; and for racy incident and vivid detail you have the alternative of turning some yellowed page or frankly scratching your head—nobody's business which. Mr. Brooks has capably turned out a costume romance, a spirited and amusing if not inspired narrative of adventure-cum-politics. He does not shrink from staging his scene in the France where Quentin Durward once journeyed and loved. The Louis of the cruel hands and craven heart, with his leaden images and his personal squalor, once more appears. If what we gather about the passing of Scott is true, Mr. Brooks is safe in handling his Louis as if he had never been painted before: it is the right method anyhow. For the simple-hearted and simple-headed Quentin we have here a picaresque rascal, Roman artist and ruffler, who appears to have read his Hewlett. The tale as a whole quite cheerfully lacks the richer fabric of motive and action which distinguishes (if anything really does) a living historical romance from a 'sdeathly diversion of the moment. As for style, the fabulist is somewhat happier than most experimenters in this field. He contrives (as Stevenson confesses one must do) a quite artificial but fairly plausible jargon to convey an illusion of the past; and only now and then (as who but Hewlett does not?) drops into modernism: a slight knock in the engine.

From rapier and dungeon to powder and patches, in "His Majesty's Well-Beloved." Place, London, century the mid-seventeenth, atmosphere a blend of court and theatre, plot a web of polite intrigue involving Tom Betterton, Mary Saunderson, and divers nobilities and royalties who play their parts capably if without especial conviction. The Baroness Orczy is an old hand at this kind of story, has the machinery under control and the lingo pat. Her experiment in the use of capitals is not happy; they seem to be scattered about with a loose hand: "There was a sooty chimney-sweep, whom I knew to be an honest Man, and the broom Men and their Boys, and many law-abiding Pedestrians who, fearful of the crowd, were walking in the traffic way, meekly giving the wall to the more roisterous throng." Such a trick merely peppers the page without enriching its flavor. This also is plainly a costume romance: a clever enough fabrication in its highflown to highfalutin style. The author of "The Burning Glass" is another inveterate explorer of the romantic past. Notwithstanding her frequent crudity of manner, she has always something of value to offer—usually, as here, a portrait vividly conceived and vigorously if not quite powerfully executed. Here is the likeness of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse towards the end of her short and troubled years; the enchantress, the fine lady, grande amoureuse. Highflown also is this tale, without relief of humor (a commodity the writer lacks) and yet by no means machine-made: an absorbed imaginative study of character in its environment.

Portraiture is what the author of "The Matrix" has attempted chiefly. Close upon Mr. Bacheller's story of, or including, the youthful Lincoln comes this tale of Lincoln's parents. It is told in a reverent, perhaps an overreverent spirit by one who was "born and reared in the same little Bluegrass valley which was the cradle of the great romance." It is the story mainly of that Nancy Hanks about whom legends still linger in that country. "All that I am or ever hope to be, I owe to my angel Mother, blessings on her memory" is a saying of Lincoln's which gives the keynote to this book. It is not the author's fault if she has produced a pious memorial rather than a living portrait. In "The Forging of the Pikes" we are upon fresher ground. Primarily, with its theme in the roots of Canada's political past, it is a story for Canadians. But though, as the author modestly surmises, "it will probably be the love-story of Alan and Barry that will attract the greater number of readers," there is plenty of vitality in the larger action. So that though it chances to take place in the Upper Canada of eighty years ago, it may be of interest to any reader on either side of the water who has followed the struggles between the "Reformers" and "Tories" of his own day. The style is flowing and simple and has an agreeable if not strictly synchronous flavor of Pepys.

H. W. Boynton

The Run of the Shelves

MR. EDWARD O'BRIEN'S "Best Short Stories of 1919" (Small, Maynard and Company) is the fifth of his annual compilations. There are twenty stories; five from the Century against two from Harper's, which cultivates the short story, one from Scribner's and none from the Atlantic Monthly. The stories run to shortness or to length; the sixty-minute story, once normal for the magazine, is here the exception. The demand for the supernatural is apparently eager and the supply punctual.

Mr. O'Brien's standards define themselves with precision, and a summary of his tests will serve as test for Mr. O'Brien. He has no eye for style. The emergence of a genuine style among his tales in Mr. Cabell's somewhat too debonair and condescending "Wedding-Jest" is as startling in its isolation as the blooming of the winter thorn at Glas-tonbury. Mr. Hergesheimer in the "Meeker Ritual" is apparently standing his style in the corner; even from the corner it is audible. Mr. O'Brien is tolerant of veneer and affectation; one would more readily condone an entire bareness (the total absence of style, like other totalities, is respectable). The second point in literature to which Mr. O'Brien is insensitive is tone. The tone of the whole book is that of the sidewalk, the sidewalk that avoids the gutter and misses the lawn.

The third and final want is the sense of workmanship. This is the surprise. The story as craft, as trade, has been made so much of in our day both in literary and unliterary circles that one blinks a little at the unconcern with which a reputable compiler admits to his book stories that are ridgy, that are baggy, that are pasty, that are shapeless. Miss Yezierska's "Fat of the Land," Mr. O'Brien's favorite, is half-built. Lovers of technique may rejoice that Mr. Horace Fish's "Wrists on the Door," one of the best tales in the collection, is well made; but their joy ought to be clouded by the discovery that Mr. H. M. Jones's "Mrs. Drainger's Veil," another of the best tales, is unmistakably clumsy.

Mr. O'Brien, however, has qualities which are as incontestable as his limitations. He has a keen, if not infallible, sense, of the powerful in motive, the original and trenchant in conception. Stories have many aspects, but their conquering aspects are few and simple; they win oftenest by their thews. Mr. O'Brien is a judge of thews. He has a second merit, of less extent but greater elevation. He likes the fact—the everyday, present-day fact. That he relishes a tincture of miracle in this actuality is undeniable, but this does not overset, or even wholly offset, the counter truth that he enjoys a savor of realism in his miracle. In stories like Miss Brownell's "Dishes," Mr. Hallet's "To the Bitter End," Mr. Ingersoll's "Centenarian," and Miss Yezierska's "Fat of the Land," a taste for the common, at least as the wrappage or selvedge of the uncommon, is healthily and laudably apparent. Mr. O'Brien's collection will be of service to those readers who are wise enough to grasp its limitations.

"A World Remaking or Peace Finance," by Clarence W. Barron (Harper), consists of a series of articles written mainly in the spring of 1919 describing economic and social conditions in Britain, together with remarks on the Peace treaty, Socialism, inflation, and kindred topics.

Mr. Barron is a trained observer and generalizes soundly from what he has observed. Thoroughly versed in economic problems, to which he has devoted a lifetime of study, he is able to reach down through the welter of phenomena to the fundamental causes of things and set them forth in a way that the lay reader can comprehend. His book is designed for readers of this class. There is nothing in it which will be news to those whose business it has been to follow closely the economic vicissitudes of belligerent Europe, but even for the latter there is attraction in the grouping of facts and the statement of their relations.

Mr. Barron is a disciple of the old-fashioned "Placing-his-hand-u p o n-my-shoulder-as-w e-left-t h e-conference-hall-the-Emperor-said-to-me" tradition of journalism and there are many little affectations of speech scattered through the book which some may find irritating. But it is, nevertheless, a good book and well worth reading.

Mr. Noel Leslie, an actor known to Boston in the "Doctor's Dilemma" and to New York in the "Rise of Silas Lapham," is the author of "Three Plays" (Boston: Four Seas Company). The plays are set with an actor's solicitude, and each begins with a promise which is overcast by partial disappointment. In "Waste," a dying girl is supplanted by her own sister in the affections of her betrothed. This is touching, and might be very touching, if the extreme bleakness of the general situation did not absorb and deaden this particular. The "War Fly" begins forcibly with a sombre and mysterious dinner; the interest rises to a devil and sinks to a fly at almost the same moment, and the little counteracts the large. "For King and Country" has moments of true pathos, but the love-story is imperfectly cemented with other and stronger appeals, and the ending leaves a fissure in the play.

The latest effort to identify Shakespeare—this time he is Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford—is, perhaps significantly, from the pen of J. Thomas Looney.

The record of a single regiment in modern operations is rather like the tracing of a thread across the pattern of a brocade; and if it is worth anything it must be done one stitch at a time. The chronicler has to deal with minute materials—companies and platoons, and even the fate of single men; and whatever his final form, there must underlie his work a meticulous accuracy as to time and place. Captain W. Kerr Rainsford has made such a narrative ("From Upton to the Meuse, With the 307th Infantry"; Appleton), which is unusual enough, and has succeeded in making it clear, expressive, and entertaining—thanks in good part to a never failing sense of humor. We must give credit, too, for his having provided the maps necessary to follow his narrative—a too unusual provision in books about the war.

The actual task in the Argonne is made far more clear by his precise and matter-of-fact statement than by any of the pretentious verbiage with which we are only too familiar: Compare, for instance, his account of the "Lost Battalion" incident with the half-bravado, half whitewashing presentations in the press or in official propaganda reports. This sobriety and measure is in fact the peculiar note of the book, and its general tone—towards all matters, large and small, towards American and Allied—is perfect. It is rare to find a history of a particular unit which avoids disparagement or invidious comparisons—and there is none of the boasting which has made certain Divisional histories little more than swashbuckling on the typewriters. Captain Rainsford does not even praise his comrades—but merely sets forth what they have done. One of his particular criticisms, however, may be quoted here:

> A fruitful cause of trouble was an almost criminal inexactness on the part of many infantry officers in map reading. . . . It was the one salient point on which the training of infantry officers was found to be deficient. Many a company commander or liaison officer was entirely capable of waving a vague finger over a valley marked on the map, while stating that the troops in question were "on that hill," and, if pressed to be more precise, he would give as their cöordinates figures which represented a point neither in the valley to which he was pointing nor on the hill on which they were.

This failing was in no way peculiar to the author's regiment; it was notorious and universal, and was responsible for more things than it is pleasant to consider.

Two more of the numerous elementary books dealing with questions of public health are "Home Nursing," by Abbie Z. Marsh (Blackiston Son), and "The Health of the Teacher," by William Estabrook Chancellor (Forbes). Miss Marsh's book is brief, well written, and reliable. It will no doubt be of real service to many mothers of families, especially when hospital facilities may be difficult or impossible of attainment. Dr. Chancellor's book is a poor affair. There is much advice of a very detailed and particular kind. Those who want specific dietary instructions will find them here; there is nothing uncertain or indefinite in his directions. For a "city teacher," woman aged 40 years, sinewy motor, body-coefficient 2, in April damp weather" a six o'clock dinner is described in detail. Among other things it includes a baked apple "2½ inches in diameter" and ice cream "made with cream, and two large cookies." If, as the preface states, the author has for years given his lectures in a known American college and school of education, one can not but feel sincere regret that so many persons have been mistaught in matters pertaining to the health and care of their bodies.

Drama

The Unreviving London Stage and Its Revivals

THE British drama is making a very slow recovery. The infrequency of my communications to the Review is simply due to the fact that there is little or nothing worth writing about. None of our playwrights of the first rank have produced anything. We were to have had a play by Sir James Barrie about this time, but it has been postponed on account of the illness of Miss Fay Compton. One or two pleasant trivialities have been produced, which I shall mention later on. But the memory of man scarcely runneth to the time when a play of any serious pretensions made its way to the London stage. Yet people are positively gasping for something to "break their minds upon." We are all convinced that a great revival must follow the war, but we have not even got the length of pointing in any definite direction and saying "Lo, here!" or "Lo, there!" Instead of a revival we have revivals—of the Euripides-Murray "Trojan Women" and "Medea"; of "Julius Cæsar" (a Gilbert-Miller-Ainley effort, only moderately successful); of "Othello" and "The Merchant of Venice"; of Mr. Shaw's "Arms and the Man," "Pygmalion," and "Candida," and of Sir James Barrie's "Admirable Crichton."

One of the things that sometimes fills the students of the theatre with despair is the wild talk about things theatrical that passes current among cultured outsiders. An instance is afforded by a recent review in the Times Literary Supplement of Mr. Hornblow's "History of the Theatre in America." The writer (unknown to me) complains that Mr. Hornblow's work is a chronicle, not a philosophic history, and illustrates his point as follows:

> Take the recent war: the chronicler of the theatre will string a list of productions and players. To the historian the interesting thing will be the social causes which filled the stages of London with rubbish and the auditorium of many a once august London theatre with pleasure-seekers, while the old patrons kept severely away; and next the quick revival of a better drama and the return to some theatres of the old patrons and the old sense of style, oddly mingled with new social factors and habits.

This passage is so amazingly remote from the facts as to lead one to wonder in what realm of a priori figments the writer has been living. It is eminently desirable that there should have been "many august London theatres" supported by faithful bodies of "patrons" who were not mere "pleasure-seekers" in the vulgar sense of the term. Had such theatres existed, it is highly probable that, during the war, they would have been given over to comparative "rubbish," by which the austere and non-pleasure-seeking patrons would have been flooded out. And, had this been the case, we might fondly have hoped for a "quick revival of a better drama" after the war, and "the return to some theatres of the old patrons and the old sense of style." But the whole picture is a Freudian dream, a vision of the night, the wish being father to the thought. It is true, of course, that the public taste —or at least the managerial taste, which more or less creates the public taste— set towards frivolity during the war. But it is not true that there were any—and much less "many"—theatres of "august" traditions, which were invaded by the tide of frivolity, to the displacement of their severely intellectual habitués. It is not true that any particular "sense of style" prevailed in any theatre or theatres, and was displaced by the war. Least of all is it true that there has been "a quick revival of better drama" and a restoration of the "sense of style." All these are imaginary phenomena, and the philosopher who should give an account of their "social causes" would be a philosopher of Laputa.

It is at least seventy years since any theatre in London made any pretence of faithfulness to an "august" tradition. There was some faint show of the re-establishment of something of the kind in the Irving management at the Lyceum and the Vedrenne-Barker management at the Court: but both of these were false starts and came to an end years before the war. For the rest, the most obvious phenomenon of the theatrical world is a state of constant flux, which prevents the establishment of any local tradition, "august" or otherwise. Theatres are constantly passing from hand to hand and totally changing their style of production. The only exceptions are such houses as the Gaiety and Daly's, which have been faithful for a long series of years to musical farce. The management of Sir George Alexander and Sir Herbert Tree gave to the St. James's and His Majesty's, respectively, a certain character: the one for social drama of the Pinero type, the other for spectacular plays and revivals. It was not the war, but the illness and death of Sir George Alexander, that left the St. James's for some time in the hands of wild-cat enterprises; but it was never invaded by mere war frivolities. As for His Majesty's, has it not been occupied for four years by a production which may be called the apotheosis of the Tree tradition—"Chu Chin Chow" to wit? The only other London theatre which can be said to have any tradition is the Haymarket—a comedy house—and its standard has been fairly maintained throughout the war. At no point, then, can we find any basis for the vision of "high-brow" patrons driven out of "august" theatres by war frivolity; and still less is there any sign of their "quick" return to their old haunts, to be rejoiced by a revival of "the old sense of style." The article reveals the difficulty of getting even very intelligent people to take a realistic view of the theatre.

The writer goes on to say that Mr. Hornblow "sees clearly and describes with understanding the social conditions which have led to the decline of the American theatre since the last decade of the nineteenth century!" This is rather surprising to me, in as much as I regard that period as one of very rapid advance. But it would be an impertinence in me to do more than state that view for what it is worth.

One of the very few conspicuously successful productions of the spring season is "Mr. Pim Passes By," a light comedy by Mr. A. A. Milne of Punch, in which our leading comedy actress, Miss Irene Vanbrugh, returns to the London stage after a long absence. "Light" is too mild a term for it—such is its insubstantiality that many of us doubted on the first night whether even its agreeable wit and Miss Vanbrugh's genius would carry it to success. Olivia Marden is a bright and clever woman, married to a brainless but well-meaning country squire to whom she is much attached. She has been most unhappily married before, to a drunkard and scoundrel who died in Australia. One fine morning, a doddering old gentleman named Garraway Pim wanders into Marden Lodge on some trivial errand. In the course of desultory conversation, he says something which leads Olivia to believe that her first husband is still alive. The intelligence naturally causes some dismay in the Marden household; but though the dismay is natural, one can not say the same of the conduct of the parties concerned. Fortunately, it is needless to go into the question, for in the course of the afternoon Mr. Garraway Pim wanders back again, and it appears that he has mixed up two names, so that Olivia is as innocent of bigamy in fact as in intention. One would have said that there was barely matter for a one-act play in this brief misunderstanding. It is only fair, therefore, to recognize the art, or knack, with which Mr. Milne spreads it out over three acts to the complete satisfaction of his audiences.

The Little Theatre, wrecked by a German bomb, has been rebuilt and reopened under the management of Messrs. Vedrenne and Vernon. Their first venture, "Mumsee," by Edward Knoblock, has been but moderately successful. It introduces us to an Anglo-French family, resident in a French country town at the time of the German invasion. The eldest son is a youth of weak character and a confirmed gambler. He drifts into the clutches of a German spy and is induced to sell him some military information. Being discovered, he ought to meet with an ignominious death; but a sympathetic British officer gives him a chance to expiate his crime by carrying a despatch to a point of danger from which he can not—and does not—return alive. So far, we have a very passable war play, not unskillfully handled. But Mr. Knoblock has not been content to write a military melodrama: he has tried to concentrate interest upon the character of the young man's mother, the "Mumsee" of the title, an embodiment of the heroic spirit of France. This was in itself not a bad idea; but when Mr. Knoblock sought to make Mumsee the heroine of a romantic love-story, his daring outran his discretion. Her very name emphasizes her maternity; and as she has four grown-up children, we must credit her with at least forty-five summers—and winters to match. What is our amazement, then, when a grizzled and battered Anglo-Indian Colonel pleads guilty to a hopeless passion for her, and when the author, in the last act, positively kills off the father of her four children in order that she may be virtuously happy with Husband No. 2! It may be set down as a maxim of stagecraft that a prudent author will not undertake to enlist our sympathies for a pair of lovers whose united ages run to over a hundred.

A curious bucolic comedy named "Tom Trouble" has been produced by Mr. Lewis Casson, a free-lance manager of some distinction. The author's name, "John Burley," is probably fictitious. The place is a Yorkshire village, and the play opens with an exceedingly vivacious and well-written scene of rustic courtship. After a lovers' quarrel, the girl, in a fit of pique, falls an easy prey to the Don Juan of the district. The question then is whether her seducer will marry her; but he is killed in an accident before the point is decided. Thereupon her original lover returns to her, overlooking her divagation; and, from the Yorkshire point of view, all ends happily. The play is marked by the simplicity, the brevity, the lack of structural development, which we note in the Irish drama; but it is by no means without talent. We learn that in this Yorkshire district, experimental marriages, not to be ratified in church unless they prove fruitful, are a recognized social institution—as they are in Thomas Hardy's "Isle of Slingers." It is an odd sign of the times that this free-and-easy custom should not only be openly discussed on the stage, but that the heroine's father, a well-to-do farmer, should be represented as triumphantly vindicating it in a discussion with the parish clergyman.

The Haymarket has scored a success with a light and bright comedy, entitled "The Young Person in Pink," by Miss Gertrude Jennings, a lady whose very real wit and observation have hitherto been displayed only in one-act pieces. In the first act we find a "young person in pink" wandering, in a rather suspicious fashion, in St. James's Park. Her proceedings attract the unfavorable notice of the park keeper; but her beauty, distinction, and evident innocence appeal to the chivalry of the young Lord Stevenage, who finds, on inquiry, that she has totally lost her memory, and has no idea who she is. Lord Stevenage claims for her the protection of Lady Tonbridge, a woman twice his age, to whom he has incautiously engaged himself when recovering from his wounds—on a day when his temperature was many degrees above the normal. Lady Tonbridge affects to befriend her, but in reality behaves to her in an odious fashion, which leads to the breaking off of the engagement, and leaves Stevenage free to transfer his affections to his protégée, who, of course, proves to be the daughter of a Duke. Probability, as you will have perceived, is not the distinguishing virtue of the piece; but it is very brightly written, contains a number of amusing character sketches, and is admirably acted. It is entirely a woman's play, Lord Stevenage being, with the exception of the park keeper, the only man in it.

The Stage Society has taken its courage in both hands and has actually produced a German play—"From Morn to Midnight," by Georg Kaiser, translated by Major Ashley Dukes. Kaiser is understood to be a noted communist, and is certainly a disciple of Frank Wedekind, the author of "Erdgeist," "Die Büchse der Pandora," and other somewhat anarchic plays. The disciple, however, is a little less morbid, and much less heavy-handed, than his master. The hero of this play is a bank cashier. Suddenly inebriated by the heady perfumes of a lady whom he conceives (erroneously) to be a "dashing Cyprian," he steals 60,000 marks and proposes to elope with her. Defeated in this purpose, he goes home in time to see his aged mother die of apoplexy; then turns up at a "velodrome" where he offers fantastic prizes for bicycle races; then visits a disreputable cabaret where he threatens to enter upon the career of a "Jack-the-Ripper"; and finally goes to a Salvation Army meeting, where he takes his place on the penitent bench, causes the meeting to end in a scramble for his ill-gotten wealth, and, being betrayed to the police, blows out his brains. All this, be it noted, occurs between morn and midnight. There is a streak of something very like insanity in the conception of the play, and it is hard to discern any merit, whether philosophical or artistic, in its crude cynicism. But it is drawn with the bold firm strokes of a "lightning caricaturist," and seems to represent a striving after a new technic which is not without its interest.

WILLIAM ARCHER

London, March 30

On Profiteer Hunting

THERE is a "flying squadron" that flies in the newspapers in heavy headlines, and it is hunting the profiteer. It is connected with the Federal Government. It is in earnest. It will protect the poor. It is investigating cases of overcharging in many necessities, such as Chinese beads, French paper-backed books, and white net gamps. It recently arrested a man in Brooklyn for asking $45 at retail for a raincoat which is supposed to have cost him only $23. The disgrace of the arrest so worked upon the man's mind that he committed suicide on the same day. It was not alleged that the man misrepresented the coats. It was not asserted that he compelled anybody to pay this price. It was not maintained that he was attempting any monopoly. It was not charged that he kept anyone from going down the street and getting a similar coat more cheaply. Under these conditions, if his price were so much above the prices of people around him, one would imagine that his punishment would be simply that the goods would remain unsold. But that is not the way our "flying squadrons" reasons. It is flying too fast to take out time to think.

The outbreak of the hysteria directed against "profiteers" has reached a highly mischievous point. Present conditions are unfortunate and regrettable, especially as applied to rents and to the housing shortage, but these conditions can be remedied only by calm thought and expert knowledge, not by high emotions. Denunciation of "profiteers," and threats against them, are not only useless but harmful. If they did nothing more than divert attention from the true remedies they would be harmful enough, but they are apt to lead to measures that are positively dangerous.

If profiteers are now charging "all they can get," it must never be lost sight of that they are always charging all they can get, and that they were just as greedy before the war as they are now. The same amount of heartlessness that exists to-day has existed since the beginning of economic history, and as it is not a new factor, it obviously can not be an explanation of present prices.

Most popular agitation about prices is based purely on the price to which the public has become accustomed. How many people know offhand the "cost of production" of common articles, such as a newspaper, a car ride, a pair of shoes

(Continued on page 468)

The Largest Wireless Station

At Honolulu, H. I., is situated the world's largest wireless station. This Station is equipped with a 300 K. W. Crocker-Wheeler Radio Generator.

The C-W Company manufactures generators for land stations, aeroplanes, dirigibles, submarine chasers and a wide variety of special purposes.

S. S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Binghamton

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

TIFFANY & CO.

DIAMOND AND GEM MERCHANTS

PEARLS DIAMONDS JEWELRY
SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS
CHINA AND STATIONERY

EFFICIENT SERVICE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Rousseau and Romanticism

By IRVING BABBITT

Traces a great international movement and studies it in its bearing on the problems of the immediate present.

"Extraordinarily able." Manchester Guardian.

"An extremely learned and stimulating book." Scotsman.

"Whatever may be our final attitude towards the author's conclusions, we cannot but regard 'Rousseau and Romanticism' as masterly. . . . We are almost impelled to declare that it is the only book of criticism worthy the name which has appeared in English in the twentieth century." Athenaeum.

"As a study in comparative literature, this work is beyond question the most thought-provoking yet produced in America. . . . It should stir to the depth the sluggish waters of American criticism." New York Post

At all Bookstores. $1.00 net.

Boston HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO. New York

(Continued from page 466)
a hat, a loaf of bread? Yet when the price of any one of these goes up, there is certain to be clamor and wrath and denunciation. That a price is three or four times what it was four years ago is considered prima facie evidence of robbery.

Nor is cost of production itself, even when known, a proper index on which to base a "fair" price. In the long run prices are governed by costs of production, but in any given season prices are unrelated to cost of production, and are determined solely by supply and demand. This is well illustrated by the crops. When the farmer plants his crop he is not only uncertain of what the next year's world demand will be, but he can know very little about the world's supply. He does not know how much competing farmers here and in other countries are going to plant; he does not know what weather conditions over the world are going to be, and how they will affect output. When his crop is harvested his price will be determined by the world competition of buyers and of sellers. The price may be, and often is, below cost of production; but the individual farmer can not hold his stock for a price that will bring cost of production plus a "fair" return. The result of trying to do so would be merely that nobody would buy his stock at all; he would suffer a total loss. His only recourse is to sell his stock for what it will bring. At these times nobody inquires as to the farmer's cost of production. There is no agitation to pay him the difference between cost of production and the price.

What is true of farm products is true of all manufacturing lines in which competition exists. Prices are fixed at any given time purely by supply and demand, and if cost of production is not used to fix an arbitrary price in times of business adversity, it should not be so used in times of prosperity. The influence of cost of production will naturally and inevitably make itself felt, without public agitation or regulation. When farmers receive too little for a given crop in one year, they will plant less of that crop in the succeeding year, so that a smaller supply will bring prices above cost of production. When, as now, certain lines of business are receiving profits far in excess of cost of production, the result must be that manufacturers in that line will constantly strive to increase their output in order to increase such high profits; and that outsiders will be attracted into the same business, thus further increasing output. This will bring down prices more effectively than any public regulation, and it will increase the supply of goods at the same time. Always provided that real competition exists, people in any line of business who are demanding "excessive" prices, though they may be creating temporary distress, are unconsciously performing a public service, for they are stimulating increased production in that line. This a priori conclusion is supported a posteriori. There was no more notorious price increase last year than that in men's clothing. Government statistics show that from January, 1919, to January, 1920, the number of workers engaged in the men's clothing trade increased 54.2 per cent, the largest increase of any industry.

Persons who believe that the present situation could be cured "if they would only jail a few of these profiteers" might do well to consider an historic precedent. In his monograph on "Fiat Money Inflation in France," the last edition of which appeared in 1914, the late Andrew D. White speaks of some of the accompaniments of that inflation of more than a century ago:

The washerwomen of Paris, finding soap was so dear that they could hardly purchase it, insisted that all the merchants that were endeavoring to save something of their little property by refusing to sell their goods for the wretched currency with which France was flooded, should be punished with death. Marat declared loudly that the people, by hanging shopkeepers and plundering stores, could easily remove the trouble. The result was that on the 28th of February, 1793, at 8 o'clock in the evening, a mob of men and women began plundering the stores and shops of Paris. At first they demanded only bread: soon they insisted on coffee and rice and sugar; at last they demanded everything on which they could lay their hands—cloth, clothing, groceries and luxuries of every kind. Two hundred such stores were plundered. Finally order was restored by a grant of 7 million francs to buy off the mob.

On September 29, 1793, France passed the law of the Maximum. First—the price of each article of necessity was to be fixed at one and one-third times the price in 1790. Secondly, all transportation was to be added at a fixed rate per league. Third, five per cent. was to be added for the profit of the wholesaler. Fourth, ten per cent. was to be added for the profit of the retailer. Nothing could look more reasonable. Great was the jubilation. The report was presented and supported by Barrère. He insisted that France had been suffering from a Monarchial commerce which only sought wealth, while what she needed and what she was now to receive was a Republican commerce—a commerce of moderate profits and virtuous. . . .

The first result of the Maximum was that every means was taken of evading the fixed price imposed, and the farmers brought in as little produce as they possibly could. This increased the scarcity, and the people of the large cities were put on an allowance. Tickets were issued authorizing the bearer to obtain at the official prices a certain amount of bread or sugar or soap or coal to cover immediate necessities.

But it was found that the Maximum, with its divinely revealed four rules, could not be made to work well—even by the shrewdest devices. In the greater part of France it could not be enforced. As to merchandise of foreign origin or merchandise into which any foreign product entered, the war had raised it far above the price allowed under the first rule, namely, the price of 1790, with an addition of one-third. Shopkeepers therefore could not sell such goods without ruin. The result was that very many went out of business, and the remainder forced buyers to pay enormous charges under the very natural excuse that the seller risked his life in trading at all. That this excuse was valid is easily seen by the daily lists of those condemned to the guillotine, in which not infrequently figured the names of men charged with violating the Maximum laws. Manufactures were very generally crippled and frequently destroyed, and agriculture was fearfully depressed. To detect goods concealed by farmers and shopkeepers, a spy system was established with a reward to the informant of one-third of the value of the goods discovered. To spread terror, the Criminal Tribunal at Strassburg was ordered to destroy the dwelling of anyone found guilty of selling goods above the price set by law. The farmer often found that he could not raise his products at anything like the price required by the new law, and when he tried to hold back his crops and cattle, alleging that he could not afford to sell them at the prices fixed by law, they were frequently taken from him by force, and he was fortunate if paid even in the depreciated fiat money—fortunate, indeed, if he finally escaped with his life. . . .

To reach the climax of ferocity, the Convention decreed in May, 1794, that the death penalty should be inflicted on any person convicted of "having asked, before a bargain was concluded, in what money the payment was to be made." About a year later came the abolition of the Maximum itself.

Mr. White's account shows the result of public clamor and emotion when carried to their logical extreme. During tions in France was completely overlooked. There is a danger at the present day that high feeling against profiteers may similarly lead attention away from the real cause of present prices, and hence from their true corrective.

HENRY HAZLITT

Jazz a Song at Twilight

AMERICA'S chief contribution to the arts so far, say the learned ones, is ragtime; or, in vulgar parlance, jazz. This cosmic syncopation is affecting man's activities. Rooted axioms waver; nations adopt intoxicating figures like the Turkey-Trotsky, the Lenin Leaning, the Bryan Grape-juice Waddle. Later Slavic music, Cubist Art, Vorticist Sculpture, Vachel Lindsay's chants and Amy Lowell's shredded rhythms—what are these but jazz?

Recently we ran across the advance sheets of a distinctly modern volume of music, "Home Jazzes." An energetic adapter has redone the old songs in the crepitative metre. We quote a few of

Concerning radical readjustment between the peoples:

"The Brotherhood of Man"

This book by Dr. A. R. L. Dohme is an earnest study of general economic and political conditions. Dr. Dohme concludes with an interesting practical outline for a World State and new human relationships. By mail, $1.10.

THE NORMAN, REMINGTON COMPANY
Publishers - Baltimore

the ragged melodies, beginning with an old favorite:

Home, home, saccharinic home,
Place to lay your dome,
Lay your dome,
Lay your dome.
There's no place—no show place—
Or "gq" place—or slow place—
There's no place like home—
What?
Home!

The nationalistic note appears in this brief chorus:

Come back to Erin for a Sinn Fein rag;
Use the ballot—or a mallet—for the old green flag.
We'll print our books in Gaelic,
So we can never failic,
Till we win at last that Home Rule, Sinn Fein rag!

"Annie Laurie" sticks closer to the accepted jazz forms:

Down in bonny Scotland where the thistles grow
There's a little kiddie with a brow like snow,
She hasn't any frosty mitt, I'd have you know,
She's a bear—Theda Bare—Oh, my!
(Slower) And on Maxwelton's brae
Amid the new-mown hay,
She's waiting 'neath a Scottish sky:

(Chorus)

Annie—Annie Laurie,
My heart's in a flurry,
Let's get preacher, license, ring,
And do that thing!
Annie—Annie Laurie,
You will ne'er be sorry,
My classy lassie, un-surpassy,
Let's do the Highland Matrimonial Fling!

We regret we can not quote the intoxicating strain of "Drink to Me—Only with Thine Eyes," "The Auld Lang High Syne," "The Battle Hymn of the New Republic," "Shimmying To-night on the Old Camp Ground," "The Jazz-Jangled Banner," or the pathetic stanzas of "I Cannot Sing the Old Songs—the Law Will Not Permit It." Instead, we give the unexpurgated chorus of "Love's Old Sweet Jazz":

Just a jazz (it's just a jazz) at twilight,
In the shy light,
Not a high light.
Life's a muddle, kiss and cuddle,
Ba-by dar-ling,
While the shadows flicker all the quicker
As though liquor filled 'em;
Though the way (although the way) be weary,
Rather dreary,
Simply bleary,
Still to us at twilight
Through the shy light
From the skylight
Comes the jazz—
(THE JAZZ!)
For it has
(IT HAS!)
A sneaky, squeaky, shrieky Bolsheviki
Sort of razz;
It's the jazz—
(THE JAZZ!)
For it has
(IT HAS!)
An easy, squeezy, Japanesy,
Funny, bunny, hug me, honey.
Can't embarrass, Peace-at-Paris,
Razzle-dazzle JAZZ!

CLEMENT WOOD

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED

LACKAWANNA

THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

The War and the Rhodes Scholarships

THE war has produced important changes in the working of the Rhodes Scholarship scheme. In the first place, it has brought about a new and very much keener interest in the scholarships on the part of students in this country. In the second place, it has caused sweeping changes in the regulations of the University of Oxford. And in the third place, the war, if not the cause, has at any rate been the occasion of radical alterations in the machinery by which Rhodes Scholars are selected in the United States.

Oxford has been affected profoundly by the war. An elaborate system of short courses has been arranged for men whose education was interrupted for five years and who have not now the time (nor in many cases the money) to spend in taking a degree in the ordinary way. The requirement in the Greek language has been abolished for admission and for all degrees. Oxford has instituted the Ph. D., has altered the old regulation which defined "residence" as sleeping within a mile and a half of Carfax, is preparing to admit women to degrees, and is asking the Government for support which, if granted, will probably carry with it such measure of government control as will make the university in a sense a state institution.

First in importance among these changes is the establishment of the Ph. D. degree, which is already attracting to the Rhodes Scholarships in larger numbers a type of student not, indeed, unknown among Rhodes Scholars in the old days, but much more rare then than he is likely to be in the future. Facilities for research have always existed in Oxford, but not until now has the university offered a degree which would be generally recognized in other countries as indicating the successful completion of an original investigation. The Oxford doctorates (the D. Litt., the D. S. C., and the D. C. L.) have hitherto been unobtainable before middle life, when their value to an American scholar would be negligible.

While Oxford has always offered opportunities for research, there has not been in the past a systematic organization of research work and definitely defined requirements necessary for the administration of graduate work on any except a small scale. It has been this lack of the organization of graduate work which, even more than the lack of a doctor's degree, has deterred the type of American student, who formerly went to Germany, from going to Oxford. Individual assistance from the most eminent men in the university has always been given to students engaged in research with a generosity which would have been impossible had these students been more numerous. But such help has been largely informal; the graduate student has been left "on his own" to work out his thesis and to prepare himself for what was likely to be a severe examination for his degree.

It must not be expected that with the institution of the Ph. D. degree the University of Oxford will be able in a day, or in a year, to improvise the type of organization which is to be found in the larger American graduate schools. In one very important respect the situation there differs from that in an American university. The man who has taken an Oxford B. A. with honors will already have done much more highly specialized work in his particular field than the American A. B. Furthermore, the Oxford honors man will have already learned to work independently for himself in a way which is not usual over here. On this account it seems likely that work for the Ph. D. at Oxford will be less elaborately organized, will remain freer and more independent than in many cases it is in the United States. As a result of this situation it follows that the American student who has done only the A. B. course is not ready to begin work for the Ph. D. at Oxford. He should have taken at least his A. M., should have acquired some experience in independent work, and must produce evidence of "fitness to engage in research" before he is ready to become a candidate for the Oxford Ph. D.

So far as Rhodes Scholars are concerned, it seems extremely likely that the Oxford Ph. D. will, for the most part, be combined with graduate work in the United States, either by men who begin their graduate study in Oxford and take the degree over here, or by men who begin their advanced work in this country and go on to Oxford for the Ph. D. American Rhodes Scholars who have only just graduated from college before going to Oxford will be well advised to take the former course, spending two years at Oxford on the A. B. in one of the Final Honor Schools, and beginning a piece of research in their third year which could then be completed in this country in one or two years, as the case may be. On the other hand, Rhodes Scholars who have already begun to work on the Ph. D. in this country will be able to finish their work and to take their degree at Oxford.

Of less importance among the changes at Oxford are the abolition of compulsory Greek and the provisions for granting "Senior Standing" under the Foreign Universities Statute. Until a year ago every candidate for the B. A. degree at Oxford was required to show a "sufficient knowledge" of the Greek language. During the past year a hot battle has been waged over the proposal to abolish this requirement, a battle which was only ended on March 2, when the requirement was defeated by a majority of seventy-five in a house of about eight hundred. The new entrance regulations provide that the Greek language shall be an optional subject, but that candidates for the B. A. degree in any subject, except mathematics, natural science, or jurisprudence, shall be required to offer, either on entrance or on their intermediate examination, a portion of Greek history or literature with texts studied in translation. That was the live issue in the recent contest, whether students of literary subjects should be compelled to study Greek. The answer of Convocation might be given in the words of Professor Gilbert Murray: "If by Greek you mean the Greek language, no; if you mean Greek civilization, yes."

Interesting as this contest is, it has comparatively little application to American Rhodes Scholars, because of the provisions for granting Senior Standing (with excuse from all entrance and intermediate examinations) to graduates of approved foreign universities. Most Rhodes Scholars are college graduates when they go to Oxford, and, while no list of institutions which are to be considered "approved" under this statute has yet been issued, it seems probable that the majority of American Rhodes Scholars will be granted Senior Standing and will proceed directly to the specialized study of the subjects in which they expect to take their degree.

Last in order but perhaps not least in importance among the changes wrought by the war in the Rhodes Scholarship scheme is the new plan under which selections will be made in this country. The outstanding character of this plan is the simplication of the procedure. Examinations are no longer required. Selections are made on the basis of the candidate's record in school and college, supplemented by confidential references and by a personal interview with the Committee of Selection. The candidate is no longer required even to procure testimonials. He simply fills out an application blank giving certain information about himself and giving the names of men to whom he wishes to refer. His record is then investigated by the committee, the more promising candidates are summoned for a personal interview, and the selection is made.

Committees of Selection in the various States are composed of ex-Rhodes Scholars, of whom there are now four hundred in this country, and this plan brings their love of Oxford and their enthusiasm for the scheme to bear upon the selection of the Rhodes Scholars of the future. Until 1919 the ex-Rhodes Scholars had had practically no part in the working of the scheme in this country. Not the least of the benefits of their participation in the selections comes from the fact that information about Oxford and about the Scholarships will be more readily available in almost every State, inasmuch as the men who are administering the Scholarships have themselves been at Oxford. Ex-Rhodes Scholars feel almost to a man that the Scholarships open what is perhaps the greatest intellectual opportunity in grasp of an American boy—an opportunity all the more valuable in that it involves not merely the opening to personal success but also qualifies a man to do his part towards building up an understanding between the members of that group of nations which, by working together, can do most for the stability of the world and the preservation of free institutions.

FRANK AYDELOTTE
(American Secretary to the Rhodes Trustees)

THE growth of constructive educational work in industrial centres is shown clearly by the March Bulletin of the National Association of Corporation Schools. Many have realized that some such work was going on. Few realize, however, just what sort of work is being done. Still fewer, perhaps, appreciate the enormous benefits which may accrue, not only to the corporations interested, but to the employees and so eventually to the country, of which the employees make up the larger part. Membership in the company clubs of this far-reaching association amounts to approximately twenty-nine per cent. of the aggregate number of employees. These figures are made from the reports of only fifty-three establishments; but when the movement spreads to practically the whole industrial life of the country, as it bids fair to do, the work, already of great importance, may prove to be, in more than a mere quantitative sense, the chief contribution of America to education.

"The object of such clubs," as their supporters phrase it, "is to promote social activities and to provide a medium through which better understanding may be had among employees and among those charged with management and oft times including stockholders." The work done, though it varies greatly according to the special needs of each club, usually, in addition to community houses, country clubs, and libraries, includes hospital service, health supervision, provision for insurance and savings funds, with instructions regarding them, night schools, and "Americanization" classes which provide instruction in English and in the principles and forms of American government.

Much of this work, to be sure, individual concerns have done for some years. The virtue lies not in the addition of particularly new ideas, but in the organization of rather obvious ideas into constructive, well-articulated work, and in the coöperative state of mind which such organization implies. Also, something refreshingly definite and practical is being done. While the mails have been flooded with propagandist literature, crying out for theories good and bad, forward-looking industries have quietly gone about their important business of making better workers and so better citizens of both employer and employee. If the ills of modern times are economic rather than political, as our Socialist brethren tell us, little could be more promising than this great effort to teach, in a practical way, the fundamental conditions of economic development.

Harry F. Atwood's "Back to the Republic" (Chicago: Laird & Lee) is a militant little volume, which pleads for the golden mean in governmental organization and policy. But it is not couched

(Continued on page 472)

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street
Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President
F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
CHARLES E. HAYDOCK, Vice-President and Manager
MRS. KEY CAMMACK..........Assistant Secretary
RUSSELL V. WORSTELL.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

Oldest Banking House in the United States

The house of Alex. Brown & Sons was founded in the year 1800—120 years ago.

For more than a century the house has steadfastly maintained the highest standards of financial service for its customers.

Investments are offered only after the most careful and efficient investigation.

Large estates can best be protected and are frequently much benefited by a special study conducted by investment experts.

This is particularly true at the present time on account of changed values due to the war and subsequent conditions.

We make investment studies without charge, recommending such changes as conditions or new tax laws render advisable.

The strictest confidential relations are adhered to in our transactions with customers.

ALEX. BROWN & SONS
(Oldest Banking House in the United States)
Baltimore, Maryland

(Continued from page 471)
in the velvet whisperings which usually exude from the friends of compromise. The author is assertive and epigrammatic. He wastes no sentences. His aim is to indicate with a few trenchant strokes just what ideals and principles guided the American Republic to greatness in the nineteenth century. This done, he proceeds with his plan for eradicating some of our contemporary troubles. Most of his suggestions are good enough, but without any flavor of novelty.

Books and the News

Sport

A LIBRARIAN of my acquaintance says there are no books which he recommends with more diffidence than the ones which describe, or pretend to describe, outdoor games and athletic exercise.

There are, I agree, few topics on which one can recommend a book with less chance of success. But his talk set me hunting for books about outdoor sport—not so much for the manuals, the "How to" books, as for the books which tell something of the joy of the game. At the very outset, I found one. Since the time when "A Was an Archer," that sport has naturally led the list, and while I fancy that few readers of the Review are thinking of going in for archery ("taking it up seriously"), anybody who likes a charming book on an odd subject should enjoy Maurice Thompson's "The Witchery of Archery" (Scribner, 1879). For the author began, not as a member of a toxophile society, but as an Indian hunter in the romantic Floridian wilds.

Next in order is coaching, and for that read "Coaching Days and Coaching Ways" (Macmillan, 1914), by W. Outram Tristram; read it for pleasure, for its information, and for Hugh Thomson's pictures. "Cricket" (Newnes), edited by Horace G. Hutchinson, is a history of the game, not a manual of instruction. For the canoe, there are books upon its "selection, care and use," but its chief dwelling place in literature is Stevenson's "Inland Voyage."

Fishing occupies one of the big sections in the library of sport, and literary folk have done well by it. I will not do the obvious thing and name the book, which, as my librarian friend says, everyone recommends and nobody reads. Instead, there is a charming volume in Sir Edward Grey's "Fly Fishing" (Dent, 1899), while a book called "Angling" (Scribner, 1896) has some agreeable chapters on American fishing by Leroy M. Yale, Robert Grant, C. F. Holder, and others. "The Tent Dwellers" (Harper, 1908), by Albert Bigelow Paine, is of the right kind, and tells of fishing, camping, woods-life, and other matters with comments upon such interesting topics as the edibility of the brown owl.

For golf there is an amusing book, "The Mystery of Golf" (Macmillan, 1912), by Arnold Haultain, on what may be called the philosophy of golf. Horace G. Hutchinson's "The Golfing Pilgrim on Many Links" (Scribner, 1898) contains pleasant essays about the links of Scotland, England, and Europe, while "The Winning Shot" (Doubleday, 1915), by Jerome D. Travers and Grantland Rice, is full of informal paragraphs and verses about the game.

The school of fox-hunting novelists have celebrated the horse in dozens of volumes. T. F. Dale's "The Game of Polo" (Constable, 1897) is historical and general, and appeals to me as readable. So does Charles E. Trevathan's book on the turf in this country, called "The American Thoroughbred" (Macmillan, 1905). Swimming is scandalously neglected, except by the writers of the "How to" books. Mr. A. S. Pier, in the one adequate essay on the subject I know (you will find it in his "The Young in Heart"), says, "The poets have astonishingly neglected it—astonishingly, I say, for it supplies one of the most sensuous human experiences." Here is the prince of sports—but the books about it are so many texts, describing the difference between the trudgeon and the Australian crawl.

It is almost the same with tennis—only they who are already devotees will care to read such books as J. Parmley Paret's "Lawn Tennis; Its Past, Present and Future" (Macmillan, 1904), but it has historical chapters which redeem it. So it is with W. P. Stephens's "American Yachting" (Macmillan, 1904), and Herbert Stone's "The America's Cup Races" (Outing, 1914). They recall great days in the history of the sport, and leave you to supply its fascination from your imagination, or from your own love of it. Walking is the one outdoor sport which requires no skill, and a good constitution rather than necessarily great muscular strength. "Walking Essays" (Arnold, 1912), by A. H. Sidgwick, is one of the genuine discoveries I made during this search. It is in quite the right spirit, and you are recommended to the essay on "Walking in Literature," especially Note A, "On the Rates of Walking of Various Persons in 'The Egoist,'" chapters 25, sqq.

But the time is at hand when one need not read about one's favorite sport, but play at it, and who would care for books then? To read about a game is like singing songs about kissing—only those do it who can not practise the art itself.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Worldwide Banking, Shipping, Trade Promotion and Travel

Through its worldwide chain of offices, and its thousands of correspondents in practically every commercially important city of the world, the American Express Company affords its clients the following combination of services:

BANKING: Purchase and sale of bills of exchange; financing of imports and exports by commercial letters of credit and otherwise, foreign drafts and cable transfers; travelers cheques and travelers letters of credit. Time and current accounts accepted at our foreign offices, and interest allowed. Collection of open and documentary accounts, in this country and abroad. Telegraphic transfers made and money orders sold in the United States. Foreign government securities bought and sold and held in custody.

SHIPPING: Shipping and freight agents and custom house brokers; through Bills of Lading issued; marine and war risk insurance attended to.

TRADE PROMOTION: Market and credit information on any country; staple commodities purchased or sold on commission; catalogs and credit references of American firms filed at foreign offices.

TRAVEL: Tickets to and reservations in all parts of the world. Complete travel information. Frequent conducted tours in this country, abroad and around the world.

Head Office: 65 Broadway
NEW YORK

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 52 New York, Saturday, May 8, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 473
Editorial Articles:
One Year of "The Review" 476
A Cost-of-Living Exhibit 477
Poles and Bolsheviki 477
Squaring Grandfather 479
Aggressive Poland. By Leo Pasvolsky 480
Presidential Inability. By Lindsay Rogers 481
The Radical in Fiction. By Frederick Tupper 483
Correspondence 485
Book Reviews:
Like a Fine Old English Gentleman 487
Talk of the Best 487
The Man of Science in the Future 488
Cult and Comedy 489
The Run of the Shelves 490
The Trembling Year. By Robert Palfrey Utter 491
Books and the News: France. By Edmund Lester Pearson 492
Empire Building by Air—Cairo to the Cape. By Cuthbert Hicks 494
Drama:
Ibsen on Grand Street—Gilbert on Broadway. By O. W. Firkins 494
How Can America Help Europe? By Guy Emerson 498

WILL the Republican Convention be a real convention or merely a tug of war? That is at this moment the most interesting question for those who are trying to forecast the possibilities at Chicago. Not long ago it was almost universally assumed that the only thing which the delegates would have to decide was whom they would like to have for President; nomination was supposed to be equivalent to election. A great change has come over the situation in the last month or two. Whatever the primaries may not have settled, they have brought out very clearly the fact that the party will have to reckon with very serious elements of disaffection, not to speak of the possibility of an organized bolt. Accordingly, if there shall be at Chicago a group of sagacious politicians strong enough to determine the ultimate result, their primary task will be to decide upon a candidate who will command a sufficient following of Republicans and independents to assure victory in November. Is any such group in sight? If so, does it represent a sufficient amount of practical foresight and of political virtue—the combination is necessary at such a time as this—to give promise of a wise decision? Nobody knows. Mr. Penrose's little flyer, in the shape of a suggestion of Knox for President, is certainly not a cheerful indication of what may happen.

THE platform-makers will have as serious a problem as the ticket-makers. The Republican National Campaign Committee is making a stout effort to help construct a platform based upon real consideration of the problems of the day, and is utilizing to that end the services of an able staff. It has received a mass of answers to carefully prepared questionnaires addressed to persons who may be supposed to have something worth while to say on the various subjects in question, and will doubtless make an interesting report on them. The leading candidates for the nomination have thus far said little that is distinctive, nor does there seem to be much prospect of their doing so before the eighth of June. The one issue upon which something like a clear-cut division exists between the parties is that of the League of Nations; but on this issue the Republican party is divided within itself almost as sharply as it is divided from the opposite party. Looking at the situation as a whole, it is perhaps correct to say that there has seldom been a time when, on the threshold of a Presidential campaign, the actual alignment of the two parties was so ill-defined, and consequently so dependent upon what will be done at the conventions. In these circumstances, it is most earnestly to be hoped that the outcome at Chicago, as to both candidate and platform, will be the product of deliberate thought and not the chance outcome of convention turmoil.

MR. MUNSEY has done a public service in directing attention to the seriousness of the newsprint paper question, and its relation to the enormous size which American newspapers have attained in recent years. The colossal destruction of forests which has been caused by this measureless consumption of paper is a matter which touches national interests in a way that Congress should no longer ignore. Not only the Sunday newspapers, but the principal weekday papers throughout the country are swollen to a preposterous size, and Mr. Munsey makes the shocking, but not incredible, statement that "we are only started on this drunken orgy of paper use." Another witness before the Senate Committee informed it that consumption of newsprint paper has risen from three pounds per capita in 1880 to thirty-five pounds in 1919. It requires no prediction of a further development of this insatiable appetite to stamp it as one that has got to be restrained. That it can be restrained by a well-designed scheme of taxation, there can be no doubt. The question is whether Congress will have the courage to apply the remedy. It is to be hoped that the Senate committee will, at all events, point the way.

THE small householder who buys potatoes by the pound is now paying at the rate of more than twenty dollars a barrel. Two years ago, when the price of potatoes was less than half this dizzy height, every one in the country who could command a plot of ground was earnestly urged to raise them. Why has not the Government issued a similar slogan this year? Two years ago, it is true, potatoes were to win the war. But if an abundance of that staple would this year win a measure of contentment for a thoroughly disgruntled nation, some one in authority has blundered. No doubt we all, including the powers at Washington, have been too obsessed by the thought of profiteers and of ways to smash them to consider helping ourselves to potatoes by the only sort of direct action that really pays.

THERE is a faint echo of Euphues' voice in the speech which Sir Auckland Geddes addressed to the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at Atlantic City. It turned on the cardinal question how Germany—and all Europe with her—could "be weaned from war and won for work." The voice of Euphues not without his England. Nothing had surprised him more, Sir Auckland said, than the note of self-depreciation, almost of pessimism, which was struck in so many of our newspapers and in the speech of so many men whom he had met. The note struck by England, in the person of her official spokesman in this country, was one of hope and self-confidence. The war, he said, had worked profound changes deserving almost the title of a revolution: "Ultimate political power in England now rests in the hands of the working classes. They are determined to work out new relations between capital and labor. They seek to the limit of the nation's power to secure tranquility in Europe, in Asia Minor, in Asia, and Africa. They see clearly that to secure their purpose they have to end the rancors and animosities which have torn Europe and brought her to the brink of disaster." Here is outlined a worthier task for Labor than the fomenting of a world revolution for the proletariat's seizure of the dictatorship. The world will be safer under the guidance of free Labor whose power is the ripe fruit of political growth than under that of Russia's so-called self-ruling proletariat, whose dictators forced their power to precocious maturity in the hothouse heat of revolution.

A NEW organization has been formed in Dublin, under the chairmanship of Stephen Gwynn, called the Government of Ireland Bill Amendment Group. Only a few months ago, on January 5, Mr. Gwynn contributed an article to the Manchester Guardian which he entitled "A Personal View of the Irish Proposals," "because nobody that I know shares it except two other men, both journalists." It is an achievement for Mr. Gwynn to have gained, in so short a time, a sufficient number of supporters of his trio to form a group strong enough to conduct a political action. It may be taken as inaugurating, on the part of Irish intellectuals, a return from the advocacy of extreme demands to a moderate and conciliatory attitude. Mr. Gwynn is a nationalist, but he does not approve of Sir Horace Plunkett's sweeping condemnation of Lloyd George's Home Rule bill. He is more tolerant towards it than the English home-ruler Asquith, who assailed it in the bitterest terms. He recognizes that the distinctive character of Ulster makes some application of the cantonal system of government necessary for Ireland. "This, and not the immediate attainment of more or less complete powers, is the true end to which Nationalist Ireland should direct thought and desire." Lloyd George's plan of divided self-government applies that system to Ireland, and Stephen Gwynn admits that this is all that can be done for the present towards the unification of his country. The status and the freedom of a Dominion can not be attained at one jump.

BUT Gwynn's approval of Lloyd George's fundamental idea does not extend to the details of the bill. His Amendment Group is to start propaganda for the improvements which must make it a workable constitution. The six-county area for Ulster as fixed by the bill must be enlarged with Monaghan, Cavan, and Donegal, which are an intrinsic part of Ulster. Their exclusion is a device to please the Orangemen, who would restrict the Ulster area to those six counties where they possess predominance, rather than extend it so as to enclose those three preponderantly Catholic counties where a combination of Labor and Mr. Devlin's Ulster Nationalists might impair their political monopoly. But Ulster is a unit, and the Catholics of the three counties rejected by the Carsonites are genuine Ulstermen who can not be severed from their fellows in the six others without increased friction tending to retard the achievement of unity. To amend the measure in this sense so as to make the unit Ulster officially what it actually is, will be the chief effort of those members of Parliament who will be spokesmen of Mr. Gwynn's Amendment Group.

SOME are cocksure that the Mayday bomb plot was, as a Hibernian orator might put it, nothing but a mare's nest hatched in the Attorney General's brain. Others are equally certain that Mr. Palmer's vigilance was the only thing that saved us. All we know is that it didn't come off.

A FEW weeks ago we ventured the opinion that the solution of the Danish crisis, from the King's standpoint, was a compromise rather than a surrender. With the results of the recent elections for the Folketing before us we can now say that the King's action, far from having been so unpopular as to make a surrender imperative to save his crown, had the approval of at least 50 per cent. of the nation. The party of Minister Zahle, whose dismissal by the King brought on the crisis, saw the thirty-three seats which it held in the last Folketing reduced to seventeen whereas the Liberals and Conservatives gained three and six seats, respectively. It is true that the Slesvig question was not the only issue. It offered the opposition an opportunity to strike a decisive blow at a Government which had made itself unpopular among all except the Radical and Socialist parties by its continuation after the armistice of an economic policy necessitated by war conditions. As a protest against the perpetuation of state interference in the economic life of the nation the vote of the electorate is no less remarkable than for the sanction it gave to King Christian's alleged unconstitutional dismissal of the Zahle Cabinet.

BEHIND all the Italian labor turmoil lurks the menacing figure of Enrico Malatesta. The swing of the Socialist movement toward the revolutionary left has been pronounced in nearly all lands; but in no country has it been so extreme as in Italy. Italian Socialism had its origin in Anarchism, and not until the Genoa congress of 1892 was it able to divest itself of the traces. Its later troubles grew out of conflicts, not between Socialists and Anarchists, but between Marxians and reformers. Since the beginning of the war, however, it has rapidly swung back to the Bakuninism of its early days; and its unofficial dictator today is no other than Malatesta, who was once a lieutenant of Bakunin's and who later, at the London congress of the Internationale, 1896, was expelled for his Anarchism. From his London refuge, where he had lived since he was banished from Italy in 1913, he was called back by the insistent demands of the radicals, and Premier Nitti acquiesced in his return. Since then he has kept things in a ferment. His authority over the radical element of the working class appears to be greater than that of the Socialist party executives, and his friends boast that even the Government dare not touch him. He has now, as he has always had, but one creed, the violent overthrow of "capitalist" government and the substitution of communal organization of industry. To the party executives he is a septuagenarian enfant terrible; they, too, are for revolutionism, Bolshevism, or any other "ism" of violence and turmoil; but they want to be sure, and they fear that Malatesta will spoil the game.

"WHAT'S right for me is wrong for you," argues the child. Primitive man argued that way, and to the limit of his ability enforced his argument with a club. Fanatics of all stripes still continue the argument, and they translate it, if they gain power, into law. The absolute suppression of free speech, free press, and free assemblage in Russia is revolutionary virtue; the punishment of outright sedition in America is vicious reactionism. All the pro-Bolshevist writers and speakers are agreed; and though the more pretentiously virtuous exponents of uplift by usurpation cloak their meaning with euphemisms, the more straightforward advocates disdain the use of weasel words. On the front page of the Appeal to Reason for April 17 is an interview with Eugene V. Debs in which the argument is stated in plain terms. "If it was right," Debs was asked, "for Russia to suspend free speech and free press, was it not also right for the United States to suspend free speech in your case during the war?" "No," replied Debs. "The Russian revolution was a forward step. American participation in the war was a reactionary step. In suppressing me, because I was a revolutionist, a backward step was taken." Naïve, infantile, amusing, what you will; but how honorably this speech contrasts with the intellectual and ethical thimble-rigging of the pretentiously pious journals of uplift!

IT must be exasperating to the insurgent editorial fraternity to have Mr. Irwin Granich talk as he does through the columns of our Bolshevist contemporary, the Liberator. As all instructed liberals and radicals know, there is a powerful plot against Mexico, engineered by Wall Street. The plotters systematically poison the minds of Americans with false information, and they plan to overthrow the wonderful Constitution of Mexico and to reduce the Mexican people from their present free, comfortable, and happy state to the degraded condition of capitalistic slaves. But here comes Mr. Granich, a Communist-Socialist, or something of the sort, who knows Mexico, and who says that from the standpoint of the common man the Carranza régime is about the worst thing there is on the planet. There is widespread misery, strikes are suppressed, workmen are shot down, the franchise is a joke, banditry is common, official graft is rampant, and, to top it all, a fire-eating Communist journal is subsidized by the Government, presumably for its influence on the revolutionary gudgeons of the United States. The report accords with reliable testimony, such as that by George Agnew Chamberlain, which has recently come out of Mexico. But it is not the kind of information relished by insurgent editors, who prefer the testimony of observers who have been carefully wet-nursed on their travels by Carranza agents, or of others who, somewhere east of Tenth avenue, deduce their observations from the glorious Mexican Constitution. That the Liberator should publish such statements must be regarded as a sort of treason to "the cause." Not often does it so far forget itself. But occasionally, say once every six months or so, it does, from a habit of careless utterance, permit something to get past which brings upon it from the revolutionary brotherhood grave suspicions of "giving information to the enemy."

MULTIPLICITY of good causes that want much should not be allowed to obscure some of the equally deserving causes that are asking comparatively little. One of these that should by no mischance be forgotten is the American Academy at Rome, which is in immediate need of $1,000,000 for the work in which it has already achieved distinguished success, and for the development of new departments, for the training of especially promising students in Landscape Architecture and Musical Composition. Through the generosity of Mr. J. P. Morgan, the raising of this sum will automatically clear away the debt of the Academy ($375,000) to the Morgan estate, since one dollar of the debt will be cancelled for each dollar subscribed to the new fund. Mr. Edward P. Mellon, 52 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York City, is receiving contributions to this fund, and announces that Liberty bonds will be credited for this purpose at their face value.

One Year of "The Review"

In a card of invitation addressed to persons whose interest it was hoped to enlist in the proposed new weekly journal, the aim of the Review was briefly defined as that of helping to maintain "the established principles of American liberty." With the appearance of the present issue, which completes one year of its publication, it seems proper to consider its experience from that standpoint.

The particular form which events have taken in the course of this momentous twelvemonth is very different from what anyone could have forecast. But running through its developments, and projecting itself unmistakably into the future so far as one can see it, the central question remains what it was a year ago, and what, indeed, thinking people must have seen it to be long before that. Socialistic agitation, and even the threat of violent revolution, had been with us for many years; but what distinguished not only the war period, and the post-war period, but several years preceding the war, was the entrance of a factor which, up to a comparatively recent time, had played no considerable rôle. The particular danger to "the established principles of American liberty" which the projectors of this journal had in mind arose from the growth of an undefined, and largely sentimental, radicalism which, with no clear object in view, was giving cumulative aid to every form of revolutionary agitation. America was not, and is not, in danger of accepting a Socialist or Communist programme now or in the near future. Against the heavy artillery of outright Marxians or Leninites it is safe enough.. The inroads which, in the present stage of our history, we really have to fear are those of the light-armed cavalry. The dilettante radicals are not going to batter down the institutions of the country. Their work is not destruction, but demoralization. And in that work the absence of heavy artillery is not a drawback but a tremendous advantage. To gird at all established institutions, to point the finger at everything that is bad and say never a word about what is good —to do all this without burdening themselves with the responsibility of any avowed advocacy of revolutionary change—is an inviting task for minds inclined to it, and finds in thousands of still less disciplined minds an eager response.

If the essentials of American life and American liberty are in danger, it is from this quarter that the danger is most acute. It is true that the discontent and unrest which have come from the enormous advance of prices has reached dimensions which, like that advance itself, surpass all expectations. But this, after all, we have reason to believe is but a passing phase. What we shall continue to have with us is that speculative discontent, that vague longing for a new world, based not so much on any clear prospect that it holds out as on an easy-going forgetfulness of what the established institutions of civilization do for us, which the dilettante radicals are constantly promoting. The peril against which we have to guard is not so much the strength of the attack as the weakness of the defense. Socialism in this country has made its gains much less in the shape of outright converts than that of sympathizing half-thinkers. Its prospect of ultimate success depends, above all else, upon the extent to which this demoralization of thought and feeling may spread and the extent to which it will be checked by the growth of sober and responsible thinking.

Within the year during which the Review has been published, a correlative danger to "the established principles of American liberty" has manifested itself. The conventional thing to say about times like these is that revolutionary agitation breeds "reaction." In the broad sense in which this word is usually employed, we see no sign of such a menace to this country. In relation to the great questions of labor, for example, or of taxation, while we may not advance so rapidly as some desire, or perhaps so rapidly as we ought, yet we shall certainly not fall back into the attitude which ten or twenty years ago largely dominated our affairs; indeed, we shall not go backward at all. The one important development which can justly be stigmatized as "reactionary" is that which has taken place in the matter of freedom of speech and freedom of political effort. This, we confess, has in some quarters assumed a form more sinister than we had thought there was reason to fear. Such attempts to suppress opposition to our existing institutions as have been made in the sedition bills in Congress, and in the amazing proceedings at Albany, are just cause for serious apprehension. No clearer duty rests upon those who maintain the genuine tradition of liberalism than to oppose, with all the ability and earnestness at their command, every such departure from that tradition. The right of free speech is not absolute, and the Review has taken more than one occasion to define, to the best of its ability, the limitations to which it is justly subject. But the attempt to suppress opinions as such, and to preclude the representation of them in American legislative bodies by arbitrary proscription, is at once a violation of the spirit of our institutions and a confession of their failure. No truer service can be done to them than to protest against such violation; nor do we doubt that the protest which has come from so many of the best of our conservative leaders and organs of opinion will have the effect of effectually checking a tendency which must be ascribed rather to thoughtlessness and ignorance than to any deep and permanent purpose.

It is not the object of this brief retrospective article to review the work that this paper has attempted to do in relation to the various specific problems of the time. As regards that, we can not but feel sincere gratification in the acknowledgments which have come to us from competent critics, a few of which are reproduced on another page. That our endeavor to be fair in the discussion of every controversial topic is so generally recognized, is a source of peculiar satisfaction. But no other service that we may have been able to render could be accounted a justification for the founding of the Review if it had not succeeded in making a real contribution to the strengthening of thinking Americans in their allegiance to the fundamentals of American liberty and order, of American vitality and prosperity. That it has done this in a substantial and effective way it feels that there is now abundant evidence. The idea is expressed by one of our correspondents in a way upon which we could not improve:

> No doubt it is too late to expect any considerable number of conversions from the ranks of modern radicalism, but this is a matter of comparative unimportance. What is important is that Liberalism should know that it still has a respectable cause, and to demonstrate that fact is precisely the work of such publications as the Review—a work which it is performing with ever increasing success.

To continue in this work, and to deserve just such recognition of it, is an object which, at the end as at the beginning of our first year, is ample inspiration for every effort that we may be able to put forward.

A Cost-of-Living Exhibit

THE United States Bureau of Labor Statistics has just given out some figures relating to the increase of the cost of living in New York City which might well furnish occasion for interesting study. That the cost of living for families of moderate income has somewhat more than doubled since 1914 is no news, nor is there anything very novel in the figures showing the varying ratios in which the different elements that enter into a family's living have risen in price. But the little table which presents these facts in a compact form for each of the five years, 1915-19 inclusive, brings out the points more clearly than is usually the case.

The most striking feature of it is the contrast between the rise of prices for clothing and that for housing. Clothing went up steadily from the beginning of the world war, and reached an enormous height at the end of the fifth year; housing, on the other hand, actually cost less in 1915 and 1916 than in 1914, and even in 1919 was only 23 per cent. higher than in 1914. The actual percentages of increase in successive years—December of each year being compared with December, 1914—were, in the case of clothing, 4.82, 22.31, 54.21, 131.25, 219.66, a constant rise winding up with a price three and one-fifth times as high as the pre-war price of clothing. In the case of housing, on the other hand, there was a slight decline in 1915 and 1916, an advance of only 2.63 per cent. in 1917 and only 8.47 per cent. in 1918, while even in December, 1919, the advance was only 23.39 per cent.; so that while clothes cost nearly three and a quarter times as much as before, rents were not quite one and a quarter times what they had been. Some part of this enormous advance in clothing expenditure may, indeed, be due to a rise of standards in the population concerned; but after allowing for this the character of the contrast remains unaffected.

To arrive at a complete explanation of this phenomenon would require extensive and many-sided investigation; but there are some elements of that explanation which naturally suggest themselves, and which are interesting not only in their immediate bearing, but also as related to the general question of money and prices. In both instances, the supply side as well as the demand side of the equation is important; but perhaps the most interesting aspect of it is that which bears on the way in which an increasing volume of money operates to raise prices.

The thing is not automatic, like the rising of the mercury in a thermometer when the temperature increases. It comes about through the operation of human motives, which do not play equally upon all the possible objects to which purchase may be directed. When a great multitude of people—through a rise in wages, say—find themselves in possession of a great many more dollars than they had formerly at their command, they do not proceed to enlarge their expenditure in every direction, and certainly not equally in every direction. It will be a long time before a person whose income in dollars has been unexpectedly increased will think of living in a different kind of dwelling from what he has been accustomed to. He will be slow to make any important change as to his daily food. Of all the things which form an important part of his consumption and that of his family, the one which responds most rapidly to what looks like a bettered income will probably be clothing—including, of course, haberdashery and millinery. Throughout the five years of the inflation period, there was undoubtedly a strongly stimulated demand for clothes, while at the same time supply was increasingly difficult to obtain; on the other hand, there was for housing only a slightly augmented demand, which, moreover, from the time of our country's entry into the war, was offset by the great exodus into the army. These circumstances seem sufficiently to account, in the large, for the figures that the table presents. The rise in rents which has taken place since the armistice is also quite in keeping with these considerations; the cessation of building during the war, the hindrance to its resumption after the war caused by the risks of a permanent investment in what seemed like abnormally high-cost building, and the return of the soldier population, combining to produce an acute shortage without the aid of any special demand for better or more expensive housing on the part of the masses. The whole subject, however, would well repay close and thoroughgoing examination.

Poles and Bolsheviki

ONE day, according to a popular anecdote, the Supreme Council, being tired of examining the claims brought forward by exacting nationalities, arranged an amusing intermezzo by inviting international scholarship to competition in a prize essay on the elephant. Among the competitors, who were given a year for the work, was a Polish zoölogist, who introduced his subject with these words: "l'Eléphant, c'est une question polonaise." The inventor of the story caricatured not unjustly the centripetal tendencies of the Polish spirit as it manifests itself to the outsider in the policy the country has adopted since its revival. The aggrandizement of Poland, regardless of considerations of justice due to other nationalities and of the dangers resulting to Europe from such disregard, seems to be the sole object of the men now in power at Warsaw. They demand no less than the entire area covered by Poland before the first partition of 1772, which would make them rulers over a territory twice as large as France, and over a population the majority of which is of non-Polish nationality. If the right of self-determination can not serve their purpose, they base their claim on historical rights, or on the economic homogeneity of Poland and her neighbors, or on strategic necessity, or on the plea that Europe can be protected against the Bolshevist dangers by no better means than a strong Poland.

Apart from the question whether the inclusion within Polish territory of non-Polish races would not prove a diminution of strength instead of a reinforcement, there is good reason to doubt the wisdom of an annexationist policy which uses the Russian menace as an excuse. Of the inefficiency of the Soviet forces we now possess sufficient evidence to consider it an established fact. But there is much ground for the fear that the Polish offensive which that inefficiency invited may tend, in spite of the successes which the Poles claim to have won, to restore to Trotsky's army some of its lost backbone. One of the causes which made for its untrustworthiness and rendered it a dangerous weapon for the Soviet rulers to wield was the growing influence of the cadre over the soldiery. That cadre consists mainly of Tsarist officers who were not wholly averse to serving in the Red army because the expansionist aims of Bolshevism coincided with their dreams of a reintegrated Russia. Without them the Soviet would have had, for an army, an undisciplined mob; without the army the officers could not hope to realize their dream. The reliability of the army, therefore, depended mainly on the loyalty of the cadre, which, in its turn, depended on the Soviet's perseverance in its aggressive policy against the apostate border republics. Since the imminent economic collapse of Soviet Russia, however, made peace with the non-Russian world imperative, the Tsarist officers had little reason to persist in their fidelity to the Commissaries of Moscow. The latter saw their own safety from attempts at revolution by officers popular among their troops in a speedy demobilization and enlistment of the discharged soldiery in the labor armies organized by Trotsky, where they will be placed under the control of reliable comrades acting as economic instructors.

And at this very moment, when Red Russia is making herself defenseless lest she should wound herself with her own weapons, steps in General Pilsudsky as the protector of Europe against Bolshevism, and scores an easy victory at the risk of uniting again the Tsarist officers and the Soviet Commissaries—from different motives, to be sure—in a common cause. The seventh army, which Trotsky had begun to convert into a labor force, was summoned back to arms and mobilized anew after the Polish Government, by its exorbitant conditions, had made peace with Soviet Russia impossible. The ultimate failure, after repeated successes, of the three Russian generals who tried to oust the Bolsheviki with the help of the Entente has taught us that foreign intervention, with the inadequate means the Allies have been willing or able to spare, has tended to seat the Moscow Commissaries more firmly in the saddle. A reversal in Russia must come from within, and the forces which are able to bring it about must be free from any suspicion of being agents of a Western Power.

Poland is, for those two reasons, disqualified as a liberator of suffering Russia. She is only a pawn of France on the European chess-board, although she is now acting as if she were the queen in the game. Apart from the reaction this move will have on the internal situation in Russia, it will widen the breach in the barrier of border states which French Generals and diplomats had conceived as a rampart against Bolshevism, and a wall against German penetration of Russia. The relations between Poland and Lithuania are tense to the breaking point on account of the Polish claim of Lithuanian territory. That is why Lithuania, after the conference of border states held at Warsaw in March of this year, refused to negotiate peace with Soviet Russia in conjunction with Poland, Finland, and Latvia. These two other states, not being neighbors of Poland, have no feelings of hostility towards her, but those with whom she lives in close contact have more reason to throw up barriers against her aggression than to form, together with her, a barrier against Bolshevism. The Ukrainians under Petlura are, indeed, reported to have joined the Poles in their recent offensive, in the hope of clearing, with Polish help, the Ukraine of Bolshevist rule. But the price to be paid for their rescue is said to be the renunciation, in favor of Poland, of all Ukrainian claims on the rich oil district of Eastern Galicia. The deal can not possibly have the approval of the people as whose representative Petlura attended the conference of border states at Warsaw. The Ukrainians are no less inimical to Polish aggression than they are to Bolshevist rule. The greater Poland restored in its pre-partition extent would comprise thirteen million Ukrainians and advance the Polish frontier to within a short distance from the Ukrainian capital Kiev. Whatever undertakings Petlura, from personal motives perhaps, may have given to Pilsudsky at Warsaw, his own people will make it difficult for him to abide by his word. A Polish victory will clear the Ukrainian house of one intruder but bring another to the gate. Petlura, therefore, can never be a reliable ally to Poland. The force of circumstances will compel him, sooner or later, to turn against her, as he turned, unwillingly perhaps, against Denikin. And thus Bolshevism bids fair again, as after the betrayal of Denikin, to reap the fruits of the mistakes and dissension of its enemies.

Squaring Grandfather

CONSTANTIA, we heard by accident the other day, has "accepted a comrade." True, in response to the scandalized protests of elderly relatives, some sort of ceremony was hastily improvised, but the young people made it quite plain that such mummery meant nothing to them. They did not say "it meant nothing in their young lives." In neither Constantia nor Dorastus was there the slightest trace of frivolity or vulgarity. Both were in deadly earnest and quite sure of their ground. They had talked it all out, analyzed themselves and each other with laboratory thoroughness, scrutinized their world with the eye of a general for the enemy's weaknesses, and with a Napoleonic confidence in their ability to marshal their own facts precisely at those points where they would prove overwhelmingly effective.

Of course, there was no reason why Constantia and Dorastus should not marry. Dorastus, if his antecedents are somewhat vaguely "European," is a young man of refinement and undeniably clever. Even to one who did not quite like him it would not occur that he had chosen, if indeed he could be said to have chosen, Constantia for the sake of her money. Of this Constantia possesses abundance, inherited from her dead mother's father, a millionaire whose honest right to his millions it occurred to no one in those days to question. The country, indeed, had been rather proud of him, regarded him as a sort of symbol of what the American boy can make of himself. But to Constantia he and his money—a good part of it hers now—have come to symbolize something quite different. She would not deny his ability nor his good nature—he was rather a genial old cock—but she is quite sure that for whatever he did in the world he was enormously overpaid. It is a little difficult to get Constantia to make herself perfectly plain on this point, but her idea seems to be that she will use grandfather's millions somehow to square grandfather with a world which he, poor man, was unaware of having offended.

Just how this is to be accomplished will no doubt develop more clearly as she goes on. Any such mediæval notion as that of charity is of course not in her thoughts. To play the pious founder or the lady bountiful she no more intends than she intends discarding her cigarette for smelling salts. Possibly Dorastus will have further suggestions, and the friends they have in common still more.

He could not, of course, tell Constantia that what she is in search of in "accepting her comrade" is romance, that what she is really trying to do with grandfather's money is to find some fresh and thrilling way of exercising power. One can not, indeed, tell Constantia anything, except such things as she wishes to hear. Tell her more concerning the social perfection of far-away Russia, and her face will light. Apologize for anything as it exists in nearby America, and note the scorn that sits on a pretty lip which seems of late, so they say, to have grown a trifle hard. There is, therefore, no manner of use in trying to point out to Constantia that since she has done, or might have done, everything that a whole regiment of fairy godmothers, be their wands tipped ever so brightly, could possibly do for her (since, indeed, ever so many people who are nobody in particular can do quite as much in this line as she) for life in its full, fresh savor she must look elsewhere.

To play Virginia to Dorastus's Paul would, however, extinguish them both in a week; the tropical island would afford no sort of field for their talents. To sit at home, either in her father's house or in her own and Dorastus's—the softer the cushion, the finer the seam, the more luscious the hothouse strawberries and Jersey cream, the more intolerable to one in her temper would the whole business become. Her grandmother distributed soup and flannels and good advice; her mother, in a later day, went "slumming." Constantia will naturally have none of this make-believe for herself; she must go a-gipsying. Hardship—she craves it; the raw contacts of life, hand struck in hard hand—to be looked up to amid such circumstances is to feel the full joy of the fight; if she went to jail for it, it would but add to the zest. Unable to conquer the world into which she was born, for the simple reason that she found the world already delivered captive at her feet as soon as she could be aware of it, she scorns to sigh for more worlds; she will invent one, since it is necessary.

Presumably this mood of Constantia's will not last forever. But time is a concept in which she takes very little interest; things happen for her in that moment just ahead which we hasten to call "now" before it is too late. No doubt she will come to some sort of compromise between the power which her money plus her brains will buy her in the new world that she has chosen to build up and the comforts of the old world, which she will discover it is not necessary wholly to abandon. Possibly Dorastus will assist her to the discovery. But in that hour, we fear, she will make a less insistent claim upon our sympathy than she does to-day, so young and so clever, quaint compound of hope and disillusion, part martyr and part tyrant, so eager for life and so determined to refuse life until it is made perfect under her hand. Many of the things that Constantia wants she will doubtless get; at what expense to a world which, in certain of the aspects she herself rather prettily symbolizes, she does not reckon; in her view, things could not possibly be worse in any case. Getting much of what she wants, whether she will find herself satisfied is another matter. It is by no means certain that she wishes to be satisfied; she wishes to want.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

centripetal tendencies of the Polish spirit as it manifests itself to the outsider in the policy the country has adopted since its revival. The aggrandizement of Poland, regardless of considerations of justice due to other nationalities and of the dangers resulting to Europe from such disregard, seems to be the sole object of the men now in power at Warsaw. They demand no less than the entire area covered by Poland before the first partition of 1772, which would make them rulers over a territory twice as large as France, and over a population the majority of which is of non-Polish nationality. If the right of self-determination can not serve their purpose, they base their claim on historical rights, or on the economic homogeneity of Poland and her neighbors, or on strategic necessity, or on the plea that Europe can be protected against the Bolshevist dangers by no better means than a strong Poland.

Apart from the question whether the inclusion within Polish territory of non-Polish races would not prove a diminution of strength instead of a reinforcement, there is good reason to doubt the wisdom of an annexationist policy which uses the Russian menace as an excuse. Of the inefficiency of the Soviet forces we now possess sufficient evidence to consider it an established fact. But there is much ground for the fear that the Polish offensive which that inefficiency invited may tend, in spite of the successes which the Poles claim to have won, to restore to Trotsky's army some of its lost backbone. One of the causes which made for its untrustworthiness and rendered it a dangerous weapon for the Soviet rulers to wield was the growing influence of the cadre over the soldiery. That cadre consists mainly of Tsarist officers who were not wholly averse to serving in the Red army because the expansionist aims of Bolshevism coincided with their dreams of a reintegrated Russia. Without them the Soviet would have had, for an army, an undisciplined mob; without the army the officers could not hope to realize their dream. The reliability of the army, therefore, depended mainly on the loyalty of the cadre, which, in its turn, depended on the Soviet's perseverance in its aggressive policy against the apostate border republics. Since the imminent economic collapse of Soviet Russia, however, made peace with the non-Russian world imperative, the Tsarist officers had little reason to persist in their fidelity to the Commissaries of Moscow. The latter saw their own safety from attempts at revolution by officers popular among their troops in a speedy demobilization and enlistment of the discharged soldiery in the labor armies organized by Trotsky, where they will be placed under the control of reliable comrades acting as economic instructors.

And at this very moment, when Red Russia is making herself defenseless lest she should wound herself with her own weapons, steps in General Pilsudsky as the protector of Europe against Bolshevism, and scores an easy victory at the risk of uniting again the Tsarist officers and the Soviet Commissaries—from different motives, to be sure—in a common cause. The seventh army, which Trotsky had begun to convert into a labor force, was summoned back to arms and mobilized anew after the Polish Government, by its exorbitant conditions, had made peace with Soviet Russia impossible. The ultimate failure, after repeated successes, of the three Russian generals who tried to oust the Bolsheviki with the help of the Entente has taught us that foreign intervention, with the inadequate means the Allies have been willing or able to spare, has tended to seat the Moscow Commissaries more firmly in the saddle. A reversal in Russia must come from within, and the forces which are able to bring it about must be free from any suspicion of being agents of a Western Power.

Poland is, for those two reasons, disqualified as a liberator of suffering Russia. She is only a pawn of France on the European chess-board, although she is now acting as if she were the queen in the game. Apart from the reaction this move will have on the internal situation in Russia, it will widen the breach in the barrier of border states which French Generals and diplomats had conceived as a rampart against Bolshevism, and a wall against German penetration of Russia. The relations between Poland and Lithuania are tense to the breaking point on account of the Polish claim of Lithuanian territory. That is why Lithuania, after the conference of border states held at Warsaw in March of this year, refused to negotiate peace with Soviet Russia in conjunction with Poland, Finland, and Latvia. These two other states, not being neighbors of Poland, have no feelings of hostility towards her, but those with whom she lives in close contact have more reason to throw up barriers against her aggression than to form, together with her, a barrier against Bolshevism. The Ukrainians under Petlura are, indeed, reported to have joined the Poles in their recent offensive, in the hope of clearing, with Polish help, the Ukraine of Bolshevist rule. But the price to be paid for their rescue is said to be the renunciation, in favor of Poland, of all Ukrainian claims on the rich oil district of Eastern Galicia. The deal can not possibly have the approval of the people as whose representative Petlura attended the conference of border states at Warsaw. The Ukrainians are no less inimical to Polish aggression than they are to Bolshevist rule. The greater Poland restored in its pre-partition extent would comprise thirteen million Ukrainians and advance the Polish frontier to within a short distance from the Ukrainian capital Kiev. Whatever undertakings Petlura, from personal motives perhaps, may have given to Pilsudsky at Warsaw, his own people will make it difficult for him to abide by his word. A Polish victory will clear the Ukrainian house of one intruder but bring another to the gate. Petlura, therefore, can never be a reliable ally to Poland. The force of circumstances will compel him, sooner or later, to turn against her, as he turned, unwillingly perhaps, against Denikin. And thus Bolshevism bids fair again, as after the betrayal of Denikin, to reap the fruits of the mistakes and dissension of its enemies.

Squaring Grandfather

CONSTANTIA, we heard by accident the other day, has "accepted a comrade." True, in response to the scandalized protests of elderly relatives, some sort of ceremony was hastily improvised, but the young people made it quite plain that such mummery meant nothing to them. They did not say "it meant nothing in their young lives." In neither Constantia nor Dorastus was there the slightest trace of frivolity or vulgarity. Both were in deadly earnest and quite sure of their ground. They had talked it all out, analyzed themselves and each other with laboratory thoroughness, scrutinized their world with the eye of a general for the enemy's weaknesses, and with a Napoleonic confidence in their ability to marshal their own facts precisely at those points where they would prove overwhelmingly effective.

Of course, there was no reason why Constantia and Dorastus should not marry. Dorastus, if his antecedents are somewhat vaguely "European," is a young man of refinement and undeniably clever. Even to one who did not quite like him it would not occur that he had chosen, if indeed he could be said to have chosen, Constantia for the sake of her money. Of this Constantia possesses abundance, inherited from her dead mother's father, a millionaire whose honest right to his millions it occurred to no one in those days to question. The country, indeed, had been rather proud of him, regarded him as a sort of symbol of what the American boy can make of himself. But to Constantia he and his money—a good part of it hers now—have come to symbolize something quite different. She would not deny his ability nor his good nature—he was rather a genial old cock—but she is quite sure that for whatever he did in the world he was enormously overpaid. It is a little difficult to get Constantia to make herself perfectly plain on this point, but her idea seems to be that she will use grandfather's millions somehow to square grandfather with a world which he, poor man, was unaware of having offended.

Just how this is to be accomplished will no doubt develop more clearly as she goes on. Any such mediæval notion as that of charity is of course not in her thoughts. To play the pious founder or the lady bountiful she no more intends than she intends discarding her cigarette for smelling salts. Possibly Dorastus will have further suggestions, and the friends they have in common still more.

He could not, of course, tell Constantia that what she is in search of in "accepting her comrade" is romance, that what she is really trying to do with grandfather's money is to find some fresh and thrilling way of exercising power. One can not, indeed, tell Constantia anything, except such things as she wishes to hear. Tell her more concerning the social perfection of far-away Russia, and her face will light. Apologize for anything as it exists in nearby America, and note the scorn that sits on a pretty lip which seems of late, so they say, to have grown a trifle hard. There is, therefore, no manner of use in trying to point out to Constantia that since she has done, or might have done, everything that a whole regiment of fairy godmothers, be their wands tipped ever so brightly, could possibly do for her (since, indeed, ever so many people who are nobody in particular can do quite as much in this line as she) for life in its full, fresh savor she must look elsewhere.

To play Virginia to Dorastus's Paul would, however, extinguish them both in a week; the tropical island would afford no sort of field for their talents. To sit at home, either in her father's house or in her own and Dorastus's—the softer the cushion, the finer the seam, the more luscious the hothouse strawberries and Jersey cream, the more intolerable to one in her temper would the whole business become. Her grandmother distributed soup and flannels and good advice; her mother, in a later day, went "slumming." Constantia will naturally have none of this make-believe for herself; she must go a-gipsying. Hardship—she craves it; the raw contacts of life, hand struck in hard hand—to be looked up to amid such circumstances is to feel the full joy of the fight; if she went to jail for it, it would but add to the zest. Unable to conquer the world into which she was born, for the simple reason that she found the world already delivered captive at her feet as soon as she could be aware of it, she scorns to sigh for more worlds; she will invent one, since it is necessary.

Presumably this mood of Constantia's will not last forever. But time is a concept in which she takes very little interest; things happen for her in that moment just ahead which we hasten to call "now" before it is too late. No doubt she will come to some sort of compromise between the power which her money plus her brains will buy her in the new world that she has chosen to build up and the comforts of the old world, which she will discover it is not necessary wholly to abandon. Possibly Dorastus will assist her to the discovery. But in that hour, we fear, she will make a less insistent claim upon our sympathy than she does to-day, so young and so clever, quaint compound of hope and disillusion, part martyr and part tyrant, so eager for life and so determined to refuse life until it is made perfect under her hand. Many of the things that Constantia wants she will doubtless get; at what expense to a world which, in certain of the aspects she herself rather prettily symbolizes, she does not reckon; in her view, things could not possibly be worse in any case. Getting much of what she wants, whether she will find herself satisfied is another matter. It is by no means certain that she wishes to be satisfied; she wishes to want.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920. in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Aggressive Poland

THE Polish military operations in Ukraina, which began last week so unexpectedly and developed so swiftly, represent a political movement of tremendous importance. Following so closely upon the peace parleys between Warsaw and Moscow, they are much more than the mere resumption of hostilities over boundaries. The proclamation issued by the Pilsudsky Government, stating the objects sought, makes that quite clear.

A new element has entered into the situation. The Polish troops have set out with the avowed purpose of expelling the Soviet troops and of reëstablishing the Petlura Government as the Government of an independent Ukraina. What Poland's purpose is in engaging upon so huge an enterprise may be inferred by considering her aspirations, and the rôle assigned to her by the great Powers.

The reëstablishment of Poland as an independent state has always been connected with the idea of the necessity of a buffer state between Russia and Germany. Now, a buffer state, in order to be secure, either must be strong enough (on its own account or through outside backing) to withstand possible attacks, or must make friends with one of its neighbors. Neither of these obvious conditions was arranged for in the creation of Poland. Numerically small and strategically weak, Poland can scarcely be considered as a powerful military barrier between much larger and stronger Germany and Russia. The great Powers backing her are far away and cut off from her. As for her great neighbors, Poland hates both of them too much to make friends with either.

Finding herself in such a position, Poland has begun the policy of gathering new small states of Eastern Europe into a political alliance; and, as any new states in the East could only be carved out of Russia, it was to Poland's advantage to work for Russia's dismemberment.

The course of Russian history during the past months has been of great assistance to Poland in the furtherance of her plans. It was particularly so in the northwestern corner of the former Russian Empire, in the so-called Baltic Provinces, where four definite groups aspire to the dignity of independent statehood. The persistence of the Soviet régime in Central Russia and the policy of the great Powers have given them, at least temporarily, the dignity that they sought. Three of these new states, Finland, Esthonia, and Latvia, Poland has hastened to recognize. She has gone farther: she has made treaties with them of such a nature as to make herself more or less dominant on the Eastern Baltic. Lithuania is apparently out of this alliance, because, no doubt, of the territorial disputes which Poland and she have carried on.

Such an arrangement in the northwest is ideal for Poland. In the first place, Great Russia is thus cut off from the ports of the Baltic and is permanently crippled. And in the second place, Poland has under her potential control very important new states.

Having thus completed her arrangements in the north with a fair degree of success, Poland now finds it possible to turn her attention to the south. Here the decisive factor is Ukraina. United with Great Russia, Ukraina would add greatly to the latter's strength. With Ukraina separated, Great Russia would be really weakened, reduced temporarily to the status of a comparatively small, landlocked state. To this extent, surely, Poland is interested in the independence of Ukraina.

But there is another and a larger advantage that attaches itself to Poland's interest in the Ukrainian independence. Poland's ambitious leaders conceive the possibility of drawing Ukraina, once independent, into the Polish sphere of influence. With the Baltic under Poland's virtual domination, and with the Ukrainian resources under her control, what possibilities are not open to her?

And why not? The palm of Slavic supremacy is now hanging in the balance. Russia has held it tightly for centuries. Now Russia is prostrate and broken. There is no doubt that eventually she will regain her strength. But now is the time to make Russia's full reconstruction impossible for a long time to come. If Poland can do it, then Poland will be the leader of the Slavs, that huge fourth element of Europe.

There is no doubt, however, that the possibility of the realization of such a plan is a mere gambler's chance. The important element of weakness in it is the character of the Ukrainian movement which the Poles are now supporting with the strength of their arms. There is no indication that the Petlura movement ever had any real popular support. Simon Petlura and his Government came into power soon after the armistice. It was at the time when the Germans were compelled to withdraw their assistance from the Government of Hetman Skoropadsky, which had been set up by them. No longer supported by the German troops, the Skoropadsky Government was swiftly enough turned out by the rising tide of dissatisfied peasants, who endured the Hetman's régime only as long as it was forced upon the country by the German bayonets. Petlura and several of his associates made use of the peasants' protest to establish a short-lived rule in Kiev. But the masses of the people never rallied to their support, and it did not take much effort on the part of the Bolsheviki to dislodge them.

Forced to flee from the capital, Petlura made numerous efforts to gather forces about him. For a time his chief occupation was the struggle against the Poles for the fate of Eastern Galicia, which was finally awarded to Poland by the Supreme Council. Petlura's relations with Denikin were also unfriendly, for his stock in trade was Ukrainian separatism, while Denikin fought for the reunification of Russia. How Petlura finally made friends with the Poles, against whom he had fought so long and so bitterly, is not known as yet. Nor is it really very important, except on one point: what price did he have to pay for the Polish assistance?

It is obvious that Petlura has little to give, except very sweeping promises for the future. Eastern Galicia is already Poland's. It is scarcely conceivable that the Poles would ask for, and that Petlura would make, territorial concessions. Obviously Petlura has given the one promise that the Poles need for the completion of their ambitious plans: he must have promised to place Ukraina under Poland's influence.

But there is no reason to expect that the Petlura movement will have a larger support in Ukraina now than it had previously. The period of the occupation of Ukraina by the Volunteer Army has furnished enough evidence of the fact that the masses of the people in Ukraina do not desire separation from Russia. To force separation upon them through the instrumentality of Petlura's Government, upheld by Polish troops, is an action that is fraught with danger.

Yet it is conceivable that the Polish operations in Ukraina, if successful in a military way, may hasten the downfall of the Soviet régime in Russia. To this extent, much good may come out of the affair. For the rest, it can only lead to the accumulation of resentments and enmities, which must seek to discharge themselves in future wars. And it will have bad results for Poland herself. For after the overthrow of the Soviet Government, through the mounting spirit of nationalism, Russia's existence as a great nation will depend upon a reunification of almost all of her former territory. She is not prepared to give up her supremacy in the Slavic world. Though temporarily shorn of some of her territories, Russia will still remain overwhelmingly larger than Poland, whose huge dream of leadership and power is built on the sands of Russia's temporary weakness.

In a few more years Poland may find herself clamped in an iron vise, formed by hostile Germany and furiously resentful Russia. Such a situation must result in violent bloodshed.

Leo Pasvolsky

Presidential Inability

[Mr. Wilson's improved health has removed from the problem of the disability of a President to perform the duties of his office any pressure of present urgency. But the experience of the half-year during which his illness was serious serves as ample reason for discussing this important and delicate question on its merits.]

SEVERAL proposals have been made in Congress to decide how the fact of Presidential inability to act may be determined, and if the House Judiciary Committee can agree, it will doubtless make some recommendation. But the chances of early action are not great, since the questions of constitutional law and political policy are difficult and important and, judging from the attitude of Congress hitherto, a decision will be long delayed. Not until 1886 did Congress amend the Presidential Succession Law of 1792, which was admittedly inadequate and perhaps unconstitutional. But the question should be answered: if the President is unable to act, who is to determine how administrative decisions are to be made and other public business proceeded with, in order that the Government may not suffer a collapse similar to that of recent months which culminated in Secretary Lansing's resignation?

The framers of the Constitution attempted to guard against an interregnum by providing that

> In the case of the removal of the President from office, or his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

This provision, although in ambiguous terms, at least considers every possibility except the death of the President or Vice-President subsequent to election but prior to inauguration. That contingency, fortunately, has never confronted the country, but Congress has not attempted to take measures to deal with it. In five cases, owing to death, the Vice-President has become Chief Magistrate: Tyler, Fillmore, Johnson, Arthur, and Roosevelt. Johnson was threatened with removal, but no President has ever suggested resignation, and the mention of this method of vacating the office is the only joke in the Federal Constitution.

The Act of March 1, 1792, provided that the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives should follow the Vice-President in succession to the Presidency. There were, however, a number of objections to this arrangement. Its constitutionality was open to question, since it was not certain that the Speaker and President pro tempore were officers of the United States within the meaning of the term as used in the Constitution. In the second place—and Madison was among those who pointed this out—if one of these Congressional officials went to the White House there was no requirement that he give up his original duties and his executive and legislative functions might conflict. Thirdly, between Congresses there is no Speaker of the House, and until 1890 the President of the Senate pro tempore did not hold over; consequently, if the President and Vice-President should die during this interim difficulties would ensue.

There were a number of attempts to change the law. In 1820 the Senate Judiciary Committee was ordered to report whether any changes were necessary. It replied unanimously that at that time it was inexpedient to legislate. In 1856 the Committee on the Judiciary reported that the act was constitutional, but suggested that if there should be a vacancy in the offices of Speaker and President of the Senate pro tempore, the Chief Justice of the United States (provided he had not presided at an impeachment) and then the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States should succeed according to seniority. No action was taken by the Senate on this report and the matter was not pressed until 1881.

Before Congress met in December of that year and before either the Speaker of the House or the President pro tempore of the Senate had been chosen, Garfield died. The fact that for some time he was unable to perform the duties of his office, caused the question of inability to be discussed; and when, in 1885, during Cleveland's administration, Vice-President Hendricks died, some legislative action was felt to be necessary. In both cases, if the incumbents of the Presidential office—Presidents Arthur and Cleveland—had died during the Congressional recesses there would have been no one to take their places. More than that, it was possible for the office to go to a member of the political party which had been defeated in the election, for, during Cleveland's term, Senators Sherman and Ingalls were Presidents pro tempore of the Senate and were Republicans.

On January 19, 1886, therefore, Congress passed a law providing that, if the constitutional provision were invoked, succession to the Presidency should vest in the Vice-President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior in the order named. The act also declared

> That whenever the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States shall devolve upon any of the persons named herein, if Congress be not then in session, or if it would not meet in accordance with the law within twenty days thereafter, it shall be the duty of the person upon whom such powers and duties shall devolve to issue a proclamation convening Congress in extraordinary session, giving twenty days notice of the time of meeting.

This statute, however, does not attempt to settle two important points. In the first place, it seems to be agreed that Congress has the power to order a special election to fill a vacancy. The Act of 1792 provided that an election should be held, but the question was left open in the act of 1886. Senator Hoar offered an amendment giving the person who succeeded to the Presidency the right to serve until the expiration of the regular term, but this was defeated and Congress apparently reserves the right to order an election if it deems wise. If a President were chosen under an intermediate election his term would be four years and that would destroy the present synchrony between the executive and legislative branches. It is possible, moreover, to imagine cases of conflict between the executive and legislature when Congress would use this method for getting rid of a President to whom it objected, and an acting President could veto a measure providing for a special election. On the other hand, the Constitution unquestionably contemplated that only persons chosen by the Electoral College should serve as Presidents. Fortunately, however, the succession has never gone further than the Vice-President and the difficulties which undeniably exist need not be solved until they confront us.

The second and more serious question is the meaning of "inability," and here the writers are in almost complete disagreement. Professor W. W. Willoughby, the leading authority on American constitutional law, simply states the problem and does not attempt to answer it:

> In the absence of a definition who is to determine, and what conditions are to be held to create, an inability on the part of the President to perform his official duties? What is to be done in case the President is temporarily disabled by sickness or accident, or insanity? Who is to decide and by what criteria, when this disablement is so serious and so prolonged as to require the appointment of an acting President?

The most elaborate discussion of these questions is to be found in the North American Review for November, 1881. Four distinguished constitutional authorities contributed to an interesting symposium on "Presidential Inability," apropos of the illness of President Garfield. The President's death rendered unnecessary any decision in his case, but the various possibilities were fully considered and widely differing opinions were expressed.

Senator Trumbull took the position that as no proof was required when the president died, "so in the case of inability the fact must be so notorious that there can be no reasonable doubt about it, nor that an urgency exists requiring immediate action on important matters, before the Vice-President would be warranted in assuming the duties of the President. When such a case arises, the people will not only acquiesce in the discharge of the Presidential duties by the Vice-President, but will demand that he exercise them."

Senator Trumbull questioned whether any law could be passed improving this situation. Ours is a people's government, he argued, and peaceful succession to the highest office must depend upon the support of public opinion. This support is both necessary and sufficient in cases of inability as well as in cases of election.

Judge Cooley, the eminent writer on constitutional law, urged that the question of inability was one for Congress to determine. "It is possible," he said, "for a case to arise so plain, so unmistakably determined in the public judgment, that public opinion, with unanimous concurrence, would summon the Vice-President to act. But though this would make him acting President de facto, he would become acting President de jure only after solemn recognition in some form by Congress." Such recognition, it may be said, has always been given, even if only in the form of a communication telling the new incumbent of the Presidency that Congress has organized and is waiting for his message. And Judge Cooley argued that since Congress has the power to embarrass and to tie the hands of the Vice-President, Congress is competent to declare when the inability exists.

The third contributor to this symposium was Benjamin F. Butler, who thought that the question of inability was a judicial one on which Congress could not pass. He took it to be "axiomatic that when the Constitution imposes a duty on any officer, to be done by him, he must be the sole judge when and how to do that duty, subject only to his responsibility to the people and to the risk of impeachment if he act improperly or corruptly," and if in certain cases the discharge of the duties of the President devolves upon the Vice-President, "he alone must judge, under the grave responsibility of his position, when his duties begin, as he must determine how and in what manner he will exercise them."

Professor Dwight, on the other hand, took the view that public opinion would not be able to restrain an ambitious man eager to occupy the Presidential seat. He suggested that "some proper legal proceeding might be instituted by Congress, in which the evidence required by law might be presented under the general power to carry into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in any department or officer of the Government."

It is evident that these views do not disclose any agreement as to what constitutes and who determines Presidential inability. Certain opinions expressed by these writers, however, may be accepted. The support of public opinion is necessary if any one is to succeed to the Presidential office; the responsibility of the Vice-President is heavy; Congress must approve, or a dangerous instance of disunion between the executive and legislative branches might occur. The Constitution unquestionably contemplated temporary inability, and it can be provided for without submitting an amendment to the States. The Vice-President and the Cabinet, with the support of Congress, are competent to determine the matter.

President Wilson ought to be rather reluctant to criticize any efforts which were made during his illness to prevent complete governmental inaction. Certainly the disposition of every one—Congress, the Vice-President, the Cabinet, and the public—was against raising the question of how the inability should be met. That it existed was sure. To mention only one evidence, twenty-eight bills became law during the special session of Congress owing to the failure of the Executive to act within ten days (exclusive of Sundays) after their receipt at the White House; and when full disclosures are made as to the nature and times of the President's complete inability to act, it will be interesting to check them up with the dates on which bills were signed. For example, the President was able to veto the Prohibition Enforcement act on October 27, but he did not approve two statutes which became law on October 22 and 25, and he failed to sign Public Laws Numbers 67 to 82 inclusive (October 28 to November 18), with the exception of Number 73, the first General Deficiency Law for 1920, which was signed on November 4. After November 18 practically all of the bills became law with the signature of the President.

The Vice-President, supported by Congress, could, under these circumstances, I think, have asserted the right to act for the period of the emergency. But the Vice-President is an anomalous officer of the United States, who presides over the Senate while he waits for the President to die. Although by the Constitution he succeeds to the Presidency, he is, in most cases, totally unfamiliar with the problems of the Administration. In spite of the fact that, for long periods, Mr. Wilson's Cabinet was ignored, this body was the best qualified to deal with the problems that needed consideration.

A wise President might have asked Secretary Lansing to call his colleagues together, and I can not see that the informal Cabinet meetings constituted a dangerous precedent. The President, perhaps, does not know that they were the only evidence to the public that there was any Government in Washington, and they may have saved Mr. Wilson the embarrassment of having the question of inability brought to a settlement by Congress or by the Vice-President, in response to public opinion.

What seems to be required in the future is a simple statute saying that if the President is temporarily unable to act he shall notify the Vice-President and request him to consult with the Cabinet—as was done during Mr. Wilson's absence abroad; and that if the fact of the President's inability is notorious, and yet this action is not taken by him, the Vice-President shall meet with the Cabinet, informing Congress of the situation, or calling it into special session, if this is necessary. The Supreme Court of the United States could not be compelled to pass on the question without a constitutional amendment enlarging its jurisdiction, and in any event it would be a political matter similar to those which the court has hitherto wisely avoided taking any part in.

It is true that such a statute as the one suggested might encourage an ambitious Vice-President to attempt to interpret a temporary indisposition as constitutional inability, but the fear of Congress and of public opinion would, I think, be an effective bar. And, after all, it would simply be one more of those political arrangements which for their success depend on that "natural sentiment" which the historian Grote called "constitutional morality": "a perfect confidence in the bosom of every citizen, amidst the bitterness of party contest, that the forms of the Constitution will be no less sacred in the eyes of his opponents than in his own."

LINDSAY ROGERS

The Radical in Fiction

"THE Radical in Fiction," cast by the malice of some strife-goddess as a topic of talk into the midst of the little circle of camp-followers of literature, threatened to prove a flaming ball of strife. Fierce old Mastodon, who had well earned his title by unswerving fidelity to the megatherium and its mental states, passionately hailed, as leader of the deed, Satan, him whom Milton drew. Had not the Arch-fiend a threefold claim to priority among radicals? He had been deservedly deported from Heaven not only for seducing by false and blasphemous argument, still the stock-in-trade of Communists of his kidney ("Flatly unjust to bind with laws the free!"), divers erring spirits, fond and foolish, but for actually taking up arms against the celestial government—the wonted treason of his present crew. In Hell the accursed firebrand had further bred sedition by utterances—still current among his agents—full of "revenge, immortal hate and courage never to submit or yield" at a Stygian Council, the prototype of many soviets. And finally, after a preparatory flight through Chaos, a vast pulp or welter of radical sentiment and opinion, this first of demagogues had turned feminist for the nonce, and, with the guile of the Serpent, had shattered the earthly paradise by tempting woman to eat of the tree of Knowledge.

For a moment we held our breath. Then our sputtering Lucifer, born Streichholz but rechristened in 1917, kindled always by the sparks of such children of light as Shelley and Heine, vehemently extols Prometheus, the first champion of mankind. Was it not he who defied the despotism of Jove the oppressor and sturdily combated the evils that reign in established government? Was not humanity, in his person, first liberated from the yoke of a ruler and regenerated through its union with love? Did not this protagonist point the way to that golden age, when man will walk, free, uncircumscribed, unclassed and nationless, exempt from awe, worship, degree, king over himself and no other? Surely Prometheus and not Satan was the first radical.

Then our prosaic Verbalist, who wings no luminous flights through time and space even in pursuit of panting words, but clings close to earth, hatching only those eggs of wisdom laid in the pigeonholes of the Oxford Dictionary's scriptorium, dryly cackles, in dogmatic protest against these fantastic origins, that "radical" and "radicalism" are barely past their centenary. "Just a hundred years ago last October, Sir Walter Scott explains to his brother that 'radical' is a word in very bad odor here, being used to denote a set of blackguards." The Verbalist, moreover, remembers to have read (smilingly we guessed where) that the radicals in their early days were called "whites" from the whitish brown hat worn by one of their leaders in 1820. "A friend of mine, a 'Southern gentleman, Sir,' recalls that, in his earliest boyhood, when the ancient commonwealth of his fathers was in the dissolving throes of so-called Reconstruction, 'radical' connoted always the carpet-bagger or the renegade who climbed to political heights on African shoulders, attended invariably by the epithet 'black.' Oddly enough in the Europe of the same date, ultra-radicals and anarchists, from the use of the red flag as a revolutionary emblem, were bescarleted. First white, then black, now red—the name seems to be a chameleon changing its hue in every generation."

"What does the word matter?" Mastodon bursts in. "The thing itself is eternal, its cursed function never dies. The Athenian demagogue, the mob-orator at Rome, the peasant leader of mediæval England, the French Jacobin, the labor agitator in America are but successive reincarnations of the same social menace. The inflammatory Gracchi, traitors to their birth and breeding, are resurrected with undoubted loss of stamina in the persons of those present-day intellectuals who play naughtily with Marxism and Bolshevism like children with parlor matches among the curtains. And what is Big Bill Haywood but an avatar of Jack Cade, 'arrogant in heart and stiff in opinion,' inciting class war, redressing public grievances by popular violence, and seeking to wreck the state through the frenzy of an unthinking multitude. Is this multitude a whit less factious, fickle, irrational, dangerous, than the hydra-headed monster of Shakespeare? In mob and mob-leader of every age we meet the same indifference to established institutions, to decent traditions, and to moral obligations."

"My turn, Mastodon!" cries Lucifer. "Of what, pray, are you an avatar but of some old feudal patrician denouncing rebellious peasants as asses disdaining the curb and leaping about the fields, terrifying all the citizens with their heehaw, or as oxen butting with their horns, or, more fearsome still, as monsters, bear-footed, dragon-tailed, and breathing fire. George Meredith drew you to the life as 'a mediæval gentleman with the docile notions of the twelfth century, complacently driving them to grass and wattling them in the twentieth.' Of what use are you and your nothing-learning, nothing-forgetting Anglo-Norman breed to a person of to-day trying to think? Indeed, I wrong the feudal mind by my comparison, because, if William Morris be right, that mind, unaware of the evils of modern capitalism, heavily penalized profiteering and usury, and disdained specious sophistry in its treatment of workingmen. If you have read 'The Dream of John Ball' you will remember how shocked is that single-minded peasant-leader when he is told that a time will come when all power will be in the hands of monopolists and they shall be rulers of all. A collared serf was freer than the modern workingman as you would have him be."

Here Middleways took the word—academic Middleways, ever sweetly reasonable, proving all things and this way and that dividing his mind. "Let us heed the Verbalist, our definer of terms, and keep within the limits of a hundred years. Even then the word's changing history helps us little. Don't you recall that Roebuck Ramsden, of Shaw's 'Man and Superman,' who has always classed himself as 'an advanced thinker,' hangs on his walls canonized radicals of the Victorian past—John Bright, Richard Cobden, Herbert Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and George Eliot? A century ago a radical was one who, like Cobbett, denounced flogging in the army or who, like Leigh Hunt, derided the embonpoint of the Regent. Only whitey-brown, that! Rereading some time since that amazing medley of the best and the worst, Warren's 'Ten Thousand a Year,' I was amused to watch the conservative author's horror of the dreadful radicalism of the thirties, rampant in the ill-advised little person of Tittlebat Titmouse, when he not only champions the Reform Bill ('The Act for Giving Everybody Everything'), but advocates the repeal of the corn laws, the lowering of taxes, the granting of universal suffrage, and the conceding of civil and religious liberty to Roman Catholics and [illegible]—not, after all, a very apoplectic programme. A few years later, in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' the university-bred youths of Conservative families and traditions raise the banner of 'Young England' and offer in alliance their white hands to the grimy paws of the radicals."

"Just as we 'intellectuals' of to-day unite with the proletariat against the bourgeoisie," smirks Lucifer.

"With this immense difference, you fallen angel," growls Mastodon, "that those splendid young aristocrats were seeking to annihilate class-feeling—not, like your ungodly crew, to promote it—and were striving not to wreck the state, but to rear a free monarchy established on fundamental laws and cherished by political fidelity and patriotic ideals. But Middleways is too kind to the radical of a century since, if the Hiram Yorke of Charlotte Brontë's 'Shirley' is typical in his lack of veneration for parliaments and establishments with their enactments, forms, rights and claims and in his relentless opposition to what he calls 'the unjustifiable and ruinous war' on which his country's fortunes depend. This rebellious pacifism is still drearily familiar."

"Perhaps you will also find drearily familiar the mid-century novel's pictures of the industrial conditions that drove men to Chartism," snaps Lucifer in reply. "Open anywhere Disraeli's 'Sybil' or Kingsley's 'Yeast' or Mrs. Gaskell's 'Mary Barton' and 'North and South,' and you will meet on every page provocation in plenty for class warfare. Here are workingmen coming with full hearts to ask their employers for a bit of fire and bedding and warm clothing and food for their children—for much less than a man's share in a man's life—and getting always a contemptuous 'No' for an answer. Does the reader wonder when leaders arise—you call them radicals—who seek to redress wrongs and to win rights, by force if needs be? Your Felix Holt and his namby-pamby tribe of would-be reformers, shrinking from sterner methods, seem to me the veriest moss-backs. We no longer ask, we demand."

"You two extremists miss," declares Middleways, "the aim and end of all this Victorian writing. Every chapter is an implicit plea for a better understanding between employer and employed, and a lively protest against your unconciliatory Toryism and radicalism. Whenever in these stories capital and labor talk frankly with one another, war between them is averted. 'We would never want no soldiers here,' says one of Disraeli's workingmen, 'if the masters would speak with the men.' So Mrs. Gaskell tells us that, when her manufacturer, Thornton, was brought face to face, man to man, with one of the masses around him, employer and employee began to recognize that we have all of us one human heart. Thus these famous volumes were great liberalizing and humanizing forces because they sought to reconcile elements that are even now in conflict. The true artist refrains from taking sides. Galsworthy in his drama, 'Strife,' preserves the same equilibrium between capital and labor as Mrs. Gaskell seventy years before, and aims at the same conciliation. What is the outcome of the strike? 'A woman dead and the two best men both broken. And the terms the very same that were drawn up and put to both sides before the fight began. All this—all this—and—and what for? ' Comment is needless. These are the facts: make what you will of them."

"Come back to your muttons," puts in the Verbalist. "What has this to do with the word 'radical'?"

"Everything," roars Mastodon. "The radical of fiction as of fact, be he evolutionist or revolutionist, socialist or individualist, is always the savage foe of the 'captain of industry' and redly anathematizes things in possession. There is little to choose between the Dr. Shrapnel of Meredith's 'Beauchamp' when he wildly berates 'that old fatted iniquity—that tyrant! that temper! that legitimated swindler cursed of Christ! that palpable Satan whose name is Capital,' and the chief striker, Roberts, in Galsworthy's play, denouncing 'the great menace of the future, the bloodsucker Capital—a thing that buys the sweat of men's brows and the torture of their brains at its own price.' Outrageously unfair is this to those most precious things, profit and privilege. Yet Shrapnel and Roberts, however misguided and fanatical, are honest Englishmen who fight hard in the open for what they deem the rights of workingmen—not treasonable aliens, enemies of the state, who plot in darkness for the coming of an hour of nightmares, when organized ignorance will dominate a disorganized world! What will fiction be in that twilight of the gods? Will the Book News of to-morrow's Anarchia feature romances of young love in which syndicalist Romeos will woo Bolshevistic Juliets, while the rival factions of misrule whet their stilettos and light their fuses against the background of a flaming heaven—with this departure from the old story that there will be no prince or chief magistrate to compose the strife?"

"As a prophet, you build better than you know, Boanerges, for of late we have traveled far and shall soon travel farther," retorts Lucifer. "In their day Samuel Butler and Bernard Shaw did yeomen's service by denouncing the blighting evil of poverty. How the fat of soul everywhere squeaked at the insult to vested interests flung by Shaw's exposure of slum-landlordism in 'Widowers' Houses'! Now Shavians and Fabians lag as far in our rear as your Roebuck Ramsden. Mr. Wells, who writes essays and calls them novels, has somewhere painted a picture of the Great State of the future, essentially socialistic, owning and running the land and all the great public services, sustaining everybody in absolute freedom at a certain minimum of comfort and convenience; but his sight is too short to perceive that the proletariat—the Demos which Dickens pitied and which Gissing distrusted and despised, while they scrupulously portrayed its misery—will in the new hour be the governing class. 'Psychological realism in the sphere of culture'—that's your cant phrase, isn't it?—the silly amenities and the subtleties of sophisticated leisure, will happily pass from the novel with the passing of the gentleman. And the country-house of fiction—the head and front of all this offending—will be scrapped like the baronial castle of old Walter Scott and Mrs. Radcliffe. Life, as plain men and women live it and make it, will busy all pens in the good time that's coming."

"A plague on both your houses!" interposes Middleways. "You myopic creatures, Bourbon and radical, have both invoked George Meredith. Do you forget the allegory that men have read into his earliest thing, 'The Shaving of Shagpat'? Here reigns that worst of despots, an established evil, a tyranny of lies, for Shagpatism represents, so say these interpreters, life in its institutional aspect, full of errors, superstitions, and wrongs. Shagpat's charmed lock flaunts blazing defiance to reform. Had you been there, Mastodon, you would have tenderly fostered its growth and have loudly acclaimed its beauty. And you, Lucifer, would have smitten off the head with the hair. But the true reformer, Shibli, though sensitive to abuses, is no iconoclast, no red-eyed, root-and-branch destructionist. He seeks only a cleansing in the interest of health and decency. He is equipped with insight—accurate knowledge of things as they are; idealism—clear vision of things as they ought to be; enthusiasm—strength to change things as they are into things as they ought to be; and he is disciplined by the thwackings of the world and of self-criticism, as no mere thinker ever is. Thus trained, Shibli goes forth to his great hour of struggle and triumph. With lightning-like stroke the sword of results descends, and day is on the baldness of Shagpat. About all of us here and now the story is narrated."

FREDERICK TUPPER

Correspondence

Lodge's "Fight Against Wilson"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In a letter in your issue of April 24, Major George Haven Putnam quotes Senator Lodge as defining the nature of his opposition to the League submitted by President Wilson in these words: "I am fighting Mr. Wilson." This statement has been going about in various forms. Last December I sent it to Senator Lodge for authentication, and here is his reply, dated December 13:

> The quotation you have marked in which I am reported as having said: "My fight is not against the treaty of peace; it is against Woodrow Wilson," is of course entirely false. I never said anything like it and I have never even thought it. There is no personal quality whatever in the fight I have made on the treaty. I have been thinking only of my country. The remark attributed to me is not only wholly false but it is so foolish, so obviously something that no man in his senses would say, that I can only regard it as a mere political and party invention to do me harm. I should be very glad if you would deny it for me whenever and wherever you hear it repeated.

This reply was published in the Indianapolis News at the time.

Major Putnam says that "the President's management of the treaty has been ill advised in the extreme," and that the treaty has been blocked "because of the President's bad management and self-sufficiency and because Senator Lodge and his associates have persisted in making the issue personal and partisan." His conclusion is that the responsibility for the delay "rests with Senator Lodge and his associates."

This seems rather cloudy; but some other things are clear. One is that the great body of the American people desire to see a league of nations tried in place of that old rogue, Balance of Power, which has nearly wrecked the world. Another is that if the Senate had failed to exercise its judgment upon the League and to act accordingly, it would have self-paralyzed functions imposed upon it by the Constitution. Finally, the millions who believe, as I do, that the Senate operated upon the League beneficially, and who see Mr. Wilson, in the face of the fact that the Allies are ready to accept all changes, wilfully forcing a decision by wager of ballot between the League submitted by him and that league with the Senate reservations, do not hesitate to accept the challenge.

LUCIUS B. SWIFT

Indianapolis, April 28

Jew and Arab

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The decision of the San Remo Conference to award the Palestine mandate to Great Britain, limited by the provisions of the Balfour Declaration, which provides for a National Jewish Home in that land, would appear, at first sight, to render academic the disputed question of the present rights of the Jews to the home of their ancestors. However, the conviction of the Zionists that they possess these historic rights really brings the matter into the heart of practical politics. The future of Palestine depends largely upon the manner in which they emphasize their claims in dealing with the Arabs, Moslem and Christian, who, according to the British Census of 1919, outnumber them in a proportion a little under five to one. Against what they regard as the "Zionist peril," Moslems and Christians have been strongly organized for over a year. When in Jerusalem last spring, I talked in their own language with members of an Anti-Zionist delegation, representing the towns of Nablûs, Jaffa, Jerusalem, etc. Their argument was, in substance, as follows:

"The sixty-five thousand Jews now in the land are our brothers, and sharers with us in the rights of actual dwellers in the land. Owing to the paralyzing effects of Turkish misrule, our economic development has been arrested for hundreds of years. We are at present in no condition to compete with foreign ability and with foreign gold. We fear that few of us could resist the temptation presented by the prices which will be offered for our lands. Thus, gradually, the country will pass away from our hands. Give us—say—twenty years in which we may learn to stand on our economic feet, but during which all Jewish immigration is to be prohibited, and then we will open the doors to the Jews. If by that time we are not able to compete with them, our inability to develop the land ourselves will have been proved."

They added that they represented scores of thousands to whom they had pledged their word that the Zionist peril should be dispelled, but declared that, in case of failure, they would not be responsible for the disturbances that would follow. Recent reports from Jerusalem, giving the details of clashes between Arabs and Jews, prove that the Anti-Zionist sentiment is as strong as ever.

Now that the mandatory Power is pledged to the Balfour Declaration, some sort of modus vivendi will, of course, have to be established. As to this Declaration, I may be permitted to make a quotation from a recent letter of mine to the New York Times:

> There are students of this pronouncement who feel that, far from being definite, its loose wording makes it capable of different interpretations. Some hold . . . that Balfour's Jewish National Home in Palestine is identical with an independent Jewish State, quite unrelated politically to the rest of Syria. Others find in the phrase merely the encouragement to free Jewish immigration, with especial economic concessions. Still others see in it no more than a promise that the Jews shall enjoy the religious and other privileges accorded to other foreign nations.

Just what interpretation Great Britain will give to this elusive Declaration the future alone will disclose.

To repeat myself, a successful modus operandi depends on the attitude of the Zionists themselves. From the beginning the practical weakness of the movement has been in the small attention paid to the actual dwellers in the land. What is known to-day as Zionism was inaugurated in 1897 by the book of Dr. Herzl, entitled "A Zion State." Consult that little book, and you will find the word Palestine occurring but once—towards the close, as I remember—and then with Argentina given as an alternative. This Utopia where the Jews were to find opportunity for unimpeded development is all through the book referred to as "over there." Little or nothing is said of any native dwellers "over there" and the impression made on the reader is of a country practically uninhabited. Later Herzl, first on practical considerations, given the necessity of a popular rally-cry, and afterwards apparently from conviction, fixed definitely on Palestine. However, the records of the Zionist Congresses, from the first, held in 1898, down to the time of the Turkish Constitution of 1908, touch upon the status of the dwellers in the land in the vaguest terms. Conversing with prominent local Zionists in Jaffa and Jerusalem as late as 1909, I found the same vagueness prevailing in regard to this question.

The Constitution of 1908 brought the Zionists face to face with the local issue, and the fact that the natives of Palestine form an element to be regarded seriously has been met with a growing, but as yet inadequate, consideration.

Yesterday I heard an eloquent and moving address on Zionism by Rabbi Wise, one of its most prominent advocates. He emphatically repudiated the charge of "the injustice of Zionism." He declared that never would the United States be called upon to send a Commission to enquire into the treatment of the Arabs by the Jews. In a few words to me later (to which I am sure he will not object to my referring) he affirmed his love for the Arabs. But I hope the Rabbi will pardon me if I deprecate the form in which he expressed that love in his speech. He said, "The Arab may remain in Palestine." As he spoke I thought of the rich, though now decayed, Arab civilization which was entrenched in Palestine for centuries. I thought of the great families, descendants of the Prophet, descendants of Khaled the Sword of God, possessors of names to conjure with ever since the Arab conquest. I thought of my friend, Ibrahim Effendi ul-Khalidi, commissioner for my excavations, whose mere presence in my Philistine camp made that camp immune from any disturbance on the part of Bedawîn or Fellahîn. And these are the people who, by the gracious permission of the Zionists, "may" continue to live in the land of their ancestors! No, no, my dear Rabbi, change your tone. Ask for the privileges of a guest—a guest, if you will, who once was host and who may be host again—and you will meet with royal Arab hospitality. Change your tone for the very sake of the noble ideals contained in your programme, for not till then can your people do the work for the inhabitants of Palestine—Moslem, Christian, and Jew alike—which I am persuaded you wish them to do.

FREDERICK JONES BLISS

New Haven, Conn., April 26

Mr. Dreiser's "Battle for Truth"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Like Mr. Paul Elmer More, I, too, am impatient of Theodore Dreiser's "uneasy muddle of ideas." I do not ask every novelist—in order to enjoy reading his books—to be an Edith Wharton; I can see much to admire in the stark brutality of Sherwood Anderson; I read and reread with enthusiasm the brisk, searching, human pages of Edna Ferber; but there is in Dreiser's work a certain unwholesome, turgid quality that disgusts me.

As the performing of a surgical operation demands both skill and strength, so the effective use of realism in art demands a clear-cut cleanness of soul and an unfaltering devotion to truth. Through Dreiser's pages, underlying his descriptions of sensuality and material success, I seem to see the author's furtive gusto, the sly licking of lips, the poorly concealed envy of the very things which he professes to hold in contempt. But however one may dislike the writings of Dreiser, it is commonly supposed that behind the writing is a rugged, honest soul who courageously expresses the faith that is in him, notwithstanding the "persecution" of lovers of good English, conservative publishers, censors, and others who at one time were charged with taking the bread from his mouth. It is only a few years since a group of members of the Authors' League asked for contributions for the brave and hounded author, to enable him to continue his battle for the truth. I did not subscribe —not because I did not admire his writings, which was reason enough—but because I had worked with Dreiser several months as associate editor to the magazine of which he was editor-in-chief. If during that period he held any strong convictions for which he was willing to suffer, or possessed any moral stamina that would cause him to stand by his guns for anything save self-interest, then he very successfully kept it from me. And I am not particularly unobservant. Shortly after I resigned my position—because the editor-in-chief had not the most elementary notions concerning the integrity and sanctity of an author's own language—I received a letter from a young writer on the New York Times saying that he was bringing suit against the magazine for non-payment of an article which had been ordered by me, and asking if I would testify in his behalf. This I agreed to do. The case came to trial. After I had given my testimony, what was my surprise to have Dreiser deny that I had ever been Associate Editor of the magazine, or associated with it in any editorial capacity whatever! Notwithstanding my amazement, it took me only a second to reach into my bag and hand the presiding judge the original letter written and signed by Dreiser offering me the position of Associate Editor, stating terms, duties, etc. I had no premonition that the defense would take that line; in my innocence, I had supposed that the article might be unjustly belittled, or that my right to accept or reject an article might be falsely questioned, but that my entire connection of months with the editorial office would be denied in toto, that was a bit too strong even for my imagination! However, looking over some papers in order to verify some dates, I had come across the letter appointing me, and had fortunately slipped it into my bag. I never saw a more disgusted judge. He asked Dreiser if he were the author of the letter, and receiving an affirmative reply, brought the case to a close and rendered a decision for the plaintiff.

As we were leaving court, Dreiser put out his hand to me, which I refused to take. He flushed, but was inclined to take the whole thing as a joke. "How could you deliberately try to discredit me like that?" I asked, indignantly. "It wasn't my judgment," he answered, as if that let him out entirely, "it was the lawyer's idea. Besides," he added with a grin, "I didn't think you'd have that letter with you, or I wouldn't have done it."

Can anyone wonder that it is difficult for me to see in Theodore Dreiser a martyr for Truth? What a pitiful sum was involved to have succeeded in puncturing the honor of a great man! True, all this took place thirteen years ago; but Theodore Dreiser was no immature youth, he was married; and even had he been a much younger man, does it not seem as if at least the germ of greatness would have shown in that daring soul that later was to champion the cause of Humanity "confronting Life unafraid"!

ANNIE NATHAN MEYER

New York City, April 30

Keeping Tab on the Professor

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In a university, as in any business organization, it is important that the administration should know the conditions under which work is being done. A record of the clock hours and the student hours for each member of the instructional staff is information which should be in the executive office and which may be used as often for remedying overwork as for criticising loafers. A college president who does not know what his men are doing is very likely to make mistakes.

So far as I have had opportunity of observing, these records have not been used as levers for changing the status of instructors or their salaries. For the same reason the executives should know the conditions obtaining in various rooms, especially those which are crowded. Plans and estimates for new buildings can be more reasonably constructed if one has a fairly accurate knowledge of existing conditions. The relative crowding of different rooms and buildings tells us where to begin in our new building programme. We also recognize the fact that the capacity of the recitation room is greater than that of the laboratory of the same size, and this in turn greater than that afforded by shop or engine room.

I fail to see why we should stick our heads in the sand, ostrich-like, and decline to get facts for fear we shall be tempted to use them wrongly.

C. H. BENJAMIN

Dean of Purdue University

Lafayette, Ind., March 9

Book Reviews

Like a Fine Old English Gentleman

Some Aversions of a Man of Letters. By Edmund Gosse. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THOUGH Mr. Gosse is a man of letters without a thesis and with little provocative quality, he has developed, in fifty years devoted to books, much quiet charm. He leads one through these various essays with an easy and experienced suavity which persuades one from the outset that suitable things are going to be said and well said, with gentlemanly animation but without undue emphasis. He is so true an Englishman that his heart will ever respond with an extra beat at the thought of Raleigh's tragic story. He is himself so much of the poet-scholar that he can never cease to value the spade-work or the cheery notes of those rather dusty brothers, the Wartons, back there in the dull mid-eighteenth century whistling up the dawn of romanticism. He is so much a Victorian that he is not quite ready to acquiesce in the conspiracy of silence which this generation has formed against the once-splendid reputations of Bulwer and Disraeli. A lover of old writers, he is yet so friendly to new ones that he weaves a fine garland of poems by soldier bards, which "Englishmen will not allow to be forgotten." He is so much a classicist that he comments with real relish on Lord Cromer's translations from Moschus; and so much an aristocrat that he enters with perfect sympathy into the literary recreations of a retired British proconsul. Having occasion to speak of Lord Redesdale's heir, who fell in the war, he writes: "His eldest son, Major the Hon. Clement Milford"; and one feels a pleasant glow of satisfaction in the assurance that this is precisely the way in which one should mention the eldest son of Lord Redesdale. Taste, tact, and temper designated Mr. Gosse from his youth as the man to call upon when a poet laureate died or when the hundredth anniversary of a classic fell to be celebrated or when a new citizen was to be admitted to good and regular standing in the Republic of Letters.

It is not difficult to perform these functions after a fashion; but it requires a fine and rare art to perform them well. It requires an art rooted in the best traditions and nourished by habitual contact with men who unfeignedly value in literature a certain vital decorum, the unfailing mark of works worthy of permanent remembrance. Mr. Gosse possesses this art; and therefore his commemorations are not perfunctory but recreative with the true academic unction. His literary character and predilections were formed just before the fashion of the Victorian age took its strong bias towards charlatanry and infected young writers with the strident vices of journalism. He came in with a group of knights of the pen, many of them Scotchmen—Lang, Dobson, Archer, Colvin, Henley, Stevenson—who clung to the old "religion of letters"; identified their style with their honor, looked upon a page of prose with amorous but exacting eye, and made their pleasure their profession. The gusto of amateurs and the skill of patient craftsmen unite to constitute the special charm of this group at its emergence, in its springtime, when these dashing young talents were studying old French verse and wearing out copies of Herrick in the pockets of their velveteen jackets—before the individual members had grown apart, and grown up, and grown old, and dangerously facile and overproductive. Mr. Gosse, who now speaks of himself as an aged mourner preparing to attend the obsequies of the Victorian time, fluted his lyrics in those vernal days with the rest of them. Yet forty years ago, when he was just turned thirty, he was already marked by R. L. Stevenson, that happy blend of Villon and Calvin, as a natural born academician, one manifestly destined, all in due time, to become librarian to the House of Lords. In 1879 Stevenson wrote with playful thrust, apropos of some decorous and mellow utterance of his friend: "My dear Gosse, I have greatly enjoyed your article which seems to me handsome in tone, and written like a fine old English gentleman."

In forty years Mr. Gosse has lost none of the virtue of his youth. In the meanwhile that virtue has been steadily disappearing from contemporary English literature. And so, without thesis or other provocative qualities, he gives us a delightful collection of essays, distinguished in that it is handsome in tone and written like a fine old English gentleman. In his half century of letters he has seen many prosperous reputations ruined by the vicissitudes of fashion; and he raises, without explicitly answering, the question whether there is, after all, any fixable standard of taste. The answer which he has accepted for himself is everywhere implicit in the sustained amenity of his tone, which one finds especially charming when he is drawing from the life, as in his portraits of Lady Dorothy Nevill, Lord Cromer, and Lord Redesdale. Any one who desires to vivify his conception of a "fine old English gentleman" should turn in this book to the pages where Mr. Gosse and the Consul-General from Egypt converse together over the fragments of Empedocles.

Stuart P. Sherman

Talk of the Best

The Island of Sheep. By Cadmus and Harmonia. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

ARISTOTLE used to say that education was an ornament in prosperity and a refuge in adversity. It is impossible to read this delightful book without being convinced of the fact. We are told that Cadmus is a well-known English writer and man of action, and we can easily believe it. Here is the philosophic mind which only years can bring, not merely those of the individual himself but also those of the race of which he is an exponent, and to this inevitable product of time are added the positive elements of wide reading, broad and minute observation, and calm and wonderfully detached reflection. Yet more, the tranquillity of the minds which produced this work is imparted realistically to all the characters to whom we are introduced: however strenuous their reasoned conclusions, we feel that in every instance the aim has been to free them from personal and selfish characteristics and to obtain, so far as is humanly possible, a glimpse of the increasing purpose which runs through the ages.

The time is indeed out of joint, and presumptuous is he who may think that he is born to set it right. We are afraid that not all the guests of Colonel and Mrs. Lamont on the Island of Sheep are free from all trace of this vice, yet much may be condoned where motives are fine and sincere. A more agreeable company we can not imagine. The scene is the north of Scotland. Before the guests arrive we are introduced to Colonel Lamont, in a pleasant arbor looking down on spring meadows which sloped towards the western sea. He is reading Matthew Arnold:

> And by the sea, and in the brakes,
> The grass is cool, the seaside air
> Buoyant and fresh, the mountain flowers
> More virginal and fresh than ours.
> And there, they say, two bright and aged snakes,
> That once were Cadmus and Harmonia,
> Bask in the glens or on the warm seashore,
> In breathless quiet, after all their ills.

He looked up from his book, "Singularly like us, my dear," he observed to his wife. She admits that she feels aged, "but not very bright." The war is over, and though peace may have its victories no less renowned than war, it also has its problems no less disturbing. "This old world," says Colonel Lamont, "has got such a twist that I can't see it settling down in our time. I wish to heaven I knew where we all stood." It is not his taxes that he is worrying about—he wouldn't mind paying fifteen shillings in the pound for the rest of his days. It is the country that exercises him. The war has been won; but for what? "We have won, of course, but we don't seem to know that we've won. Those damned politicians are at the job again. I thought we had washed all that out." And Bolshevism, remarks Mrs. Lamont. And every little faction on the globe wanting to turn itself into a state, he rejoins. And our own labor people so discontented, she continues, and all this business of the League of Nations, was his conclusion of the antiphony.

Speedily, however, a livelier note is struck. The guests arrive in rapid succession—politicians, soldiers, labor leaders—American, French, and English in nationality—and among them a sprinkling of ladies of interrogative instincts. We could wish none of the company away, with the possible exception of Mr. Albert Wyper, a progressive journalist, with a soft shapeless face, a humorless eye, and an untidy person, who introduces himself with the remark, "I have found a new theory of Democracy in a French review and am writing a letter to the New Republic on the subject." Will some one tell us why a malign fate has identified "progressive," a word not unpleasing in itself, with such characteristics?

And now we find ourselves in a flood of discussion, and our only grudge against Cadmus and Harmonia is that they allow it to last only a niggardly few days—a full month would be not too much! No sooner do the guests sit down to their first repast than the keynote is struck. In a high, clear voice Mrs. Aspenden, "a lady given to good works," discourses of history. "I have been reading all about this place," she announces. "Do you know that St. Brandan came here on his great voyage? It is his Island of Sheep where he found the lamb for the Paschal sacrifice. There is a beautiful passage about it translated out of some old Latin chronicle. He sailed, you remember, out of tempestuous seas and came suddenly to a green isle of peace with sheep feeding among the meadows." "I like the story," remarks Mr. Christopher Normand, who is a singularly ingratiating character. "To come out of stormy seas to a green isle of quietness! It is what all are seeking. Democracy is a great and wonderful thing, but it does not make for peace." "There!" exclaims Lady Sevenoaks, "I knew it. Already we have reached that odious subject."

They have indeed. But it has taken us so long to set the scene that we can not rehearse the dialogue. Nor do we want to; the reader will thank us for letting him discover for himself the rare charm of this book. Passion is excluded, though there is plenty of idealism, and an abundance of hard, shrewd wit. National characteristics are exceedingly well portrayed. We are proud of the courage of our countrywoman, Mrs. Lavender, who, when asked to vouch for the statement by Mr. Jonas, a labor leader, that "things are easier in America because they tell me that classes are fluid there and their boundaries are always shifting," replies, "True. William was raised in a shack in Idaho, and if the present rate of taxation goes on, my boys will be getting back to that shack." And we may confess a previous acquaintance with Mr. Merryweather Malone, an American politician with Irish antecedents, who on being accused of having acquired an Oxford accent, replied, "We've all got a bit of it, ever since Abel. It was that that made Cain mad." This is of a piece with his "I'm of Irish stock myself, and for our sins we've got a good many like me in the States. That poor little island is living on a bogus past and trying to screw some pride out of it, while she's forgetting to do anything to be proud of right now. The ordinary Irishman is ashamed of himself and he has not the honesty to admit it. No man's any good unless he has something to swagger about, and Ireland has not anything except a moth-eaten ragbag of wrongs. That's her confounded antiquarian habit of mind."

Let it be understood that in these quotations we have hardly touched the fringe of the discussion embodied in this work. Nor has any attempt been made to disclose to the reader the felicities of style and argument which meet us on every hand. It is sufficient to say that there is here a fineness akin to a forgotten art. How does it all end? We refuse to say. Perhaps we do not know; perhaps Cadmus and Harmonia do not know. Can any valid conclusion be drawn from the following facts? "The only hope for Democracy," says Mr. James Burford, an ex-Labor Member of Parliament, "is to make it an aristocracy." Shortly afterwards someone suddenly asks, "Where's Burford?" Mrs. Lamont answered, "I think he has gone for a walk with Phillis [her niece] in the garden."

F. J. Whiting

The Man of Science in the Future

The Outlook for Research and Invention. By Nevil Monroe Hopkins. New York: D. Van Nostrand Company.

This book reflects the enthusiasms of a man who has given his life to the prosecution of engineering projects, and who has come in the passing of years to appreciate with great vividness the fundamental significance of scientific research for national progress. Despite some curious blunders touching matters of fact, it has in it much that is informing regarding the actual status of American research and its more obvious defects.

Taking his point of departure from a somewhat precarious psychology, the author exhibits in a very striking way the accidental conditions under which men at present, by a very haphazard process of social selection, are picked out for research careers, and he makes a good case for the belief that great masses of the finest research talent remain sterile because of the poverty of our present devices for identifying, stimulating, and developing it. The story which he tells of the indifference of the American public, both educated and uneducated, to the place of scientific research in national life is somewhat depressing, but well within the truth. He shows that our national vanity regarding American inventiveness rests on rather less substantial foundations than is commonly believed, and over against this fact is to be put the relatively meagre accomplishments in the application of fundamental scientific methods and ideas to practical industrial processes. Were our industrial products thrown open to a more equal competition with those of other nations, this fact would be brought home to us far more keenly than with our high tariff walls has hitherto been in general possible. His chapter on the tropical development of research during the war, and the part played by the National Research Council in this movement, is extremely informing and decidedly encouraging in its implication of an aroused popular appreciation of scientific men and their methods.

The reader may well wish that, in connection with his discussion of patents, the author had gone more nearly to the root of our whole patent system, the beneficence of whose operations under present conditions is decidedly open to question. He indulges in some admirably sound advice to inventors, which will doubtless fail to reach most of those by whom it is chiefly needed. There are few more pathetic chapters in the history of intellectual endeavor than those portraying the year-long struggles of many inventors to perfect devices which were defective in the essential scientific ideas upon which they were based, a fact to which the ignorance—and often secretiveness—of the inventor has rendered him tragically oblivious. Important and successful inventions represent long and courageous endeavor, working with two great tools—creative imagination and sound scientific knowledge, the latter far more important than the average individual at all appreciates.

One need not be wholly Philistine to call in question the low estimate put by the author upon humanistic methods of educational training and his wholly optimistic view regarding the utilization of scientific materials as the essential nucleus of our educational programme. Those who have faced the actual job of teaching in our schools and colleges, however sympathetic with the author's general position, could disabuse his mind of certain fallacious preconceptions.

The book contains some interesting speculations on the limits of scientific discovery, on the applications of research in the industries, and comes to an end with a somewhat scrappy but not uninteresting list of problems awaiting solution, which appears to have been gathered as the result of enquiry from a considerable group of scientific men.

The volume belongs to a class of books which suffer somewhat in the appeal that they are capable of making to the humanistically trained intellectuals, because of a certain rawness of cultural outlook as tested by the conventional standards of the literary and humanistic critic. On the other hand, it is replete with indications of wide and substantial scholarship in various scientific branches, it is composed with a somewhat infectious enthusiasm for the beauties of science, and perhaps the best thing which can be said for it is that it is likely to be the forerunner of not a few more substantial and more convincing presentations of the same general field. The time is ripe for a distinctly epoch-making treatise on this whole subject.

Cult and Comedy

The Anchor: A Love Story. By Michael Sadler. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.

Time and Eternity: A Tale of Three Exiles. By Gilbert Cannan. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Love and Mr. Lewisham. The Story of a Very Young Couple. By H. G. Wells. New York: George H. Doran Company.

It seems to have been within the memory of the living that readers of William Black and Mrs. Humphry Ward were startled and delighted by the appearance of certain "young" English novelists named Wells and Bennett. A little later came the "younger" English novelists, Cannan, and Walpole, and Mackenzie, and the rest of the family who bear each other so strong a family likeness. And now, within a year or two, has appeared a group of youngest interpreters for whom ardent publishers and complaisant reviewers are claiming much and predicting more. Distinction is a favorite word in these estimates. Punch achieves an amusing superlative. It declares that Michael Sadler's "The Anchor" reaches an "unusual level of distinction." Perhaps that is it. Perhaps its level of distinction is what chiefly impresses or depresses us in this youngest fiction. They are all, these performers, so "extraordinarily clever" (as the Daily Express calls Mr. Sadler); so knowing, so uniformly unconventional, so fluent . . . so young. The back jacket of "The Anchor" has a well-written blurb. Change the proper names to fit the instance, and you have the fairly satisfactory description of an imaginary composite novel made up of all twentieth century British novels to date. Add that Laddie is of Winchester and Oxford and pursues as a journalist in Paris and London his "young man's adventures in love and self-discovery." . . . "Laddie McAllister," continues the blurbist, "is the kind of young man most of us know; brilliant, acutely self-conscious, a bit unstable, but lovable, he is in danger of becoming a mere intellectual drifter. His unconscious search for an 'anchor' is complicated by his relations with two women of antithetic influence, and by his friendship for Dermot Hill, a quaint and engaging Irish radical."

Yes, Laddie is one kind of man most of us know: he is youth, he is egotism, he is temperament and all that. But it is odd and not quite normal that he should be the only kind of man these youngest novelists, on either side of the water, seem to know or to be interested in. Is there no natural medium worth dealing with between the red-blooded idiot of movie romance and this mentally and morally cross-eyed darling of the younger clan? The truth, as I make it out, is that in interpreting youth this modern school fails to transcend youth, fails of the maturity which beholds youth in its beauty and its piteousness, a marvelous phase of life, but not the whole of it or even surely the best of it. Youth justifies itself, is its own sufficient excuse and palliation; not therefore need its follies and fecklessnesses, its piracy and poltroonery, be solemnly elevated for worship. The Laddie of "The Anchor" is a commonplace credible young chap, rather more decent sexually than is the fashion among his literary kind, recognizable enough as "the kind of young man most of us know." Perhaps he is even the kind of young man most of us have been. But why dig us up again? Aren't we, in that phase, getting to be an old and dull spectacle? We admit everything: why keep rubbing it in upon a politely yawning world? Forget it: and tell us a story about the fellow we might have been. He is the man for our money. In some such reactionary strain I find myself perusing again and again this perennial chronicle of the more or less decent young Briton taking his first flutter at life in a London of newspaper offices and studios and variously complicating females. For Laddie, there is a Janet much too good. Hearken to him in the act of proposing marriage:

"Janet—I fell in love with you here—the first time I ever saw you in the flesh. I am now going to ask you to consider marrying me. The prospect is unattractive—even more unattractive than it looks. . . . I am not a waster. That is to say I work hard and am intelligent and sane. Such vices as I have are negative. But I am an uncreative artist, if you will allow so priggish an expression. I mean I love beauty but can not work off that love in the creation of other beauty. Consequently I am, in certain things, rather unstable. If you will take me on —and I need you, Janet, absolutely, pitifully almost—take me on and stand by me, I shall learn to stand by you. You are so strong, so—oh, my dear, there are no words!—but you are safe-harbour, anchorage, something firm to cling to, and—I think that's all."

Undeniably a pill for Janet; and an artificial misunderstanding, based upon a Potiphar's wife charge against Laddie, increases the size of the bolus. But she downs it at last; and the discovery of his innocence is thereafter immaterial: "As if it mattered what you have been or will be," cries Janet in the ear of her prigling. "You just are. Dear heart—"

All this, you say, is simple and sentimental enough—why adduce it as a modern instance? To which the reply might be that it is not inherently more sentimental than the majority of contemporary chronicles of this kind in which the lad takes Potiphar's wife, as it were, in his stride. The sentimentality of such fiction lies in its slavish worship of youngness—the mere state and act of being young, of muddling through youth. Mr. Gilbert Cannan, of course, lays himself open to no charge of Victorianism. Nor does he always deal with the fumblings and yearnings of the salad years. Stephen, of "Time and Eternity," is in his thirties, by the calendar. But we have to take Mr. Cannan's word for that. To all intents Stephen is the eccentric apprentice at life, just as the young gentleman in "Pink Roses" was the amiable dabbler. His youth is static; and so, we presently observe, is that of his Valerie and even of the gray experienced Perekatov. These are official children of the modern world, looking upon it with astonished rebellious eyes. A young Englishman, a girl from South Africa, a Russian Jew, they are exiles in London as they would be anywhere. Exiles—but where is their land? I for one can not make out, unless it be in that not-world of passionately protestant youth where respectability and injustice, old saws and outworn principles, marriage, war, duty have no place. Haplessly offset against them is the honest but hysterical young romantic, Ducie, the British "decent sort," not heroically cast though capable of heroic violence, as when he seizes an insolent slacker by the neck and throws him "a dozen yards"—surely the record put for slackers. A morsel of his strength he uses later to strangle Valerie—maybe this is as good a way as any to dispose of her, though it leaves Stephen temporarily at a loose end. Valerie has "given herself" to Stephen, with much talk about not believing in marriage or dreaming of a permanent union between them. Here they are together: no doubt the thoroughly modern reader will perceive what it is all about:

. . . His only dread was lest he should fail her, as he most certainly would if he tried to understand her from anything external, her appearance, her actions, her moods, or even her thoughts.

She said:

"If you were not what I thought I should kill you."

"What do you want me to be?"

"What you are."

He accepted that she would kill him as the most natural thing in the world. After the love they have shared, any betrayal of it, however slight, would be worse than death. Indeed, life outside the wonder they had created seemed so fantastic as to be a continual desecration: soldiers, battle, exhortations to patriotism, food queues, revolution in Russia—all seemed like incidents in a stage play; the capricious movements of the crowd and the incidental characters surrounding the drama of passions which knew their object and would attain them or destroy.

He protested a little faintly:

"But I don't ask you to be anything but what you are."

"I am what I am," said Valerie, firmly.

Which seems to settle matters very satisfactorily. Firmness is a great thing.

I chanced to turn from these books to "Love and Mr. Lewisham." It was written twenty years ago. Someone is said to have asked Mr. Wells, not long since, which of his own books he liked best. He reached for a copy of "Love and Mr. Lewisham," and said that he did not know that he had ever done any better writing than that. I took up this first American edition of the story with the half-defined notion that here I should find something in line with my "youngest" novels of the moment—something at least in the way of forecast, for who if not Wells set the ball of modernity rolling? . . . Yes, here is the young man in London, fumbling at life and love, with two women in the offing. . . . And then we rub our eyes. Was modernity so old-fashioned a business, twenty years ago? Or was this the final indulgence of a delightful romancer before modernity "got" him? Here at all events he employs the very materials of which his literary grandchildren make such bitter or defiant copy, in the gentlest most believing way. His comedy remains a comedy, the ancient comedy of all for love and the world well lost. Lewisham's dreams of social reform, of personal fame, of a distinguished career in science, have been pushed aside by circumstance. He willingly and not ignobly resigns them that he may bear his part as husband of a wife and son of a mother and father of a son. The book is full of sweet humor, more tender than that of "Mr. Polly" and more simple than that of "Tono-Bungay"—the two stories (written some ten years later) with which I should place "Love and Mr. Lewisham" as the purest product of Mr. Wells as a story-teller.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

THE movement for a memorial to the late Professor Sir William Ramsay, K. C. B., F. R. S., is making progress both in England and in France. Early in the war British science lost in him one of its great leaders. No short notice could attempt to describe his activities in chemistry, but his researches were equally remarkable in the more abstruse sides of the science and in those that attracted popular attention. To the public Ramsay will remain best known for two extraordinary researches. Before his work, it was believed that the atmosphere consisted only of a mixture of oxygen, nitrogen, and a few other well-known gases. Starting on the puzzle that there was a minute difference in weight between nitrogen as separated from the oxygen of the air and nitrogen as prepared from pure chemicals, Ramsay, after work of remarkable delicacy, discovered and isolated five new elements in the atmosphere—argon, neon, xenon, krypton, and helium. Helium had been known through spectroscopy to exist in the sun. When the sun's atmosphere was examined with the spectroscope, physicists had seen a blazing green line that corresponded with no known element. Just as St. Paul forced the attention of the Athenians by bringing to them the "Unknown God," so Ramsay electrified the scientific world when he isolated and discovered in the ordinary air the existence of this element and reproduced in his laboratory the same spectrum line.

When the Curies discovered and isolated radium, Ramsay was one of the pioneers to work on it, and realized the alchemist's dream of proving the possibility of the break-up of the atom. He showed that radium, though an element, decomposes, giving off the gas helium, and thus led the way to the discovery of the number of elements through which radium changes. The work was a miracle of minute analysis which involved the handling, through countless processes, of almost imperceptible quantities of gas.

Sir William Ramsay was never blind to the close connection of science with everyday life. When the war broke out, he devoted himself to the application of science to the needs at the front, and he was the first to insist that cotton, as the basis of explosives, must be made contraband of war. By so doing, he greatly embarrassed the German manufacturers of explosives and directly contributed to the final victory. The memorial will consist of a fund for the provision of Ramsay Research Fellowships, tenable wherever the necessary equipment may be found, and for the establishment of a Ramsay Memorial Laboratory of Chemical Engineering in connection with University College, London.

The fourth number of Etudes Italiennes (Paris: Leroux), which has just reached this country, completes the first volume of this French quarterly. It pays this high compliment to Dr. Ernest H. Wilkins, Professor of the Romance Languages at Chicago University:

We warmly approve of his active campaign for the development of Italian studies in the American educational system. . . . With their practical ways and their proneness to do things promptly and on a large scale, are our American colleagues about to give to the Italian language in the training of American youth the place which we in France still hesitate to give it?

The youth of Sarah Bernhardt is perennial. Though seventy-six-years old, she has just finished delivering a series of public lectures at Paris on the "Grands Semeurs d'Idées," the closing one being devoted to Edmond Rostand, "the most obstinate believer in the final victory." The gifted actress declaimed some of the poet's finest verse, and her voice is described as being as "golden as ever." And this has been followed up by "the divine Sarah" actually appearing on the boards again, as she is now giving nightly performances at her own Paris theatre of Racine's "Athalie."

Besides offering the University of Paris an annual sum of money for the new Chinese Department, the Pekin Government has now signified its intention of depositing in the Sorbonne library a hundred thousand manuscripts, probably the most remarkable collection outside of China.

M. Maurice Barrès relates that when Moréas was on his death-bed, he said to the former: "There aren't classicists and romanticists; that's all nonsense. I am sorry to be in such poor health that I can't explain this to you."

The Anglo-French Review, of London, whose chief aim is to draw France and England more closely together, seems to be prospering. Beginning with the April number, it contains sixteen more pages than the earlier numbers. One of the French articles is by Léon Bourgeois, President of the League of Nations, "where we soon hope to find representatives of the United States," he says. M. René Puaux, the Paris publicist, writes on "La Turquie et l'Entente," and has this to say of our non-participation in the matter: "The absence of the United States was a great disappointment to the English Government. America's acceptance of the mandate for Constantinople and Armenia has long appeared to be the ideal solution of the difficulty. British statesmen gave it their warmest approval, and the withdrawal of America has compromised the whole question. It is easily understood that the additional responsibility thrown on France and England by this lack of collaboration on the part of the United States has been a source of considerable anxiety to those two Governments." There are three articles on Prohibition, the last by Dr. Leonard Williams, one of the leading London physicians, being entitled "Pause for Pussyfoot," in which it is stated that "the white man is not at home on the American Continent . . . the race will die out . . . the black man will shortly be complete master of the United States, and the white man become a rare bird"; and all this will be due to "this experiment of Prohibition." John Gould Fletcher contributes a poem, "In the City of Night," which he dedicates "to the memory of Edgar Allan Poe."

A writer in the Temps hails Montessori's plea for periodical instruction in silence as a fortunate reaction against the verbosity of pedagogues, which causes hypertrophy of the children's memory at the cost of their reasoning faculty and their critical sense. A bath of silence is what the brain needs most of all. Too much talking is going on all over the world, but especially in Latin countries. There people get intoxicated with the spirit of words. If, from childhood, people were taught the virtue and the practice of silence, sound common sense would not so often be wasted by "la melomanie de la phrase." But, unfortunately, it is the wagging tongue itself which must help us to fight its intemperance. Conferences, meetings, reports, with their immoderate waste of words, are the only means of persuading the talking crowds of the boon of silence.

Of Heine's "Buch der Lieder" the sixtieth edition recently appeared in Berlin. The same firm, Hoffman & Campe, which published the original issue, brought out this latest edition of the book. The publishers claim to have brought half a million copies into circulation.

Boris Brasol's "Socialism vs. Civilization" (Scribner) consists of six chapters. Chapter I describes the theory and the aims of Marxian socialism; Chapter II criticises the Marxian system; Chapter III describes the socialistic experiment in Russia; Chapter IV discusses the socialistic excuses for its failure; Chapter V sketches the socialistic agitation abroad and at home, and Chapter VI contains the author's positive suggestions for remedying the defects in the existing order. In offering opinion on his book a sharp distinction should be drawn between the first four chapters and the last two; the book would be twice as good with the last two eliminated.

In his study and criticism of Marxian socialism Mr. Brasol states the case lucidly and persuasively. This sort of thing has been done before and well done—by Simkhovitch for instance and by Skelton—but it is always worth doing again when it is done well, and Mr. Brasol has done it. His description of the Russian "experiment" is interesting as a broad outline sketch, although it adds little or nothing to the knowledge already possessed by an intelligent reader of the daily press. Indeed, it recalls at times the kinds of articles contributed to the Saturday Evening Post by writers of the Marcosson clan. Nevertheless, it will do very well. But when we come to the account of the "socialistic" agitation at home and abroad and to the final chapter —"Revolution or Reconstruction"—there is a swift and sharp decline in both the interest and the value of the book.

Take, for instance, Mr. Brasol's proposals for "reconstruction." He advocates a "counter propaganda" to Socialism by lecture and pamphlet, answering argument and reason by argument and reason. So far so good. But he wants to "curb" revolutionary propaganda, he wants to "deport" revolutionary agitators, he wants to continue war-time restrictions on immigration, he wants to prevent (by law) strikes in "key industries," and to make "picketing" illegal. He wants a "National Institute of Production," under State and Federal auspices to correlate industry and increase productivity. In discussing the "labor" situation he deals rapidly with "bonuses," "conciliation," and such matters, but seems to be unaware of the problems commonly described in the phrase "industrial democracy." None of this is very helpful. Some of it reads a little like the kind of "happy thoughts" that come to one sometimes in connection with problems which one imperfectly understands.

Georges Eekhoud, the foremost French-writing novelist of Flanders, the author of "La Nouvelle Carthage," "L'Autre Vue," "Les Fusillés de Malines," was, after the armistice, dismissed as instructor at the Brussels Academy of Plastic Arts. He had incurred official disgrace by his pro-Flemish attitude during the German occupation. Unlike his countryman, Maurice Maeterlinck, who, though born at Ghent, in the heart of Flanders, has abused the Flemings as "rustres" and "lourdauds," Eekhoud has not become estranged from his own people by the fame which his writings have won him in France. As a protest against the disgraceful treatment of a great artist and patriot an imposing indignation meeting was held on March 27, in the Lyrical Theatre at Brussels. Both French and Flemish writers of Belgium, artists, teachers, students, men of all classes and professions, joined in an impressive homage to the victim of official ostracism.

Dr. A. Eekhof, Professor of Theology in the University of Leiden, is preparing for publication a history of the Pilgrim Fathers' life in Holland, from 1608 to 1620. The book will derive its chief interest from facsimiles of original documents discovered by the author in the Dutch archives, amongst others the only known signature of John Robinson, which has supplied a key to fresh discoveries in England, and the last will of John Robinson's widow, Bridget White, made in the year 1643. Two of the Pilgrim Fathers, William Brewster and Thomas Brewer, had a printing business in Leiden, of whose output little was known until now. Dr. Eekhof, however, has been fortunate in finding two booklets that came from their press, a discovery which will make his book attractive to bibliophiles and all those who are interested in the history of printing. It will be a lasting contribution to the tercentenary celebration of the Pilgrim Fathers' landing at Plymouth, in which Holland intends to take a prominent part.

The Trembling Year

"AS yet the trembling year is unconfirmed," says the poet of "ætherial Mildness." He was the poet of a formal age, yet now and then he looked the fact in the face.

> Winter oft at eve resumes the breeze,
> Chills the pale morn, and bids his driving sleets
> Deform the day delightless.

My neighbors express it in more pungent metaphor—"Looks 's if we was goin' to have winter all summer," says Uncle Everett, with a twinkle in his eye. It is his version of Swift's comment on the talent for the obvious which leads to complaints about the weather: "It is always too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry; but however God Almighty contrives it, 'tis all very well in the end."

At the death-bed of winter we watch with tense longing for his release. We may at first think him dying when he sleeps, but after he has wakened to successive bursts of sound and fury we are fain to think him sleeping when he dies. The snow shrinks to long streaks marking the north faces of swales and ridges. Days rise clear with beneficent sunshine, and sky that you will swear is a different color from that of last week; but by ten o'clock clouds threaten, and before long snow flurries drive past on level winds. But at sunrise crows converse loudly that hitherto have floated silently from top to top of tall pines; bluejays become noisy and conspicuous; nuthatches talk cheerfully; chickadees begin to practise their two spring notes; starlings at a distance bring you to a halt listening for a new song that is not of winter. Slants of sunlight from a higher angle make you think you see a livelier iris in colored mists of willow and poplar twigs. Sunday walkers triumphantly exhibit budded pussy willow, but to me he is a prophet without honor, for he dwells on my own premises, and year after year I have seen him slyly bud a few twigs on a warm day after early cold in November and trust to his fur to carry him through. In the open the snow dwindles to untidy patches like old newspapers blown about and lodges, but for a month yet it will linger as a silver undertone to blue veils in the hills. Wet streaks on the trunks of maples come not from melting ice but from bleeding branches broken in winter gales. Sugar maples don their spring buckets, and flies and bees that come to taste the sap tell me that birds may now come and find food. Then just after the middle day of March comes a morning when I snap broad awake with a pervasive sense of well-being as from good news felt but not remembered. It is the murmurous rejoicing of the bluebirds, so eagerly awaited that it has entered my ears with pleasure before it reached my consciousness. I go to the window and see them drifting northward in short flights from bough to bough of the bare maples against a sunrise sky. Thereafter my mind is at peace; any further activity of winter I know to be his death flurry, at which the year may tremble but not I.

Windless days come with skies that shed warmth like a benediction. At the foot of a south-facing brick wall, crocuses bloom close to the ground. Daffodils impale dead leaves and lift them on the points of their spears. The rhubarb pushes the mold upward with gnarled crimson fists which meet the sunshine and relax to show the tight-packed convolutions of the new leaves. On the edge of the ditch skunk cabbage protrudes its mottled horns. Then for a week the sun sheds no blessing. The wind howls from the north; the earth stiffens about the crocuses and their heads are smothered in snow. Next come slants of white rain dissolving the new snow, and the song-sparrow sings bravely. The tone of the fields has deepened from dead khaki to olive drab and forestry green. Regiments of cornel and willow shoots make vague blurs of crimson and chrome yellow. Red maple buds have turned back their tiny blood and orange scales, and make clouded color through the rain. By degrees the rain softens to cold mist. A breeze stirs the curtains of the mist, tosses them, sweeps them away in shreds. The whole air moves, and the fog takes up its march toward the eastern hills. The sky is revealed as fleets of slaty clouds beating eastward on a reef breeze with patches of open blue widening and closing in their wakes.

Not all the myriad shades of young green that ethereal mildness in its course spreads on our hillsides can transcend the beauty of the mist-like, subtly blended colors of bare twigs in this time of the trembling year. At no other season is there such variety of shade and tone save in autumn—but autumn flaunts her clothes, the young year trembles through diaphanous veils. Colors that are plain to name when you look at them closely in small bits, under any effect of blur, such as distance, atmosphere, or indirect vision, blend in combinations that defy one's vocabulary. I know an elderly pitch pine, the trunk of which, when "with hands in my pockets I saunter up close and examine it" has clearly two main colors, terra cotta and silver gray. If I look just past the trunk at something beyond, the effect is the same as if I look at it from a distance; the color becomes a nameless pink compounded of silver and terra cotta. So it is with the thickets of bushy alder and birch, which run the scale of color from pale mauve to wine-dark purple according to permutations or combinations of light, moisture, and distance. Near by and seen against the sun, alder twigs are a dark indeterminate brown, and the sun glints white on the glossy bark. At a little distance, with the sun to one side, you see the white of the sun-glint mingle with the color of the bark to make mauve. The pinker tones, mauve, violet, lavender, appear when the bushes are near by and in stronger light; distance, shadow, or atmosphere (moisture, dust, or smoke in the air) gives them more blue.

Such colors, hesitant and undetermined, are fit vesture for the trembling season, but one there is more daring than anything of autumn, which if it were not of fairyland would set the world on fire. On a little knoll that catches a level ray from the late afternoon sun, I have found a pool of spirit light blended of moon and opal, glowing with the incandescence of a sunset cloud. It comes from a quilt of moss; I have found no one yet to tell me its name, but the children know it for its forest of thread-like stems each upholding its little vase which in summer they love to undress, taking off the tiny Tam o' Shanter cap and woolly shirt. The sunlight mingles and touches to fire the colors of the glossy stems, ranging from crimson through orange and chrome to pale green. They dissolve their color in the light as in liquid or in lambent flame, a radiance incredible in anything so tiny. True Thomas himself, "spying ferlies wi' his ee" as he lay on Huntley bank, saw no gayer sight unless it was through just such fairy woods blazing with the fire of spring that he saw the Queen come riding.

Now less oft at eve does winter resume the breeze; morn is no longer pale and seldom chilled, and if the day is delightless it is no recurrence of driving sleet that deforms it. Willows along the river rise like rounded clouds of faint green smoke. Shad and wild cherry float drifts of blossoms like pale sunshine in woods and hedgerows. "Brightness falls from the air" where the sugar maple hangs out its delicate tracery of pale green blossoms. The trembling year is quite confirmed.

ROBERT PALFREY UTTER

Books and the News

France

WHILE some of the public men who greeted King Albert in America thought it necessary to remind him that we do not really believe in kings, there came from Speaker Gillett, in Congress, a truthful and manly acknowledgment of our debt to the nations which suffered the first and hardest blows against civilization. He introduced the King as "our friend, our ally, and our defender." To Belgium and to France, as the champions of liberty, must go the gratitude of every lover of liberty. The "intellectuals," in England and America, signally fail to show that they possess any intellects whatever, when they try to prove their devotion to human freedom by defending Germany, and snarling at France.

The true France, and the relations towards her which will be maintained if believers in democracy prevail in America and Great Britain, have been set forth in a number of books by writers in both countries. An English view, written during the war by Laurence Jerrold, is "France Today" (Murray 1916), a study of various sides of French life, government, and politics. Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant's "French Perspectives" (Houghton, 1916), and Edith Wharton's "French Ways and their Meaning" (Appleton, 1919) are brief books. Mrs. Wharton, for writing this book, is denounced as a snob by a critic in the New Republic, who naturally resents a good word for any countries except Germany and Bolshevik Russia. Visits during the war resulted in Winifred Stephens's "The France I Know" (Chapman, 1918). Another English book is "My French Year" (Mills & Boon, 1919), by Constance E. Maud. Herbert Adams Gibbons, in "France and Ourselves" (Century, 1920), publishes

(Continued on page 494)

The Best is the Cheapest---

Crocker-Wheeler Motors represent the highest achievement in motor manufacturing. Their installation is a real economy—which manifests itself in uninterrupted performance and lasting service.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York, Boston, Syracuse, Chicago, Cleveland, Birmingham

Pittsburgh, Newark, New Haven, Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco

Just Published

THE LIGHT HEART

By Maurice Hewlett

This is the latest stirring tale of the Norse country by the best known—and probably the greatest—of the medieval romancers. It is a vigorous story—the kind Americans like—full of action and adventure and about interesting people. Price, $2.00

ALL AND SUNDRY

By E. T. Raymond

E. T. Raymond is the author of that delightful collection of pithy word-pictures, "Uncensored Celebrities." "All and Sundry" is another highly amusing collection of uncensored celebrities describing such famous contemporaries as Woodrow Wilson, the Prince of Wales and Foch. Price, $2.25

WILDERNESS SONGS

By G. H. Conkling

Songs and poems of America of today. Price, $1.50

THE CAIRN OF STARS

By Francis Carlin

Irish songs by the author of "My Ireland." Price, $1.50

Among the Spring Leaders

THE GIRL FROM FOUR CORNERS

By Rebecca N. Porter

"A golden California romance to put you into the mood of spring." Now in its second printing. Price, $1.75

THE TURN OF THE TIDE

By Lt.-Col. Jennings C. Wise

Former Secretary of State Robert Lansing says this book is "a real contribution to the literature of the war." Price, $1.50

MANY MANY MOONS

By Lew Sarett

Poems and songs of the North Woods' Indians, with an introduction by Carl Sandburg. Price, $1.50

JANE AUSTEN

By O. W. Firkins

"A book about Jane Austen both new and worth reading" is the verdict of The New Republic. Price, $1.75

9th Printing

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

By Ford Charnwood

"A monograph that gives a masterly analysis of Lincoln's career and character . . . a model of what the historian's work should be."—John Drinkwater. Price, $3.00

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
16 West 44th St. New York

(Continued from page 492)
essays whose aim is to interpret America and France to each other. Robert E. Dell's "My Second Country" (Lane, 1920) resulted from the war, but goes far beyond the war in its historical studies; he avails himself of the freedom of a lover of France to indicate the dangerous situation in which the war has placed her. Clara E. Laughlin's "The Martyred Towns of France" (Putnam, 1919) is healthful reading, especially for those who are overeager to kiss and make-up with an utterly unrepentant Germany.

Some of the pleasant books of travel, and of comment upon French life, written in the days before 1914, are Henry James's "A Little Tour in France" (Houghton, 1884), Mary King Waddington's "Chateau and Country Life in France" (Scribner, 1908), Edith Wharton's "A Motor Flight through France" (Scribner, 1919; first published, 1908), E. V. Lucas's "A Wanderer in Paris" (Macmillan 1909), W. C. Brownell's French Traits" (Scribner), and Barrett Wendell's "The France of Today" (Scribner, 1907).

For a book on the government, there is Ex-President Poincaré's "How France is Governed" (McBride, 1913). A recent history of France, in one volume, which includes the great war, is William Stearns Davis's "History of France" (Houghton, 1919).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Empire Building by Air —Cairo to the Cape

A NEW form of empire-building is in progress. The old venturers who charted unknown seas in quest of adventure and knowledge—those who threaded their slow way across untrodden continents—their day is done. The sea and the earth have had their share; it is the turn of the skies. The empire-builder of to-day has a new element to play with, new means of swiftly linking up the uttermost corners of the earth.

In the course of one year the ends of the British Empire have been reached by aircraft from England, and the Atlantic has been spanned. News comes that the journey of over five thousand miles from Cairo to the Cape has now been accomplished. Twenty-five years ago and more it was the dream of Cecil Rhodes to build a railway from Cape Town to Cairo—but geography prevented it. The airplane has at last given reality to his dream. And dreams not only his. To reach Cairo by air one passes over the Icarian Sea, and the airway to India lies above Palestine, where Isaiah saw the vision of the six-winged Seraphim, and on through Assyria, where winged creatures adorn the palaces.

The new transport has already made the fame of Sir Frederick Sykes, the Controller of Aviation in Great Britain. It was he who had the vision to perceive that Cairo must become the hub from which radiate the air-routes of the East. The preliminary planning, as in the transatlantic and Australian flights, consumed laborious months. Three survey parties, charged with laying out the most suitable air-route over Africa, were despatched in December, 1918.

The route by air from Cairo to the southernmost point of South Africa is, as they laid it, 5,200 miles. Reckoning 100 miles an hour as a fair average flying speed, only fifty-two hours of actual flying time will be required to traverse the entire continent, a week's journey. The total distance by present means of communication is 6,223 miles, for which anything between sixty to seventy-five days is required, according to ground conditions in certain sections.

Altogether forty-three airdromes have been made—many of them over 4,000 feet above sea level. The difficulties encountered by the survey parties would have been practically insurmountable but for the loyal help of the natives. In places it was necessary to cut airdromes out of dense jungle, to fell thousands of trees and dig up their roots, while the soil of innumerable ant hills had to be removed in native baskets. Some of these ant hills are often 60 feet in height and between 35 and 45 feet in diameter. At N'dola, in Northern Rhodesia, seven hundred natives were working from April to August of last year and roughly 25,000 tons were removed. Blasting was tried but was found to be unsuitable.

Flying risks are perhaps not so grave as in the Australian flight, but they are great enough. It is in the central zone of the journey that the chief difficulties occur. Most of this is covered with dense bush and tropical forest, and landings at other than the prepared grounds will be exceedingly dangerous, if not impossible. In some parts there is no land transport, which makes it difficult to provide the necessary stores at the airdromes. Moreover, at some places the tsetse fly prevents the use of cattle, so that, failing the provision of light motor transport—for which special roads would have to be prepared over some sections—native bearers will have to be used for the carriage of stores. Lions, deadly snakes, white ants, mosquitoes, and other bloodthirsty creatures, together with a shortage of water and an unhealthy climate, do not add to the joys of ordinary travel, and the fact that the survey parties completed their work in twelve months in the face of such obstacles says much for their hardihood.

Each airman proposing to make the journey is furnished with elaborate route directions comprising information as to the prevailing winds and weather conditions at various points; description of any conspicuous landmarks such as may enable the airdrome to be more readily located, of all obstacles, and of the nature of the country surrounding each landing ground; and the distance and location from each airdrome, of the nearest railway, telegraph, doctor, or hospital, and drinking water supplies. He has also been supplied with a diagrammatic weather chart prepared by the Meteorological Section of the British Air Ministry after special investigation of the prevailing weather conditions along the route, showing the normal type of weather to be expected during the various seasons of the year. So far as is possible, pilots will, during the progress of the journey, receive reports of the actual weather conditions ahead of them.

All the pilots have to do is to fly and keep on flying; but in their flights they would do well to hover for one respectful instant above a grave on the heights of the Matoppo Hills.

CUTHBERT HICKS
(Late of the British Air Ministry)

Concerning radical readjustment between the peoples:

"The Brotherhood of Man"

This book by Dr. A. R. L. Dohme is an earnest study of general economic and political conditions. Dr. Dohme concludes with an interesting practical outline for a World State and new human relationships. By mail, $1.10.

THE NORMAN, REMINGTON COMPANY
Publishers - Baltimore

Drama

Ibsen on Grand Street—Gilbert on Broadway

A PERFORMANCE of "John Gabriel Borkman" was given on April 24 at the Neighborhood Playhouse by the School of Drama of the Carnegie Institute of Technology. It was not a performance in which the lovers of Ibsen or lovers of the exhibit of promise in amateurs could take any unqualified delight. The two leading women had undisciplined voices that sank in quality as they rose in power. Mr. C. F. Steen as Borkman was fortunate in a rich and wisely governed voice, but his personality suggested the fallen cleric or neglected poet rather than the Sir Epicure Mammon who Borkman really is. The other parts were never less than excusable or more than acceptable, with the single exception of Vilhelm Foldal, which Mr. Theodore Viehman acted with a piping innocence that was sound and pleasing. The performance, of which I missed the first act, was rapid and superficial; the meaning has to be coaxed out of Ibsen; and while deliberation is perilous, I suspect that it is by facing and mastering

(Continued on page 497)

MACMILLAN SPRING NOVELS

St. John Ervine's New Novel

THE FOOLISH LOVERS

By the author of "John Ferguson"

In this story of a headstrong, dominating young Irishman and the effect on his life of the conflicting influences of various women, Mr. Ervine has done some of his finest work. It is a realistic, convincing delineation of contrasting character—of the contest between a strong but unguided will and the subtle persuasions of diversely disguised self-interest. To be ready next week.

THE IMPERFECT MOTHER

J. D. BERESFORD'S New Novel

The story of a woman of middle age who leaves her family to elope with a fascinating but characterless lover, of her later meeting with her son at a time when both are in need of affection and sympathy and of their final breach, brought about by the selfishness of her love. This penetrating study of character and temperament is bound to stir the most widespread interest.

JOHN FERGUSON

By St. JOHN ERVINE. New edition with an Introduction by the Author.

"Never have the tragedies of everyday life been presented in dramatic form more truthfully or more poignantly."—The Dial.

"The conspicuous merits of the play consist in its perfect naturalness, its progressive interest, the consistency, variety, and vitality of its personalities, the deep emotional interest, of situations of its hidden machinery. This work puts Mr. Ervine in the first rank of living dramatists." —The Nation.

LABOR'S CHALLENGE TO THE SOCIAL ORDER

By JOHN GRAHAM BROOKS

This careful and exhaustive study of the causes and character of the present widespread unrest is written in a sane and judicial spirit. An inclusive analysis of past and present conditions and a thought provoking discussion of the possibilities of the future make this a work of the utmost importance and timeliness.

MRS. WARREN'S DAUGHTER

Sir HARRY JOHNSTON'S New Novel

Following in the footsteps of "The Gay-Dombeys" this new novel has as its central character a personage from another well-known author's work. It is the intensely interesting story of Vivien, daughter of Mrs. Warren, from the point where Bernard Shaw leaves her in his play, "Mrs. Warren's Profession," and of her effort to attain to an honorable position in the face of her great handicap.

A STRAIGHT DEAL, or THE ANCIENT GRUDGE

OWEN WISTER'S New Book

A book of facts about England and the British Empire, written with the avowed intention of creating a better feeling and understanding between English and Americans. Careful, thorough and authoritative, the work covers a very wide field and is startling in its revelations of England's attitude toward this country today and in many serious situations in the past. $2.00

THE STRANGER

By ARTHUR BULLARD

The meeting of East and West furnishes the background for this new sort of love story, shot through with Oriental color and mysticism and reflecting the author's intimate acquaintance with native life and ways in the old Mohammedan strongholds of North Africa and the Near East.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, Publishers, NEW YORK

The Magazine that Bankers Need

THE ANNALIST is a real aid to bankers because it presents weekly authoritative data that reveals the financial and commercial state of the Nation.

The charts and graphs published in The Annalist make instantly available the facts and figures on bank clearings, Federal Reserve statements, gold holdings, stock and bond transactions, price fluctuations, corporation earnings.

Its pages also include brief, authoritative articles of vital importance concerning the financial and business interests of the country.

Many Thousands of Bankers the Country over
Read The Annalist Each Week

$5.00 A YEAR BY MAIL 10 CENTS AT NEWS STANDS

Advertising Rates on Application

THE ANNALIST

A Magazine of Finance, Commerce and Economics

Published by The New York Times Company,
Times Square, New York

THE ANNALIST, Times Square, New York

Enter my subscription to The Annalist, and send bill for one year.

Name ....

Address ....

38-5-1

(Continued from page 494)
that peril that success in Ibsen performances is achievable. The students tried to play "John Gabriel Borkman" for its Broadway values, values which Broadway perceives to be insufficient.

The play does not show Ibsen's own dramaturgy at its best. Borkman is naturally the central figure, but his relation to the main crisis in Act III is almost peripheral. His death from physical exposure in Act IV ends a good deal, but solves or settles nothing. Moreover, death by the elements in psychical play is an impropriety, and, if the venture into the air be symbolic, death by symbolism in a realistic play seems equally improper.

But the drama has real merits. Borkman is vigorously imagined; what is more, he is one of the few characters in the Ibsen social plays whose own imaginations are vigorous. It is curious that this dreamer should be a business man, and that the artists, Solness and Rubek, should be plodding and mechanical beside him. He fails in business, as they, in their diverging fashions, fail in art; and all three by a startling coincidence, perish in a symbolic re-ascent to irrecoverable heights, Solness on his tower, Rubek and Borkman on the hill or mountain. All three men carry hope into despair, and Borkman in particular, so muscular in paralysis, so indomitable in prostration, attracts and dominates while he grovels and repels. This note of failure impresses us strangely in its reiteration by a successful artist in the height and blossom of his fame.

There are seven characters in "John Gabriel Borkman" (omitting servants); in other words, there are seven avidities. They chase, they seize; their very love is predatory. For a parallel I should have to refer to Gogol's "Inspector-General," or to those Plautine and Terentian comedies in which the characters are all teeth. The thing spares neither sex nor age. In its hopeless survival in the elderly man whose career it has darkened and defiled, it is grim enough; but perhaps its emergence is even more awful in the tenderly reared, gentle, and even amiable lad, whose innocence it has not wholly dimmed. Even the delicate young girl is not fangless. There is a vivid moral—a moral which Ibsen may or may not have purposed or endorsed—in the circumstance that all this greed is fruitless or calamitous. The ruin in the old is manifest; in the young the havoc is foredoomed: Ibsen has not hesitated to make the elopement as farcical as it is wicked, and the future lowers or leers at us through the transparence of its useless veil. In the end the desolation is complete; the two haggard women have lost the man, the boy, for whose hearts they have ruthlessly contended. One is dead, the other vanished; and their hands meet in unavailing fellowship across the barren memory and the lifeless frame.

Two special matinees were given last week at the Knickerbocker Theatre by the Actors' Fidelity League for the benefit of the Vacation Association, which is mindful of working girls. There was presented a fanciful one-act sketch by Mr. Oliphant Down called the "Maker of Dreams," in which Mr. Kyle, the dream-maker, was fittingly genial, though a little too robust for his stock-in-trade; Mr. Ruben was black-haired, white-faced, and scarlet-lipped, and the midge-like Miss Ruth Chatterton appeared in an equal brevity of gown and speech. The names of Mr. George M. Cohan and Mr. William Collier were capitalized in a double sense for the benefit of the programme; but neither they nor the reasons for their absence were forthcoming. Mr. George Copeland was expert at the piano.

W. S. Gilbert's "Pygmalion and Galatea" was the mainstay of the entertainment. The attractions of this play are considerable; its theme is pointed, its adaptation to the stage is dexterous, its comedy is zestful, and its satire on civilized practices, notably war, is the more deadly, and therefore the more helpful, for the superlative innocence of its mouthpiece. The blank verse keeps out of the way with a beautifully humble perception of the fact that keeping out of the way is the first duty of blank verse in modern comedy. But there are incongruities enough to qualify one's pleasure. A statue comes to life. This is believable only in a very romantic or a very sportive mood. The dramatist's mood is not in the least romantic; hence sportiveness becomes the breath and being of the play. But what place is there in a sportive fabric for the blinding of the scarcely peccant husband, for Pygmalion's final cruelty toward Galatea, for the heartbreak of Galatea's willing relapse into the shielding insensibility of stone—one of the bitterest and at the same time most beautiful indictments of life that misanthropy has ever framed? This is all somehow misplaced. The buoyancies of Sir William Gilbert's roguish little comedy shudder at the advent of these spectres like Florizel and Perdita in the merrymakings of the "Winter's Tale" at the approach of the gloomy and irate Polixenes.

But the incongruities do not end here. Mr. Archer has pointed out with entire correctness the dramatic impropriety of Galatea's retort, "What, a paid assassin!" to Pygmalion's definition of a soldier. What does Pentelic marble know of paid assassins? A statue animated a few hours ago can have no knowledge—not even knowledge enough to give point to its ignorance. But its ignorance must

(Continued on page 498)

Readers of "Parnassus on Wheels" will be glad to know that the whimsical little tale of Roger Mifflin and his caravan bookshop is now in its seventh edition.

CHRISTOPHER MORLEY

is headed for a secure place in our literature. His unique charm has won for him a large public.

The success of his latest book, "Kathleen," is gratifying proof of his growing popularity. His books are:

The Haunted Bookshop
Kathleen
Parnassus on Wheels
Shandygaff

DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.

NEW EDITION

The History of the I. W. W.

By Dr. PAUL FREDERICK BRISSENDEN,

Special Agent, United States Department of Labor, 438 pp. octavo, paper covers, $3.50 net; cloth, $4.00 net; postage for two pounds.

"Invaluable to all those interested in the rise of this sensational organization."—The New York Times.

"Most important study ever made and recorded of the I. W. W."—The New York Call.

Everyone wishing to understand the underlying causes of current industrial unrest should read this book.

Syndicalism in France

By LOUIS LEVINE, Ph.D.,

Special writer, New York World.

229 pp. octavo, paper covers, $1.50 net; cloth, $2.00 net; postage for twenty ounces.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.
Publishers
NEW YORK

Complete Banking Service in Convenient Localities

55 Cedar Street
Broadway at 73rd St.
Madison Av. at 75th St.
125th St. at Eighth Av.

Customers of one office have at their disposal the facilities of all offices.

DEPARTMENTS

Banking — Trust
Mortgage — Coupon
Credit — Transfer & Registrar
Foreign — Municipal Bond
Reorganization — Safe Deposit
Safekeeping of Securities

UNITED STATES MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY

Capital and Surplus, $6,000,000
NEW YORK

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street — Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE

Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mss. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES

Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

(Continued from page 497)

be pointed. One may pity even Sir William Gilbert in the throes of the baffling double problem of keeping Galatea's knowledge down to the point enforced by probability and up to the point required by comedy. A more venial inconsistency is the combination of Greek costume with English manners. When Pygmalion, very properly, sends Galatea to his sister's house for the night, we are moved to search for his address in the British Who's Who.

The all-star performance was by no means of solar brilliancy. The best part was probably Miss Gladys Hanson's handsome, sweeping, and imperious Cynisca. Pygmalion, in Mr. Lester Lonergan's bluff interpretation was rather a man about town than an artist. Miss Fay Bainter as Galatea looked well and posed well, and combined artlessness with instinctive dignity; but her elocution was a little too obviously moulded, and there was a half-doll-like, half-nun-like, quality in her work that took the savor out of her lovemaking. Mr. Sidney Toler and Miss Katherine Hayden were competent in unexacting parts and Mr. J. W. Ransome and Miss Zelda Sears as the art-patron and his wife had a loudness in their behavior which their costumes reechoed.

O. W. Firkins

How Can America Help Europe?

THE British Ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, in an address before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on April 28, urged the participation of the United States in the rehabilitation of Europe. He expressed the conviction that Germany and all Europe would get back to work and life after more or less suffering. "Perhaps there will be disorder," he said, "there may be upheavals, but the people will win through." He added, "The great question you [in the United States] have to decide is this: Are you going to stand by and wait for Europe's troubles to come after you, as come they will, or are you going to help Europe to win through to reasonable conditions? I do not mean help Europe politically, but as a long-range business proposition."

If this question is directed to American business men, the almost universal answer, based upon our desires, would be in favor of helping Europe. The only difficulty is how to render the help so that it will be of permanent benefit both to Europe and to ourselves.

In October, 1919, distinguished delegations of business men and bankers visited this country from England, France, Italy, and Belgium, to attend the International Trade Conference at Atlantic City. On that occasion the utmost friendliness for the problems of Europe was expressed by an assemblage as fully representative of American business as any that ever came together in this country. Ever since then the matter has been receiving the closest possible study, and yet no far-reaching progress appears to have been made. Just what have been the obstacles to carrying out in fact what the business leaders of a great and rich nation almost universally desire in theory to accomplish?

Let us regard the matter briefly, first from the point of view of Europe, and secondly from the point of view of the United States.

From the European standpoint we see the greater Allied nations making heroic efforts to get back to work. In repeated statements the Allied Premiers have recognized the necessity of balancing their budgets. They realize the necessity of increased production in order to provide goods for export to offset their abnormal imports. To a great extent, however, their efforts have been handicapped by the desires of men to work shorter hours at the one period perhaps in the history of the world when enthusiastic and unremitting labor is most called for. Gradually the exports of these countries are increasing and their imports decreasing. England is making rapid progress in this regard, and is amply capable of taking care of herself. Among the Continental countries perhaps the best record is being made by Italy, whose position, as recently described in this country by Professor Attolico, the resident High Commissioner, indicates a thorough practical knowledge of the necessity of reducing inflated currencies and producing up to the maximum of national ability.

With the Central and East Central countries of Europe the situation is different. Recent eye-witnesses of these conditions tell a story which has no parallel in human annals. Millions of people are starving, fields are untilled, factories are idle because of the lack of raw materials, freight cars are not allowed to pass from one country to another because of the lack of mutual confidence and trust. Between two of the newly created countries, instead of a mutual interchange of commodities, there exists a barrier of barbed wire and machine guns. Poland has a million men on the Bolshevik front and, in common with neighboring countries, is flooded with millions of refugees from the horrors of the Russian régime. The idea of extending ordinary commercial credits to such countries, or of making transactions with those countries the basis for the indiscriminate issuance of investment securities to the American public, is, of course, not to be entertained.

We have a stake in this situation. The civilization of America could not continue if the civilization of Europe were to break down. The development of European markets is a vital question for American exporters. Just at present, with an intensified domestic demand, we may look with temporary unconcern on the decline of American exports to Europe. But ultimately, all sentiment aside, we must for our own interest and protection give consideration to the development of markets in Europe. If this is not a matter to be discussed on a credit basis, is it a matter which the United States Government should consider in a less negative way than it has done during the past year?

The normal attitude of business men in times of peace is opposed to Government interference in business affairs. We have more or less assumed that our Government should now step out of active coöperation in European financing, and the American business public as a whole has approved the decision of the Government not to extend further direct credits to European nations. What are we to do, however, when we all admit that the European situation calls for assistance in the shape of raw materials, when an appeal which touches closely both our hearts and our minds is made to us from across the water, and when very little basis exists for transactions on strict business lines? Does the situation involve not primarily economic, but rather political and social, elements of vital significance to the American people as a whole?

The United States Government has invested on behalf of the American people nearly ten billion dollars in Europe. We can only expect repayment of this money when Europe has returned to a producing basis. Is not the United States Government as a lender of credit interested directly in the rehabilitation of its debtors?

There is a further factor bearing on the Government attitude in this trying situation. Under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles there were created in Europe a number of new political units which are of unproved economic strength. The unsettlement of these countries must have a continuing effect upon the orderly progress of the larger and more stable nations of Europe. Without entering at all into the political controversy surrounding the ratification by the United States Senate of the Treaty of Peace and the League of Nations, it must be obvious that until some coördinating body is established in Europe we can not expect to see the economic stability which is the only basis for the transaction of actual business and credit operations on a large scale.

Are we, then, facing a vicious circle? Are we taking the position that we can not extend credits to Europe for the purchase of raw materials in the United States until Europe returns to a stable basis, with budgets balanced and exports on the increase, while Europe takes the position that budgets can not be balanced and production stimulated until raw material is made available by the United States? The normal processes of business have not been able to cut this Gordian knot. From a straight investment standpoint the American business community has been in a most unsatisfactory position, even if the security as a basis for the extension of credits to Europe had been clearly available at all times.

From the American standpoint, it is true that under the Edge Act the machinery of credit has existed for some time. But even those who have had most deeply at heart the desire to help Europe in its desperate situation have not up to this time felt like setting up machinery which would not operate, thus holding out hopes to Europe which would be doomed to disappointment.

Why has it been felt that the machinery would not operate? This point can be touched upon only briefly, but it involves three main considerations. First, let us suppose that a large corporation under the Edge Act is established with capital paid in by banks and other interested organizations and individuals. Where is the management to come from? We have in this country comparatively few men of wide foreign experience who are capable of extending safe credits abroad. The few trained men are all overworked at present in the banks and investment houses of the country. Secondly, suppose the management were to be obtained, is it clear that the kind of sound business which such a corporation would undertake to do could, in fact, be done? Is it not true that the credit need in Europe to-day is greatest where the credit risk is greatest? Would it not be necessary, in order to meet the real crux of the European situation, to extend credits which would not be safe, judged by the usual standards of credit practice? The third point follows naturally from the second. Let us suppose that a corporation were established with $50,000,000 capital, and that this $50,000,000 were used up in the extension of credits abroad. This would be a mere drop in the bucket. Now a corporation established under the Edge Act is authorized to issue debentures for sale to the general public up to ten times its capital and surplus. Under this provision the supposed corporation would be author-

(Continued on page 500)

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.
Established 1818
Philadelphia NEW YORK Boston

International Investments

Our booklet on International Investments, now in its third edition, shows the relation of such investments to the foreign exchanges and gives an outline of certain foreign loans issued in dollars.

Copy on request

BROWN, SHIPLEY & COMPANY
Established 1810
Founders Court, Lothbury
LONDON, E. C.
Office for travelers
123 Pall Mall, LONDON, S. W.

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED

LACKAWANNA

THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

(Continued from page 499)

ized to issue $500,000,000 of debentures. Are we prepared to offer such debentures to the American public as an investment, assuming that we could issue them on a basis of return commensurate with rates obtainable on prime domestic debentures? Could the business community afford at the present time to invite the small investors of this country to come into this situation without stating to them frankly that they were entering not a field of investment, but one of speculation? And if we frankly offer the securities as a speculation, will the small investor be interested to an extent which will have a substantial effect, assuming, as we must, that under the present system of super-taxes the large investor is to a great degree out of the market?

These are some of the difficulties which must be faced in attempting to solve the European problem. The man would be heartless who would say that it ought not to be solved, even though our domestic demands for capital are overwhelming at the present time. The United States is a member of the family of nations and must give heed to the sufferings of its friends and associates. The man would be foolish who would say that the problem had no solution. Somehow, and in some way, it must be solved. But we should be doing an ill service to Europe and should set back immeasurably the education of the American people in foreign investments, which is one of the most vital necessities for the future development of American trade, if we were to proceed now in a hasty and unsound manner. The whole situation needs to be constantly studied with an open mind, and if our earlier conclusions with regard to the leadership of the United States Government must be temporarily revised to meet an emergency situation, we should not hesitate to revise them.

The European puzzle has been receiving the deep and earnest study of the bankers of America. They have not been unfaithful to their responsibilities in this regard, but inexorable facts of a political and social, as well as an economic significance, have determined the financial history of the world during the last eighteen months. Unfortunately, this history could not be shaped by the impulses which have come from the hearts of American businessmen.

The eyes of millions will be focused on the forthcoming conferences to be held in Brussels and in Paris. If these conferences develop no constructive plans they must be followed by others until in some way, some sound and permanent way, the problem is carried forward toward solution. The subject requires from now on the continued sympathetic attention of the ablest minds in America.

GUY EMERSON

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 53 New York, Saturday, May 15, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 501

Editorial Articles:

Johnson and the Chicago Convention 504

Idealism in Vacuo 505

The Faith that is in Us 506

By-Governments in Germany 507

Give Hungary a Chance. By Examiner 508

The Jubilee of the Metropolitan Museum. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr. 510

Two Plans for a National Budget. By Ralston Hayden 513

Correspondence 516

Book Reviews:

An Undiplomatic Diplomat 518

Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, and Others 518

Two Major Fabulists 520

"Him of Cordova" 521

The Run of the Shelves 522

Impressions de Voyage II. By Caspar F. Goodrich 522

Educational Section:

English Grammar Schools. By Walter S. Hinchman 523

The Stock Exchange and the "Corner in Stutz." By T. F. W. 524

Books and the News:

America and England. By Edmund Lester Pearson 528

POOR America! How many twisted sentiments are expressed in your name! "If we are to exercise the kind of leadership to which the founders of the Republic looked forward and which they depended upon their successors to establish, we must do this thing with courage and unalterable determination," says the President, meaning that we must sign the treaty without reservations. We had supposed that Washington truly represented the Americanism of his day, yet even the freest interpretation of his words furnishes no authority for such an unrestricted alliance as that for which the President pleads. Mr. Hillquit, for one, is certain that Mr. Wilson has forsworn his American heritage. "We [the Socialists] are practically alone in upholding the somewhat antiquated American ideal of government of the people, by the people, for the people." Poor America! Are you, too, to be "dismembered" by such taking of your name in vain?

WHAT is the matter with the "capitalist press"? Does it not know that it ought to suppress any such outgiving as that of Mr. W. Jett Lauck, the statistician representing the railway unions before the Railroad Labor Board? And if it can't be suppressed, it ought to be tucked away under a little headline in some obscure page of the paper. Instead of that, all the great New York dailies which Big Business hires to keep the people in ignorance display the thing conspicuously, under striking headlines, and without a word of introduction or comment to break its force. Here are the headlines, for instance, in the New York Times:

SAY HUGE PROFITS RAISE LIVING COST

Rail Unions Present Data to Labor Board, Accusing Capital of Profiteering

NOT DUE TO HIGHER WAGES

Where Pay Rose Only 15% Some Retail Prices Went Up 300%, They Assert

MASS OF FIGURES SHOWN

What is the use of carefully concealing from the people what some tenth-rate Socialist orator may have said in Paterson, and then giving them this perilous stuff to feed on? It looks as though our plutocratic rulers were not getting anything like their money's worth out of the editors whom, as everybody knows, they own body and soul.

OUT of the real world in which we are living come two responses to the voice which Mr. Wilson has lifted up in the unreal world in which he dwells, that are worthy of special note. Mr. Taft, in his usual quiet and lucid manner, states the cardinal facts about the treaty as they stand:

> The Lodge reservations leave the treaty nearly as effective as it is without them. The reservations affect only Article X. By insisting on the feature of the treaty which cannot be ratified by the Senate, Mr. Wilson has endangered the entire Versailles peace.
>
> The Lodge reservations preserve the three great things in the treaty; first, the limitation of armaments; second, the settlement of national differences peaceably; third, open diplomacy. Article X is not destroyed but only limited by the reservations. The obligation of the United States to participate in international crises is left to the discretion of Congress.
>
> All the other countries in the League are bound by Article X, but are nevertheless willing to allow the United States to enter under the reservations proposed. Mr. Wilson, however, refuses.

Mr. Bryan dwells not upon the particulars of the compromise, but upon the no less pertinent fact of the demonstrated state of American political opinion concerning it, and concludes:

> Democratic friends of the League of Nations should join Republican friends of the League and by so doing take the issue out of the campaign and speak peace to war-distracted Europe.

If these counsels of common sense were to prevail, if the obstruction of the President's autocratic obstinacy could be removed, the gain to the country and the world would be great beyond the possibility of computation.

MR. HOOVER'S statement about the sugar situation is full of practical wisdom. While blaming the Administration for not having bought last year's Cuban sugar crop, he lays the emphasis chiefly upon what can be done for the present and the future. We are participating, he says, in the world shortage of sugar due to decreased European production, and our merchants are bidding against European Governments for its purchase. One means of remedy to which he points is for our Government to enter into negotiations with the larger European Governments to stop bidding against each other and so secure our fair share of the available supply. But he does not ignore the fact—although he does not sufficiently recognize it—that we are actually getting (however high the price) very much more than our proper share. Mr. Hoover proposes that our consumption of sugar be reduced by immediate rationing of the non-essential consumers. He thinks that the manufacturers of candy, sweet drinks, and other non-essentials would voluntarily coöperate to this end as they did during the war. It occurs to us, however, that if the Government got control of the foreign supply—as undoubtedly Congress could enable it to do even without recourse to any war power—it would have the reins in its own hands in the matter of rationing. On the subject of sugar profiteering Mr. Hoover says:

> The profiteering is international. The situation is as much disliked by the vast majority of our manufacturers and distributers as by the public, for they do not like even to be accused of profiteering. The situation cannot be remedied by the Attorney General's conception that forces of this character can be handled by putting a few people in jail.

Mr. Hoover may or may not have had some thought of Chicago in his mind when he said these things; but nothing is more certain than that if he were in the White House he would act along just such lines in any problem of the kind.

THE Polish offensive, successfully led by General Pilsudski, recalls to mind the hopes of a speedy overthrow of the Soviet Government entertained at the time of General Yudenich's military advance upon Petrograd. The recollection contains a warning against sanguine expectations. We shall probably witness a rallying of Russians, regardless of political convictions, against the menace from abroad, tending to reinforce the resistance of the Red armies. The capture of Kiev is, indeed, an important success for the Poles, which will not fail to make impression upon such neighbors as are coveting part of the Russian bear's skin. Rumania, for one, seems bent on joining the victorious campaign and seizing, across Bessarabia, the port of Odessa. But to encourage such aggression, as appears to be the tendency in Paris, is a reckless policy, opposed to the spirit of the League in which France takes a prominent part, and involving great dangers for the future. For it alienates from Europe those liberal Russian elements which it is hoped will one day recover power at Moscow.

THE factor of chief interest in the further development of the Polish campaign is the attitude of the Ukrainians. Will Petlura, reinstated in power at Kiev, remain loyal to his ally and, if so, will he have sufficient authority to convince the people of the wisdom and the advantages of his policy? These are the questions on the answer to which the success or failure of Pilsudski's offensive will ultimately depend. To owe a debt of gratitude to one's enemy intensifies the passion of hatred, and it will require no small amount of skill and tact on the part of the Poles to spare the mortified pride of their debtors. The debt is twofold. The Polish help will have to be acknowledged in a tangible form as well. What sacrifice Petlura has undertaken to make for Poland's support is still uncertain. That Pilsudski should have been satisfied with a renunciation by the Ukraine of all her claims on East Galicia, provisionally assigned to Poland, is very unlikely. When it comes to paying his promissory note, the Ukrainian alliance and Petlura's personal prestige will be put to a hard test.

THE French Federation of Labor sounds a hopeful note in its appeals to the workers. And its members appear to strike work in ready response, although they are told that they must not allow themselves to be distracted by less essential aims, such as more pay and less work, as this would only belittle the movement and scatter its strength. It is not their individual welfare the workers are asked to help improve, but the welfare of the country, which can not be saved, the leaders assert, by the reconstruction programme of the Government. Only the nationalization of railroads and the adoption of the rest of the Socialist programme can effectively meet the problems now baffling the responsible rulers in Paris. That the nation has little faith in the Socialist gospel became apparent at the last elections. But the scepticism of the patient should not prevent the miracle worker from applying his cure. The initial treatment is of the simplest. It consists in doing nothing whatsoever, and in preventing Work, the real physician, from attending on the sufferer. It is the method of the New Thoughters applied to economic life. But the danger is great that, by the time the patient is deemed sufficiently seasoned for the miracle to take effect, his body may be too exhausted to rise from its paralysis.

IN the happy days of the Great Society we are to depend upon social ostracism, community pressure, and all that sort of thing, rather than upon law, as the corrective of anti-social action. So at least we judge from the speculations of Pluralists, left-wing Liberals, "philosophical" Anarchists, and various other kinds of social seers who have dipt into the future and seen the wonders that will be. It is curious, therefore, to note the wail of protest that goes up from these circles over present-day exercises of this social pressure. Mr. J. A. Hobson, writing in the London Nation, expatiates on the difficulty of an English Liberal in understanding the American idea of freedom. The Englishman demands the freedom to dissent. The American, on the contrary, demands only the freedom to conform. He has the "herd mind"; he is fanatically intolerant; he has a brutal disregard of the claims of private conscience, a contempt for the rights of the minority, and he denies the right of effective criticism of public policy. America is repressive in her laws, but still more repressive in her extra-legal community pressure. "Conformity or trouble" is the popular slogan, and woe be to the non-conformist, especially in times of "war madness." Apparently the social force which is sure to function so ideally in the days of the Great Society is a most tyrannical thing just now.

THE alleged facts given by Mr. Hobson to support his interpretation would better have been omitted. They have been gleaned from various journals of radical propaganda and are, like his generalizations, more or less fantastic. Unquestionably during the war there were, at times and in places, violent and high-handed instances of mob pressure. They were shameful and inexcusable. But so much being said, there is also this to say: first, they were exceptional; and secondly, the provocation was sometimes extreme, and would have been so regarded in any society strong enough to hold itself together. Social pressure can not be restricted to a few carefully chosen fields of action. If it expresses itself against the child-beater and the wife-deserter, it is quite as likely to express itself against the slacker, the plotting alien, the close-fisted usurer, and the vociferous revolutionist. One may rightly denounce its excesses, as any other kind of excesses. But to protest against its exercise in the field of sedition, on the ground that it invades the "rights of the minority," is to demand for the minority a special privilege. A "right" for a minority that enables it, in a life-and-death matter, to annul or obstruct the will of the majority is no right but a charter of exceptional power. The protection of minorities is the security of democracy; but the aggrandizement of minorities is its doom. To whatever Utopia we may come, the community, in its own extra-legal way, is likely always to have something to say to the element that sets itself, in vital matters, against the thing regarded as necessary and right.

BY whom is Japan governed? By the War Office, says Mr. Charles Hodges, who recently gave the readers of the Review a peep behind the financing of China. According to him Premier Hara and Baron Uchida of the Foreign Office are mere stalking-horses behind which the military diplomats skilfully conduct their manœuvres. The charge is borne out by the recent occupation of Vladivostok and the Maritime Province, which is contrary to the wishes of the entire press of the country, and a flagrant repudiation of Mr. Hara's often repeated formula that Japan has no territorial or political ambitions in Siberia. The War Office has tried to justify the action of General Takayanagi by the charge that, while negotiations were on foot between Russian and Japanese commanders, Russian soldiers got out of hand and attacked the Japanese. We can only say that, if this attack was not provoked, it came at an extremely opportune moment—after the Americans had evacuated Siberia and before the Soviet's peace proposals had been answered—to serve as a pretext for an obviously preconcerted operation in the course of which all the Russian forces in the district were attacked by the Japanese and disarmed after a day or two's fighting. "The Japanese military coup can only be explained," says the Japan Advertiser, "on the assumption that it was a predetermined step in the execution of a deliberate policy which appears to conflict with the views of the Cabinet."

PLANS for rushing through Congress a two billion dollar bonus, or donative, for the soldiers are not progressing favorably. Each scheme proposed for charming the necessary funds into the public purse raises difficulties that should finally make plain the impracticability of the whole scheme. It is time for Congressmen to ask themselves whether they may not lose more than they gain by voting the donative. Such a course will win them by no means all the soldier vote and it will lose them the votes of a great many other citizens whose good feeling towards the ex-service men is not a bit less genuine and deep than theirs. Meanwhile, the delays in caring for the maimed are being looked into. Will their chances of receiving proper and speedy attention be better after two billion dollars have been squandered in the form of a bonus? Mr. Taft has put his judgment of the matter plainly: "This bill should not be passed."

WHY coöperative societies, which in a number of other countries have thrived so well, have done so ill in the United States, has long been a matter of much speculation. It seems, however, that the tide has turned, and that during the last decade there has been a considerable growth. There have been, as is well known, striking instances of the success of producing societies, such as the California Fruit Growers' Exchange and various live-stock shippers' organizations; but it is not so well known that there has been a great increase in the number of successful consumers' societies. The Bureau of Labor Statistics has now under way a survey of the coöperative movement in this country, and though the volume of data so far gathered is but meagre, enough is available to indicate the existence of about 3,000 of these societies, with a combined business of some $200,000,000 a year. In the Monthly Labor Review for March, Florence E. Parker summarizes the results of the study so far made. Most of the coöperative stores sell at prevailing market prices, and the monetary benefits to the members come in the form of dividends, based on the amount of the individual's purchases—this being the way in which the great Rochdale coöperative system in England has always operated. The average for the stores dealing in general merchandise is 6 per cent. Indirectly, of course, there is a further monetary benefit; for the presence of a coöperative store tends to prevent profiteering in the neighborhood. But coöperation has other benefits than the merely monetary ones: training in business methods, training in citizenship, encouragement of latent abilities in management, habituation to altruistic modes of thought and action. Not unreasonably have many thoughtful students looked to coöperation as the solution of many of our most vexing social problems.

Johnson and the Chicago Convention

SENATOR JOHNSON will be a formidable figure in the Republican National Convention. The strength he has shown in the popular vote in Eastern as well as Western States establishes that fact beyond dispute. Into the details it is needless to enter, for the real question is not that of his chance of getting the nomination. That chance there is every reason to believe to be very slight. The convention at Chicago will have to take Johnson into serious account not as a possible nominee, but as a vital factor in determining who else shall be the nominee; and the strength that he has been able to muster in the primaries will likewise be a potent consideration in the shaping of the platform.

Two months ago, it seemed to almost all observers that the Republican campaign would be a walkover; to-day no such feeling is possible. Not that the Democratic party has made any gain, either in its standing before the country or in the development of any hopeful candidate. On the contrary, so far as that is concerned, the elimination of Hoover as a Democratic possibility has simplified the situation for the Republicans. The change in the political sky has come from within, not from without, the Republican party itself. The Johnson vote shows very plainly that the party can not count with certainty on being able to present a solid front to its opponent; still less on being able to poll the doubtful or independent vote in any such preponderant measure as seemed certain a short time ago. In what proportions the vote for Johnson is to be ascribed to ordinary political preferences, and in what proportion to a singular medley of various forms of discontent and revolt, may be open to question. But the intensity of feeling, as well as the numerical strength, attested by his following in the primaries, makes it quite certain that a great mass of voters are ready to throw overboard any Republican candidate whom they may find not to their liking.

There is no prospect that this state of mind will be bettered by the proceedings at the Convention. On the contrary, Johnson will make just the kind of fight best calculated to intensify it. And if nothing occurs by way of offset, the Republican party will have a tough job on its hands in the campaign, in case the Democrats put up an attractive platform and a vote-getting candidate. Johnson has indicated that he will not bolt; but whether he stays in the party or not, there is nothing to compel his followers to stay in it. The pro-Germans, the pro-Irish, and the pro-Russians who flocked to his standard in the primaries are not permeated with any profound affection for the Republican party, and would cheerfully take out their disappointment at Chicago in the shape of a vote for the Democratic ticket, if San Francisco gives them a chance. The same is true of other varieties of Adullamite which helped to swell his vote—and that of La Follette—at the primaries; and it is in a great measure true also of the straight radical element in his following. The problem before the Republican leaders at Chicago is that of a possible serious division in their own party, with several weeks intervening for the Democrats to guide themselves by its indications before making their decision—though, of course, it is also true that the Democrats face the possibility of dissension equally serious.

A week or two ago we should have said that this state of things would be sure to compel a most serious consideration of Mr. Hoover's candidacy, although very few of the delegates would be personally inclined to vote for him, and still fewer would be pledged to him. With victory distinctly in doubt, the knowing ones at Chicago will of necessity bend their minds to the task of finding out the means of removing that doubt. Of all the men who are in the running for the nomination, Hoover is the only one whose candidacy would set in motion forces that would powerfully tend to retain in the party, or to draw towards it, elements which are now doubtful, and of which the loss would gravely threaten the loss of the Presidency. Any other of the candidates would mean to those who are holding aloof merely the Republican party's candidate, though perhaps a particularly good one; Mr. Hoover would mean the Republican party's candidate plus Herbert Hoover. And after the kind of fight that is pretty sure to take place at Chicago, a candidate whom hundreds of thousands of voters, without distinction of party, ardently desire to elect on account of their high hopes of what he would do for the country and the world, would be an invaluable asset to the party that nominated him.

Unfortunately for Mr. Hoover's prospects at Chicago, however, the developments of the past two weeks have put a different color on the situation. However gratifying it may be to his followers that he polled fully 200,000 votes in the California primary, the fact that Johnson beat him by 150,000 is a terrible bar to his nomination. The mere fact that, in a contest between two Californians, the one that had a long-established hold on State politics came out victor by a large majority would not in itself be decisive; the trouble comes from the circumstance that to prefer the vanquished to the victor would mean in this case to accentuate Johnson's grievance, and accordingly to increase the danger of mischief from the hostility or the sulking of the Johnson following. If Mr. Hoover had kept out of the primaries altogether, he would be in a far better position.

Apart from the personal aspect of the struggle, there is one cardinal question of policy which has assumed, within the past fortnight, quite a new character. The strength that the Johnson movement has appeared to exhibit—in spite of its relatively poor showing in Indiana and in Maryland—has intensified anti-League tendencies in the Republican camp. We do not believe that the votes in the primaries prove anything as to the judgment of Republican voters generally on the subject of the League. But it will be difficult to deny their negative significance. What has happened can not be reconciled with the idea that there exists any general and deep-seated resentment against the course of the Republican Senators in insisting upon the Lodge reservations. And it will be in the highest degree difficult to draw the line even at that point, in opposition to the stand of the irreconcilables, with Johnson and Borah at their head and with Knox and Penrose backing them up. That the outcome of the contest on the League will be an elastic declaration, leaving the ultimate position to future developments, is likely enough; but the same motives that will dictate such an outcome in the platform will be a powerful makeweight against the nomination of Hoover.

Three full weeks still intervene before the delegates gather at Chicago, and it is not impossible that the atmosphere will undergo a change in that interval. Even more likely is it that when the delegates get together, they will come to realize more clearly than they do now the uncertainty of the party's victory, an idea which to the politicians, as well as to the country at large, has until within a short time been quite unfamiliar. What will be the result of a sober consideration of this, it is impossible to forecast. In the meanwhile, there is one aspect of the situation which might well repay a little public attention. Presidential primaries are still a novelty in our political arrangements, and it behooves us to consider whether they are justifying either the high hopes which some had built upon them or the expenditure of energy and preoccupation which they involve. Would not the actual thought of the country, alike upon issues and upon candidates, have had a better opportunity both for expression and for ascertainment without the interposition of the primaries? Is not the element of chance, as well as that of intrigue and of all sorts of meaningless or factitious combinations, increased through the operation of the primary game? We would not venture to be dogmatic on the subject, but we are inclined to answer both of these questions in the affirmative.

Idealism in Vacuo

If one could forget everything that has happened since November 11, 1918, one might be thrilled by the President's appeal to his party and challenge to its adversary. "It is time," Mr. Wilson exclaims, "that the party should proudly avow that it means to try, without flinching or turning at any time away from the path for reasons of expediency, to apply moral and Christian principles to the problems of the world." The time for not flinching and for disregarding considerations of expediency, if such a time there ever was, has faded into what already seems a dim and distant past. Turn to the President's speech in New York on September 27, 1918. "It will be necessary," he declared, "that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure a secure and lasting peace"; and that price included "not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with." The League of Nations was to be the means of making secure not some kind of settlement or other, but the beautiful and perfect settlement thus foreshadowed. That the thing was impossible was all along sufficiently evident. But, impossible or not in the anticipation, it has certainly wholly disappeared from the fulfillment. The flinching, the turning aside "for reasons of expediency," began at Versailles. Of the thousands who were ready enough to take for reality a dream of to-morrow, there are few indeed who will accept a dream of yesterday as a substitute for the bald truth of to-day.

Not less discordant with Mr. Wilson's dream is what has happened not in the councils of diplomats but in the actions of the peoples. "National purposes," he declared in that same speech, "have fallen more and more into the background, and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place." Ask the Italians, ask the Jugo-Slavs, ask the Rumanians, ask the Greeks, ask the Poles, ask the Irish, whether they have become completely indifferent to "national purposes" and are concerned only with "the common purpose of enlightened mankind." Or again, take the very instrumentality through means of which the great dream was to be fulfilled. Long before the struggle began in the Senate, long before America loomed up as the chief obstacle that Mr. Wilson was to encounter in the execution of his grand design, the central idea of the League as originally conceived had been abandoned. Although Mr. Wilson, even so late as his Manchester speech on December 30, 1918, had declared that the United States "will join no combination of power that is not a combination of all of us," the League from its very inception wholly excluded the Central Powers and Russia, and was constructed upon a basis of dominance by the five Powers whose martial strength had achieved the victory. As for the terms imposed upon the vanquished, however just or however necessary, they left the defeated nations in just such condition of prostration, and with just such feelings of bitterness, as have been the result of devastating wars in all those past ages in which men were still walking in the darkness of national animosities and rivalries, of national fears and suspicions.

All this is no reason why we should not strive to raise the world to a higher plane of action, and, above all, to lessen in every possible way the danger of reoccurrence of the appalling calamities of war. But it should be a reason for recognizing that the duty of a statesman is to strive for what is attainable, not to exhort for what is palpably unattainable; still less to put to hazard the good that is clearly within his grasp, upon the most tenuous of gambler's chances of attaining something better.

At no time since the President returned from Europe has he evidenced the slightest feeling of responsibility for the awful loss which his obstinacy might inflict upon the world. Last summer he could have had the treaty ratified with reservations which, except from the point of view of one blindly addicted to the carrying out of his own wish, evidently left the League but slightly, if at all, impaired in its potentialities for good. The feeling of the country was then strongly with Mr. Wilson. Had he yielded something, public opinion would have seen to it that he got the rest. Week by week, month by month, not only the prestige of the President, but the authority of the League idea has steadily declined. The latter has happened for bad reasons as well as for good; but it has happened. The delay and the wrangling have given opportunity for fanatics and demagogues, as well as for sincere and earnest upholders of what they conceive to be America's own requirements, to incite hostility to the treaty. Sinn Feiners and pro-Germans, Socialists and Bolshevists, have gathered head in their opposition. Nowhere is there any sign that attachment to the Covenant without reservations has grown; on the contrary, thousands of sincere Americans have been won over to the idea that reservations are necessary. But so far as Mr. Wilson is concerned, nothing whatever has happened. He nails his colors to the mast. Let the ship go down if it will, but never let it be said that Woodrow Wilson has yielded a jot or tittle to save it. Some may be tempted to say that this is magnificent, if it is not statesmanship; for our part, we can not find that magnificent which must be ascribed at least as much to colossal self-esteem as to any more honorable origin.

The Faith that is in Us

"THE trouble with the Review," writes one of our readers, declining to renew his subscription, "is the same as that which the Apostle Paul found with the Church of Laodicea." The trouble with the Church of the Laodiceans was that it was "neither cold nor hot," but "lukewarm." Whether our candid friend bases his judgment on the general character of the Review or on its attitude in regard to some cardinal issue, we are left to conjecture. We think we may safely assume, however, that what he has in mind is not that fairness in controversy which so many of our correspondents have recognized as a virtue, but the actual position the Review has taken upon several phases of the struggle against Socialism and disloyalty. There are doubtless others who find the same objection. But their state of mind, we take it, is not unlike that which, as we have been reliably informed, is prevalent among many of the good up-State members of the New York Legislature in regard to Mr. Hughes. "What has come over the Governor," these people say, "has he turned Socialist?" But surely nothing can be less Laodicean than such a protest as Mr. Hughes made against the proscriptive mania which took possession of the Legislature at Albany during its recent session. Mr. Hughes was not lukewarm, he was hot; and he was hot, not because of any feeling in favor of the Socialists, but because of a most intense feeling in favor of the institutions which the Socialist movement is designed to destroy.

If intolerance were the true measure of loyalty, if readiness to resort to extreme measures at the first alarm were the true test of faith in our institutions, then that man would be the best American who was ready to go the greatest length in suppressing Socialist publications, in excluding Socialists from legislative bodies, in enacting laws giving to administrative officers sweeping and arbitrary powers for the hounding down of every kind of dissenters. But to our mind it is not those who oppose such measures, but those who uphold them, that are the men of little faith. If our institutions are built upon sand, then, to be sure, we must gather in frantic alarm at the first sign of storm. But if they are built upon a rock, we must trust to the strength of the foundations to resist its onset. And the figure does less than justice to the actual situation; for what the headlong defenders, whether at Albany or at Washington, are so ready to do is to loosen the foundations themselves for the sake of finding material with which to meet the attack. Proscription and intolerance may, indeed, afford temporary relief from immediate danger; but they lessen for good and all the resources upon which we must rely for permanent safety.

Nor is the question solely one of method or policy. Speaking for ourselves—and we believe we may speak also for the men of whom Mr. Hughes is a type—we feel it quite safe to say that we are far more deeply attached to the fundamentals that are at stake in the issue of Socialism against individualism than are those who so readily forget the traditions of liberty in their eagerness to avert immediate peril to the existing order. Let some proposal be made which has in it the most dangerous germs of paternalism, but which does not on its face bear the Socialist brand—a proposal which looks comfortable and desirable from the standpoint of immediate interest—and you may be sure that many of those who are keenest in the heresy hunt will welcome it without a qualm. What we are concerned about is the essentials of that structure of Government and society which has been built up by a people of self-reliant freemen; and we mean to defend that structure against danger, whether it be threatened by the hostility of enemies or by the thoughtlessness or ignorance of those who regard themselves as its friends.

The future of democracy in America is hanging in the balance. It is our hope, and our confident belief, that it will come out triumphant from this time of trial. But if it is to do so, we must be willing to abide the test. We must show reason for the faith that is in us. We must be willing to let all comers do their best to show that it is not worth preserving, and we must do our best to show not that it is without fault, but that with all its faults it is a precious heritage which it would be madness to cast aside. If it be Laodicean to hold that this can be done, if it be Laodicean to believe that it will be done, then we are Laodiceans. But if constancy of purpose and sincerity of conviction are to be measured rather by a steady and quiet adherence to the faith than by violent and spasmodic manifestations of panic or intolerance, then we can not admit the justice of the impeachment.

By-Governments in Germany

THE development of affairs in Germany since the farcical five days' rule of Dr. Kapp bodes little good for the Government which, after that reactionary intermezzo, was constituted as the result of a compromise with the German trade unions. The general strike called with the sanction, if not at the request, of Herr Bauer's Cabinet, for the defense of the Constitution against the counter-revolutionary menace, proved an equally effective weapon, as soon as that menace was averted, for rendering the lawful Government submissive to the will of Labor. Herr Legien refused to sheathe the sword until the Government which it had served to defend had yielded to his demands. The ultimatum of the Trade Unions, as whose spokesman he acted, required, among other things, that they should be consulted, for this once to be sure, in the reconstruction of both the Imperial and the Prussian Ministries, and that a People's army should be formed from members of trades unions only.

A writer in the New Europe, on the assumption that "it is the lack of a direct voice in the state which frequently pushes trade unions into the uneconomic path of strikes," expresses his belief that "the squaring of the two conceptions, of the old state relying on a non-professional local basis and of the professional unions, may supply a fruitful chapter in modern constitutional development. The experiment made, in several countries in Europe, with proportional representation which, eliminating the local constituency, makes the squaring of the two conceptions superfluous, has shown how simple and easy that constitutional development is. Any group of professionals whose members are scattered over the country can, under that system, vote as a unit at the polls and, according to its numerical strength, send one or more of its candidates to Parliament, there to defend the interests of their particular profession. A railwaymen's brotherhood, an actors' union, an association of school teachers, a farmers' league, a policemen's federation can each acquire, in this way, a direct voice in the state. But nowhere has the principle been accepted that these many voices shall, except through their power in the Parliament, have a say in the formation of the Government.

It is this fear lest the Government's compliance with Legien's ultimatum should create a dangerous precedent for repeated assaults, from the side of the unions, upon the independence of the Government, which has become an element of dissension between the coalition parties supporting the tottering governmental structure. There is little hope of a continued co-operation, after the elections, between Majority Socialists, Democrats, and Catholics, and it will be by the merest chance if the building erected on such infirm pillars does not collapse before that time. The old opposition within the Centre party against the policy inaugurated by Erzberger in 1917, which raised its head again after the latter's fall, is gathering additional strength from the Government's weakness, and this agitation among the Centrists for a rupture with the Majority Socialists is the signal for a renewal of the Catholic movement in the Rhineland against the centralized state under the control of Berlin.

But it is not only in the Rhineland, where anti-Prussian sentiment makes for disloyalty to the Prussianized empire, but also in the south of Germany that the Government's lack of backbone is causing a reaction unfavorable for Berlin. In a communiqué jointly issued, some weeks ago, by the Governments of Bavaria, Württemberg, Baden, and Hesse, a protest was raised against the disbandment of the "Einwohnerwehren," which the Government will be forced by the Entente to carry through. Their maintenance, the message declares, is a matter of the most vital importance to the South German States. It is not this protest, which, indeed, is serious enough in itself, but the way in which the Governments in question thought fit to enter it, that is an ominous sign for the authority of Berlin. The South German States are duly represented in the Reichsrat, where their spokesmen can advocate their dissentient opinions. By choosing the unusual way of a joint official communiqué they gave to their protest the character of a move against the Central Government, whose authority seems to be challenged by an interstate alliance within the Empire. The declaration of the Bavarian Minister-President that Bavaria, even at the risk of a rupture, would maintain its standpoint, was hardly calculated to dispel that impression.

A difficult task, therefore, awaits Comrades Müller and Köster at the Spa Conference. Nominally representing the Imperial Government, they will feel the force of their own arguments impaired by the painful consciousness that whatever they yield or gain will be challenged, if not disavowed, by a power at home which they lack the means of constraining. If they pledge themselves to the disbandment of the "Einwohnerwehren," the whole of South Germany will be united in resistance against the orders to that effect from Berlin; if, on the other hand, the improbable should happen, and they should succeed in persuading Millerand to consent to the retention of those forces, they will be faced with another ultimatum from Labor, reminding them of their pledge that only members of the Trade Unions shall be deemed worthy of maintaining order at home and safety on the borders. The interference of by-Governments threatens to paralyze all initiative of the central authority in Berlin.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Give Hungary a Chance

A GOOD deal of newspaper and periodical space is devoted in these days to denunciation of the Hungarian Government. If these articles, published in the Nation, the New Republic, and various Socialist papers, were merely a collection of scandalous stories like that about Lieutenant Freiszberger, who amused himself one evening by hanging eight men in his own bedroom (Nation, April 5), they would not be worth answering, because the good sense of American readers could be trusted to class them along with the tales of Baron Münchhausen. But they are so clever a combination of truth, complete falsehood, and dangerous half-truths that it would be unfair to Hungary to pass them unnoted. The United States is technically at war with Hungary still, but it is characteristic of Americans to demand fair play even for an enemy, and it should be the aim of the American press to point out and support European efforts towards reconstruction of economic life wherever they occur, rather than to dwell on the inevitable faults of a new Government that has not yet gained full control of the disorganized nation.

The various anti-Hungarian articles purport to be discussions of the present Government of Hungary, yet every bit of evidence concerns a period before the present Government assumed office in the middle of February of the present year. The origin of the statements made is interesting. They are almost invariably drawn from Az Ember, a radical paper published in Vienna by Hungarian political refugees, or from the Arbeiterzeitung, another Vienna paper controlled by the extreme Socialists. Any one who is familiar with the present-day Vienna press knows the depths to which it has fallen; knows also how often the sensational news printed in these two papers has been investigated by Allied missions and shown to be entirely without foundation. Yet, without investigation, the wild statements of Az Ember are retailed to American readers as sober fact. These articles, reprinted in America, not only ignore dates but ignore the relationships of the various Hungarian leaders mentioned. Friedrich and Horthy are always coupled as though their policies and ideals were the same, but as a matter of fact Horthy, the present ruler, dislikes Friedrich and all that he stands for, and endured him for a time for political reasons, just as President Wilson, for a much longer time, endured his association with Mr. Bryan. Friedrich exerts no influence in the present Hungarian Government and holds no office. He is a man of very small calibre, narrow-minded, reactionary. He came into power partly through pushing himself to the fore at a time when Hungary had no big men to take charge after the Bela Kun gang escaped with their plunder; and partly because, as a vociferous opponent of Socialism, he represented in the popular mind the antithesis of Bolshevism. Sir George Clerk firmly refused to recognize, in the name of the Supreme Council, any Government of which Friedrich was the head, and only permitted him to have a place in that Government because he so clearly represented the opinion of the vast majority of the Hungarian people. Horthy is a very different personality. He was the head of the Hungarian army and had won the unanimous approval of the country by his loyalty to Hungary in his dealings with the Rumanians and by the moderation of his policies. He has not yet shown himself a great man, but he is a thoroughly honorable man who is trying to do his best under very difficult circumstances. He was never a supporter of the Archduke Joseph. He did not invite the ex-Emperor to reëstablish the Hungarian monarchy, but may well have been in correspondence with him for the purpose of securing his formal abdication. Such are the two men who are usually classed as partners in crime.

The following, in a few words, is an attempt to tell the truth about Hungarian conditions, an attempt made from the American point of view, not from the radical Socialist point of view. It is based on facts, not rumors, and is more concerned with pointing out the good than the bad, although it aims not to ignore the bad where it exists.

The reason for most articles in the American press on the evils of the present Hungarian administration is the flow of rumors from Vienna as to Hungarian treatment of the Jews. It would be absurd to deny the fact that Hungary is anti-Jewish; it is. It would be absurd to assert that Jews always receive fair treatment in Hungary; they do not. But before the Hungarian Government is condemned on this account it is well to look the facts straight in the face. The Jews, of whom there are many in Hungary, are far better businessmen than the Magyars, and have got into their hands most of the banking and general industrial life of the country. For Magyar men of business to hate them for this is unfair and deplorable, but is human nature. The hatred of the Magyar peasant for the Jew has more foundation. The Jews control a large part of the agricultural lands and they have got that control through the exploitation of the peasants, lamentably ignorant in money matters. In the larger dealings the Jews of Hungary have succeeded through superior business acumen; in the smaller dealings they have succeeded through usury and sometimes through trickery. They were the most obvious profiteers during the war, and the people hate them also for that. They swarmed into Budapest from Galicia at the time of the Russian advance and have refused to go back to their homes because they like better the small business opportunities of the city. But Budapest, like Vienna, is overcrowded and desperately short of food. Its population has almost doubled. For this reason it has been necessary to concentrate in camps in the country thousands of refugees, the majority of whom happen to be Jews. But these refugees are not, as is often asserted, starving and dying in typhus-infested camps. The Hungarian Government is doing the best it can for them, and a commission sent by the International Red Cross—an organization famous for its fearless outspokenness—reported the camps to be in excellent condition, sanitary, well-managed.

The Jewish question would have been serious enough for the reasons stated. It is critical because Jews were the leaders in the communist régime and because in consequence the average Magyar sees in every Jew a potential Bolshevist. Years of dislike have been intensified by the terrible memories of the Soviet and, try as it will, the Government can not prevent all manifestations of a hatred made more dangerous through fear. But in spite of this there have been no pogroms. There have been murders. In Kecskemet the Inter-Allied missions estimated that twenty-five or thirty persons were murdered. But the statement in the Nation that "the acts of Horthy's White Army exceed any excesses of the Bolsheviki" is not only a lie but a stupid lie, because all the facts, as distinguished from slanderous rumors, disprove it. A good example of specific rumors quoted as fact by the American Socialist press is, as the Nation phrased it, "the treatment of certain well-known Hungarian intellectuals—specifically the condemnation to death of Andreas Lazko." Leaving aside the fact that the plural is used for the single case cited, the truth is that Andreas Lazko has not been condemned to death, has not even been arrested, but is living quietly in Hungary. This information, obtained directly from the American Commissioner in Budapest, ought to give pause even to those whose aim in life is to defame every Government that is not radically socialistic.

Neither Az Ember nor the Arbeiterzeitung can endure the fact that in the elections in Hungary the Socialists failed to make any showing whatever. A certain Mr. Bagger, writing in the New Republic of March 17, produced a somewhat labored argument to prove that the elections were not fair, but this argument is contrary to the statements of Americans who were on the ground. It is true that some adherents of the fallen Bolshevist régime were in prison on criminal charges, but the number was negligible and, had they been at large, they could not have affected the issue. The truth was and is that the only Socialists in Hungary are found among the laboring classes in the cities. At the most generous estimate they do not number over five per cent. of the population, and the remaining ninety-five per cent. were determined to do away with all danger of a Socialist régime. Like the Bolshevist Pravda in Petrograd, however, the Socialist papers of Vienna can not endure the rule of the majority unless the majority happens to agree with their own views. Their purpose, therefore, is to discredit the Government of a majority which, in Hungary, very nearly represents the will of all of the people, and to do this they stoop to all kinds of fantastic slander, attacking even the representatives of the United States.

On December 17, 1919, the Arbeiterzeitung said of the Kecskemet massacre:

> An American Commission which visited Kecskemet found sixty-two corpses lying unburied and hanging on the trees of a neighboring forest. This paper is in a position to prove by an official document that this wholesale murder was committed by order of the functionaries of the Hungarian State with the knowledge of the highest authorities and of the Ministry of Justice, and that it was hushed up, though the number of victims is said to be about five thousand. The Allied Powers are about to conclude peace with this Government of murderers and thus to receive them into the community of civilized humanity. The Rumanians kept these men in check, but hardly had they left when the slaughtering began. English, French, and Americans did not permit them to protect the lives of these miserable people. The American Colonel Yates undertakes the supreme control over the Brachialgewalt, that is, the new forces. And now under the Stars and Stripes of the United States, who could hold back these monsters, the murderous work will go on.

This statement was sent by the American Commissioner in Vienna to General Bandholtz in Budapest, who answered:

> Every statement in this article as received and regarding Americans is false. No American Commission visited Kecskemet. Col. Yates returned to his permanent duties in Rumania over three weeks ago. The American member of the Inter-Allied Military Mission was relieved from same on December 13. Report that Col. Yates undertakes supreme control over the new forces and that murderous work is going on under the Stars and Stripes of the United States is inexpressibly false and libelous, and it is requested that prompt and efficacious action be taken to adequately punish the perpetrators, to force the Arbeiterzeitung to retract its false statements, and to prevent a repetition of such a scurrilous publication.

The Arbeiterzeitung made a half-hearted retraction of this particular tale, but both it and Az Ember have continued to publish equally libelous and false statements and to attack at will the so-called "capitalistic Government of the United States," and its various agents in Central Europe, when the result of the investigation of these agents does not agree with the preconceived ideas of the papers in question.

That the Government of Horthy has made every honest effort to be fair, to restore prosperity and order in what is left of Hungary, every candid neutral observer admits; that this Government will be able to restrain the Hungarians from propaganda and even military adventure to regain some portion of its lost territories, is not certain, and indeed the Government feels, with the people, that these territories have been unfairly taken away. It is also unlikely that, in spite of all efforts, Horthy will be able to prevent further murders of those believed by the Hungarian people to be the cause of most of their misery. All that can be affirmed is that Horthy will work harder along these lines and with more chance of success than did the Governments which intervened between the fall of Bela Kun and the recent elections. He is an honest, high-minded man. If he has the strength to be a dictator until normal conditions are restored he will have bravely carried his country through a critical period and will give the people new hope.

It must be remembered also that Horthy has not only popular sentiment to work against but the grim fact of continually rising prices. The crown, from an international point of view, is worth practically nothing. It still remains the standard of value in Hungary and the prices of local products have, therefore, not gone up as arbitrarily as have the prices of imported products. The Nation puts on the present Government the responsibility for the cost now of forty-five crowns a day in the hospitals, as compared with the cost of ten crowns a day under Bela Kun. The reason for this is that Bela Kun and the Rumanians managed to do away with all the medicines, surgical dressings, and appliances in the various hospitals. Bela Kun also flooded the country with worthless money. He admitted that the charge of ten crowns a day had no relation to the cost of caring for patients in the hospitals, and he tried to limit the admissions only to the working classes. The present cost of forty-five crowns is no more than the ten crowns charged at the beginning of the Bolshevist régime, so far as the value of money is concerned, especially when it is remembered that the Government has been compelled to procure all of its hospital materials from abroad. This is only one example of the rise in prices which inevitably bears very hard on all classes of the population, but which can not be imputed to any fault peculiar to the Hungarian Government.

Neither can the tragic condition of the refugees in Hungary be brought up against the Government. These poor people, living as they are in box cars and in caves in the hills, have been driven away from their homes in the territories now owned by Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and Serbia. They are an absolute charge of the state, and the state, with very limited resources, is doing everything possible to alleviate their sufferings.

It is quite true that the Governments of the Archduke, of Friedrich, and of Huszar had less power than the Government of Horthy, but as pointed out above, even those weak Governments prevented the massacres which were greatly feared. It is pleasant also to be able to credit them with some definite attempts to treat all classes fairly and to work for the benefit of the suffering and the oppressed. The American Relief Administration sent a child welfare committee to Hungary in August, 1919. This committee did what it could with its limited resources to alleviate the abject misery which was found to exist after the Soviet Government collapsed. It was not authorized to carry on regular work until October, 1919. In closing its work, which has been carried on steadily since then, it has issued a very illuminating report, and even those who hate the anti-Socialist Government of Hungary can not accuse the American Relief Administration of trying to curry favor by fair words, inasmuch as its work is over. This report says, among other things:

> The Hungarian Government has, from the beginning, shown the greatest interest in the work and has given its steadfast support. In October, 1919, the Government voted five million crowns for administrative expenses and agreed to furnish forty-four tons of flour and five tons of fat weekly to supplement the American programme. Although there was at times only a three-days' supply of flour and fats in Budapest, the Hungarian Government has never failed in its deliveries of flour and fat for child welfare work.

Later on, this allocation by the Hungarian Government was increased. The pamphlet of the American Relief Administration states clearly that no distinction was made of race, creed, or social status. Children were fed if they were hungry and undernourished, and it was the poor of Hungary, and the poor only, who benefited from this work; yet the Socialist press, reprinting in America the fantastic tales emanating from Vienna, has the impudence to assert that in Hungary to-day it is only necessary to be poor to be persecuted.

Hungary has been bitterly punished for its share in the war. Its territory has been reduced seventy-three per cent.; millions of Hungarians are under alien rule; the country has been stripped by Rumanians and Bolshevists; the ancient arrogance of the Magyars has been punished to the full. The country should be given the opportunity for orderly development. It does not want Socialism, and there is no more reason why the rest of the world should impose Socialism on Hungary than why it should impose monarchy on the United States. Let the world guide and counsel fairly and unselfishly. It might at least refrain from slander and give Horthy his chance.

EXAMINER

The Jubilee of the Metropolitan Museum

To celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its founding the Metropolitan Museum has rearranged its collections, temporarily incorporating with them hundreds of precious objects borrowed from private collectors. The exhibition thus becomes a record of the influence of the Museum and a hint of its expectations. What is remarkable about the display is it comprehensiveness. In most separate departments, the Museum still falls below what is expected in a first-class museum abroad, but an equally catholic display could be obtained in London, Paris, or Berlin only by drawing on several museums. Even in separate branches—Egyptian and Far Eastern art, the industrial art of the Middle Ages, arms and armor, musical instruments—the Museum offers collections hardly surpassed in Europe.

It is my pleasant task to trace the fifty active years that have resulted in this achievement. My own interest began when at ten years old I was introduced to General di Cesnola's smirking Cypriote gods, then still in the old Douglas Mansion, on East Fourteenth street. Forty years of the growth of the Museum are quite vivid to me. So, while for sober facts I shall depend on Miss Winifred E. Howe's excellent history, I shall, even at the risk of indiscretion, say something of the remarkable personalities who controlled this development.

There is no great invention, be it telegraph or sewing machine, without a rival inventor. In this case the pale honors go to the New York Historical Society. Having considerable collections, from 1860 to 1870 it endeavored to get the city to provide it with a building in Central Park where it might maintain a general museum of history and art. The society lacked the energy to put the scheme through. Theoretically this was a pity, for the neglected collections of the society were until nearly 1900 at once richer than those of the Metropolitan and more suitable as a nucleus. But the race is ever to the strong, and the New York Historical Society was beaten to the goal by a new set of hardy volunteers. The Museum germinated amid the gayety of an American festival at Paris, July 7, 1866. Somewhere between punches and dancing in the tents on the Pré Catalan, John Jay, whose address the London Times noted as "lively and amusing," proposed a "National Institution and Gallery of Art"; and a committee was appointed. It eventually reported informally to the Union League Club. Its Art Committee, October 14, 1869, recommended a private foundation, opining that "it would be folly to depend upon our governments, either municipal or national, for judicious support or control in such an institution; for our governments, as a rule, are utterly incompetent for the task." They recommended also that laymen, and not artists, should control the Museum.

There was a month of preparation, and on November 23, 1869, a great meeting, to which all the artistic and literary clubs of New York were invited, was held in the Union League Club. Some three hundred gentlemen attended. The venerable William Cullen Bryant presided and made a notable address. A committee of fifty was appointed, which was subsequently increased to one hundred and sixteen. John Taylor Johnston was appointed President the last day of the year 1870, and guided the destinies of the bantling Museum for nineteen years. The Museum was incorporated April 13, 1870. About a year later the Park Commissioners were authorized to provide a building. Thus the arrangement by which the City should house the Museum, but the trustees control its policy, was firmly inaugurated. But it took seven years to build the first fragment of art gallery on the Central Park site. Meanwhile the Museum, being in the position of having no works of art to show, and no place to show them if it had, became the object of unamiable ridicule by the press.

It was plainly necessary to show something. A trustee, William Y. Blodgett, rose audaciously to the situation, bought, on the off chance of being repaid, two collections of old masters, mostly Dutch and Flemish, and amounting to 174 pictures. The price, for those days heavy, was $116,000. The Dodworth building at 681 Fifth Avenue was leased for three years, and what had been a fashionable dancing academy became a shrine of art. The Museum was faithful to its origins in the Pré Catalan. On Washington's Birthday, 1872, Mr. Blodgett's old masters, with a remarkable loan collection from many sources, were displayed to all comers. And all comers soon amounted to about seventy a day for the first three months. It may be worth noting that of the first lot of old masters seventy-seven survived the weeding out of forty-two years and were still on exhibition in 1914. Under the severest of tests Mr. Blodgett's buy looks like a reasonably good one, while his enterprise gave an indispensable fillip. Had he not acted, things might have gone badly with the new Museum.

Considering this somewhat casual but sufficient start with the wisdom of hindsight, it seems strange that it occurred to nobody to work in community of interest with the New York Historical Society. Its very important collections of Chaldean and Egyptian antiquities, the miscellaneous paintings inherited from the Art Union, the Bryan Collection of primitives, seem to have been regarded with suspicion when regarded at all. Even now these remarkable collections are little visited. The Metropolitan Museum may have decided wisely in not attempting to give interest to what the public had already agreed to ignore.

The same year, 1872, that saw the modest opening in the Dodworth Building, President John Taylor Johnston paid at his own risk $60,000 for the Cesnola Collection of Cypriote antiquities. General Louis Palma di Cesnola had a creditable past as a soldier of Italy in the War of Liberation and the Crimea. He became an American citizen, served in the Civil War, and thereby got his heart's desire in a Consulate at Cyprus. There, without scientific precautions of any sort, he gathered in by excavation and purchase an enormous collection of the nondescript art of that mongrel island. Archæologically the material, representing a meeting point of Chaldean, Phœnician, Egyptian, and Grecian influences, was new and interesting. It made a considerable stir when taken to London, and the British Museum wanted a selection from it. General Cesnola wished to keep it together under his own name and to have it go to America. He persuaded President John Taylor Johnston to give him $60,000 for the assortment. Probably the vision of adding to military and consular glories the directorate of a great museum already hovered in the General's astute Italian imagination. In any case, he returned to Cyprus with his money, dug and bought more actively than before, and again in 1876 sold collection No. 2 to the Metropolitan Museum for another $60,000. These purchases of President Johnston were fateful. It turned out that the General went with his Cypriote things. Secretary of the Museum in 1877, director from 1879 to 1904, he was to guide and limit its policy for over twenty-five years. It should be recalled to his credit that whatever his expectations in making these sales to the Metropolitan, he gladly sacrificed large immediate profits to keeping his collections in America, and intact.

Personally, I believe the purchase of the Cypriote collections was a great blunder. It put a vast mass of provincial and ugly objects of art where they would on the whole do the least good. Any success the collection had was one of curiosity. Even its archæological value was diminished by the way in which it had been assembled without adequate records or control. From the point of view of taste, nothing could have worse misrepresented the glories of early Ionian art. We see the exhibited remnant of the collection to-day shrunk to the proportions of a minor department within the general classical field. The evident advantage of the purchase was that it gave the Metropolitan something distinctive that its older rivals lacked. It meant prestige of a kind. Having been bred in awe of the Cesnola collection, I shall say no more than that under the personal conditions involved, its purchase was a natural step, and that the theoretically better alternative of buying beautiful things was perhaps not at the moment practicable.

I feel about the same way towards the energetic activity in assembling architectural casts which marked the middle years of the Museum. It is simply heartbreaking to think what the cost and overhead represented by these bulky objects would have bought in fine originals in those days of cheap prices. On the other hand, the money might not have been forthcoming for mere originals, and, had it been, who was then capable of buying them safely? Some day or other the diminishing casts of the Museum will be reassembled in some New York Trocadero. Meanwhile they have, as Chaucer might have said, "served their day as for their tyme."

It is touching to realize that until General Cesnola was made secretary in 1877, the Museum staff was the trustees. These busy men of affairs arranged the loan exhibitions, packed and unpacked the collections in the moves from the Dodworth building to the Douglas Mansion, and thence to Central Park. Naturally, the Museum got both the graces and defects of a family enterprise which long clung to it and have not yet wholly disappeared. So we must account for the long opposition to Sunday opening, attained only in 1891, for the retention of General Cesnola long after his usefulness was past, for tardiness in grasping the need of expert curatorship.

No consideration of the Museum from its final removal to Central Park, in 1879, to 1904 is possible without an estimate of that remarkable and potent character, General Cesnola. To him everybody reacted positively. He was constantly attacked for one reason or another. Once he had to defend a libel suit against his chief antagonist M. Feuardent. The issue was whether the Cypriote things had been bedeviled. The matter was brought into court, but twelve good men and true decided that the General was without fault. At one time or another young and hopeful newspaper critics endeavored to dislodge the General. Clarence Cook began in 1882 and, so far as I know, I finished in 1902. It was a fascinating game, for the General was a broad and shining mark, but we only succeeded in binding his trustees to him with hooks of steel.

The trouble with the General may be briefly expressed. He well knew the limitations of his own archæological knowledge, and visitor or curator, he wanted no one about his Museum who knew more than himself. He became a Cerberus. Generally he lurked perdu and very hard at work. But if you heard a canine, or rather leonine, clamor through the corridors, you might be sure that a guard had caught some miscreant studying the collections and had reported the offence to the director. The cataloguing fell into arrears, the labels were often curious. The General was only too conscientious, according to his own lights. He managed the vast and growing concern with a staff of only three, excluding an occasional curator of sculpture. Such work as Mr. Storey, Mr. d'Hervilly, and Mr. Reynolds did was prodigious. The late Mr. Reynolds, in particular, rejoiced in the title of Curator of Textiles and Classical Antiquities. Like everybody else, he was a general utility man. His chief business was to record and label the exhibits. For one of his industry, recording was child's play; he naturally knew the location of any object in the Museum. Labelling was a harder matter. Often he did not know precisely what a new object was, and there were no books in the Museum to aid him. Whenever he brought a critical doubt to the General the order was label it! LABEL it! LABEL it! This naturally resulted occasionally in such labels as "Curious Christian Object." Mr. Storey shared the General's antipathy to students and the traveling connoisseur who rechristens pictures gave him profound distress. Of this hard-worked and absolutely devoted staff, that delightful and accomplished gentleman Mr. d'Hervilly alone had a well-developed sense of humor. If he has left diaries of those heroic days, they should be incomparable reading.

In the intervals of the vain assaults upon the General, and partly because of them perhaps, the Museum grew apace. President Johnston retired in 1889, and Henry S. Marquand succeeded him. Twice during his administration the Museum was substantially enlarged. A man of fine personal taste, possessor of one of the best general collections of his day, lover of rugs, enamels, and choice handicraft of all sorts, Mr. Marquand introduced into the policy of the Museum the ideal of quality. Besides numerous collections of industrial art, he gave in 1892 fifty-three paintings of high character. The Rembrandts, Van Dycks, Halses, with the superb Vermeer, Turner's "Salt Ash" were so many masterpieces that required no apologies or explanation. People began to realize the difference between an art museum and a collection of antiquities. In short, he brought into the work the priceless element of taste. He attached no burdensome restrictions to his gifts. These are, to-day, in their logical places in the galleries, where they best serve the art lover and commemorate their art-loving donor. By establishing a membership at ten dollars a year the support and good will of the Museum were put on a broader basis. Great gifts came in, the John Crosby Brown gift and foundation for musical instruments, the Catherine Lorillard Wolfe bequest of 148 modern paintings with a considerable endowment, and in 1901 the sensational bequest of over-six million dollars by J. S. Rogers. Nobody ever heard of him. He was merely one of the new ten dollar members. Legend has it that he was once graciously treated by General Cesnola, who did not know anything about him, in a casual visit to the galleries. If so, the General expended his graciousness to good purpose. The Rogers gift immediately put the Museum into the first rank as a buyer. The trustees were immediately enabled to negotiate such purchases as the Boscoreale frescoes and the Dino collection of armor. President Marquand died in 1902. President Rhinelander succeeded him. No steps were taken to make the necessary reorganization and increase of staff. The executive capacity of General Cesnola and his tiny staff were taxed to the utmost merely to keep things going. It wore down even his energy. In 1904 he and President Rhinelander died within a few months of each other. The old régime was at an end.

J. P. Morgan, colossus of art collectors, and already a trustee and a generous giver, succeeded to the Presidency, and called to undertake the great work of reorganizing the Museum Sir Caspar Purdon Clarke of the South Kensington Museum. He was an amiable personality, thoroughly in sympathy with scholarship, and most eager to extend the public influence of the Museum. His own specialty was Indian arts and crafts. Under him the growth was largely in the applied arts. Mr. Morgan soon put on loan the Hoentschel collection, comprising the applied and decorative arts of Europe from early in the Christian era to the year 1800. A new wing was built to accommodate this loan, the greater part of which through Mr. Morgan's considerate liberality, or that of his son, was eventually given to the Museum. The ideal of comprehensiveness, which had ever hovered before the founders, was now relatively attained.

Sir Caspar brought into the Museum a delightful atmosphere of friendliness and hospitality. His courtesy to us of the press was unlimited. He denied himself to no visitor. I recall leaving the Museum with him after hours. He showed me a portfolio which he said contained correspondence to occupy him at home till midnight. I pleaded with him to interpose secretaries between himself and unauthorized visitors like myself with trivial errands. He answered that he was a public official and must see all comers. This high if impracticable sense of duty wore him out in three or four years. We killed him with curiosity and kindness. Meanwhile he had given the Museum a genuine departmental organization. Expert curators appeared in Painting, Classical Archæology, Decorative Art, Armor, and Egyptology; the gigantic work of sorting, relabelling, re-exhibiting, and cataloguing the collections was vigorously undertaken. In all these matters Dr. Edward Robinson, Assistant Director since 1905, a veteran archæologist and long director of the Boston Art Museum, was a leading spirit. Mr. Robert W. de Forest, the new secretary of the trustees, aided Mr. Robinson in far-reaching plans for education and publicity. A Bulletin was founded and immediately attained authority among similar publications. Skilled guidance was provided for visitors, and an alliance sought with the city schools. Money poured in abundantly for acquisitions, while the rising cost of maintenance remained a recurrent embarrassment, as it still is. Over all this presided the genial exotic spirit of Sir Caspar, with his South Kensington enthusiasms. I recall standing with him before Sir John Millais' saccharine portrait of the youthful Ellen Terry. Sir Caspar remarked that the chromolithograph of this picture hung in a million British homes. I hope I seemed duly impressed. An incident which perhaps reveals the tinge of philistinism in the man also shows his real desire to make the Museum count for the public. He was a generous spirit glad to fill his halls and study rooms with those who knew more than himself. He assiduously built up a library and photograph collection which to-day are models of their kind. He was keenly conscious of his duties towards contemporary art. Here George H. Hearn's splendid gift of paintings by American artists, with a generous fund for acquisitions, greatly strengthened his policy. It meant immediate good will from an important class of artists and art lovers, even if in theory this selection from modern art might better be left to an especial institution—an American Luxembourg. Gifts in Sir Caspar's six fruitful years were too numerous even to be briefly itemized. Notable among them was Mr. Thomas F. Ryan's gift of a whole gallery of sculptures and sketches by Rodin.

In review, the administration of Sir Caspar seems a transitional one. His most responsible curatorships were held by foreigners like Roger E. Fry and W. R. Valentiner. Both attacked their task with zeal and knowledge, and each had the insight to select the capable American successor who now holds his place. In particular, Dr. Valentiner, protégé of that most astute of directors, Dr. Bode, did a most valuable service in enlisting the good will of the new generation of art collectors to the Museum. When the war called him back to quite different pursuits, he was sincerely missed on all hands. When Sir Caspar died in 1910, the directorate inevitably fell to Mr. Robinson, who had ably conducted the affairs of the Museum during his chief's long invalidism.

Now is not the time to review the recent years of the Museum. Suffice it to say that they have been years of aggressive and successful work in public education, of great gifts, in particular of critical cataloguing. In fact, Mr. Robinson's greatest work has been to insist on scholarly competence in his staff. He has been fortunate in finding trained curators in America, and through a system of voluntary apprenticeship has, with his secretary, Mr. Henry W. Kent, instituted the first museum school in America. This farsighted move has assured a highly trained personnel to the rapidly increasing art museums of the interior. Mr. Robinson also set himself to loosening the burdensome conditions with which many of the old gifts had been saddled. It was the custom to require segregation of such gifts, to the destruction of all logical classification. Generally it sufficed to obtain the consent of heirs to the distribution of the separate collections. It soon became apparent that the objects were far more effective when put in their proper company, and also that the memorial idea is better met by scattering through the general collection fine objects each of which bears the name of the donor. The educational effect of all this was tremendous. Wills like that of the late Isaac D. Fletcher leaving his collections unconditionally show the new spirit. From this point of view I regretted the acceptance of the Altman gift in 1914, spendid as it was, and advised Mr. Robinson and certain friends among the trustees to let the alternative in Mr. Altman's will—an independent museum —be carried out. It was the chance to settle, once for all, the issue of segregation, while the Altman collection, which in its own museum would have been an increasing joy, will now be an increasing embarrassment. My official friends could not grasp the truth, quite patent to me, that no museum has reached its moral majority which is not willing for good reason to decline a ten million dollar gift.

Among useful extensions during Mr. Robinson's administration have been the new curatorships in Far Eastern Art and in Prints. Both departments have developed with extraordinary swiftness and success. The accession of Mr. Robert W. de Forest to the Presidency in 1912, after Mr. Morgan's death, has been marked by an acceleration of the educational work of the Museum and by bringing it into relations with current artistic industries. Of its kind the Metropolitan Museum is probably the most active museum in the world. It passes its semicentenary with best prospects and highest hopes.

If I may prophesy for its near future, it will give up certain family practices, natural from its origins, but now detrimental. It will, for example, cease to charge its trustees with that task of buying for which they are ill fitted. It will, under proper controls, turn the buying over to its trained staff, so that prompt, energetic, and economical buying shall be practicable. This will stop what has been a considerable waste of money and time. In short, the best celebration that the trustees could make for the Jubilee would be the abolition of their obsolete Accessions Committee. Possibly the best Jubilee resolution for the staff would be a more systematic policy with respect to growth. The Museum has grown amazingly. The present need is to reduce the quantity of exhibits and increase the quality. Much of this is being done automatically by replacements. There remains to be worked out a more definite policy towards study or reserve collections, and a method of utilizing for other institutions the enormous mass of hidden minor treasures. In this matter I assume more confidently the risky prophetic rôle, because I know the mettle of the Museum staff and trustees. They are not men to linger in ruts or fall back on past performance. They celebrate the Jubilee of the Metropolitan Museum less as laudators of its extraordinary past than as men charged with its great future.

Such growth in extent and artistic importance as the Metropolitan Museum has attained in its fifty years of life has been approached only in Berlin and has nowhere been equalled. It is perhaps the most remarkable example of the efficacy of American private enterprise in the field of spirit. As an achievement it is far more noteworthy than the great one-man foundations. It represents an extraordinary faith, which has indeed moved mountains—the faith of scores and hundreds of trustees, donors, and officials. It represents also a noteworthy relation of confidence and loyalty between the City and a private corporation. The City has housed and largely maintained the Museum without interfering politically with its management, and the trustees have ever rewarded that confidence by an unlimited devotion and generosity. The Metropolitan is more than a great museum; it is a peculiarly American institution. In such coöperation between the state and private initiative consists our American tradition and lies our American hope.

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Two Plans for a National Budget

TWO concrete plans for a national budget and audit system are under consideration by Congress. One of these plans is embodied in the Good bill (H.R. 9783), which passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously October 21, 1919, and in the accompanying resolution providing for important changes in the rules of the House (H. Res. 324). The other project is to be found in the McCormick amendment to the House measure, reported to the Senate last month by the junior Senator from Illinois, which completely re-writes the Good bill. In the ordinary course of events the amended bill will go to conference, and in due time the result will be a compromise budget and audit act. Should the best features of both proposals be retained, and the Good resolution or its equivalent be adopted by the House, Congress will have created a national financial system which will combine the most successful elements of British and Continental budgetary procedure with certain outstanding advantages of our present financial practice, and which will be wholly in harmony with American governmental institutions.

A comparison of the Good bill with the substitute Senate measure reveals radical differences in their respective provisions for two of the three phases of governmental finance—for the preparation and presentation of the annual estimates for receipts and expenditures, and for the checking up on the expenditure of money appropriated. The most vital of these differences is in the location of, and the placing of responsibility for, the budget bureau which each bill proposes to create. The Good bill places this bureau "in the office of the President," makes its director a Presidential appointee without Senatorial confirmation, and conceives it as a "mere agency of the President" in exercising the powers conferred upon him by the act. "If duplication, waste, extravagance, and inefficiency exist in any branch of the service, the President will be responsible for them if he includes in his budget an estimate for their continuance," Mr. Good says. The bureau of the budget is to ferret out such conditions, and the President, acting on the bureau's reports and recommendations, is to remedy the evils and see to it that each department asks Congress for what it needs and no more. In short, the President is to be his own chief financial officer, immediately responsible for the formulation and recommendation of the annual financial and work programme of his administration. "The primary purpose of the bill," writes its author, "is to insure the preparation and submission of such a programme by the Chief Executive."

The McCormick plan places the budget bureau in the Treasury Department. A commissioner and two assistant commissioners of this bureau are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and provision is made for the employment of expert and clerical assistants by the commissioner. The latter clearly is intended to be the chief expert in economy and efficiency in the national administration. The amended bill provides that it shall be his duty, "in the period prior to, and upon submission to him, of the budget estimates of the several departments and establishments, to make a detailed study of the organization, activities, and methods of business of the several administrative services of the Government for the purpose of determining those changes which, in his opinion, should be made in the existing organization, activities, and methods of business of such services or in the appropriation of moneys for the support and conduct of the work of such services, or in the assignment of particular activities to particular services, or in the regrouping of services departmentally with a view to securing greater efficiency and economy in the conduct of public affairs."

In outlining the method by which the annual estimates are to be prepared, the McCormick bill provides that one of the assistant secretaries, or other chief assistant, in each department, shall be designated by the departmental chief to have direct supervision of those services which have to do with the purely business operations of the department, to perform the duties of a general business manager and financial secretary, and to supervise the formulation of all budget estimates for the department. On or before October 1, the head of each department, having studied, analyzed, and revised these estimates, is required to submit them to the Commissioner of the Budget in a form to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, together with explanations of any requests for new items, or for increases in old ones. All of the budget estimates for the ensuing fiscal year, together with the recommendations of the Commissioner of the Budget, shall be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before November 1 of each year. The latter official shall then "revise, consolidate, unify, coördinate, reduce, or otherwise change any item or items of the budget estimates submitted to him by the Commissioner of the Budget . . . as he may deem necessary to effect economies and to prevent waste, extravagance, loss, or duplication," and on or before November 20 shall submit the entire revised budget to the President. Under seven heads the bill provides that this budget shall give a complete picture of the financial situation of the Government, past, present, and prospective.

The President is then authorized to "revise the budget submitted to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the increase, reduction, or elimination of any item therein contained, by the addition of new items, which, in his opinion, are needed for the proper conduct of the affairs of the Government, by the consolidation or grouping of items, or by making any other changes . . . in any other feature of the organization and operations of the several services which, in his opinion, will lead to increased economy and efficiency in the conduct of public affairs." Then the President shall, on or before December 10, "submit to Congress the Budget, as revised and approved by him, including a statement of what, in his opinion, are the revenue and expenditure needs of the Government and how those needs should be met."

It will be seen that this procedure aims to make the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for the formulation of the budget in the first instance, and that the budget bureau is intended to equip him to do this work effectively. It is the President, however, who is ultimately responsible, because not only must he personally decide serious issues between the Secretary of the Treasury and the other Cabinet officers, but he must present the finished programme to Congress as his own.

Administrators, legislators, and lay experts are sharply divided upon the question whether the director of the budget should be immediately subordinate to the President, or to the Secretary of the Treasury; and where the best opinion is so evenly balanced, it is likely that either scheme would work with a fair degree of satisfaction. Undoubtedly, however, one actually is preferable to the other, and the writer believes very strongly that this happens to be the same one that is the more closely in accord with the historic conception of the two great offices involved. In the days of Washington and Adams, Hamilton and Gallatin, the Presidency was really an executive rather than an administrative office —it was the office, in fact, of the Chief Executive—while the Secretary of the Treasury was the real fiscal officer of the Government. As the business of the nation enormously increased in volume and in complexity, the Presidents were threatened with inundation by an ever rising tide of administrative and political detail. The point was finally approached at which, as Mr. Wilson pointed out years ago, no ordinary man could be President and live, despite the fact that most of the administrative functions of the office had been "put in commission." To-day it may be said that the degree to which the President is to be the Chief Executive contemplated by the Constitution, and the success with which he is to solve the great political and administrative problems to which the world expects him to address himself, will depend in large part upon his ability to delegate to others just such administrative details as are involved in threshing out the annual estimates.

This is not to say that the loose-jointed, uncoördinated administrative machine with which we have become familiar should not be tightened up, or that the ultimate responsibility for the efficient and economical operation of that machine should not rest squarely upon the President. Far from it. The first point of articulation, however, should be somewhat below the White House. Instead of decreasing the responsibility of the President, this would increase it, because it would throw into clearer perspective the greater issues in which alone he would have to intervene, while at the same time he would be equally subject to criticism should he offer a work and financial programme carelessly prepared as to details.

In proposing to make the Secretary of the Treasury the initial point of administrative articulation, the McCormick bill conforms to the practice of almost every other nation, and with the old feeling that our Secretary of the Treasury is, or should be, the chief financial minister of the Government. And if it departs from the popular conception of equality between the members of the President's Cabinet, it is far more nearly in line both with American traditions and with public sentiment to-day to confer definitely stated and universally understood powers upon one of our great established political officers than to create a new functionary, with undetermined status, powers, and responsibility, and to trust to events to establish him in satisfactory relations with the President, the Cabinet, the Congress, and the country. This, beyond cavil, is what the Good bill would do. It has been said that the new official would become the administrative, as the existing private secretary to the President has become the executive, or political, secretary to the Chief Executive. It is self-evident that in any event he would be either one of the most powerful men in Washington or little more than a high-priced clerk—aut Caesar aut nihil. Is the creation of such a functionary based upon sound principles or upon American traditions? Would it commend itself to the American people?

The McCormick amendment differs from the original Good bill also in providing that the commissioner and the two assistant commissioners shall be appointed for six-year terms, one to be selected every second year. This method of appointment will compel a certain permanence and continuity in the directing personnel of the budget bureau, and at the same time it recognizes the potentially political character of the offices. While no new administration can make a clean sweep of the commission, it can ultimately name two of its members, and it is hoped that the arrangement will mean practically a permanent tenure for commissioners who are both expert and non-partisan.

In providing for the creation of an accounting department, an establishment independent of the executive departments and under the control and direction of the Controller General of the United States, both the Good bill and the McCormick amendment offer definite plans for accomplishing the third step in the processes of national finance. Both abolish the offices of Controller and Assistant Controller of the Treasury, and of the six auditors for the several departments, and centralize in an accounting department the auditing and accounting functions which are now performed by various agencies in the Treasury and other departments; both provide for an independent audit of the accounts of the Government by officials responsible to Congress and not to the President; and both require periodic and special reports to Congress covering all matters relating to the receipt and disbursement of funds. It is thus expected that Congress will be able to ascertain financial and other conditions in the departments from an independent source, instead of having to be content with the evidence of officials and employees of the executive services themselves.

The chief differences in the accounting departments contemplated by the two bills lie, first, in the organization and tenure of the staff of higher officials, and, secondly, in the distribution of functions within the department. The Good bill provides for a Comptroller General and an Assistant Comptroller General, who, though appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can be removed only by concurrent resolution of Congress, after notice and hearing, when "inefficient, or guilty of neglect of duty, or of malfeasance in office, or of any felony, or of conduct involving moral turpitude, and for no other cause and in no other manner except by impeachment." The retiring age for both officers is fixed at seventy years. Under the Senate amendment the Comptroller General and three Assistant Comptrollers General would be appointed by the President, with Senatorial confirmation, for five-year terms, one being appointed each year, and would be removable "only for cause." If the object of Congress is to create an auditing agency which will be independent of executive control. or even of the suspicion thereof, and, so far as possible, "out of politics," there can be no question but that the Good plan is far superior to that of Senator McCormick. And certainly a non-partisan, independent auditing and accounting of national financial transactions is not only in accord with the best theory and practice the world over, but is what is desired by both Congress and the American public to-day.

As to the distribution of functions and responsibility, the Good plan follows the British precedent in concentrating authority in the Comptroller General, while the McCormick substitute prescribes in detail the functions of each of the higher officials of the accounting department, and even sets up an additional board of appeals to review decisions of the First Assistant Comptroller General as to the validity of accounts or claims against the Government. It is to be gravely doubted whether this decentralizing of power and responsibility will result either in greater fairness and honesty, or in higher efficiency in the performance of the functions of the department.

The passage of either the Good or the McCormick measure, or of a compromise bill, will be a great advance towards governmental economy and efficiency in the United States. But no budget reform will be more than half complete until the financial procedure of the House of Representatives is thoroughly overhauled. "Congress will not perform its full duty by requiring the executive departments to adopt business methods if it refuses to lay down the same rule for the transaction of the business properly coming before it," declared the Good committee in laying before the House its resolution providing for drastic reforms in the financial procedure of that body. The adoption of this resolution, or its equivalent, will, in fact, be the real test of the good faith of the House in its almost unanimous expression of an ardent desire for a national budget system. Not unnaturally, the resolution has been held over pending the passage of the budget bill, and during the interim the House should be made to understand that if it values its reputation for intelligence and common honesty it can not afford to dally or to take half measures in this matter.

The Good resolution makes three changes in the rules of the House: (1) It centres in one Committee on Appropriations, composed of 35 members, the authority to report all appropriations, and takes from the Committees on Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Indian Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the authority now vested in those committees to report appropriations; (2) it provides means for limiting the power of the Senate to increase appropriations; (3) it permits the raising of a point of order at any time on any appropriation item carried in any bill or joint resolution reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations. The committee reporting the Good resolution observes:

> It is at once apparent that the principal change proposed in the rules of the House is the one centering all appropriations in a single committee. . . . The adoption of this resolution will permit the Committee on Appropriations, consisting of 35 members, to divide its work between the subcommittees which it will create, so that the budget can come before Congress in one measure. The consideration of that measure will involve a full and comprehensive discussion in Congress of the big problem of government finance. The financial obligations of the Government viewed in this way will have a tendency to sober the temper of Congress when it comes to passing legislative bills that may mean the taking up of new Government activities which will require future appropriations.

The Good committee did not overstate the importance of the reform which it has proposed. For years the multiplicity of appropriation committees has been recognized as the centre of the vicious circle of Congressional finance. The proposed changes will break this circle. In addition they will make possible a great debate upon the entire policy of the Government as expressed in its financial programme, and will afford opportunity for effective Congressional criticism of the Administration. It will permit Congress to become, to some extent, what the Mother of Parliaments always has been, the "great inquest of the nation."

The committee considered the advisability of adopting the cardinal point of British financial procedure by which the Government estimates may be reduced but may not be increased by the legislature, and upon sound grounds decided against the change. For Congress to bind itself not to appropriate any money not requested by the executive would be to abdicate one of the clearest duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, and to sweep away what remains of the separation of powers which is at the base of our governmental structure. The limitation under which the House of Commons acts in appropriating money is workable only as a part of the parliamentary system, or in a despotism. If it is desired to introduce it into the United States the proper way is by a revision of the Constitution, not by Congressional act or resolution.

RALSTON HAYDEN

Correspondence

The Pope on Socialism

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I enclose herewith a translation made by a friend of mine, a Jesuit Father, of a letter dated March 11, 1920, written by Pope Benedict to the Bishop of Bergamo. I thought this might interest your readers as being of very recent date and being an authoritative definition of the attitude of the Catholic Church toward Socialism and its explanation of the "varieties of orders in civil life."

L. F. L.

New York, May 7

Venerable Brother:

At the outset we wish all to know that the course which you have recently taken has our most hearty approbation. When the din of arms had been quieted and the masses had gone back to their work which had been interrupted, you held a council in your diocese and founded an office for promoting the interests of the various classes of workingmen. This is an institution which is truly excellent and is destined to bear good fruits, if it is governed by right principles, which are those taught by religion. Else what disturbance of the state it may cause is only too manifest.

Those who are at the head of such an institute on which the safety of the state greatly depends, before all must ever keep before their eyes and most religiously follow the doctrines of Christian wisdom on the social question which have been set forth in the memorable Encyclical Rerum Novarum and in other letters of the Apostolic See. Let them bear in mind especially the following principles: in this race of life, which is short and subject to miseries of every kind, no one is permitted to be perfectly happy; happiness true, absolute, and eternal, as the recompense for a life well spent, is held out for us in heaven; to that all we do must look; this is the cause why we must take more care of our duties than our rights; yet also in this mortal life it is right to eliminate, as far as we can, hindrances of our happiness and to seek to better our condition; nothing promotes the common welfare more than the concord and hearty coöperation of all classes; and the greatest of conciliators is Christian Charity. Therefore let the leaders see how ill considered for the good of the workingmen are the schemes of those who, while promising to better their condition of life, proffer themselves as helpers only for gaining possession of these frail and fleeting things, and not only neglect to moderate their minds by admonitions about their Christian duties, but make them more hostile to the rich, and do this with that violence and bitterness of language by which men alien to us have had the habit of stirring up the multitudes to overthrow civil society. Venerable brother, to avert this great peril, it will be the part of your vigilance to admonish all who are truly seeking the interests of the workingmen as you have placed them in office to do, that they must keep far from the intemperance usual in the words of Socialists and that they must infuse a deep Christian spirit into all their work for action and propaganda in defense of this cause. If they fail in this spirit, they may do great harm to the cause, certainly they can do no good for it. It is a pleasure for us to hope that all will heed your words. But if any one shall refuse, without hesitation you will remove him from the office which you have entrusted to him.

But those who, through the munificence and beneficence of Providence, have received more must give more for this proposed Christian elevation, as it is called. All who are eminent by their station in life or by their mental culture must not refuse to stand by the workingmen with their counsel, influence, voice. In their dealings with workingmen, those who have abundant wealth must not exact extreme justice but follow the rule of equity. We even earnestly urge them in this to show themselves indulgent and, so far as they can, to make generous and liberal concessions and remittances. How fittingly fall on their ears the words of the Apostle to Timothy: "Charge the rich of this world to give easily, to communicate to others." By this means the minds of the poor which have been alienated by belief in the greed of the rich, will be gradually reconciled to the latter. However, those whose station and fortune are inferior must understand well that variety of orders in civil society arises from nature and in the end is derived from God's will: "for He made the little and the great" (Wisdom VI. 8), and He did this most fittingly for the welfare of both individuals and the community. Let them be persuaded that no matter how high they may rise to better things, by their own industry and the aid of the good, there will ever remain for them, as also for other men, no small portion of sufferings. Whence if they are wise, they will not aspire in vain to things higher than they can reach, and they will endure quietly and constantly evils which they can not escape, for the hope of blessings which are everlasting.

Therefore, we beg and beseech the citizens of Bergamo to be consistent with their past filial love and reverence for this Apostolic See and not to let themselves be deceived by the fallacies of men who promise wondrous things and by these promises seek to tear them away from the faith of their fathers, so that afterwards they may be able to drive them to use violence and inaugurate universal confusion and disorder. The cause of justice and truth is not defended by aggressive violence and the subversion of order. Those arms are of such a nature that those who use them wound themselves the most grievously.

Against such pernicious enemies of Catholic faith and civil society, it is the duty of priests and especially of the pastors to contend with bravery, hearty union with each other, and zealous obedience and reverence towards you, venerable brother. Let none of them think that this is a matter which is alien to the ministry of their sacred order because it is economic, for in this matter itself the salvation of souls is in peril. Whence, we wish them to count this among their duties, to contribute all the study, vigilance, and labor they can exert, to social training and action, and to cherish with every kind of aid those who in this matter are working for our advantage. But at the same time they must both diligently teach those entrusted to their care the precepts for a Christian life and inform them about the deceits of the Socialists and aid them to increase their estates, always, however, inculcating the lesson taught by the constant prayer of the Church: that we may so pass through blessings which are temporal that we may not lose those which are eternal.

Senator Weeks on Lodge and Wilson

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am enclosing my check for five dollars to renew my subscription to the Review, which I have read with interest and with which I have generally been in agreement.

As I am writing for the above purpose, I can not refrain from saying a word about the correspondence which you have been publishing relating to the conduct of the League controversy in the Senate, commencing with Mr. Beck's letter and followed by many others. I am especially led to make this comment in justice to Mr. Lodge, who has been many times charged with playing politics in connection with the League controversy, a charge which is renewed by Mr. Putnam in your number of April 24, in which he quotes Mr. Lodge as having said, "I am fighting Mr. Wilson."

Whatever may be said pro or con in regard to Mr. Lodge's conduct of the Senate's consideration of the League, it is unthinkable to anyone who knows him that he should have ever used that expression or anything similar to it; because such a statement would be beneath even the cheapest politician, to say nothing of a statesman of long experience and international reputation. As a matter of fact, Senator Lodge has specifically denied having made such a statement, and I feel confident that he has not only never said it or anything like it, but has never even thought it.

Very few who have not had experience in a legislative body can appreciate the difficulties of steering an important bill through the maze of differences of opinion which exist, not only in obtaining a definite result, but in keeping the discordant elements in a temper to finally permit positive action. Senator Lodge's success in this controversy has been most notable and has been commented on favorably by nearly everyone who has had occasion to follow the Senate's action. My belief is that it will, in history, be considered the most notable achievement he has ever accomplished in a long and distinguished career.

The real difficulty has been with the President himself, who maliciously mixed the League with the Treaty and who has been unwilling to even make the concessions which the Allies were willing to accept. I do not think it is unfair to him to say that it is the general opinion that he has been governed in this whole controversy by personal considerations rather than his country's best interest.

JOHN W. WEEKS

Washington, D. C., May 8

Senator Lodge and Sinn Fein

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

My first impulse after reading Mr. Beck's letter in the Review of April 10, finding you had printed it without comment, was at once to enter the lists in your behalf. Second thought gave assurance that more powerful hands than mine would pick up the gage: Major Putnam's letter and your own editorial in the issue of April 24 leave nothing to be desired, except in one important particular. Mr. Beck quotes your indictment:

> Mr. Lodge has shown himself neither a large-minded statesman nor a competent party leader, and he has given countenance to many abominable moves in the game.

and adds,

> This would have been more convincing if you had given any specifications for so severe a criticism of one of the most experienced and scholarly statesmen now in the public life of this country.

Assuredly Mr. Lodge's support of the "Irish Republic" was "an abominable move in the game," and I agree with Mr. Beck to the extent that it should receive very specific mention. It is the more inexcusable precisely because he is "one of the most experienced and scholarly statesmen," none knowing better than he the consequences to be expected from such action. The immediate result of the move, desired and obtained, was of course the detachment of Senator Walsh from his party. But the far more serious result was to give to the Sinn Fein conspiracy a footing in practical politics which it could hardly have attained without Mr. Lodge's support. Apart from all considerations of ordinary decency towards a friendly nation, in view of our close relations with Great Britain and the obligations we have been placed under since 1914 owing to our lack of preparation against war, Mr. Lodge's attitude seems peculiarly base. To what lengths he is willing to go in support of Sinn Fein hatred of England and the efforts to embroil us in a war of unimaginable horror it is hard to say. Meanwhile let him give a thought to the growing strength of the Loyal Coalition —and its votes—and reflect whether there are not more of us who are ready to fight our Irish-American enemies than our British friends.

HAROLD B. WARREN

Cambridge, Mass., May 4

The War and French Students

[The writer of this letter is the head of the famous École Normale Supérieure. He is a member of the French Academy and one of the leading historians of France.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Last October a series of special entrance examinations was held for the returning soldiers. We were all very curious to know how our young men would acquit themselves after the interruption in their studies occasioned by the war, and we were prepared to be rather indulgent. Now let me give some of the results of these examinations, as handed in to me by the examiners.

In the department of philosophy, the average mark "is superior to that obtained in previous Normal School examinations," reports one of my colleagues, "the candidates showed a solid acquaintance with their subject and, above all, a real strength of expression, proofs of their having followed a life full of varied experiences which had made their young minds exceptionally mature."

In history, the candidates "thoroughly comprehended the questions and answered them with precision, some of the young men showing a really surprising maturity of thought, while numbers of them expressed themselves with vigor and authority."

The report concerning the Greek examination contains a rather amusing remark. The author translated was that very Attic orator Lysias, whose text the candidates somewhat modernized, and we found in their papers such up-to-date words as conference, congress, meeting, etc. Some of the students dispersed headlines through their paper "The Arrival of the Fleet at the Seaport of Piræus," "The Treason of Theramenes," etc. All this was not very Attic and the examiner could not always suppress a smile; but his report reads: "Superior qualities, maturity of mind, good judgment, decision of character, very remarkable qualities of manliness."

The examiner in Latin has been in the habit for several years of deploring the falling off of interest in that study. But this year he is delighted and declares that the examination "has given him the joy of a real surprise."

In French "the examination reached a remarkably high standard, most of the candidates displaying a maturity of mind and a firmness of judgment worthy of the greatest praise."

The examiners show a tendency to feel rather blue about the German papers, whereas for the English ones they are in the best of moods, "the candidates falling in with the spirit of the text and employing an English which is as clear as it is idiomatic."

This testimony, which I might give at still further length, is very interesting in itself, since it shows that our French universities and high schools will have capable young professors in the future as in the past, facts which I recommend to the consideration of our pessimists at home and to our friends and fellow-professors in foreign parts who sometimes may have doubts as to our future.

ERNEST LAVISSE

Paris, France, March 11

The Wits of Queen Anne's Time

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

To professors of English literature desperate for a mode of approach that will interest undergraduates in the wits of Queen Anne's time, I suggest this entry in Swift's Journal to Stella, March 27, 1713:

"I went afterwards to see a famous moving picture, and I never saw anything so pretty. You see a sea ten miles wide, a town on t'other end, and ships sailing in the sea and discharging their cannon. You see a great sky with moon and stars, etc. I'm a fool."

A little timely pep might be added by citing a letter to Swift from Colonel Robert Hunter, Governor of New York, March 14, 1713:

"Here is the finest air to live upon in the universe, and if our trees and birds could speak, and our assemblymen be quiet, the finest conversation too. Fert omnia tellus, but not for me."

Fert omnia tellus, but not for us either, alas.

S. B. G.

University of Nebraska, April 3

Book Reviews

An Undiplomatic Diplomat

RECREATION. By Viscount Grey of Falloden, K. G. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

WHEN war broke out in 1914, natural and universal curiosity was excited regarding the representative men of the belligerent nations, in whose hands lay the fate of the world. Our newspapers and magazines teemed with articles and illustrations. Among the faces of warriors, kings, and statesmen, there was none more fit to haunt the memory than the face of the British Foreign Secretary, Sir Edward Grey. The eyes had the black, cavernous depth of Poe's, of Poe's beholding in procession all the images of terror from his wild tales pass before him. It was the face of a man seeing a ghost, a million ghosts; and nearly a million of his countrymen were to die by war before five years were gone.

The personality behind this mask of horror was a riddle to friends and foes. The man chosen by a great nation to deal with friendly, rival, or hostile Powers knew no language but his own, and never left his native island. Now, if Buffon's adage has any truth in it, this enigmatic man has revealed himself in a little book of some forty printed pages. Last year he delivered an address at Harvard on recreation, certainly not a tragic theme, which is now published for the benefit of a wider audience.

Of artifice, literary, or any other, in the plan or style, there is not a trace. The writer begins at the beginning, announcing his subject, recreation, in the first paragraph; he goes on to the end, and then stops. The diction is plain and simple, almost to the point of baldness. There are no flights and no flowers. An occasional touch of quiet humor brightens the discussion of a serious topic in a serious way. The age is a pleasure-seeking age; whether it finds pleasure is another matter. Recreation is not the most important thing in the world; but, wisely taken, it makes for happiness. Games, sport, gardening, reading, as forms of recreation, are treated briefly, the obvious advantages of each being pointed out in a few words. Disciples of Izaak Walton will judge with charity the confession of his passion for fishing.

> In October I used to find myself looking forward to salmon fishing in the next March and beginning to spend my spare time thinking about it. I lay awake in bed fishing in imagination the pools which I was not going to see before March at the earliest, till I felt I was spending too much time, not in actual fishing but in sheer looking forward to it. I made a rule, therefore, that I would not fish pools in imagination before the first of January so that I might not spend more than two months of spare time in anticipation alone.

This is not the tortuous utterance of a modern Metternich; it is frank, human, almost naïve, the admission of an enthusiasm.

There is nothing new in his advice about reading. There can not be, at this time of day. He recommends poetry and philosophy, but does not wish to force them upon the reluctant. His own selection of books for recreation is first, Gibbon, then, a classic novel, then, a "modern" work, not closely defined. Plato he read at Oxford without much appreciation; but, in his riper years, he found that the great Greek seemed to "kill" other philosophical writers. He could not find the same pleasure in them.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of this address is the account of his outing in England with Mr. Roosevelt. It is used to enforce his advice about planning one's recreation ahead. Before Mr. Roosevelt started on his famous travels in Africa, he planned to be in England in the spring, in order to hear the song of certain birds. Viscount Grey took him down to Litchborne, at the appointed time, and the birds did not disappoint the distinguished pair. Very English was the Englishman's fear that his visitor might be bored. He thought, "Perhaps, after all, he will not care so very much about birds, and possibly after an hour or so he will have had enough of them. If that be so and he does not care for birds, he will have nothing but my society, which he will not find sufficiently interesting for so long a time." It is equally characteristic of the American temperament that Mr. Roosevelt was not only keenly interested in the English song-birds but he had informed himself about them before coming to England, and needed only to hear them, to complete that department of his knowledge.

Towards the close of the address, the style rises above its natural and deliberate plainness. In speaking of Nature the Consoler, he expresses what so many have felt during the war.

> Our feelings were indeed aroused by the heroism of our people, but they were also depressed by the suffering. In England every village was stricken, there was grief in almost every house. The thought of the suffering, the anxiety for the future destroyed all pleasure. It came even between one's self and the page of the book one tried to read. In those dark days I found some support in the steady progress unchanged of the beauty of the seasons. Every year, as spring came back unfailing and unfaltering, the leaves came out with the same tender green, the birds sang, the flowers came up and opened, and I felt that the great power of nature for beauty was not affected by the war. It was like a great sanctuary into which we could go and find refuge for a time from even the greatest trouble of the world, finding there not enervating ease, but something which gave optimism, confidence, and security.

And the eyes which took such delight in the visible world are now dim.

An English poet made his heroic English King describe himself as "a fellow of plain and uncoined constancy." The phrase describes Grey of Falloden. To his enemies, he was the arch-deceiver, of more than Machiavellian craft, he was "Liar Grey." He did indeed deceive, but it was because he always told the truth, and could tell nothing but the truth.

Apart from its matter, this little book is a triumph of the American printer's art. Type, paper, dimensions of page, press-work, binding, would make it a discriminating bibliophile's treasure, had it no other merit.

ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN

Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, and Others

THE GOLDEN WHALES OF CALIFORNIA. By Vachel Lindsay. New York: The Macmillan Company.
STARVED ROCK. By Edgar Lee Masters. New York: The Macmillan Company.
THE COAT WITHOUT A SEAM. By Helen Gray Cone. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.
CHORDS FROM ALBIREO. By Danford Barney. New York: John Lane Company.
PICTURE-SHOW. By Siegfried Sassoon. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.
GEORGIAN POETRY, 1918-1919. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

RESISTANCE to Mr. Vachel Lindsay is eventually futile. One is glad of its futility. Something in me that actively questioned or passively antagonized his spell has given way before the "Golden Whales of California." Who can resist an inundation? The "Golden Whales" is a triumph of individuality. To advise men indiscriminately to trust their own natures is a little as if one should advise them indiscriminately to bet on their own horses. Everything depends on the horse; everything depends on the nature. But when a nature that is trustworthy is trusted, and requites the trust, the spectacle is refreshment and delight to the beholders. The "Golden Whales" brings to me my first clear and unqualified acknowledgment of the greater Lindsay.

In this writer there have always been two elements: the poet, and what I shall unceremoniously, but not disrespectfully, call the urchin. The poet is a gentlemanly poet; the urchin is a good fellow, but he is a little boisterous, a little mischievous, more or less unkempt and unshod, and his life is an unending Hallowe'en. If the neighborhood has been more amused than shocked at his pranks, it has also been more amused than edified; it has not taken him so very seriously. The poet and the urchin lived apart; they could not find each other. They have found each other, in my judgment, in the "Golden Whales," and their meeting is the signal for Mr. Lindsay's emergence into the upper air of song.

Let me cite the first lines in the book:

Yes, I have walked in California,
And the rivers there are blue and white,
Thunderclouds of grapes hang on the mountains.
Bears in the meadows pitch and fight.
(Limber, double-jointed lords of fate,
Proud native sons of the Golden Gate.)
And flowers burst like bombs in California,
Exploding on tomb and tower.
And the panther-cats chase the red rabbits,
Scatter their young blood every hour.
And the cattle on the hills of California
And the very swine in the holes
Have ears of silk and velvet
And tusks like long white poles.
And the very swine, big hearted,
Walk with pride to their doom
For they feed on the sacred raisins
Where the great black agates loom.

I think that is a passage in which Wordsworth, himself rather Lindsayan in his reckless combination of the Apocalypse and Mother Goose, would have heard "old Triton blow his wreathed horn." This is the very splendor and festival of the grotesque, the union of the infantile (in no depreciatory sense) with the gigantic; giants, by-the-by, are the special property of infants. It is the day before creation with the materials for the mighty enterprise littering the sky-floor with their tumbled riches; and if there is a smack of the banjo or of the bagpipe in the accompaniment of the morning stars, that, for the making of a world like ours, is only an added seasoning and congruity.

The third poem, quite as captivating, though less poetical, is "John L. Sullivan, the Strong Boy of Boston." I have never read a poem quite like "John L. Sullivan," a poem which catches a civilization in its net, or, more exactly, strings a civilization, in the giant beads of a motley but somehow magnificent necklace, on the bright thread of its lyric joviality. The poet calls the time provincial, "dear provincial 1889," and he is right. But it is an uncompelled, a chosen, provinciality, the country life of a man who owns a house in town. Mr. Lindsay, American, Illinoisian, Springfieldian, as he intrepidly and riotously is, has affiliations with the universal. If your goal is the centre of the earth you may start as well from Springfield, Illinois, as from Paris, Petrograd, or Cairo. Even the poet's Bryanism has sonorities in which the chords are sempiternal. He heard in that movement "time-winds out of Chaos from the star-fields of the Lord." The poem from which I quote with its clangorous and marching title of "Bryan, Bryan, Bryan, Bryan" is printed or reprinted in the culled and discerning pages of the new-born London Mercury. That fact has a kernel.

I quite agree with Mrs. Marguerite Wilkinson, critic of poetry for the New York Times, that Mr. Masters is of all contemporary poets the most difficult to review. "Starved Rock" is the sort of book that should furnish promptings and incitements to the wakeful, or even to the drowsy, reviewer, yet I have rarely felt so unprompted, so unincited, as in its presence. Critics do not like to confess that they are baffled, or even worried; yet I was on the point of making either one or both of these confessions when the review that I wanted to write broke upon me in its luminous entirety. Perhaps I shall review the man rather than the book, but "Starved Rock," as Mr. Masters himself tells us, is an eminence from which one overlooks the surrounding country.

Mr. Masters is a man of undoubted ability, though much of his output is less than able. He is even a man of undoubted poetical ability, though much of his ability is not poetic. But the imperfection of his culture, the want of self-discipline, the mixture of indolence and assiduity, evinced in the lavishness of his untrammeled outpour, the entertainment of vague faiths and aspirations which his skepticism cramped and chilled, but could not extirpate, the prompt, facile, and uncritical responsiveness to the movements confusedly afloat in the turbid air of a distracted age—all these things are indications of a mind whose organization nature did not quite complete. The mind is not quite equal to its job; its works are approximations.

But, it will be said, what about "Spoon River"? The question is a probing one. "Spoon River," whatever its faults or limitations (and its faults are serious and its limitations trenchant), is possessed of certainty. Its poetry may be questioned, but its faculty for business, its executive thoroughness, is incontestable. The fitting of means to ends, the coincidence of design and achievement, is consummate. Some timely incentive, some favoring circumstance, perhaps the Greek Anthology, perhaps Mr. William Marion Reedy, gave Mr. Masters for once that property in his subject which his later volumes have proved to be intermissive and exceptional. It is this difference between the man and his chief work that makes him a puzzle and plague to the reviewer. Mr. Masters found in "Spoon River" what all writers need—a method that protected him from himself. In freedom he would have gone astray, but he bound himself, like Odysseus, to the mast. The misfortune of his later work has been the absence of some astute counsellor to warn him when to be deaf—and when to be dumb.

In "Starved Rock," the reader will not starve, though he will scarcely feast. There are the usual monologues, of which only two are slimy; there are the discoveries of the desirability of doing what you please—discoveries in which Mr. Masters has been anticipated by the savages and the pterodactyls. There are bulky and hazy philosophies, cosmicisms, idealisms, feeble sedatives for bitter griefs. There is an excellent bit of journalism, self-described in the title, "Sagamore Hill," in which the lugubriousness that lies in wait for Mr. Masters in the intermissions of his onslaughts is happily relaxed. There are landscapes of an alluring but unsatisfying picturesqueness, a picturesqueness that seems mainly verbal, whose horizons are the edges of the page. There are instances of that lyric pliancy and invitation which surprise the ear among the ruder notes of Mr. Masters, and there are rare moments of true inspiration like the following:

Change now is yours beyond the waters, nights
Of waiting and of doubt have dimmed desire.
Our hands are calm before the dying fire
Of lost delights.
Babylon by the sea knows us no more,
Between the surges' hushes
When on the sand the water rushes
There is no voice of ours upon the shore.

Miss Helen Gray Cone has a substantially perfect technique. The possessor of a perfect technique is a being set apart, not only among capable poets, but among supreme poets. The great are rarely perfect: to which charge a retort, if not a rebuttal, might be found in the assertion that the perfect are rarely great. The highest originalities are not open to Miss Cone, but her feeling is delicate and true, and, in all the agitations of the late war, there is no tremor in the mounting flame. Her work should find its own public, and even the lordly public that looks askance at poetry of this type should be sensible of the vigor in the two stanzas which I quote:

The world is a broken ball,
Stained red because it fell
Out of bounds, in a game of kings,
Over the wall of hell:

And now must the spirit of man
Arise and adventure all—
Leap the wall sheer down into hell
And bring up the broken ball.

It is the object of Mr. Danford Barney's "Chords from Albireo" to evoke moods rather than impart ideas—such is the purport of Mr. Lawrence Mason's tentative but laudatory preface. In a word, we, as gentlemen and men of taste, are not to protest if Mr. Barney is unintelligible. To this I think the simple but sufficing answer is that poetry is a branch of literature, that literature is a mode of speech, and that men speak to be understood. Mr. Barney's moods are conveyed to Mr. Mason by sounds. But if words generate ideas and sounds generate moods, and Mr. Barney prefers to give us moods without ideas, the consequence is plain: he should give us sounds without words; "Cuckoo, jug-jug, pu-we, to-witta-woo" should be the formula for his poetry.

I spent ten times as much mental effort on Mr. Barney's "A Woman Passing" as I should have spent on an equal quantity of Tennyson or Wordsworth.

Now if one is striving to reduce the part of the understanding in the reception of poetry, surely the oddest of all conceivable methods that one could choose to accomplish that result would be—to increase its burdens. I have a simple, wholesome, rustic notion that if a man works a horse, he should feed it. My complaint against Mr. Danford Barney is that my understanding is a horse which he overworks—and starves. All this would not have been worth saying in this place, had Mr. Barney been destitute of poetical capacity.

The critical and the uncritical public seem united in their admiration for the poetry of Mr. Siegfried Sassoon. When habitual dissidents agree, perhaps the dissenter from both should hold his peace. I am, moreover, entirely willing to concur with both these publics in the admission that Mr. Sassoon's strong, simple, honest detestation of war is a manly thing which manhood the world over should esteem. War brightens in the prospect and softens in the retrospect so much that we need to keep by us a man for whom war is everlastingly in the present tense. When it comes to sheer poetry, however, I find in Mr. Sassoon but two outstanding merits, a feeling for phrase and a sense of the occult, both present in the degree which redeems verse from insignificance without lifting it to distinction. His literary judgment is singularly undeveloped.

> I stood with the Dead, so forsaken and still;
> When dawn was grey I stood with the Dead is an excellent beginning for one kind of poem. "'Fall in!' I shouted; 'Fall in for your pay!'" is a passable conclusion for another kind. But the use of the two as beginning and ending of the same poem indicates that the author is "unlesson'd, unschooled, unpractis'd" in his own art. The one poem which I am inclined to except from the gravamen of these strictures and restriction is called "Sick Leave," and is found, not in "Picture-Show," but in "Georgian Poetry, 1918-1919."

To this "Georgian Poetry" my final word pertains. I read the first number of this anthology years ago with unfeigned admiration. The same qualities, the same authors, reappear in part in the current volume, but my admiration, though not dead, does not recover its old alacrity. These poets have unquestionable merits. From the infirmities of the later and lesser Victorians their liberation is complete. They hate the general, the banal, the trivial—all of which are sound and righteous hatreds. In phrase they love the condensed and the concrete—both of which are virtuous and salutary loves. But there is a contrast, if not a conflict, between their temper and their ideal. Their temper is calm, measured, resolute—almost an eighteenth century temper. Their ideal is the vivid, the striking, the extreme—almost an Elizabethan ideal. Naturally enough, their eighteenth century temper is not quite at home in the handling of this Elizabethan ideal. Hence the vividness, which is by no means altogether wanting, comes to reside less in the ideas than in the language, less possibly in the language than in the vocabulary. Their dictionary is as dynamic as Shakespeare's, but their style isn't. Their watchword is deliberate intensity. That is not an unpromising watchword; it made the Divine Comedy. But in Dante, in whom incandescence was the normal state, the deliberation did not chill the intensity. In England, under George the Fifth, the dissipation of heat proceeds more rapidly.

O. W. FIRKINS

Two Major Fabulists

WOMAN TRIUMPHANT (La maja desnuda). By Vicente Blasco-Ibañez. Translated from the Spanish by Hayward Keniston. With a Special Introductory Note by the Author. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

TREACHEROUS GROUND. By Johan Bojer. Translated from the Norwegian by Jessie Muir. New York: Moffat, Yard and Company.

THESE books are the result of a natural process which, after we have been more or less fortuitously "landed" by some new foreign genius, promptly picks us up and puts us in the basket. They are minor as well as earlier pieces of work. But the authors, in this case, think them worth our trouble and even worth some special gloss at their own hands. The Spaniard supplies an introduction to the English version, and the Norwegian replies in full to the queries of a reviewer for the New York Evening Post. So we know what each of them intended by his book and what he thinks it means.

"Woman Triumphant" is recalled by its writer as a novel which caused "a scandalous sensation" when it appeared, many years ago, in Spain. It was thought to be a sort of libel or satire on two well-known figures in Madrid society. The introduction defends it against this charge as well as against a possible charge of immorality. In fact, its treatment of sex matters is cautious by comparison with much that we are getting from English-writing contemporaries. To a point, its matter is familiar. A young painter at the turning of his career marries a good but Philistine woman. For a time he bows before her as the embodiment of Beauty. But she is jealous of what she perceives to be the true object of his worship. She turns him from his destined fulfillment as a painter of the nude, and forces him to become a fashionable success, as a maker of portraits. Her jealousy still feeds itself on suspicion of his sitters; and the time comes when it is justified. A somewhat notorious beauty with a fatuous husband becomes his mistress. Thus far we tread a familiar path. It is with the wife's death that the important action begins, a purely mental and spiritual or, as the slang goes, psychological action. If I ever re-read any of this book, it will be the hundred pages of Part III; the earlier parts might be summed up in two paragraphs. The author's interpretation of the tale is unconsciously confined to the conclusion:

> It must be borne in mind that the woman here is the wife of the protagonist. It is the wife who triumphs, resurrecting in spirit to exert an overwhelming influence over the life of the man who had wished to live without her. . . . Renovales, the hero, is simply the personification of human desire, this poor desire which, in reality, does not know what it wants, eternally fickle and unsatisfied. When we finally obtain what we desire, it does not seem enough. "More, I want more," we say. If we lose something that made life unbearable, we immediately wish it back as indispensable to our happiness. Such are we: poor, deluded children who cried yesterday for what we scorn to-day and shall want again to-morrow; poor, deluded beings plunging across the span of life on the Icarian wings of caprice.

In such a mood does the author re-peruse and expound his tale. It is not his determining mood, or there would be no great public for him. And it is not the determining mood of his story. For what moves us in it is that for all their blundering and wantonness, something real and abiding has sprung from the union of Renovales and his maja. In this the woman triumphs, and life triumphs through her.

"Treacherous Ground" was written in 1908. Blasco-Ibañez has recently said, "Johan Bojer is a Maupassant of the North, an impassioned, rapid thinker, with Latin clarity . . . Such a fiery, passionate way of telling a story." One might as well declare Blasco-Ibañez a Bojer of the South. Bojer has had his Gallic phase, and owns to an early discipleship of Zola. But his clarity is the northern clarity and his passion the northern passion: his is the cold fire of the North. He is of the race of Hamsun, of Nexö, of Lagerlöf—above all, of Ibsen. "Treacherous Ground" is very much in the Ibsen tradition. Like "The Face of the World" and "The Great Hunger," it shows an idealist and dreamer faring hardly in his contact with "life." Here, though, we take in a way the negative side. Erik Evje is a self-deceived dreamer, a sentimentalist, selfish like all his kind, who confounds egotism with idealism. He tries various pursuits, the church, medicine, labor reform, and finds them in turn unworthy of him. He has an old mother at home on their remote estate who is ready to turn over everything to him. Very well, he will be a reformer and philanthropist in his own country. But his schemes for the improvement of his fellow-men are tangled up in conceit and indolence. His beneficiaries are to become his victims; and for him there is nothing left but drink. The tale has the bite and "follow through" of an Ibsen play, a "Wild Duck" or an "Enemy of the People." It lacks, accordingly, the rich sympathy of "The Great Hunger." As for its idea or moral, Bojer has given his own elucidation of it. Erik Evje's Nemesis comes when, confronted with his folly, he sacrifices everything rather than "lose his crucifix," and so "be alone with his sins. He feels responsible for the sins he has himself committed, but he is not willing to assume responsibility for the ideal which has put the welfare of a number of human beings at stake . . . Tyranny does not always appear in royal purple. The greatest tyrant is the dreamer who tries, come what may, to reform the world in accordance with his own dreams. I tried in 'Treacherous Ground' to create a concrete example of a dreamer who is a tyrant. I had in mind an idealist who is an egoist, an uplifter who tries to forget his own sins by charging them up to society."

Read, O liberator, O new-republican, O freeman and denational—read, and perpend!

H. W. Boynton

"Him of Cordova"

Seneca. By Francis Holland. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

Mr. Holland's biographical essay, originally designed to preface a translation of Seneca's letters to Lucilius, is now allowed to appear "on the chance that here or there some readers may be found to share my interest in the subject." His full and agreeably written narrative of the life of the philosopher-statesman should win readers for Seneca. And if Mr. Holland's translation of the Epistles is not to be published, Dr. Gummere's version in the Loeb Library is at hand. What Mr. Holland ought to do is to publish a not too bulky volume of extracts. Skilfully excerpted and arranged, the world which has taken so kindly to Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius would quickly find a place in its heart for Seneca. For he, like them, and like Socrates before and Bacon and Addison since, was successful in bringing philosophy from the clouds and home to men's business and bosoms.

If the present age is indifferent to Seneca, and except as he figures in the scholarship of the Elizabethan drama it unquestionably is indifferent, it is the first of twenty centuries so minded. To preceding generations the very contrasts presented by his life made him absorbingly interesting. Preacher of poverty, he was many times a millionaire: advocate of simple living, he was virtual ruler of the world; asserter of personal integrity and independence, he truckled to a Nero when he could no longer control him. Only in his death, calmly opening his veins and stepping into a warm bath to hasten his sluggish blood, do precept and practice come together. Supposed correspondent of St. Paul's (his charming and accomplished brother Gallio, at any rate, came into personal contact with the Saint at Corinth) he is hailed as more Christian than the Christians; a later age condemns him as an atheist. Extravagantly praised and imitated in his own day for his pointed style—his modernity—he is despised in the next generation for his vulgarity and verbal antics. In the whole range of letters it would be hard to find a man who has been more admired, attacked, patronized, laughed at, and affectionately read than he.

Viewed as a part of an ideally reconstructed classical world, Seneca is neither a large nor a brilliant figure. In tragedy he seems hardly to belong to the genuine Roman tradition of Ennius, Accius, and Pacuvius; probably even as a writer of rhetorical tragedy Ovid surpassed him; as a metrician he is nothing by the side of Horace. As a philosopher he can not stand with Cicero in sweep and continuity; in a history of Stoicism even on a large scale he is dismissed with scant notice. In every view he is epigonal, second-rate, a little tawdry, sensational when he is not cold, dry, staccato. He is of the Silver Age. But as the Roman world recedes, Seneca remains a promontory long discernible, a sea-mark by which the hardy spirits of a later world laid their course back to Rome. Dante gladly admitted him to the "philosophic family." Chaucer read in his works, and for the Middle Ages generally he pointed many a moral. Over the new birth of tragedy he presided: it learned to walk with his stride, to mouthe with his voice, and some tricks of his gait and utterance never quite left it. Plutarch was his only rival in Montaigne's affection. The Epistles to Lucilius come more nearly than anything else to anticipating the modern familiar essay. "How could it be (as that worthy oratour sayde) but that walking in the sonne . . . yet needes he mought be sunburnt." So the dedicatory Epistle to Spenser's "Shepheards Calender," concerning its author. It does not seem to have been noted that the "oratour" here referred to is Seneca. They are many who have taken rhetorical color from his brilliance.

As a figure in modern literature Seneca is more lastingly significant than as a classic. His face is toward the New World. Columbus is said to have set sail with a verse from the "Medea" on his lips, and Governor Bradford, dismally coasting the shores of New England in the Mayflower, is reminded of an apt passage in the Epistles. Seneca's is one of the few voices of antiquity to be raised in behalf of slaves and in condemnation of the shows of the arena, facts of which students of Elizabethan drama who think of him only as the author of some peculiarly bloody and sensational plays ought sometimes to remind themselves. Mr. Holland is probably wrong to deny to Seneca, in passing, the authorship of the tragedies, only to attribute them to another man of the same name. The verses of Sidonius Apollinaris which distinguished between Seneca the philosopher and Imperial counsellor and Seneca the tragedian may very well owe their origin to a misunderstanding of Martial's line about the two Senecas, father and son. With the exception of the "Octavia," we need not deny them to their traditional author. And even in the case of the "Octavia," usually ruled out because Seneca himself appears as one of the characters, a strong argument has very recently been made for conceding its rightful membership in the canon where the tradition of full fifteen hundred years has accorded it a place.

Into the long and interesting story of Seneca's literary fortunes it is no part of Mr. Holland's task to enter. He is placing the story of his life against the background of Julio-Claudian Rome. His tone is that of a discriminating apologist. Apologist of some sort it is now almost impossible not to be; it is Seneca's misfortune that the Roman history which has come down to us was written from the point of view of his enemies, while the writings of his friends have perished. For some things in his career apology is not easy; his flattery of Claudius, for instance, whose "Pumpkinification" he later celebrated, contained in his "Consolation to Polybius" which he wrote from his Corsican exile. The philosopher may have professed the whole world his home, but the man knew where grew the vines his hand had pruned. As for his conduct toward Agrippina, the task of managing such a pair as the daughter of Germanicus and her precious offspring, Nero, asks a little charity in the judgment. No man who both preached and practised so much as Seneca could avoid standing occasionally in apparent contradiction with himself. In both he was a practical man rather than heroic and profound. But even his enemies credit him with giving to Rome the best government she enjoyed under the Empire. And his philosophy, designed to render a man superior to the assaults of fortune, was good doctrine for the troubled days which followed. It is not without significance for ours.

Harry Morgan Ayres

The Run of the Shelves

"From Friend to Friend" (Dutton) is the title of a small book of final reminiscences from the pen of the late Lady Ritchie, Thackeray's daughter. The book, which is copious on Mrs. Cameron, Mrs. Sartoris, and Mrs. Fanny Kemble, is sown with greater names. It is more enjoyable than many books of reminiscence, which seem to lack matter, and to be pinched and downcast in their genteel poverty. Lady Ritchie abounds in good-humor, a quality which most of us are more disposed to like than to praise. She writes happily, is really fond of people, never seems to have made the Thackerayan discoveries that the smile of hostesses is veneer and that the smile of life is that of the hostess. Both smiles are occasionally real; perhaps both were real for Lady Ritchie. She possesses style of a kind, though in what nook or chink of her unpretending English it takes up its shy abode we should need an analyst to tell us. An epoch says "Good-bye" to us in these closing reminiscences of a prolonged and gracious life. Why are we so kind to departing individuals, even to departing nobodies and bores, while we seem to let even fruitful and worthy epochs perish without commemoration or regret, "unhouseled, disappointed, unaneled"?

M. Albert Waddington, correspondent of the Institute and professor at Lyons University, says in the preface of his "Histoire de Prusse" (Paris: Plon) that "there is no history of Prussia in French," and adds: "I have taken as my model what M. Lavisse and his collaborators have so well accomplished, and I have tried to do in a more modest way for Prussia what they have done for France." He then thanks a half dozen German scholars "for their precious aid." But this volume, which is to be followed by four others—in fact, the second has just appeared—was published before the war. Speaking of himself, the author says in an unpublished letter:

> I was born at Strassburg just ten years before the city was lost to France, and sorrow over this forced separation from Alsace-Lorraine caused my thoughts to dwell continually on the hope of their eventual return to France. This desire decided me, as soon as I was old enough to choose a career, to make a special study of Germany in general and of Prussia in particular, in order to be in a position to enable my fellow countrymen to understand better those who had vanquished us, and to perform the task in such a way that while I brought out their grave faults—rapacity, perfidy, and pride—I would not hide their good qualities—love of order and discipline and work. So I spent two years in residence and study in Germany, and all my teaching in the university has been in modern history, especially in the history of the Germanic nations.

We should add, in order to complete this autobiographical note, that during the war M. Waddington served as an interpreter and won the croix de guerre, and that M. Waddington's family relationships, connect him with Madame Waddington, known to all readers of Scribner's; to the late Eugene Schuyler, to Colonel Harjes of the Morgan house, and to young Jean P. Waddington, a Cornell graduate, who won honors on the western front.

One of the causes of the intense hatred for the Germans which exists in France is due largely to their ruthless destruction of the churches, and this feeling is kept alive by the frequent publication of books and pamphlets on this subject, in which the illustrations speak to the popular heart even more keenly than does the text. One of the finest of the modern provincial churches of France was that of Notre-Dame de Brebières, at the little town of Albert in Picardy. In "Une Glorieuse Mutilée" (Paris: Bloud and Gay), the curé, Abbé Gosset, tells the sad story of its destruction, and two score photographs, depicting the edifice as it was in 1914 and as it is now, drive home the bitter words of this indignant prelate, and may awaken a desire in the reader to help increase the subscription for its restoration.

A new Section of the Oxford "English Dictionary on Historical Principles" (London: Humphrey Milford) has just appeared. It covers a part of the letter V and is edited by Dr. W. A. Craigie, who treats 1,571 words, 222 of which are now obsolete and 65 alien or not fully naturalized. The vocabulary is predominantly of Romanic origin, and consists largely of adoptions of, or formations on, common Latin words and stems. Many of these are found with little change of form, in all the modern Romanic languages. Italian has contributed a few words, including vista, viva, and volcano. The native English element is represented by only one important word, vixen. Of words from remote sources, is the American negro voodoo. It is curious that vote was before 1600 almost exclusively in Scottish use. The lack of obvious meaning in vouchsafe was no doubt the main cause of the extraordinary variety of forms and spellings in which it appeared down to the sixteenth century. Dr. Craigie gives over fifty examples of this. Under vivisection and its derivatives, the campaign in England against this practice comes out interestingly in the illustrative quotations for which this dictionary is famous. Thus, under Voltairean and its derivatives peculiar life is given to the definitions by having them associated with the names of Gladstone, Morley, Carlyle, Canon Liddon, and Mrs. Browning.

Impressions de Voyage II

Thrice have I been in Manila while the Spanish flag flew over these islands and twice since that flag was replaced by the Stars and Stripes. Even since my last visit, more than nine years ago, tremendous changes and improvements have been effected.

Manila was a horrid but picturesque pest hole in the '90's. Its streets were largely mud ruts in the wet season and narrow, dusty passages during the North East monsoon, and the gutters were the only sewers. Now, however, all are paved and kept in excellent order; sewers have been constructed; fairly good water from the hills has been introduced to take the place of unsanitary surface wells. The moat about the old Spanish walled city, breeding ground for mosquitoes, has been filled in to make a pleasing public park and golf links. The mosquitoes, which once swarmed in vast clouds, are hardly to be seen at all. The city has grown enormously, chiefly, of course, in the suburbs. Everywhere are handsome and spacious buildings of an excellent architectural style either completed or in course of erection. Reinforced concrete seems to be the favored material.

There is but little visible of the former Spanish element. Only at rare intervals can a purely Spanish face be recognized. Indeed the chief, possibly the only, trace left of the Spanish occupation is in the rule of the road—still to the left. The fashion in native male costume used to be a piña shirt worn outside the trousers à la Dicky-Dicky-D'out. It survives in but occasional instances; European garb, as a rule of white cotton, is now the vogue. In the country the old costume is more often seen. Formerly the inhabitants invariably surrendered the sidewalk to their Spanish masters. Now they take pleasure in crowding Americans into the gutter. They interpret liberty and equality rather disagreeably.

We had three delightful days and four cool nights at Baguio, the summer capital, some five thousand feet up in the hills of northern Luzon among the pines. There is nothing even in British India superior, if indeed equal, to Baguio, which was laid out by Mr. D. N. Burnham, the landscape architect; although it lacks Simla's background of towering snow-capped Himalayas, beside which Baguio's peaks seem mere hills.

The approach is by a road which zigzags up a picturesque gorge. As we climbed steadily upwards in a motor we passed many groups of Tagalogs leading dogs to the Sunday market to be sold as a delicacy to the Igorotes who troop in once a week to Baguio from districts beyond. In spite of their gastronomic idiosyncrasies and their scant attire, we found ourselves inclining to the general belief that these Igorotes are a better and more virile lot of men than the Tagalogs, known to us usually as Filipinos.

To reach Baguio one takes the narrow-gauge railway which runs due north for about 120 miles from Manila over a great alluvial plain. At Dagupan the change was made to automobile. It may be that we made the journey at a season when the rice fields are purposely left fallow. Whatever be the cause, it was rather depressing to contrast their deserted appearance with the throngs that crowd the streets of Manila. Another explanation for the absence of any signs of cultivation throughout hundreds of square miles of paddy may lie in the governmental regulation of the price of rice, which has so discouraged the farmer as to force him to turn his attention to the raising of sugar and tobacco, where he encounters no administrative check.

The general opinion, as I gathered from Americans with whom I talked, is that the Filipinos are incapable of self-government. This harsh judgment may or may not be true. Derisive comment is made on certain measures passed at a recent special session of the Philippine Legislature, such as granting a large pension to this person or that or a huge cash gratuity to another, the provision for the acquisition by the State of 80 per cent. of the stock of the Manila Railway. The Government is importuned to help in the financing of a hanging garden surpassing that of Babylon in size and magnificence, while the ordinance by which the Government takes over all oil wells is soundly berated. But we Americans should be in a better position to find fault if our own legislative record were more nearly flawless.

What effect on Philippine prosperity would follow our withdrawal and the stoppage of annual disbursements of, I understand, thirty-odd millions of gold dollars for naval and military purposes can only be conjectured. "If you do so," I am told, "the different races would be cutting each other's throats without delay and the Moros would move into Manila. At least America should keep a military force here to protect the Philippines." It may sound brutal but I advocate giving the Filipinos their complete liberty—say after five years' notice. If it is worth having, it is worth fighting for. Whether they are or will be grateful for all we have done for them, or for the vast sums of good American money spent for their direct and indirect benefit, I can not pretend to say. At least, we shall have done our full duty by these wards of ours and have achieved an approving conscience.

CASPAR F. GOODRICH

Manila, P. I., March 21

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

English Grammar Schools

THE MANCHESTER GRAMMAR SCHOOL. Alfred A. Mumford, M.D. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

THOUGH the sudden impetus given to education at the beginning of the fifteenth century resulted in the founding of many grammar schools, few of them have survived the vicissitudes of four centuries with the stability of the Manchester Grammar School. One learns of the existence of a grammar school at Stratford because Shakespeare may have gone there; DeQuincey, on the other hand, was little more than an incident in the long and honorable history of the school at Manchester. Not that there were no dark periods, with rather pathetic efforts to fumble through to the light; but the significant thing is that the school did always emerge, and that its latest emergence was a consciously constructive effort, without fumbling. Dedicated to the education of the common people of Manchester, it never permanently forgot its true character, in spite of yielding to occasional temptations to imitate the more comfortably successful schools of an "exclusive" type. When the education of the common people in the last half of the nineteenth century came into its own, the Manchester school was therefore well adapted to take a prominent part in the national scheme. It now numbers above a thousand boys and goes on with an accumulated force which is almost as strong, in its special field, as the social tradition of Eton or Winchester.

The composition of the school at the present time is interesting. Fifteen per cent. are "free placers," while another forty per cent. come from the public elementary schools, some of them, however, paying the "capitation fees" of £15 a year after they enter the Grammar School. The other boys come from various preparatory schools and, with only a few exceptions, pay the fees. There is thus established what in America would amount to a combination of the virtues of the public school and the private day-school, with an evident elimination of many of the defects of each.

The present character and composition of the Manchester Grammar School are naturally more intelligible when one has some knowledge of its growth through four centuries. Dr. Mumford rightly therefore gives considerable attention to the history of the school. His pages show an affectionate interest that reveals intimacy with the history of nonconformist Manchester and long hours spent among the quaint records of the school library. Perhaps on this account the author is led, especially in the early chapters, to a profusion of detail which could be of interest only to an "old boy" of the school. Indeed, some of it hardly justifies itself even on these grounds. The early history of the institution, meagre and rather insignificant, is padded out with irrelevancies. Heavy and not wholly accurate ecclesiastical history (the reader is given the impression, pp. 21-23, that all England went Calvinistic in Elizabeth's time), considerable space given to Grotius because an old copy of his works reposes in the school library, special attention to the founding of the Manchester almshouse,—these and similar digressions swell the early chapters to forbidding bulk; while the "barring-out" (p. 130) might have appeared to the author less deserving of special comment if he had recalled that even the gentle Joseph Addison took part in a barring-out and that Dr. Johnson dismissed it as "a savage license, practised in many schools, towards the end of the last (17th) century." The volume, to be sure, is in one sense a sort of memorial, and so might be justified in its digressive bulk, were it not for the avowed purpose of showing how the school was in the van of democratic developments in education. It is of more than local interest, the author tells us, "because of the constantly repeated efforts which have been made from its foundation to free the school from the limitations of its own age and period and keep it in touch with the wider needs of society." The parts of the book which deal with these efforts are of distinct value to anyone interested in education.

The school, founded by Hugh Oldham in 1515, came near extinction during the fifty years after the death of its founder. The feoffees appear to have heeded little the hope of Oldham that the sons of Merchant Adventurers and tradesmen should be brought up "in virtue, cunning, erudition, literature, and good manners." With the appointment of Dr. Cogan to the high-mastership in 1583, however, the school renewed its vigor. The chief study at this time was of course the classics, but music received much respectful attention—an attention worthy the consideration of modern educators. The school grew steadily with the advance of the Puritan movement; situated in a centre of non-conformist activity and connected through it with Leyden and Dutch scholarship, it took a position of more than local importance and began to send poor boys to Oxford and Cambridge. During the following century it fared less well. Naturally the new interest in science found support which was lacking at the more aristocratic foundations, and the Wesleyan Revival had a quickening effect on the school and its neighborhood, but the easy-going rationalism which settled over most English institutions of learning during the eighteenth century gradually dissipated the traditional fervor that the Manchester school had inherited from its Puritan days. This and the increasing popularity of the more exclusive boarding-schools resulted in a decrease in numbers which in the Tory days of George IV amounted to a serious menace. The Rev. Jeremiah Smith, high-master from 1807 to 1837, sought to stem the tide by remaking the school into "a high-class boarding-school," with strong Church and King leanings and with preparation for the universities a main feature. This course, though temporarily successful, ran counter to the character of the school, and Lord Cottenham's decree in 1839 forbidding university "exhibitions" to boarders was followed in 1848 by a final decision that boarders be abolished altogether. All the older trustees resigned; things looked black for the school. This development, however, was really a mercy, for it threw the institution back to its natural course, and the genius of F. W. Walker, high-master from 1859 to 1876, built out of the confusion a school able to fit later without great difficulty into the national scheme of education.

The last chapter of Dr. Mumford's book contains much valuable material. As he was for a long time medical examiner at the school, his testimony against military training in secondary schools is important. Other valuable expert testimony is that given in regard to the irregular development of the adolescent. A sort of summary of his evidence is found in the following sentences:

> All vital activities, whether bodily or mental, have as a physical basis the setting free of a stream of energy. Their growth does not increase by steady and gradual stages coincident with the calendar age of the child or the adolescent, but by fitful and somewhat erratic leaps whose height as well as whose time of appearance vary greatly. With the full onset of adolescence a great and sudden increase of energy output usually takes place, which may be restricted to one or few of the functional systems of the body or may be uniformly diffused, though this is rare. The rate of development of one system or function by no means affords a guide to that of another, and violent forcing the pace of any system will be accompanied by injury, the appearance of which will be delayed but will not be prevented, for, in the absence of unusual vigor, precocious growth involves premature decay.

This of course is not a new discovery, but it states clearly as well as authoritatively a point to which educators have so far given quite insufficient heed.

WALTER S. HINCHMAN

Bethlehem

Bach Festival

May 28th, 4 p. m. and 8 p. m.
Cantatas and Motet

May 29th, 1.30 p. m. and 4 p. m.
Mass in B Minor

LEHIGH UNIVERSITY
Bethlehem, Pa.

Applications are invited for an Instructorship in French and Spanish. Stipend, $2000 or $2200 with the summer school. Young Canadian or man of Latin origins preferred, but applicants must speak both languages and have had college experience in teaching. Letters, with references and recommendations, may be sent to the Dean, Dr. W. Sherwood Fox, Western University, London, Canada.

Concerning radical readjustment between the peoples:

"The Brotherhood of Man"

This book by Dr. A. R. L. Dohme is an earnest study of general economic and political conditions. Dr. Dohme concludes with an interesting practical outline for a World State and new human relationships. By mail, $1.10.

THE NORMAN, REMINGTON COMPANY
Publishers - Baltimore

The Stock Exchange and the "Corner in Stutz"

In the matter of the New York Stock Exchange and the "corner" in the stock of the Stutz Motor Company, the undisputed facts appear to be as follows:

1. The stock of the company—100,000 shares—was listed on the Exchange and regularly dealt in on the "floor."

2. In March of this year a spectacular rise took place on the price of the stock and the character of the dealings in it was such as to attract the attention of the "Committee on Business Conduct." This body is a sub-committee of the Board of Governors of the Exchange, which is charged with the duty of exercising general supervision over the business methods and practices of members.

3. Investigation by this committee disclosed the fact that Allan A. Ryan, a member of the Exchange and head of the firm of Allan A. Ryan & Co., personally owned 80,000 shares of Stutz Motor stock and that "he and his family, friends, and immediate associates owned or had contracts for the delivery to them of stock aggregating 110,000 shares, or 10,000 shares more than the entire capital stock of the company" (official statement of the Governing Committee of the Exchange published April 17, 1920).

4. The "Committee on Business Conduct" thus became officially aware of the existence of a "close corner" in Stutz Motor stock. It thereupon informed Ryan "that the situation must not continue; that he alone was in a position to put an end to the corner and must take whatever steps were necessary to do so." (Ibid.)

5. The statement of the Governing Committee continues as follows: "The situation did not improve and no effective steps were taken by him" (Ryan) "to end the corner. At the meeting with the Business Conduct Committee on the morning of March 31, Mr. Ryan stated the terms on which he was willing to settle. Those terms were $750 per share. The Exchange itself had no power to settle the outstanding contracts or fix the terms which would be proper for settlement. At the joint meeting of the Business Conduct Committee and the Law Committee on the afternoon of the same day, he stated $500 as his settlement figure. He was informed that even in case of a settlement the question must be raised whether the stock must not be stricken from the list because it was not sufficiently distributed to provide a free and open market. He at once declared that unless he was assured that the stock would be allowed to remain on the list and that no action would be taken in respect thereto, he would not settle for $500 and that his settling price might be $1,000 or more. The Business Conduct Committee and the Law Committee at once reported the facts to the Governing Committee, and the Governing Committee by unanimous action adopted the resolution suspending dealings in Stutz Motor stock." (Ibid.)

6. The effect of this action was to prevent the rules of the Exchange from being used by Ryan to make the "shorts" settle under penalty of "insolvency" under the rules and consequent suspension from membership in the Exchange.

On April 5 Ryan "at his own request" (ibid.) appeared before the Low Committee of the Exchange and made another offer of settlement, which settlement was to be made with the Exchange Committee and enforced by the Exchange upon its members. The Law Committee declined to enter into negotiations with Mr. Ryan. It held the view that all questions arising out of contracts relating to Stutz Motor stock were to be settled between the parties to those contracts . . . (Ibid.)

8. The issue was thus fundamentally joined. Ryan's position was one of demanding that the Exchange Committee should make a settlement on behalf of the "shorts"—and enforce this settlement upon them—and that thereafter Stutz Motor stock should remain on the "list." The Exchange Committee's position was that the matter was one which concerned the parties to the contracts and that it was not its business to arrange a settlement of the contracts; also that it could not allow its rules to be made the means of enforcing what was admittedly a close "corner"; also that

(Continued on page 526)

CROCKER-WHEELER MOTORS

"Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power"

Still Leading

Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler were the first to apply generators to not only the telephone and telegraph—but later to the wireless.

In 1919 the U. S. Government adopted Crocker-Wheeler Motor Generators for wireless in conjunction with aeroplanes in both naval and land use.

S. S. Wheeler

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York, Boston, Syracuse, Chicago, Cleveland, Birmingham, Pittsburgh, Newark, New Haven, Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco

ROMAN ESSAYS AND INTERPRETATIONS

By W. Warde Fowler $5.65

The ripe fruit of a long life of scholarship are these papers dealing with a variety of subjects in Latin literature and mythology which will interest the folklorist, the student of comparative religion and the general reader as well as the classical student.

POLITICAL IDEALS

An Essay

By C. Delisle Burns $1.80

This, the third edition, has been corrected and brought up to date, and two new chapters have been added, one on Democracy and the other on the League of Nations.

MEDALS OF THE RENAISSANCE

By G. F. Hill Net $25.00

A splendid book covering the entire field of medallic art, both Continental and English, during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, valuable alike as a reference work and for its fine illustrations. It should be noted that the medals figured here have for the most part not been previously illustrated while references are supplied to many hundreds of pieces illustrations of which are to be found in other works.

DIPLOMACY AND THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By D. P. Heatley Net $3.75

An attempt to portray diplomacy and the conduct of foreign policy from the standpoint of history. In the history of diplomacy we see the fruit for each age in treaties which express the movements of thought and mark the development of conventions that are widely recognized.

At all Boosellers, or from the Publishers.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

AMERICAN BRANCH

35 West 32d St., New York

New edition just published

THE OLD FARMER AND HIS ALMANACK

By GEORGE LYMAN KITTREDGE

xiv+403 pages Fully illustrated $3.00

If it is true, as it seems to be, that the progress of our country has been largely determined by the spirit and energy of New England men and women, one may claim, without fear of gainsaying, a position of some dignity for this unpretentious annual, the Old Farmer's Almanac, which has, in its successive issues, been their secular manual of faith and practice for so many years. Professor Kittredge takes one or another feature of the early issues as the starting point for each of his chapters, and with additions from his own marvelous stores of knowledge draws an entertaining picture of life in Colonial days. The antiquary, the historian, and the plain "gentle reader" will find it a book to read again and again for facts as well as amusement.

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

7 Randall Hall, Cambridge, Mass. 19 East 47th Street, New York City

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED
LACKAWANNA
THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

(Continued from page 524)
it could not properly admit to dealings a stock which was virtually all owned by one man, for there could not be a free and open market in it while its ownership was thus concentrated.

The entire affair was thus removed from the direct purview of the Exchange. After nearly three weeks of manœuvring, a "voluntary settlement" was reached between Ryan and the "shorts," on April 24, by which the "corner" was dissolved and the episode ended. During this period Ryan "resigned" his membership in the Exchange—his "resignation" has not as yet been acted upon by the Exchange authorities—and the Stutz Motor Company withdrew its stock from the Exchange list.

Comment upon the affair has naturally been widespread. Eliminating from the discussion everything but the facts, it is interesting to note the principles involved and to test in the light of those principles the propriety of the course of action followed by the Exchange. The case is interesting because of its unique character. There have been "corners" in the past, some of which (as in 1901) have developed accidentally and some of which have been carefully engineered. But the Stutz case is the first wherein an absolutely "close corner" has been brought officially to the attention of the Exchange authorities and offered to them for adjudication at an early stage of the operation. The important questions are: Did the Exchange authorities take proper action? What principles are involved?

First as to Stock Exchange rules: These rules require that stock which is sold shall be delivered on the following day before 2:15 P.M., that if it be not delivered by the seller to the purchaser before that time, it may be publicly "bought in under the rules" by the purchaser for account of the seller and that failure on the part of the seller to deliver stock due, or to pay for stock so "bought in," is an act of insolvency which involves suspension of membership on the part of the defaulter. Also under the rules stock may be borrowed and must be returned to the lender upon demand made by him upon the borrower, and if not so returned may be "bought in under the rules," as in the case above described, with precisely the same consequences. Failure to "return" stock or to pay for stock "bought in under the rules" by the lender is an act of insolvency involving suspension of membership.

When admission was made to the Business Conduct Committee of a "corner" in Stutz stock, the "shorts" were borrowing stock from the Ryan group, who, as above stated, held 110,000 shares and "contracts," as against only 100,000 shares actually in existence. Thus the "shorts" were subject to demand at any time for return of stock under penalty of having the same "bought in under the rules," and the only source of supply for the stock was the group from whom they were borrowing. This group was thus in a position where it could compel the "shorts" under the rules of the Exchange to "cover" their commitments at any price it chose to dictate, for it alone was in a position to supply stock at any price.

Confronted with this situation, what course should the Exchange authorities have pursued in justice to all parties concerned?

The position of the Ryan group and the "shorts" was, in fact, a case of a claim by the former for damages from the latter for non-performance of a contract which was in effect impossible of performance. Enforcement of the "buying in" rule would enable the Ryan group to assess the amount of the damages and collect them under penalty of insolvency and suspension from membership in the Exchange. For stock ordered "bought in" by the Ryan group for account of the "shorts" could be supplied only by that group at such price as it might choose to exact, and the price exacted would determine the damages to be collected. This would clearly be an inequitable method of settling the matter. Moreover, there were open other ways whereby the rights of all parties were conserved and by which they could be appraised and determined. Failing settlement by voluntary agreement between them, there were available the courts of law whose competence in the matter of assessing damages for non-fulfillment of contract was complete and unquestionable. Withdrawal by the Exchange of the use of its machinery by the Ryan group would in no way prejudice the rights of that group, whereas failure to withdraw that machinery might gravely prejudice the rights of the "shorts."

The Exchange Committee's course was therefore clear, and in the main they followed it. At the first meeting between the Business Conduct Committee and Ryan it appears (from the official statement of the Exchange itself quoted above) that Ryan was told that he must take steps to end the corner, and it appears (from a statement by Ryan issued April 12) that they requested Ryan to continue lending the stock pending such steps—the "buying in" process thus being temporarily excluded. Finally, on March 31, no settlement having been effected, the Board of Governors of the Exchange threw the whole matter outside the purview of the rules of the Exchange, leaving it to be adjusted either by voluntary agreement or by due process of law. Three weeks later the affair was adjusted by agreement.

That the Exchange acted in accord with the principles governing the case is clear, and it may be laid down as a general rule that in the case of a "corner" it is the duty of the Exchange—and of all similar bodies—at once to exclude the whole affair from its jurisdiction. Whatever ground there is for criticism of the Exchange in connection with the Stutz case is to be found in the fact that the suspension of all dealings in Stutz stock which was ordered on March 31 was not ordered on the day when Ryan first admitted to the Business Conduct Committee that there was a corner in the stock. It is true that extenuating circumstances may fairly be urged; the case was without precedent and the desire of all parties to accommodate a new and difficult situation was natural; besides, it was stipulated that stock was to be lent and stock loans were not to be called. Nevertheless, strict construction of the principle in the case would have required immediate suspension of all dealings so far as Stock Exchange rules were concerned. While the delay may be reasonably excused it can not be justified in principle. With this exception the Exchange must be admitted to have handled the matter correctly and in full accord with equity.

Two other points may be noted in connection with the Stutz corner. One concerns the re-admission to the Exchange "list" of Stutz stock. The other concerns the process of "short selling" in general. So long as any stock is owned entirely by a single individual or a very few individuals it is not susceptible of a "free and open market." Presumably the ownership of Stutz Motor stock is to-day substantially as it was when the corner was disclosed, viz. in the hands of the "Ryan group." No stock thus controlled is eligible for "listing" on the Exchange, nor should it be eligible for listing upon any Exchange which aims at maintaining a free and open market for securities dealt in on its "floor." The reasons are obvious and need not be recited.

The process of "short selling" (which involves the "borrowing and lending of stocks") is very imperfectly understood by those who have not had access to the machinery of the operation. Its essence is in the "borrowing" process. The important thing to note about it is that every "short sale" brings into existence a "contract" which can only be fulfilled by a purchase of stock from someone who has it and is willing to sell it. Suppose that in the case of a given company there are 1,000,000 shares outstanding, owned by 20,000 stockholders. A speculator sells one hundred shares "short" which is bought by someone. The total amount of stock and contracts now in existence is 1,000,100 shares, or 100 shares more than there are actually

(Continued on page 528)

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.
Established 1818
Philadelphia NEW YORK Boston

International Investments

Our booklet on International Investments, now in its third edition, shows the relation of such investments to the foreign exchanges and gives an outline of certain foreign loans issued in dollars.

Copy on request

BROWN, SHIPLEY & COMPANY
Established 1810
Founders Court, Lothbury
LONDON, E. C.
Office for travelers
123 Pall Mall, LONDON, S. W.

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street — Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President
F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres. — H. W. Shaw
James Dodd, Vice-Pres. — J. A. Flynn
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres. — A. C. Downing, Jr.
Harry Forsyth, Treas. — W. MacNaughten, Assistant Secretaries
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y — E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mrs. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell..........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard — Buchanan Houston
S. Reading Bertron — Frederic B. Jennings
James A. Blair — Walter Jennings
Mortimer N. Buckner — Darwin P. Kingsley
James C. Colgate — John C. McCall
Alfred A. Cook — Ogden L. Mills
Arthur J. Cumnock — John J. Mitchell
Robert W. de Forest — James Parmelee
John B. Dennis — Henry C. Phipps
Philip T. Dodge — Norman P. Ream
George Doubleday — Dean Sage
Samuel H. Fisher — Joseph J. Slocum
John A. Garver — Myles Tierney
Benjamin S. Guinness — Clarence M. Woolley
F. N. Hoffstot

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

Complete Banking Service in Convenient Localities

55 Cedar Street
Broadway at 73rd St.
Madison Av. at 75th St.
125th St. at Eighth Av.

Customers of one office have at their disposal the facilities of all offices.

DEPARTMENTS
Banking — Trust
Mortgage — Coupon
Credit — Transfer & Registrar
Foreign — Municipal Bond
Reorganization — Safe Deposit
Safekeeping of Securities

UNITED STATES MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY

Capital and Surplus, $6,000,000
NEW YORK

issued, and there are 20,001 holders. The "short seller" must borrow from some-one 100 shares to make good his contract of sale. He now owes 100 shares of stock at a fixed price to a third party. Suppose that, instead of 20,001 holders of the stock and contracts, there were only one; the "short seller" would then be "cornered" and would have to buy from the man to whom he owed stock, the stock necessary to comply with the loan. Thus in every "short sale" of stock there is, mathematically, an "overissue" of stock and there is, theoretically, a possibility of a "corner." The reason why "short selling" is feasible and the reason why "corners" are so rare is simply the fact that the stocks dealt in on the Exchange are mostly scattered in ownership so that it is almost always possible to borrow stock or to buy it. This is what is meant by a "free and open" market.

One concluding reflection suggests itself. The Stutz episode aroused in some quarters a demand for "incorporation" of the Exchange. An "incorporated" Exchange could not have dealt with the matter as it was dealt with by the New York Stock Exchange. It does not require much imagination to picture the series of injunctions, demurrers, and the like which would have been brought into play in such a case had the governing powers of the Exchange authorities been subject to court review, and the prolonged confusion that would have resulted. It was precisely the possession of plenary power by the governors of the Exchange that enabled the matter to be dealt with quickly, and, in the main, upon right lines.

T. F. W.

Books and the News

America and England

ONE of the most important books of the spring is Owen Wister's "A Straight Deal, or The Ancient Grudge" (Macmillan, 1920). It is about Anglo-American relations, and it sets forth directly and emphatically that if we wish peace to prevail, and civilization, as Americans understand it, to advance, we will, both here and in England, continue to cultivate friendship between the United States and Great Britain. But if Americans prefer the triumph of Sinn Fein, and the interests of Germans and pro-Germans to the peace of the world, they will allow themselves to be influenced by the Sinn Fein-German propaganda, will nurse ancient grudges, and credit all the slanders and false rumors set afloat against England by these allies of the Hun.

These books may be used to counteract falsehood. This is what an Englishman has written about the old quarrel: "The American Revolution" (Longmans, 1899), by Sir George Otto Trevelyan. And this by an American on English government: "The Government of England" (Macmillan, 1912), by A. Lawrence Lowell. An English writer on the same subject: Sidney Low's "The Governance of England" (Putnam, 1914). A soldier of the British Army wrote about the American Expeditionary Force in "The Last Million" (Houghton, 1919), by Ian Hay. An Englishman describes the United States in "The Future in America" (Harper, 1906), by H. G. Wells. Two books about England: "The Lighter Side of English Life" (Foulis, 1913), by F. Frankfort Moore, and "Our English Cousins" (Harper, 1894), by Richard Harding Davis.

For the relations between the two countries: Matthew P. Andrews's "A Heritage of Freedom" (Doran, 1918), and Harry H. Powers's "America and Britain" (Macmillan, 1918).

Four informal and readable books are Ian Hay's "Getting Together" (Doubleday, 1917), Price Collier's "England and the English from an American Point of View" (Scribner, 1910), Frederick De Sumichrast's "Americans and Britons" (Appleton, 1914), and J. G. Cook's "Anglophobia" (Four Seas Co., 1919).

Four books about the historical and political events in the Anglo-Saxon world are: William A. Dunning's "The British Empire and the United States" (Scribner, 1914), Sinclair Kennedy's "The Pan-Angles" (Longmans, 1914), Andrew C. McLaughlin's "America and Britain" (Dutton, 1919), and Henry Cabot Lodge's "One Hundred Years of Peace" (Macmillan, 1913).

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Books Received

FICTION

Mix, Jennie I. At Fame's Gateway. Holt. $1.75 net.

Morris, E. B. The Cresting Wave. Penn Publishing Co.

Van Vorst, Marie. Fairfax and His Pride. Small, Maynard. $1.75 net.

The Best Short Stories of 1919, and the Yearbook of the American Short Story. Edited by Eugene J. O'Brien. Small, Maynard.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Atwood, Harry F. Back to the Republic. Sixth edition. Laird & Lee.

Bunau-Varilla, Philippe. The Great Adventure of Panama. Doubleday, Page.

Butler, Nicholas Murray. Is America Worth Saving? Scribner. $2 net.

Dawson, Richard. Red Terror and Green. Dutton.

Falkenhayn, Erick von. The German General Staff, and Its Decisions. 1914-1916. Dodd, Mead.

Gaston, Herbert E. The Nonpartisan League. Harcourt, Brace & Howe.

Gibbons, Herbert A. France and Ourselves Century.

Harrison, Austin. Before and Now. Lane

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 54 New York, Saturday, May 22, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 529

Editorial Articles:

America's Duty 532
Treaty Manœuvres 532
Our Merchant Marine 533
The Socialist Convention 534
The Turkish Treaty 535

The Plot Against Mexico. By W. J. Ghent 536
Hiram W. Johnson in Fact and Fancy. By Jerome Landfield 537
The Military Coup in Germany. By Dr. Paul Rohrbach 540
Switzerland and the League of Nations. By Ottfried Nippold 541
Correspondence 542

Book Reviews:

The Beginnings of Modern Italy 544
Japanese Rule in Korea 545
The Puzzle of National Character 546
True Stories 547

The Run of the Shelves 548
My Friend the Print Seller. By Lawrence Williams 550
Certificate Borrowing and the Floating Debt. By Jacob H. Hollander 552

Drama:

Sothern and Marlowe at the Shubert Theatre. By O. W. Firkins 554

Books and the News:

Living Expenses. By Edmund Lester Pearson 556

MR. HOOVER has completely disposed of Senator Johnson's sneer concerning his position on the treaty. The Senator had spoken of Mr. Hoover's "recent conversion to the so-called Lodge reservations, contemporaneous with his Republican candidacy," and had thought fit to refer to it as "evidence of the flexibility and elasticity of a great statesman's mind." Not a very brilliant bit of irony, at the best; and it turns out to be entirely without foundation, for Mr. Hoover wrote a letter to the President last November, urging him to accept the Lodge reservations so as to avoid "the great dangers of voting the treaty out." He felt, as so many other earnest advocates of the League felt, that the reservations, some of which he objected to, and others of which he regarded as "constructive, particularly in rendering it clear that the war power must be invoked by Congress," would not prevent the accomplishment of the great object of the League. "The world issues," said Mr. Hoover, "are so great as not to warrant the risks involved in delay in getting it into service, in the hope of procuring a few per cent. more ideal structure." In the homely phrase at the close, we seem to hear the practical engineer speaking; and all the way through we see the words of an honest man anxious for a great public object, and not of a seeker for the Presidency or any other office. Whatever criticisms may be made of Mr. Hoover, the very last that will have any chance to stick are those which impugn his sincerity, or which charge him with going out of his way for the sake of capturing the nomination.

THE New Republic, having helped to give currency to a reported utterance of General Wood's, of such preposterously violent character as to be calculated to do him great injury in the minds of all sensible persons, now sets forth with great fullness the story of its acceptance of that report. The article closes with the following words:

> The New Republic is, of course, glad to note General Wood's disavowal of such lawless statements. It regrets that General Wood was not fairly quoted by the correspondent who was present at the address and it regrets having given an added circulation to an inaccurate report, which sounds like a fairly good approximation to an apology, but the heading of the article is "Was General Wood Misquoted?" which makes the thing as a whole not much more like a gentleman's apology than 2.75 beer is like real beer. It appears that the New Republic went to a great deal of trouble—and, one would infer, of expense, too, for money is plentiful in that office—in the endeavor to find out whether the report, originally found in the New York American, was correct; with the result that finally the obnoxious passage was found in a special dispatch from Fort Collins to the Rocky Mountain News. In this, General Wood was reported as saying:

> My motto for the Reds is S.O.S.—ship or shoot. I believe that we should place them all on ships of stone, with sails of lead and that their first stopping place should be hell.

In response to a recent inquiry from a reader of the New Republic, General Wood states that he never said anything of the kind as in any way expressing his own view, but was quoting what Dr. John Wesley Hill had said, as showing the bitterness that had been aroused against the Reds. His own views, the General adds, have been very often expressed as follows:

> Aliens who are avowed enemies of our government and who seek to pull down our institutions, if found guilty, after a fair trial, should be sent to their own country. I have always emphasized very strongly that there should be no short-cut or irregular methods; that they are entitled to full and fair trial before a court of competent jurisdiction.

General Wood's long record of honorable public service has been notable, among other things, for dignity and self-control, sometimes under very trying circumstances. The antecedent improbability, therefore, of his having uttered a sentiment like that ascribed to him in the Fort Collins dispatch should have made the editors of the New Republic unwilling to accept its authenticity without the most thorough confirmation. One obvious means of testing its accuracy, that of writing to General Wood himself, does not seem to have occurred to them as worth while; and now when they do get his denial, they regard the statement of an unknown reporter for the Rocky Mountain News —very possibly the same man who sent the report to Hearst—as only a shade less trustworthy than the General's denial. Else why the interrogation in the heading? And why the very carefully stinted language of the apology? We fancy that the New Republic is still under the influence of its "will to believe," and indeed that it expects its readers to do likewise.

WITH frankness and humility worthy of a Confucian sage a Mexican official of the latest revolution confesses the sins of his distracted country and asks the world to have patience yet a little. Assuredly, señor, a world of patience; the United States most of all, which has no wish for another Ireland on its hands, and has grown a little wary of attempting to pick a winner in the Mexican free-for-all. It is some comfort, at any rate, that the Mexicans can still laugh—laugh at "Tea Flower" Bonillas and his bad Spanish, laugh at Don Venustiano, himself chuckling into Chironian whiskers over the success of his splendid young protégé, Juanito Barragan. Señor Blasco-Ibañez does us a service; he humanizes the Mexicans. Let us laugh with him, and them; it is a great aid to patience.

THE career of Levi P. Morton, dead at ninety-six, is full of the flavor of America. A clerk in country stores, dry-goods merchant, banker, Congressman, Ambassador, Vice-President, country gentleman, and man of the world, he might have begun amid surroundings even more humble than the parsonage in which he was born, and he might, if he had been a man of genius instead of a man of sterling American ability, have gone farther along the road whose end is history. The significance of his career lies in its balance—he was not merely a politician and not merely a man of business—and in the well-nigh perfect adjustment which he was able to establish between his abilities and his opportunities. He did not attempt what he could not do, but what he did attempt he carried through with a vitality that even played Old Time himself as good a match as he often meets with. Withal, he was never too busy to live. There are other ways of living than his, but for most people, on whatever scale they can manage it, the life he lived is at once a model and an inspiration.

IT would seem as if Signor Nitti played a skillful game when, on May 11, he made the life of the Cabinet dependent on the rejection of the Socialist motion regarding the incidents which had recently occurred among the personnel of the Postal and Telegraph services. He thus offered to the opponents of his foreign policy a chance of defeating him on a minor question of internal administration, avoiding thereby a definite condemnation of his activities as a member of the Supreme Council. His forced retirement in consequence of the Popular party voting with the Socialists brought on a political crisis which only served to demonstrate his indispensableness to the country. For neither the Catholics nor the Socialists, who, having forced the crisis, were responsible for its solution, were able or willing to form a new Government. Though allied in opposition against Nitti, they refused to join hands in constructive politics, and no party in the Italian Chamber is sufficiently strong to become responsible for the Government entirely on its own hook. Within a week from the date of his resignation, Nitti had the satisfaction of being requested by the King to form a new Ministry. He will return considerably stronger for this short retirement.

THE Cabinet of M. Millerand has requested the Minister of Justice to open legal proceedings against the General Federation of Labor with a view to its dissolution, the charge being that it has gone beyond the limits of its lawful activity, which is the defense of economic interests, corporate and professional. Its avowed object in calling the strike was to enforce upon the country, against the wishes of the people as expressed in the last Parliamentary elections, a hazardous experiment in social reform desired by a minority of workers only. In reply to the Government's decision, the Federation has issued a manifesto which tries to parry the blow by representing it to the workers as an act of despair of the Cabinet and an admission on its part of the strength of the movement. Léon Jouhaux, in taking that stand, puts a fair face on a foul matter. His cause is evidently lost, and the move of M. Millerand is more likely to be a symptom of its collapse, offering the Government an opportunity of striking a decisive blow at his turbulent organization.

LABOR shortage, combined with the high price of seed, is expected to result in a shrinkage of five per cent. in the acreage planted to potatoes this season, according to reports from the field agents of the United States Bureau of Markets. There are few products of the soil in which average results fall farther below demonstrated possibilities than in potatoes. Under existing circumstances, it would seem to be the duty, or perhaps we should say the welcome opportunity, of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, and all State agencies of similar purpose, to spread to the utmost a knowledge of modern methods of increasing the potato yield and protecting it against its various enemies. It is entirely possible that a five per cent. decrease in acreage may be followed by a decided increase in production, and that, too, with a very slight relative increase in labor.

THERE is real pleasure in the discovery of at least one set of workmen who are willing to combine shorter hours with undiminished production. The "congress" of the American Multigraph Company, at Cleveland, pledged the workers to maintain the rate of production at the ten-hour standard if the company would grant the nine-hour day. The concession was made, in October of last year, and the pledge was faithfully carried out. The workmen have again come forward with a request (not a demand) for an eight-hour day, pledging themselves to a peaceable return to the nine-hour system in case of failure to maintain an undiminished rate of production. Preparatory to the request, a committee appointed by the "congress" had gone carefully over the data of production and discovered possible changes o method by which the rate of production might be increased. Here appears to be a case in which workmen are coöperating with their employers on the plane of mutual confidence and common sense, rather than passion and distrust.

THAT an army officer ought never to open his mouth on social or industrial questions is a stock convention in every radical editorial sanctum. These questions are beyond his ken; he can not, in the nature of things, know anything about them; and the only service he renders, when he speaks of them, is to furnish hilarity for gods and men. And yet—not always. For when he happens to say something that seems to confirm a radical attitude on a particular matter he becomes all at once a perspicacious, shrewd, trained, and experienced observer whose word is authoritative. Take, for instance, Major-General Graves and his reported saying that 98 per cent. of the people in Siberia favor the Bolsheviki. On the basis of the returns, with a few precincts still missing, we can safely affirm that not a single radical, liberal, or other sort of insurgent periodical in the United States has failed to print this reputed saying, with more or less exultant indorsement of both speech and speaker. And yet every person informed about Siberia knows that the utterance can not possibly be true. No matter how often and how diversely the popular sentiment has shifted, and no matter how democratic, radical, or revolutionary it may at any time have been, or may now be, there is no credible evidence that it is or has been pro-Bolshevik. At one time it supported Kolchak, and at a later time it turned violently against him. But the shift was not to Bolshevism; it was a reassertion, in large measure at least, of anti-Bolshevik democracy. In the manifesto of J. Jaxushew, president of the Siberian Regional Duma, issued last September, though Kolchak is bitterly denounced, the Bolsheviki are still "the enemy at the gates," whom a year before the "peasants had chased out of the country." There is no conclusive evidence that the Bolsheviki are in any greater favor in Siberia now than they were then.

THERE is nothing the insurgent editor so eagerly gulps as a seeming disclosure. He knows what his readers want, and it is his business to supply them. They want to hear about the derelictions of the great covenants deviously arrived at, whispers behind locked doors, dark and mysterious origins of familiar things. To many of them the probable and the preposterous are one, and if the disclosure turns out to be merely a mare's nest there's no loss: it might just as well have been true, and anyhow it has furnished its thrill. These evils occur under capitalism; therefore they couldn't possibly occur under some other "ism." Count Czernin's declaration that "Italian diplomacy dominated the affairs of the Entente during the war," moves the New Republic to the sage comment: "That is something persons outside of the diplomatic game never suspected, but if one puts together such bits of evidence as cropped up and passed unnoticed, Czernin's statement looks plausible." Of course it looks plausible. To the insurgent editor how else could it look? If it had read that the sinking of the Lusitania was caused by the devilish machinations of the French holders of Russian bonds, or that the disaster of Caporetto was brought about through the dickerings of A. Mitchell Palmer with Enver Pasha it would have looked equally plausible.

"IT is a great mistake," said President Masaryk, President of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, in his birthday address to the National Assembly, "to imagine that the social revolution may be effected by the subjugation of the so-called bourgeoisie. Violence, here, too, would fail in its purpose; violence would only make slaves, and a slave never and nowhere works willingly and efficiently." Yet this threatened violence and compulsion is an inextricable part of almost all radical programmes for human uplift, and in the case of the two temporarily successful revolutions, in Russia and Hungary, the threat was instantly translated into actuality. The purpose to impose a rule of force on the unwilling is explicit in almost all revolutionary formulæ and propaganda. The phraseology is that of compulsive power. The revolutionists of all schools intend to "seize and hold," to establish the "dictatorship of the proletariat," to enforce "proletarian discipline," to "subjugate the bourgeoisie," and to "crush out opposition." All of these phrases are expressions of the primitive delight that the revolutionist finds in the contemplation of a state of things in which he and his group will have power to compel others to obedience. It does not matter that the revolutionist delusively calls himself a pacifist, a democrat, an equalitarian, or any one of a dozen other terms that imply a disapproval of force and a hope for the rule of reason and persuasion. All this is for his more remote Utopia; what inspires him for the immediate future is the vision of himself and his fellows exercising unlimited powers against the rest of mankind.

IN "Neophilologus," a Dutch quarterly devoted to the study of modern languages, we find the reproduction of a curious portrait of Milton, which has come to light in Amsterdam. The "Ryksmuseum" possesses a collection of lacquered ware portraits by an Eighteenth Century Japanese artist, one of which presents the features of the poet as we know them from Faithorne's engraving. The regicide has mixed with unfamiliar company in the Japanese workshop, for the rest of the oval-shaped miniatures are mostly royalties: Frederick II. of Prussia, Joseph II., Gustavus Adolphus et al. The artist paid an unconscious tribute to Time's conciliatory power. It is sad to think that the intrusion of journalism and the teaching of general history have robbed the modern Japanese of that delightful ignorance which might cause an artist ingeniously to unite in a fraternal series of portraits the features of Mr. Wilson, Clemenceau, Wilhelm von Hohenzollern and Gabriele d'Annunzio.

America's Duty

To any one who has taken the trouble to think of the appalling situation in Central Europe, Mr. Davison's moving appeal and powerful statement of facts were but a confirmation of what one already knew and already felt. But the appeal and statement have centred the attention of the country on the subject, and the response which the nation will make, in acts not in words, will be a measure of its quality, a test alike of its heart and of its mind.

There is no use in mincing matters about it. We are not doing our duty as human beings, and we are not doing our duty as a great and rich and powerful nation. To dispose of the matter by saying that "we have troubles of our own" is to say that, facing the most stupendous need the world has ever known, we are unwilling to lessen by a little our extravagances and luxuries, in order to lessen by a great deal the agonies of millions of our fellow-men, rendered helpless by a world calamity that has left us almost unscathed.

An appropriation of five hundred million dollars, even if it were an outright gift, would be a mere bagatelle to us, in comparison with the immeasurable good it would do, and the unspeakable urgency of the need. "I believe," says Mr. Davison, "that the apathy and indifference which prevail to-day are due only to the fact that the American people have not grasped the dreadful facts," and he believes that when once "the true bearings of the situation have bitten into their consciousness, they will arise and act." But this biting in is taking an unconscionably long time. Our duty is to act now, and not after more millions have starved, after whole peoples may have been plunged into chaos, after the world's unrest has been intensified to the point of imminent deadly peril, from which we ourselves shall not be exempt.

Mr. Davison outlines a definite practical plan, to be instituted by Congress, under which the relief would take the shape not of mere alms, but of constructive aid administered by a commission of the best men America can command—"men of the type of General Pershing, Mr. Hoover, or ex-Secretary Lane"—the commission to be vested with complete power; and the aid would be administered upon such terms of coöperation on the part of the countries benefited as would tend to bring about not mere assuagement of distress, but genuine restoration. And when our Government had adopted the plan, it should "invite other Governments in a position to assist, to participate in the undertaking."

Will America awake to her duty? Will she rise to her opportunity? For the opportunity is as magnificent as the duty is compelling. By undertaking to lead in this great work of salvation, by devoting to it an insignificant fraction of what we stood ready to devote, if necessary, to the prosecution of the war, we shall be making an investment in goodwill which alone will infinitely more than repay the outlay. The gratitude and friendship which was the response of Belgium and of other afflicted countries to American aid in fighting destitution and disease during the war will once more flow to us, on an even greater scale and in more permanent form. Nor will the effect of this goodwill be limited to the manifestation of sentiment, for the improvement of tone and feeling in the prostrated countries of Central Europe will be the most powerful agency that can be imagined towards the prevention of anarchy and war.

If we have not lost our sense of proportion, if we do not place a trifling material sacrifice above the imperious claims at once of humanity and of policy, Mr. Davison's stirring appeal will not have been made in vain. The only excuse for our inaction is that the terrible need and the clear duty have not been brought home to our minds. This excuse can no longer be pleaded. Mr. Davison's words are a trumpet call to the nation's conscience. Let every one of us who is not deaf to the call do his utmost to drive the duty home to those in whose hands lies the decision between duty and inertia, between honor and shame.

Treaty Manœuvres

The Knox resolution declaring the state of war with Germany and Austria-Hungary at an end was passed in the Senate last Saturday by a majority of only five. Only three Democrats — Senators Reed, Shields, and Walsh of Massachusetts —voted in favor of the resolution; and two important dissenters from it, Senators Nelson and McCumber, are recorded on the Republican side. The utter hopelessness of any attempt to pass the resolution over the President's veto is thus demonstrated, though, of course, no demonstration was necessary. Any analysis of Mr. Knox's elaborate argument in favor of his motion would have been, at any time, of strictly academic interest only; and now even that can hardly be claimed for it. Of mere argumentation on theoretical aspects of the treaty, the country has, in all conscience, had enough; and Mr. Knox's argument had too much the character of a lawyer's brief, and too little the character of a genuine political discussion, to make it intrinsically a matter of high public interest. In so far as the episode of the introduction and debating of the resolution may have had real interest, it was as one more manœuvre in the long series which have marked the history of the treaty ever since it was presented to the Senate. But even as a manœuvre it did not have the kind of interest that attached to preceding moves in the game; for it did not offer, as many of the others have done, the possibility of furnishing a definition of the issue upon which the Republican party might plant itself in the whole matter of the treaty and the League.

Before the resolution disappears from view, however, it is worth while to draw attention to one important point. In the minds of the people generally, and in most of the pleas made for the resolution, the chief object to which it was supposed to be directed was that of bringing to an end the conditions in our own country which are predicated upon a state of war. The President is clothed with extraordinary powers, and many domestic affairs are subject to abnormal regulations, in virtue of acts of Congress passed during the war and remaining in force, according to their terms, until its termination. The declaration of a state of peace would bring the operation of these acts to an end, and would take from the President the extraordinary powers which they conferred upon him. In addition to the desirability of this object in itself, another motive has undoubtedly played its part in the pushing of the resolution. From the party standpoint it has been thought to be good politics to place upon the President the odium of continuing a state of war when Congress had declared its desire to bring that condition to a close. But obviously the direct object could be attained as well, and the indirect object vastly better, by something very different from the Knox resolution. So far as our domestic conditions are concerned, it would be quite competent for Congress to repeal all its war acts, and further to declare that as regards home affairs the war emergency is at an end; this, without introducing any question of international relations. In this way, in the first place, all the complex questions, both of diplomacy and of constitutional law, would have been eliminated from the case; and secondly, if the President had placed himself in opposition to that proposal he would have had to shoulder the responsibility of this opposition without being able to plead, as of course he now can, that Congress had gone beyond its legitimate province.

Of far greater interest, from the standpoint of treaty manœuvring, is the peace plank in the platform adopted by the Indiana Republicans. This is supposed to have been virtually drafted in the very highest councils of the Republican party—to represent the strategy of Senator Lodge and Chairman Hays and to foreshadow the treaty plank of the approaching Chicago Convention. That that plank would be "an elastic declaration, leaving the ultimate position to future developments, is likely enough," we said last week was highly probable; and the Indiana platform makes it almost certain. Nor do we feel disposed to find much fault with such a decision. In spite of all that has come and gone—or rather because of all that has come and gone—the condition of thought on the subject in the Republican party, and in fact in the country at large, is the reverse of definite; and there is no magic in a platform declaration that can transmute uncertainty of purpose and absence of conviction into their opposites. Unfortunate as it may be, it is a fact that sentiment will have to crystallize, and policy will have to become defined, in the course of the campaign and not in the little time that intervenes between now and the meeting of the Convention. The choice of candidate, however, may have a powerful effect in the shaping of the issue, and it is earnestly to be hoped that the man chosen will have both the will and the capacity to furnish a kind of leadership which has thus far been sadly lacking.

Whatever view be taken of the rights and wrongs of the long-drawn-out struggle in the Senate, and between Senate and President, the one manifest characteristic of nearly all of it is that it has been essentially a series of manœuvres—strategic moves for position, sparring for points. From a very early stage in the proceedings, it has been evident, or at least almost evident, that the President would not accept the Lodge position, and that the majority of the Republicans in the Senate would not bow to the President's will. What each side hoped for was that time would operate in its favor; and the object of particular moves was not to attain the particular end ostensibly in question, but to bring about a favorable protraction of the contest.

The one exception to this state of things was presented by the "mild reservationist" group of Republican Senators. They were really hoping to accomplish the end which they proposed, and they really had good reason to think that the end was attainable. If they had received encouragement from the Democratic side—or if, over and above the sincerity, and in some instances the high ability, with which they urged their cause, they had had a certain quality of heroic determination in which they were wanting—they might have proved the dominant factor in the situation. To Mr. McCumber is due high recognition for the constancy which he has displayed throughout, the readiness he has shown to do, at every turn, that which the faithful pursuance of his original purpose called upon him to do.

Apart from the endeavors of the mild reservationists, we have witnessed merely a succession of grapples, which might indeed have resulted in a compromise, which would have so resulted if the President had been accessible to reason, but which now in the retrospect assume the character of a mere setting of the stage for what is to happen during the campaign and after the election. Over the frightful loss which the world has thus suffered there is nothing to do just now but shrug our shoulders; let us hope that something more promising of substantial result will begin to emerge when the Convention at Chicago shall have completed its work.

Our Merchant Marine

In the matter of our merchant marine, there has not yet been marked out, in Congress or elsewhere, a clear pathway of transition from the methods forced by war conditions and necessities to a permanent national policy, which will assign a proper place to private enterprise, and will give definite assurance as to the nature and extent of Government control under which such enterprise may be exerted.

As an aid in developing such a policy, the Bankers Trust Company, of New York City, has compiled an extremely valuable and interesting little volume, under the title of "America's Merchant Marine." The first few pages sketch the earlier history of the subject, from the building of the first ship at the mouth of the Kennebec, down through the colonial period and the exciting vicissitudes of the Revolution, the Napoleonic wars, and the war of 1812, down to the summit of growth reached in 1855, when American yards turned out more than two thousand vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of over five millions. At that point the turn began, with England's superior skill in constructing large iron steamships. American capital ceased to invest in wooden ships, and the tonnage built in American yards fell off nearly two-thirds in five years.

After the historical sketch come twenty chapters on various phases of the subject, as for example, Operating Costs, Labor Factors, the Oil-burning Ship, Government Aid, America's World Markets, The Great Lakes Traffic, American Registry Laws, Ship Safety Laws, and Marine Insurance. Businessmen involved, directly or indirectly, in overseas trade, the possible investors in shipping shares, and especially our national lawmakers and their executive advisers, need at the present time just such a carefully compiled book of facts as this.

The Socialist Convention

IN the funeral procession of Junia, sister of Marcus Brutus and wife of Caius Cassius in former years, Tacitus tells us that images of the most illustrious families to the number of twenty were carried; but the images of Brutus and Cassius outshone them all, he says, because (for obvious political and personal reasons) they were not there. It is a somewhat similar effect that the Socialists were aiming at, in their national convention of last week, when they nominated Eugene Debs to lead them in the coming campaign. His leadership is expected to be all the more effective because, barring the chance of a pardon from the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, he will not be there. There is little reason to believe, however, that a plea of martyrdom resting on so slender a base as that of Mr. Debs will make any effective appeal to voters not already convinced.

Perhaps the best claim of the recent convention to "Americanism" could be based on its close imitation of such old party traditions as the minutely detailed denunciation of the other side (Democrats and Republicans lumped, in this case) and the painfully drawn out applause when the name of the conquering hero comes, accompanied by the marching of the delegates around the convention hall, in a kind of college boys' snake-dance. Should not the real industrial revolutionist have whirled far enough off the old orbit to have shaken himself loose from all that? What conservatives might call an entirely hopeful sign was the attitude of the convention towards the present situation in Russia. Formally, it expressed its adherence to the "Third Internationale," but it just as formally refused to be led into any indorsement of "the dictatorship of the Proletariat" as a test of that adherence; and various speakers, including Victor Berger, indicated very plainly not merely their conviction that such a dictatorship would not work here, but their knowledge that it is going awry in Moscow. The "conservatives" were roundly hissed by the galleries, but had their way on the floor in formulating the platform. The defeated, however, as a salve to their feelings, were assured by Berger and Hillquit that the party was not to become more moderate, but in reality would be more revolutionary than ever before. A New York delegate, James O'Neal, asserted that "bourgeois democracy, with all its faults, at least allows decision on important matters by the civilized method of the ballot. Dictatorship means sheer brute struggle." In the hurly-burly of debate, one of the delegates made an implied admission of rather damaging character in the assertion that common sense is the principle of success, and that the Socialists must mix common sense with their demands if success is to be secured.

No complete draft of the platform is as yet available, with the many alterations made on the floor of the convention, and a detailed study of its provisions must come later. It declares in the broadest terms for "the socialization of industries," but does not carry that declaration to the entirely logical conclusion of demanding that the farmer shall surrender his property right in his farm. An outsider is naturally tempted to see in this an inconsistency due to a desire for the farmer vote, supposed to be among the discontented elements. The convinced Socialist, however, possibly thinks that the farmer's eyes are not yet fully open, and that a merely temporary concession must be made to him until he is won over by seeing the beauty of confiscation as applied to others.

While the more radical element of the convention suffered a formal defeat at every point where the test of a vote was forced, the inner spirit of the body as a whole was probably represented by the defeated side. The concessions were born of expediency, rather than conviction. The voter who really believes in American institutions, as framed by our forefathers and developed by generations of actual working, should not imagine for a moment that the party which has come first into the campaign, with Mr. Debs at its head, is merely one among several groups of Americans desiring to put perhaps a different, but none the less legitimate, interpretation on those institutions. Though the Socialist party, making a virtue of necessity, may show itself willing to submit to the forms of the Constitution as a means of attaining to power, there is no question of its intent to use that power, if attained, for the overthrow of the Constitution as we know it, and as its framers intended it. The Debs ticket should have the support of none but those who believe that our Constitution is a failure in its most fundamental features, and that the abolition of private property—progressive and rapid, even if not immediate and complete—is the proper basis on which to build a new form of government to take its place. The man who does not believe this, and yet talks of voting the Socialist ticket as a "protest," is thoughtlessly playing with a very dangerous kind of fire. To give the Socialist full liberty to state his programme and support it by argument is one thing; to lend him support, by voting his ticket as a mere rebuke to somebody else, is quite another.

The Turkish Treaty

THE Turkish carpet, in which the green of the fertile crescent, the gray of the Arabian desert, and the blue of the Ægean were the most prominent colors, is to be cut up and divided among various claimants, the Sultan retaining a part little larger, compared to the original carpet, than a prayer rug. And a prayer rug, rather than a throne, is the true symbol of his future status. Shorn of secular power over all but his Turkish subjects, he is only a petty potentate of a small, uncivilized people which counts for little among the family of nations. Only as Caliph, leader of the mosque prayers, does he remain an important figure in the Asiatic world. As such his power is unchallenged. Even his former Arab subjects, who revolted against him and shook off the yoke with British aid, still give him the accustomed homage as the Executive of Islam.

With this functionary the Entente had no quarrel. The treaty handed to the Turkish delegation in Paris concerns only the Sultan of the Ottomans, although it is true that the clause which permits the maintenance of Turkish sovereignty in Constantinople was framed out of consideration for the sovereign in his capacity of Caliph. This permission, however, is not given unconditionally. Its fulfillment by the Entente will depend on Turkey's faithful observance of the treaty; in other words, Mehmed VI as Caliph is made a hostage for his own good behavior as Sultan of the Ottomans. The two will wink at each other in their common sleeve, the Sultan well knowing that from breaking the agreement no harm can come to the Caliph, as the same reasons that prevented the ousting of him this time will still hold good hereafter. For if the systematic massacres of Greeks and Armenians were not a sufficient reason to justify the Turk's expulsion from Europe, the less heinous crime of infringing the peace treaty will not, and ought not, to be so punished, unless the Entente should demand more respect for its own dictates than for the dictates of humanity.

However, the Sultan is left but little chance of breaking his word. Turkish sovereignty, though maintained in Constantinople, will be a shadow only of its former self. The real sovereign in the capital will be the Great Powers. Since, on March 16, the Allied forces, chiefly English, took possession of the Ministries of War and Marine, of the arsenal at Galata and all military depots, of the police bureaus, post and telegraph offices, of the bridges across the Golden Horn, of the railway station and the quays, the Sultan and his Ministers have lost control over the city. A month is given them for the consideration of the treaty, but though it should take them only half a day, as it probably will, to come to the conclusion that they can not accept it, accept it they will, because the Entente has the power to force them to sign. This military occupation is, indeed, a provisional measure, but it does not follow that with the withdrawal of the visible instruments of power the Entente's hold on the Government will simultaneously be released. The treaty, which this military display will help to enforce, will then become the instrument by which that hold can be maintained for good. It gives England, France, and Italy a permanent and complete control of Turkish finances, and it is a commonplace of domestic and historical experience that he who holds the strings of the purse holds also the reins of government. Again, under the interallied control of the Straits, the access to the city and its communication with Anatolia is entirely in the hands of the Powers. The Sultan and his Government will be mere executives of these, and Europe, though disappointed of her hope to rid herself of the Turk, will have the satisfaction, at least, of seeing order restored and security of navigation established in that exposed and vital part of her continent.

It is not the Turkish Government, therefore, whose decision can materially affect the fate of the treaty. A veto from Washington will have greater weight than one from the once Sublime Porte. The full satisfaction of Greek claims in Thrace as against those of Bulgaria, the cession of the Dodecanesos to Italy, and the continuance of the Sultan's rule in Constantinople are not in accord with Mr. Wilson's well-known views, and will probably be the subject of a long series of diplomatic notes leading up to the usual compromise between principle and expediency. The second point, we confess, is an ugly blot on the treaty, ill according with the tenets of the League of Nations, whose name is so frequently mentioned in the document, and we should be glad to see Mr. Wilson succeed in getting the treaty amended on that minor point.

But the final word on the treaty will be spoken by Mustapha Kemal. Though the peace be dictated to the Government in Constantinople, it is in Anatolia that it will have to be enforced against his resistance. His influence extends beyond the field of his military activity, into the political sphere of the capital. Four-fifths of the deputies of the Turkish Chamber are members of the Nationalist party Felah-i-Vatan, or Weal of the Fatherland, which thus possesses the power to hamper the activity of any Government which it considers to be a tool of the Entente. If Kemal remains successful in defying the Great Powers, the majority in the Chamber will derive courage from his example to use that power to the fullest extent. Hence on the military exertion of the Entente to bring him and his Nationalist following to reason the fate of the treaty ultimately depends. A difficult guerrilla warfare in Anatolia is necessary to establish peace with Turkey and security for Greeks and Armenians.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

The Plot Against Mexico

THE sudden collapse of the Carranza Government from a popular uprising will appear, to ordinary folk, a sufficient proof of the evil social conditions that have lately prevailed in Mexico. A push and a kick, and all was over. Yet for the last five years, and particularly for the last three years, since the adoption of the present Constitution, these conditions have been constantly misrepresented by the insurgent press of the United States. This press has shown itself coldly indifferent to the frightful sufferings of the Mexican people; it has unquestioningly accepted and distributed the propaganda of paid agents of Carranza; it has ignored or distorted the most trustworthy evidence; and in the face of all the easily ascertainable facts it has kept up a "wolf! wolf!" cry of Wall Street intervention.

Just such another journalistic episode was strung along the ten years ended May 25, 1911. Then it was the conservative press in solid front, as of late it has been the insurgent press. Then it was the Diaz myth—a benevolent father-king, wearing out his heart and soul in devoted service to his backward and not overgrateful people; just as of late it has been the Carranza myth—a fusion of Washington, Lincoln, and Mazzini, but with nobler vision than these, patiently building up an earthly Eden while undergoing the constant bedevilment of American capitalists. The same mealy-mouthed language of palliation and excuse was then lavished by the conservative press on the jailings and shootings of Diaz as of late has been lavished by the insurgent press on the jailings and shootings of Carranza. In those days, as in these later days, hand-picked observers crossed the line southward, where they were taken under protection and guidance and sumptuously fed on official pap, and whence they came back with standardized tales of peace, prosperity, and contentment. And in those days, as in these, a shrewd old ruler knew where to put his money to get results from the always and ever-to-be bamboozled American people.

I think, if a personal word is permissible, that I can speak on this subject with some knowledge and some right. From the time of the first prosecutions of Mexican political refugees in the southwest, I have taken an eager and a sympathetic interest in all that concerns the Mexican people. The Diaz propaganda, thickly sown though it was, did not deceive me. In New York City I was, I believe, first among those who sought to get a hearing in the conservative press in behalf of the Mexican liberals. I found no opening. One editor, too young and too indiscreet for his job, accepted one of my manuscripts, but the owners of the magazine suppressed it. The pro-Diaz censorship was at the time complete. Later, in a few cases, it was relaxed, and several articles by various writers, including one by myself, appeared in the periodical press. Then, mysteriously, the lid came down again, and it stayed down virtually until Diaz was ousted by Madero. During the ensuing long period of turmoil I have carefully followed Mexican events; I have also followed the insurgent press for its comment on Mexico; and I say that, with a single exception which will be noted later, so far as I know no radical, Socialist, revolutionist, or pseudo-liberal paper in the United States has made the slightest attempt to tell the truth about Mexico. Most of these journals, indeed, have busied themselves with misleading propaganda and with the denunciation of persons who told the facts.

These facts have been accessible in greater or less degree to any one who cared for them. Conditions under Carranza, especially during the last year, can be readily summed up. These conditions, of course, were not uniform throughout the land. What could be said of most of Mexico would not apply to Sonora, Lower California, or parts of Sinaloa. Nor would any generalization which could be framed be equally true of all the other regions. But taken in the lump, Mexico was ruled by a dictator, held in power by the aid of bandit chiefs who looted the big estates and industrial properties, terrorized the people, and refused, as a rule, to suppress the other bandits (the anti-Carranza ones) because it was more profitable to dicker with them. Mexican refugees say that though they were robbed indiscriminately by both governmental and anti-governmental bandits, the latter were the more decent, and usually left them something to eat. The Carranzistas made clean sweeps.

There was general insecurity of life and person. General Salvador Alvarado, in his famous letter to Carranza, some months ago, declared that between the outlaws and the Carranzistas some 36,000 men were being killed every year. "No one thinks of the man," he said; "let him die like a dog in the gutter." For hundreds of thousands of the people there was no work and no promise of any. There was great destitution, and there were no sincere efforts on the part of the Government to relieve it. Justice was for sale. "A wave of shameless and cynical immorality," said Alvarado, "pervades the acts of judges and shysters, who sell justice to the highest bidder." Elections were a farce. There was not even personal safety for a candidate opposing Carranza. Only by the most extraordinary precautions were the friends of Obregon able to save his life from the attempts of Carranza's thugs.

Far from fostering social and labor legislation, Carranza overturned the results of the Alvarado and Carrillo régimes in Yucatan, and he set himself stubbornly against the remarkable series of reforms instituted in Sonora by Calles. The summary of these reforms prepared by Juan Ortiz Mora shows Sonora in the creditable light of a most progressive State, steadily forwarding a reconstructive programme against constant obstructions by Carranza. As for organized labor, Carranza was its bitter enemy. His remedy for strikes, though from motives of expediency not always enforced, was the firing squad and the machine gun battalion. "By slaying and imprisoning workmen," says Juan Rico, of the Mexican Labor party, "Carranza ended the general strike of 1916." The testimony on this matter comes from a multitude of sources, and is irrefutable.

On top of all this, the late First Chief subsidized a wildly revolutionist communist monthly magazine, Gale's. No intelligent person could fail to see from a glance at this journal the proofs of its fraudulency. It excoriated the American Federation of Labor. It denounced even "moderate Socialism." It declared that soviet communism was the workers' only hope. It extravagantly praised Carranza the man, and the Carranza Government. But the greater part of its space was taken up with violent denunciations of alleged American projects of intervention. In each issue this intervention bogey was set forth in all its hideous deformity, and then bludgeoned, blacksnaked, and flayed from head to toes. Now no one can suppose that Carranza, the dictator, had the slightest patience with the soviet doctrines of this journal. Nor can any informed person believe that he would have allowed this journal to appear for a single issue if radicalism had been its sole note. But any one can see the value to Carranza of a Mexico City journal written and printed for the revolutionary gudgeons of the United States. The first-page legend which it carried, "20,000 circulation in English, 5,000 in Spanish," was probably a falsehood; but there can be no doubt that by far the greater number of copies went to the United States. Despite the glaring evidences of its fraudulency, it was credulously accepted by American radicals, who sent it money (in reply to its frantic appeals), wrote for it, and promoted its circulation. I assume that Obregon has already suppressed it as a notorious swindle.

These facts, as I have said, have been in greater or less degree accessible to all who cared to know them. But they have been studiously ignored or else angrily denied by the insurgent press of the United States. There is one exception. A revolutionary Communist, living in New York, journeyed to the land of the heart's desire as pictured in the idylls of Lincoln Steffens, John Kenneth Turner, John Reed, L. J. de Bekker, the Rev. Samuel Guy Inman, and other poets of the impressionistic-romantic school. When he arrived he looked about him. He was completely disillusioned. In the columns of the revolutionary Liberator for January he told his disheartening tale. It makes out a case against the Carranza Government far worse than what has been summarized here. The revelation caused a pretty row in the columns of the Liberator, but so far as I know not a single other insurgent journal has mentioned the matter. As late as May 5 the New Republic, with matchless ineptitude, could speak as follows:

> Revolutionary activity in Mexico was to be expected, since the Presidential elections are approaching. It is a Mexican method of electioneering, more dramatic and less expensive than the methods in vogue in the United States. Usually pains are taken to reduce the danger of bloodshed to a minimum. In the present instance the center of revolutionary activity is Sonora, seventy-six thousand square miles of hill and desert with less than three hundred thousand population, practically inaccessible to invading forces except from the United States. Auxiliary centers of revolution appear elsewhere, but the press reports of troop movements and engagements offer no proof of anything like a determined revolutionary force like those which overthrew Diaz and Huerta, or even like the Villa assault upon Carranza. But the noise of Mexican politics arises opportunely for the purposes of those in this country who would like to make an issue out of "cleaning up Mexico."

Liberalism, radicalism, insurgency in general, accepted a Mexican myth based partly upon the high-flown rhetoric (as well as on the confiscatory provisions in Article 27) of the Constitution of 1917 and partly upon the tales of romantic and sometimes subsidized travelers and rhapsodists. All contrary testimony was uniformly rejected. Insurgent journalism has played exactly the same game with regard to the Government of Carranza that it has played with regard to the Government of Lenin. It has shamelessly juggled the facts. Events have shown that the real plot against Mexico was the plot of Carranza and his bandit chiefs against the Mexican people, and that this plot was in this country perversely abetted, to the best of their powers, by the professed organs of truth, justice, and brotherhood.

W. J. GHENT

Hiram W. Johnson in Fact and Fancy

THE energetic campaign which Hiram W. Johnson is waging for the Republican nomination is attracting keen attention in all circles. His phenomenal showing in a succession of State primaries is causing anxiety among many who a few months ago did not take his candidacy seriously. Indeed it now looks as if the California Senator would come to Chicago next month as General Wood's most formidable rival. Politicians profess to minimize the results of the primaries, pointing out that they represent but a small minority of the voters, but they are plainly worried. Conservatives interpret his success as the result of appeals to the radicals and the elements of unrest, calling attention to the fact that his strongest showing has been made in industrial centres where the greatest discontent exists. Still others consider it a verdict of popular opinion against Wilson and the League of Nations, and point also to his pacifist, Sinn Fein, and pro-German following.

Undoubtedly all of these considerations have weight and must be taken into account, but they are far from furnishing a satisfactory explanation. Anyone who attended the meetings addressed by Senator Johnson in New York and Chicago, could not but be struck by the preponderance of these obnoxious elements in the audiences and the direct appeal which the speaker made to them. But it is inconceivable that they are sufficiently numerous to account for the Johnson votes cast in the primaries. As a matter of fact he owes his largest support to the prevalence of what may be termed the "Johnson legend." Widely spread over the country is the belief that Hiram Johnson is the Hercules that cleaned the Augean stables of Californian politics and introduced in that commonwealth advanced welfare legislation and a model system of administration. It is this belief that has drawn to the Senator thousands of good men and women who have become impatient at the slowness of progress and skeptical of most men prominent in public life. These people are convinced that they can find in Johnson a leader that will brush away the cobwebs at a stroke and usher in a new and happier day.

Is there any real foundation for their belief? Has the Johnson legend any basis in fact? Surely it is of the highest importance to study the record and ascertain the truth. If Hiram Johnson performed in his native State the services thus attributed to him, then, indeed, he has a valid claim to be considered as a worthy candidate for the highest office in the land in this transcendent time of crisis. If, on the other hand, he is sailing under false colors and profiting by a reputation which he does not deserve, then all the world should know it. It is the purpose of the writer to analyze Johnson's career in California objectively with a view to determining whether his acts, accomplishments, and character justify his popular reputation in the eastern States.

In California Hiram W. Johnson's political career has been brief but spectacular, and those most opposed to him and his methods will not deny him the credit of large achievements. Prior to his first appearance on the political stage in 1910, when he was elected Governor, he had been a rather inconspicuous lawyer. His legal equipment was considered mediocre, and his abilities lay rather in the line of a certain dramatic eloquence and the power of vitriolic attack in addressing a jury than in clear reasoning or constructive argument. Before his campaign for the Governorship he was chiefly known for his connection with two cases, the graft prosecution and the Dalzell Brown affair.

When Francis J. Heney undertook the graft prosecution case, Johnson also entered it, but soon afterward withdrew, the alleged reason being that he fell out with Rudolph Spreckels, the "angel" of the prosecution, over the amount of his fee. Later, when Heney was shot and temporarily disabled, Johnson volunteered to take his place. Ruef was convicted—as he was certain to be from the moment of the attack on Heney—and this at once established the popularity of Johnson.

The other case was that of the defense of Dalzell Brown, who had looted the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company. It was a scandalous case and the guilt of the accused was beyond question. Johnson was generally believed to have been employed to use his influence and "pull" with the district attorney's office to get his client off with a light sentence. A judge was called in from the country, and Brown pleaded guilty to one charge. The prosecuting officer asked for a nominal sentence on the ground of the assistance rendered by Brown in untangling the false entries in the books of the bank. Later it appeared that Brown had done nothing of the sort, but had done all in his power to block the investigation. There was little doubt as to the means employed by his attorney in securing his escape from just punishment.

Then came the split in the Republican party. The so-called Lincoln-Roosevelt League was formed, with the avowed purpose of wresting control of the party machinery from those who had long held it. Johnson was asked by the League to run for Governor, but declined. The then Governor, James Gillett, was deservedly popular and there was little doubt of his reëlection if he should decide to run again. When, however, Gillett announced that he would retire and the way seemed open for a plurality candidate to succeed in the resulting confusion, Johnson changed his mind and accepted the leadership and candidacy of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

He made his campaign on the issue of the Southern Pacific in politics, and it is upon this that much of his fame outside his native State rests. As a matter of fact, the Southern Pacific was already out of politics, had been out of politics for two years, when he started his campaign. The facts are open to everyone. Had the Southern Pacific not given up its political organizations throughout the State, Johnson would have had no show at all. But the legend of Southern Pacific political control was still strong, and Johnson played upon it in vitriolic attacks. He indulged in spectacular "shadow-boxing" over the grave of the self-buried giant. It is a matter of record that, not long before, he had sought employment with the Southern Pacific and had been turned down.

Reference must be made to one other issue in this election that has been misrepresented in the East, the issue of woman suffrage. It has been publicly asserted that Johnson was an advocate of suffrage and was largely responsible for giving the vote to the women of California. Nothing could be further from the case. The Constitutional amendment for suffrage was before the electors at the same election in which he was running for Governor, but in all the speeches he made up and down the State, never once did he say one word in favor of it. On the contrary, he kept discreetly silent, except in private conversation, where he could voice his contempt in safety. Though repeatedly urged to make a public declaration on the subject, he declined to do so.

The campaign resulted in his election, together with a Legislature entirely subservient to him. With this in hand, he started to build up a political machine unique in the annals of American politics. Its unique character lies in the fact that, while it exercised a control even more complete than that of Tammany, and utilized the corrupt forces of vice and graft as exemplified in the ward-heelers of the underworld and the waterfront, it was built up "in the name of the Lord," and counts among its supporters many of the most prominent and "forward-looking" men of California. How was it possible to achieve such an anomalous result? By patronage, pure and simple, albeit sometimes disguised beneath the cover of "welfare" commissions.

It would be unfair to deny Governor Johnson the credit for much legislation of enlightened character. California was far behind in such matters, and if perchance Johnson's subservient Legislature deserved the epithet of "freak," which has generally been applied to it, due appreciation must be recorded for the institution of many needed reforms. The drawback was that these reform and welfare measures—good as well as bad—were carried out by the institution of numerous highly paid commissions, which cost the people of the State exorbitant sums and each of which became a source of patronage to the Governor for his machine. This patronage was abused in a shocking manner. A large number of legislators were given lucrative positions. Saloon-keepers, professional gamblers, id omne genus, who controlled large blocks of votes, were taken care of and even dominated the Republican county committee of San Francisco. The number of State employees increased by leaps and bounds, and the expense of running the State Government jumped from $8,376,298 in 1910 to $15,681,943 in 1916. One illustration of the increase of the State payroll for political purposes may be cited as typical. In 1910 the employees on the San Francisco water front (State Harbor Board) numbered 285 with an annual pay-roll of $379,936; in 1916 these had been increased to 604, with an annual payroll of $702,359. The Harbor Board controls the belt-line railroad, with four miles of track and four locomotives. For this were provided seven yardmasters, fifteen firemen, forty-six machinists' helpers, seventeen electricians, and fifteen engineers!

The political degradation of California under the Johnson machine presents a dark picture. The obedient Legislature placed the additional burden of taxation, necessary to meet the vastly increased expenditures, upon the public service corporations and fooled the people into believing that this came out of their fat profits and not out of the pockets of the consumers. The owners of these corporations were rendered thoroughly docile under the threat of confiscatory taxes without redress, and even today, in the primary just held, many of them came tamely to heel, realizing their impotence to kick against the pricks.

The story of Johnson espousing the Progressive party and his disfranchising of the Republican party in California forms a chapter by itself, but to tell it would transcend the limits of this article. Here is no question of the right or propriety of changing political allegiance. It is the question of utilizing a personal machine to seize and change a party organization. Johnson, through his complete control of the Republican State Committee, secured the nomination as Presidential electors of men pledged to vote for the Progressive candidates, and prevented the names of real Republican electors from appearing on the ballot. To perpetuate his control, despite the collapse of the Progressive party, he secured the passage of an infamous primary law that permits any man to vote in the primary of a party regardless of his own party affiliation. His attacks on the Republican party were violent and offensive, yet when it served his purpose he directed his followers to vote in the Republican primaries, and thereby obtained again the control of the Republican party organization for the purpose of securing the nomination for United States Senator. Another step also was necessary. The Constitution of California forbade a Governor to become a candidate for Senator. He had this provision repealed. The iniquitous primary law made possible at the same time political deals and trades with the Democrats.

Such was the situation at the time of the Hughes-Wilson campaign and the Johnson-Hughes episode in California, which resulted in the election of Wilson. In California, Hughes was defeated by less than 4,000 votes; Johnson was elected Senator by more than 300,000. This astounding result was lamely explained in many ways. To this day it is generally believed in the East that it was due to the stupidity and Bourbonism of Republican reactionaries, whom the people rebuked for slights to their champion, Johnson. These explanations obviously do not explain. Johnson claimed to be loyal to Hughes, but had this been true, the slightest nod to his machine would have made the victory of Hughes certain. California was overwhelmingly Republican, and there was no need for Hughes to include it in his itinerary, certainly not before the primaries, where the Senatorial nomination was to be decided. W. H. Crocker, Republican National Committeeman, made an earnest plea that Hughes's visit to California should be delayed until after the primaries, lest the national candidate should be injected into the local struggle. But Hughes came, and the studied break was carefully staged. Why was it done? To many the answer seemed simple. If Hughes were elected, four years later he would undoubtedly be reëlected, or, if not, a Democrat would succeed him. Johnson's opportunity for the Presidency lay in the defeat of Hughes and the election of Wilson, who would scarcely attempt to run a third time.

Johnson's political career in California and at Washington gives a clear index to his character. Alfred Holman thus sums it up in the Argonaut:

> Mr. Johnson, a man not without talent and courage and with exceptional powers of public appeal, is first, last and always a politician. He is a statesman only in the sense of an extended experience in the mechanism of practical politics. Of world affairs he knows little and cares less. He has no convictions founded in broad knowledge or in moral purpose. His genius is that of destruction; his talent that of denunciation. His policy, when not limited to expediencies, is dominated by his hatreds. Early in his career he discovered the campaign value of defamatory onslaught, and he has attuned his very considerable powers of oratory to this sinister expedient. Mr. Johnson has not the first qualification for the presidency. He is minus the breadth of mind, minus the knowledge of affairs, minus the economical instinct, minus the judicial spirit, above all minus the character requisite in the presidency if it is to be brought back to its constitutional status and re-established in the respect of intelligence and patriotism.

This is a harsh arraignment, but justification may be found for it in the recent primaries in California.

With almost the whole press of the State at his beck and call (no less than thirty-seven editors had been appointed by him to commissions), a violent tirade of misrepresentation and insinuation was launched at his opponent, Herbert Hoover. Every day the papers carried hints to the Democrats that they could vote in the Republican primaries. Hoover's supporters, amateurs in politics and starting late, carried on a clean campaign, eschewing these political methods. They had very limited funds to spend, which were devoted to sending out letters and circulars and to paying for some advertisements in the Johnson papers, the only way they could reach the electorate. The Hoover campaign expenditures in California were probably less than one-fifth those of the Johnson committee, yet they at once provoked the old familiar cry of "a Saturnalia of political extravagance," a smoke-screen to conceal the prodigality on the other side. Despite the most powerful political machine ever known in America, despite the opposition, the unfair opposition of practically all the newspapers, despite their inexperience and lack of funds, despite the adherence to Johnson of a crowd of old-line Republicans, who thereby, prior to the appearance of Hoover, sought to insure against another betrayal of the party by Johnson at Chicago, nevertheless the supporters of Hoover obtained for him nearly three votes for every five votes cast for Johnson. It was a splendid showing, and the protest which these 210,000 votes expressed should not be without effect in opening the eyes of the East to the true nature of the Johnson legend.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Military Coup in Germany

WAS it a military coup? That can not be subject to doubt when one considers who were the wirepullers. A Social-Democratic politician, Herr Odenweiler, from Bad Homburg, had, on March 13, a conversation with General Ludendorff at Berlin in the course of which the General requested Herr Odenweiler to bring him into contact with the Social-Democratic Party Managers and the executives of the Trade Unions. The leaders of the conspiracy wanted, at the very outset, to pacify and placate the working classes. Among other things, Ludendorff said: "We have employed Kapp simply because we had no better man. We need one with iron nerves. If you can procure us any, we are willing to form a Government also with them."

Ludendorff acted, of course, in the belief that he was doing his country a service, but a conspiracy against the German Constitution, such as broke out on March 13, must be judged by what actually happened and not according to the subjective conviction of the principal actors. The chief agent was Ludendorff's former assistant in the war, Colonel Bauer, the very man who, on December 7, 1919, assured the American journalist, Karl H. von Wiegand, in an interview that "with the exception of a few hotspurs, no one in Germany contemplates restoring the monarchy by violence." During the few days in which Herr Kapp was the stalking-horse for the military dictatorship which was to be established, the participants in the enterprise publicly denied that they had any monarchical intentions. But these protestations were not in accordance with Bauer's interview, the tenor of which was that the monarchic movement in Germany was growing and that the restoration of the monarchy, in a form copied from the English model, would come to pass "automatically" in the near future. The Colonel even disclosed at the time a regular programme: first, the election of Hindenburg as President, then the removal under his authority of the ruins of the old Empire, and finally an invitation to Crown-Prince Friedrich Wilhelm to take possession of his inheritance. Such was, doubtless, also the plan underlying the attempt of March 13. When its leaders expressed themselves on the question of the monarchy in private conversation, their denial lacked that decision which they gave to their public utterances. Those who know Hindenburg's character can not believe him to have been initiated in the conspirators' plans. The wirepullers behind the scene had intended him for President because the moral authority and personal worship which the Marshal commands even among his political opponents could serve their purpose unknown to Hindenburg himself.

The conspiracy might have become more dangerous if it had not broken out prematurely. Shortly before, the majority in the National Assembly decided that the elections for the Reichstag should take place in the late autumn, as soon as the harvest should be over, and a definite legislative programme should have been dispatched. This was against the wishes of the reactionary monarchists and conservatives. They wanted, on the contrary, elections at the earliest possible date, because public feeling, during the last months, had been unfavorable to the Government. The cost of living kept going up, the recuperation of national production proceeded but slowly, labor showed an increasing tendency towards radicalism, and one could often hear the remark, "Before the November Revolution things were in better shape. Since then they have gone steadily downward." The average German unconsciously confused the consequences of the war with those of the Revolution, and the pace-makers of the counter-revolution made the most of this confusion. Among their circle it was feared that, if the elections were postponed until the late autumn, the Government might succeed meanwhile in quieting the general discontent by financial reforms by levying on both capital and incomes, and by obtaining material alleviation of the peace terms.

Hardly better pleased were the conspirators by the plan, then under discussion among the majority parties, to have the President elected not after the American fashion by the entire nation, but in the French way by the people's representatives. That would preclude the election of Hindenburg, and his moral prestige was an essential factor for the realization of their retrogressive move. At this juncture the Minister of War and Generalissimo Noske became aware of the existence of the conspiracy.

Noske was, no doubt, the most energetic man in the Government. For him the outbreak of the counter-revolution was a moral defeat, as he had always guaranteed that the officers and troops, according to their oath to the Constitution and the personal assurances of the Generals, were loyal to him, the Minister, whatever their feelings and convictions might be regarding the old Empire. His security was such that even in the night of March 12, when he inspected the guards in front of the Ministries, he did not yet believe in the seriousness of the situation, and held himself convinced that he could frustrate the conspirators' plans. But when, at 3 o'clock in the morning, the Government was suddenly faced with the full danger, Noske said the troops at his command were four times outnumbered by the forces then marching upon Berlin. The Government troops had little inclination to fight against odds, and received the order to retreat. When the conspirators entered Berlin, they found the city abandoned and most of the members of the Government gone.

This flight of the Government was a disappointment to the leaders of the counter-revolution. It invalidated their claim of being the only central authority in the country. The second obstacle in their way to success was the refusal of all the departments both of the Imperial and Prussian administrations to coöperate with them. The two assistant Secretaries of State in the Foreign Office gave the self-appointed Imperial Chancellor, Dr. Kapp, to understand that they would not heed any orders from him. Even more serious was the hostile attitude of the Ministry of Finance. Herr Kapp sent an adjutant to the Assistant Secretary of State who, since Erzberger's fall, had been responsible for the Department, to ask for a draft of ten million marks, which he needed for the pay of the troops. The Secretary's answer to the officer was literally as follows: "Tell Dr. Kapp that I have no money for him, and that he shall not get a single penny from me." But the decisive blow to their hopes was given by the refusal of the officers and soldiers in the provinces to join the rebels.

A backward look on these five days of the Kapp régime suggests a threefold conclusion. It reveals, first of all, the fatal mentality of those men to whom, in the war, the destinies of Germany were entrusted. General Ludendorff betrayed, by his remark about the need of men with iron nerves, that he had not the slightest notion of the spirit prevailing among the people. Only an absolute lack of political sense can account for his absurd belief that the counter-revolution could be forced through with military power against the will of the people in its present mood. We understand now why this man and men of his stripe, such as Kapp, Bauer, and von Lüttwitz, were incapable, during the war, of reading the signs of the time which gave them warning to conclude a timely peace. It was Dr. Kapp who in July, 1917, founded the "Fatherland Party," which had for its purpose the continuation of the war until Germany should have vanquished all her opponents. That party had, at the time, the support not of the masses, which then had already grown tired of the war, but of a large part of the educated classes. But the Pan-German spirit had lost its hold on these, as the failure of Kapp's revolution has proved beyond any doubt. When the conspirators realized that they could not expect material help from that quarter, they changed their tactics and sought contact with the radical wing of the Socialists. They offered to the Independents the use of their troops, if they wished to form a Government. Their idea was to establish a Bolshevist Germany, if their original plan failed, and to attempt to restore Germany's military predominance with the help of Soviet Russia, a plan of despair evidencing a total absence of political intelligence. Not even the bulk of the moderate Social-Democrats, let alone the bourgeois parties, would have lent support to such a mad excess of patriotism.

The second conclusion bears on the question whether the radical and destructive counter-move of the general strike was necessary to repress the revolt. It is not to be wondered at that Labor, under the first impression of the coup, when Berlin was practically cut off from all communication with the rest of the country, and the real situation in the individual provinces could not be surveyed, should have reacted in the way it did, honestly believing that everything was at stake. The movement was spontaneous. The lawful Government did not officially call the strike, but seems to have recommended it. In that Ebert and Bauer made a mistake, for which, however, they are not to blame. For they could not know the actual strength of their own position, which the course of events proved to be greater than they thought, despite the many mistakes which they had made and which precluded the return of their Government in its former constitution. But these mistakes are recorded on another page than the one which contains the history of the Kapp revolution.

The third conclusion is that these patriots of the Ludendorff type have caused the Fatherland a material loss of about two billion working hours, involving a retardation of the country's reconstruction and of the fulfillment of its obligations. This deplorable effect is only grist for the mill of the Communists who aim at the overthrow of Germany's economic organization and hope to usher in the world revolution with the help of Bolshevist Russia. The coup has, indeed, offered an occasion for the German people to show the world, by its disavowal of the military reaction, that a large majority of the nation renounces its past ambitions. It may justly be said that this was the first unmistakable manifestation of the existence of a new, democratic Germany. But also, this democratic Germany will have a hard struggle to prevent a large part, perhaps the majority, of Labor from being lured into the radical camp by the success of the general strike, which has proved its effectiveness as a political weapon. The nebulous dreams of a communistic state, of a Soviet Republic, and an alliance with Russia have taken a more definite shape, and the near future will probably witness a series of violent coups from the extreme left. An effective antidote would be an increased import of raw materials and foodstuffs. Only that Government has a chance of maintaining itself in Germany which provides the people with the means and opportunities of remunerative labor and with the wherewithal to feed and clothe themselves. In this respect the Entente is in a better position than the German Government to avert the dangers which, as a result of Kapp's coup, are now threatening the country from the left.

The late experience, finally, has emphasized the danger involved in the principle of a standing army, which the Peace Treaty of Versailles has imposed upon Germany. With a democratic militia no coups d'état can be attempted by ambitious or reactionary generals; with a professional soldiery, prone to violence and restlessness, such attempts have a better chance of success.

Dr. Paul Rohrbach

Berlin

Switzerland and the League of Nations

[The following article, written long in advance of the plébiscite of May 16, gives an account of the conflicting views on the League of Nations which the results of the referendum show to be a true reflection. The author was for many years Professor of International Law at the University of Berne, is now an active member of the bar of that city, and is one of the best-known Swiss authorities on jurisprudence.]

SWITZERLAND, like America, has found difficulties in the way that may finally lead her into the League of Nations. In both countries membership in such an alliance seems to stand, at the outset, in contradiction to fundamental principles of a traditional foreign policy. Without attempting to judge, or to prescribe, the course of the United States, some account of Switzerland's efforts to solve the problem with which she is faced may prove useful.

With us, though the Government and both Parliamentary bodies have urgently recommended adhesion to the League, it is still necessary to bring about a clear conviction in the minds of the people. The real difficulties began precisely at this point. It is no easy matter to enlighten an entire nation. It is difficult enough to make our intellectual classes understand the present international situation. But to make everybody understand it, every workman, every peasant, to make men understand it who have never taken any interest in political questions, that is an undertaking that demands great confidence in the political good sense of a nation, great confidence in democracy.

What makes the task still more difficult is the fact that the Covenant of Paris is far from perfect. No one was genuinely elated over its meagre results in bringing about obligatory arbitration, disarmament, and international organization. I must say, so far as I am concerned, I, too, was disappointed, although I had worked for more than twenty-five years for the advancement of international law and was therefore in a position to realize the great advance that, in spite of everything, the Covenant of Paris provided for the world. The same could be said of all sincere advocates ot a League of Nations. Time, no doubt, was necessary to realize the great advantages of the Covenant in spite of everything else, to realize the amelioration it provided for the deplorable international situation of the entire world after this war, and also to realize the disadvantages of a policy of separatism on the part of those countries deciding to remain outside of this League. Not until all this was realized was it possible to see in the Covenant, as a matter of fact and in spite of its imperfections, a tremendous advance, nothing less than salvation for humanity.

There was during the war in German Switzerland a great deal of pro-Germanism. Our press was in complete subjection to the Empire and defended with it German imperialism and German militarism in all its evil consequences. It is a shame for us, living in a democratic country, to have to admit that the readers of our newspapers simply believed all the falsehoods that our press imported from beyond the Rhine. We did not have in German Switzerland a single newspaper that was truly independent and that maintained the Swiss point of view in every respect. (This state of affairs induced my friends and myself to found a new paper, the Neue Schweizer Zeitung.) The press, which was more German than Swiss, is above all else responsible for the fact that we have in German Switzerland many thousands who have been, and still are, entirely subservient to Germanism. These thousands, guided by a mediocre press, are to-day still opposed to the entrance of Switzerland into the League of Nations. If the League had been decreed from Berlin they would probably speak and think differently. But the Covenant comes from Paris, and that suffices to compromise it in their eyes.

It is of interest to know that those who are hostile to the League of Nations are led, if we leave out of consideration the small provincial press, for the most part by a number of our military commanders who were counting on the success of German militarism. Disappointed with the result of the war, they are naturally opposed to what they call an alliance of the victors. In order, however, to defend their point of view in a less offensive manner, they use the pretext of our policy of neutrality as an argument against the entrance of Switzerland into the alliance. Superior officers who during the war snapped their fingers at our neutrality and violated it flagrantly do not hesitate to-day to use it as a pretext for entirely opposite action.

There are, besides these, still other opponents who can not be convinced. These are the Socialist workmen. The Swiss Socialist party takes its orders, not from Berne, not from Zürich, but from Moscow. They are Bolshevists, with the exception of the group of Swiss Socialists who call themselves the "Grütliverein." The others—and they are unfortunately the great majority—are followers of Lenin and are therefore opposed to a League of Nations the object of which is precisely to rescue the world from Bolshevistic anarchy. They have but one aim, to destroy the political régime and the social order of Western Europe.

It may be seen from what I have said that Swiss militarism—in the Prussian sense of the word—and Swiss Socialism —in the Russian sense of the word—go hand in hand with regard to the question of the entrance of Switzerland into the League of Nations. And what makes this affiliation still more interesting is the fact that these people, who allow the foreigner, German or Russian, to dictate their attitude, in order to justify their attitude, make use of the pretext, the one party no less than the other, that the abandonment of our neutrality would mean a national danger to our country. They are infinitely dangerous, because they exploit the emotions of our people with a view to the triumph of aspirations which are diametrically opposed to the true interests of the country.

Besides such opponents of the Covenant, whom I call insincere, there are a considerable number of very good patriots who are seriously disturbed because they have not sufficient confidence in the Covenant as it was made at Paris and who are alarmed at seeing our Government depart from a traditional policy. Yet it is clear that to-day the great majority of our intellectuals and members of all political parties, with the sole exception of the Bolshevists, are in favor of joining the League. That gives us the confidence that, in spite of all obstacles, the popular vote of the sixteenth of May will be favorable to the League.

What has made the situation much easier for us is the fact that the Council of the League of Nations has promised us that within the League we can maintain our traditional neutrality.

> The Council of the League of Nations, while affirming the principle that the idea of the neutrality of members of the League of Nations is incompatible with the principle that all the members of the League shall act in common in enforcing its obligations, recognizes the fact that Switzerland is in an unique position and is actuated by a tradition of several centuries which has been explicitly incorporated in the laws of nations and which the members of the League of Nations, Signatories of the Treaty of Versailles, have duly recognized through article 435, that the guarantees stipulated by the Treaty of 1815 and especially by the Act of November 20, 1815, in favor of Switzerland constitute international obligations for the maintenance of peace. . . . In accepting these declarations (of the Swiss Government), the Council recognizes that the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland and the guarantee of the inviolability of her territory as incorporated in the laws of nations, especially in the Treaties and the Act of 1815, are justified by the interests of universal peace and therefore compatible with the Covenant.

We, here in Switzerland, are sufficiently familiar with American idealism to know that it is absolutely impossible for a nation which before all others has been a guide for us in all the problems with which the League of Nations is concerned to remain outside of it. The hour will come when the two democracies, the one the oldest, the other the greatest, in the world, the two countries that have set the precedent for the creation of a League of Nations, will be members of this organization that will lead humanity to a happier and a nobler future.

OTTFRIED NIPPOLD

Berne, April 25

Correspondence

"The Faith that Is in Us"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Of the many commendable editorial utterances which have appeared in the Review, none is more worthy of attention than that in your issue of May 15, headed "The Faith that is in Us." This is the true gospel of wholesome democracy, from which we have witnessed so many lamentable departures during the last few years. It is the sane middle ground between the wild extremism which would destroy the fruits of ages and the frenzied reactionism which would annihilate the spirit of liberty and progress.

The real radicals of the country, the inheritors of the spirit of Thomas Jefferson and Wendell Phillips, the true liberals, the broadminded conservatives, are at one in their love for the basic principles of democracy, although differing widely in their judgment of the merit of proposed alterations in the method of applicaton. It is a burning shame that a word with the splendid historic meaning of "radical" should be almost universally misapplied at the present time. Those who seek to subvert the foundations of the Republic are not radicals, but revolutionary destroyers. Whatever our different shades of radicalism or conservatism, it is time for us to realize that there is need for union against a twofold enemy. Liberty and order must walk hand in hand. The reactionaries and victims of the current mob hysteria, begotten of a pseudo-patriotism, are no less a menace to the one than the Bolshevist spirit in all of its guises to the other. A plague of both their houses!

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

New York, May 14

Misstatements About Mexico

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have read with interest the article in the Review on three books on Mexico. It is a subject very close to me, as I have spent a good many years, among them the happiest of my life, in that country, but in spite of my long sojourn there, I every day realize my ignorance of the subject, and am correspondingly amazed at the assurance of men like Mr. de Bekker, who, after a five weeks' junket in Mexico, consider themselves sufficiently well informed to instruct the American public on her social, political, and economic problems.

As might be expected, his book fairly bristles with misstatements which would be funny if they did not contain many malicious insinuations and misrepresentations of fellow countrymen established in Mexico.

Thus, on page 31 of his book, "The Plot against Mexico," he says: "But how does Villa maintain himself? Partly by stealing cattle, partly by robbing ranches and mines, but chiefly through the charity of his American friends."

Not a particle of proof is produced in support of this assertion, which of course is merely a repetition of what Mr. de Bekker heard from some of the Mexican officials, whose guest he was during his trip. If Mr. de Bekker had taken the trouble to study Mexican history, he would have come to understand the tendency of Mexican politicians to throw the blame for their political troubles upon outsiders, preferably the United States; his readiness to accept without investigation charges made by parties obviously biased is not creditable.

The accuracy of Mr. de Bekker's book may be judged from the following specimen found on page 205: "Spanish land grants conveyed merely the surface soil, reserving mineral rights to the State. Coal, natural gas and petroleum were not specifically included because their value was unknown." Whatever may have been the law of Spain, a country which lost her rights over Mexico in 1821, the Mexican Mining Code of 1892 states specifically that "the owner of the soil is entitled to work freely, without the necessity of special license, the following mineral substances: Mineral fuels; mineral oils and waters, rocks in general for building or decorative purposes."

Again, on page 55 he says: "Carranza has run the Mexican railways at a profit and without raising the tariff for passenger traffic." It is not until page 195 that he admits that on July 1, 1917, the railroads already owed over 71,000,000 pesos for capital and interest matured; it is almost superfluous to add that not only this debt but the interest accrued on bonds since then remain unpaid, and that there have been no replacements of the rolling stock worn out or destroyed. With bookkeeping of this sort it is always possible to figure out a paper profit.

Dr. Samuel G. Inman, who lived in Mexico for several years, can not even plead ignorance of conditions there as an excuse for such a statement as this, which he makes on page 118 of "Intervention in Mexico." "Property has always been a most sacred thing to Anglo-Saxons. The loss of American lives in Mexico will not be the reason for our intervening. It may well serve as the pretext, but the real reason will be in order to protect American investors. It would not take a great deal more misrepresentations by the American press about the chaos that exists in Mexico than we now have if there were only another border raid or two, quite easily arranged, to make the majority (of Americans) honestly vote for such a war!"

When examined as to this statement by Senator Fall, Inman was obliged to admit that he was simply quoting de Bekker.

"What knowledge have you about arranging raids between Mexico and this country?" asked Mr. Fall.

"I haven't any knowledge except what has been published in various papers and books that these raids have been financed that way."

This is the kind of information on Mexico which the American public gets from certain sources.

Far more worthy of consideration is Mr. P. Harvey Middleton's "Industrial Mexico," which on the surface at least appears to be a serious attempt at presenting the economic situation of that country, though the execution is decidedly amateurish and Mr. Middleton evinces a disposition to see things in a rosy light.

For instance, speaking of the prosperity in evidence in Mexico City in April and May of 1919, he mentions the well-patronized restaurants. I dislike to spoil a good story, but at the very time to which he refers, I was patronizing Mexico's restaurants myself and it often happened to me that I would be the only guest. Mr. Middleton, in his description of Mexico's seaports, tells of the amount of money that has been spent on harbor improvements, but neglects to mention that these improvements were almost all made under Porfirio Diaz and that since his downfall they have been allowed to go to pieces. The reference on page 265 to the rapidly growing traffic of Vera Cruz is particularly humorous and will no doubt be appreciated by the merchants of that port, while the "new and substantial" wharves there of which he speaks were built in 1901.

Much of Mr. Middleton's eulogy of Mexican conditions is in the future tense, as when he speaks of the numerous proposed new railroads and the establishment of factories and foundries by Japanese or Americans, and in his chapters on stock raising, agriculture, lumbering, and sugar production, he complacently ignores a state of affairs that has driven from their homes hundreds of Americans and countless thousands of Mexican farmers, and has cost them their property and often their lives. Of the henequen industry, the utter demoralization of which was notorious, owing to the manipulation of the Comision Reguladora, he says, in passing, that for 1919 "it is expected that the output will exceed that of 1918." At the time of his writing, something like 700,000 bales of henequen remained unsold in the warehouse of Yucatan.

In only one place does Mr. Middleton issue a warning as to the dangers of the country, as when, on page 167, he says: "It can not be too strongly emphasized that bandits and rebels are still active in some of the best coffee growing districts, and no American should venture either his money or his person until he is assured of adequate protection," a statement which might be made with equal justice in regard to almost any occupation in Mexico, save those which can be carried on in the largest cities.

The scandalous repudiation of 670,000,000 of paper money is glossed over on page 208 with the statement that the larger part was redeemed as taxes, railroad fares, etc. The truth, known to everyone in Mexico, is that taxes and duties were made payable in gold; later, a surtax of a hundred per cent. was added, payable in paper money, which in this way was withdrawn from circulation.

Surely, "Industrial Mexico" will never go down in history as a model of accuracy.

G. W. KNOBLAUCH

New York, May 1

The Ability of France to Pay Her Debts

[The author of the following letter is one of the most distinguished French Senators and one of the leading authorities in France on agriculture. He was deputy from the Vosges from 1872 to 1903, Minister of Agriculture from 1883 to 1885, President of the Chamber of Deputies from 1888 to 1889, and Prime Minister from 1896 to 1898.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am very glad of the opportunity to give to the public of a country which stood with us in saving civilization, and with which we wish to continue to go hand in hand, the gist of a recent speech of mine.

Here in France we are weighed with a heavy charge caused by the German invasion and the necessary debts contracted in order to win the victory. It will take us twenty years to restore the devastated parts of our country, and we must go on borrowing in order to continue this reconstruction work and to pay these debts. There are doubters amongst us who say that France is incapable of paying these sums. But they are wrong, and I say it with sincerity and without ostentation. We have an asset which they do not take into account. I refer to the return to France of Alsace with all its great riches, especially its potassium mines, its recently discovered oil wells, and probably other sources of wealth. Lorraine brings back to us iron mines unsurpassed by those in any other part of the world. These riches alone would suffice to pay off our national debt. But these are not the only resources of revenue. The principal one is our industries which create capital and revenue. We have every reason to believe that our industries will be normal again in a few years. Our revenues will also be increased by a return to the economical habits peculiar to our country. Every unnecessary expenditure will be avoided. There will be reforms in this direction and all red tape will be eradicated. There will be changes in our parliamentary system, too. Great attention will be paid to our agriculture. I am urging that committees for this purpose be organized in all our Departments, and that our farmers' wives and daughters, who saved the country from famine during the war, be admitted to membership on these committees. And finally the "sacred union," which was observed during the war, will continue during the peace, while every Frenchman will work until his death. For a moment last autumn I was disposed on account of my eighty years and more to decline reëlection to the Senate. But here I am again at the Luxembourg.

JULES MELINE

Paris, March 10

Conservation of Wild Life

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I am much interested to note in your periodical an editorial advocating the formation of a commission for the conservation of wild life. This idea I am heartily in favor of. Such an official organization with proper authority could tremendously benefit and help maintain our wild life. I trust you may continue to advocate such an organization.

The Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture is the one Government bureau largely devoted to the study and conservation of our wild life, under restrictions, however, which prevent it from accomplishing as much good as it might otherwise bring about. One of our larger activities is the administration of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act, the constitutionality of which has just been sustained by the Supreme Court. The Migratory Bird Treaty Act and the decision give us a solid foundation for the conservation and increase of our useful bird life. According to all reports this work has already accomplished much good.

E. W. NELSON
Chief of Bureau

Washington, D. C., April 26

Book Reviews

The Beginnings of Modern Italy

ITALY FROM DANTE TO TASSO (1300-1600). By H. B. Cotterill. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

PERHAPS for readers accustomed to see propaganda in everything, Mr. Cotterill's book may seem to be part of a subtle plan on the part of the Italian Government to make the world forget Fiume and Istria and remember the Florence and Siena that have, after all, been Italy's greatest asset. The volume bears on its paper cover the delicate outline of Giotto's Dante, or what we like to think is Giotto's Dante, holding his yellow pomegranates against the faded background of the Bargello Chapel. It is prefaced by the familiar portrait that used to hang in the window of every picture shop, the delicately drawn head and shoulders of Beatrice d' Este, the gentle girl-wife of Lodovico il Moro, with its pearl-edged cap and the pendant necklace, and the golden circlet binding the hair. Within are all the other dear and familiar landmarks of Alinari and Brogi illustration—Ghiberti's Baptistry Door, the Campo Santo at Pisa, the tombs of the Vendramin and Mocenigo, with others less familiar.

To attempt in a volume of six hundred pages to treat popularly, yet with due regard for scholarly accuracy, the political history as "viewed from the standpoints of the chief cities, with descriptions of important episodes and personalities and of the art and literature of the three centuries" from Dante to Tasso is obviously a large order. In 1300 Dante was exactly in that "middle of our mortal life" when he met the vision of Virgil, who was to take him on his immortal journey. In 1600 Tasso had been dead for five years. Between these two dates there grew up an almost legendary world, packed with action, rich in color, a world that saw the development of the arts to the highest point of perfection and that produced some of the greatest names in literature, history, poetry, and science. The author has adopted an excellent and satisfactory plan for compassing his enormous field and clarifying the immense detail that goes to make up the history of these perhaps most significant centuries in the world's history. For each century he gives an historical outline, the history of the principal cities, Rome, Naples, Milan, Florence, Venice, with a critical chapter setting forth the principal literary productions, and another chapter on the art, dealing separately with painting, sculpture, and architecture. The historical outlines of the century he has given in thirty-year divisions in an attempt to untangle the complicated web of Italian politics. The book was evidently written during the war and the author is frequently, rather amusingly, pleased to find German authorities in error. He misses no opportunity to dispute with so distinguished a Teuton authority as Gregorovius and to trace to Germanic influences the obvious degradations of Italian taste in decoration. Italian history shows a singular continuity of spirit. Reading these fascinating pages of the exploits of the Visconti and the Sforze, the Montefeltri, the Medici, and the Gonzaghe, one sees that D'Annunzio, pouring out fiery proclamations and verses in his Colonel's uniform, is, at best, but a modern condottiere. Four centuries ago they too were not only soldiers but poets and painters and æsthetes and patrons of art.

From 1300 to 1600 are the centuries that not only developed the arts of sculpture, painting, architecture, and poetry as evidenced by such supreme names as Michael-Angelo, Raphael, Titian, Petrarch, Poliziano, Brunelleschi, Leonardo da Vinci, but that developed and conceived to a greater degree than is generally recognized the republican and national ideals of the Italian peninsula. Most books on Italian history are histories of the rulers and not of the people. The people appear occasionally, as in the dramatic and tragic stories of the Communes, especially of such as Cola di Rienzo, but the emphasis still falls on the triumphs and tyrannies of popes and doges, of emperors and condottieri, rather than on the growth and development of liberating ideas which are becoming of increasingly greater interest to a generation that has gone through a great war and is rather fed up on ducal tombs and frescoed chapels.

The national concept of Rome as the centre of an Italian world bounded by the natural geographical limits of mountain and sea, ruled by a native king, freed from the authority of the Church, which lost its authority when it lost its simplicity—this is not a modern doctrine but a fundamental idea in Italian literature and political philosophy since the days of Dante. Dante merely completed the mediæval conception that saw in Pope and Emperor, representing Church and State, not sun and moon but two suns of equal power, authority, and holiness. Dante's whole political philosophy rests on the theory of the absolute separation of two necessary guides, Pope and Emperor, co-equal, independent, deriving each his authority from divine sanction. To Dante the hope of Italy lay in the restoration of simplicity to the Pope and of power to the Emperor. Petrarch's "Spirto Gentil," addressed to Cola di Rienzo, Machiavelli's "Deliverer," of the last chapter of the "Prince," Fazio degli Uberti's "vertudioso re," all reflected the eternal hope of the poets for a united Italy under a human power, free from external dominion. Dante saw this ideal realized in the adored person of Henry VII of Luxemburg, the "Messo di Dio," whom he put into Paradise as a reward for his supreme virtues and his tragic ill fortunes. Petrarch, the first to love Italy civilly like an Italian and not like a Guelf or a Ghibelline, was the first to perceive and to express the real essence of the new humanism and the growing enthusiasm for democracy. He heard the voice of the revolt against the Middle Ages, not from papal or royal palace, but from the Forum, where the people were becoming accustomed to the sound of their own voices. Cola di Rienzo, the plebeian archæologist, who felt himself the reincarnation of the spirit of Rome and who was proclaimed as Tribune of the people in the Campidoglio, became for Petrarch, though unhappily but for a short time, the embodiment of the popular ideal, the protector of Liberty, "dolce e desiato bene." Convinced by the perpetual perfidy of foreign dominators that the monarchy was the only means of restoring the Roman republic, the voice of Italian patriotism called successively to such redeemers as Robert of Naples and even to the tyrannical, liberty-destroying dynasties of Milan and Ferrara and Mantua, seeing in the power, though it be that of a tyrant, at least the power of a native Italian prince, believing that the voluntary renunciation of municipal independence was compensated by the saving influence of a strong patron. Hope culminated in Gian Galeazzo Visconti who, because of his great territorial conquests, seemed to embody the monarchical principle of unity under a native emperor as opposed to the Florentine principle of communal liberty with a loosely federated union under the Pope. Thus the monarchical concept which would break up municipal strongholds, reduce municipal franchises, and join the separate provinces under a strong political head became a principle of federation and political equilibrium which finally resulted in the foundation of the modern Italian kingdom. And it is very interesting to see that in the eyes of modern Italians Victor Emanuel II, the native Prince who finally mounted the throne, became the embodiment of the ideals of Dante and of Fazio's famous prophecy of the coming of the king to rule over the Italian garden "enclosed by mountains and its own seas, in the perpetual succession of whose princely dynasty should lie safety and hope for Italy."

BEULAH B. AMRAM

Japanese Rule in Korea

KOREA'S FIGHT FOR FREEDOM. By F. A. McKenzie. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company.

IN 1907, Mr. McKenzie, the well-known newspaper correspondent, published a volume entitled the "Tragedy of Korea," and based upon personal observations which he had been able to make by escaping from the Japanese authorities at Seoul, going into the interior of Korea, and studying the police methods which the Japanese were employing as the de facto rulers of the country. He has now issued a new volume, including some of the chapters of the old and bringing the account to date.

It is now some months since the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America felt compelled to issue a report describing the atrocities of which the Japanese soldiers had been guilty against a wholly defenseless people. This report was especially significant in view of the well-known reluctance upon the part of all church organizations to animadvert on political conditions in countries in which they maintain missionary stations. It was further significant that one of the signers of the report was Mr. Sidney L. Gulick, who for years had been known as one of the foremost defenders in this country of what he conceives to be the rights of the Japanese. Mr. McKenzie, however, charges Mr. Gulick with having exerted every possible influence to prevent the early appearance of the report which, as Secretary of the Council, he felt compelled to sign, with the result that the report did not appear until some four or five months after the atrocities described in it had begun.

As to his own point of view, Mr. McKenzie, in his Preface, says:

> Some critics have sought to charge me with being "Anti-Japanese." No man has written more appreciatively of certain phases of Japanese character and accomplishments than myself. . . . I have long been convinced, however, that the policy of Imperial expansion adopted by Japan, and the means employed in advancing it, are a grave menace to her own permanent well-being and to the future peace of the world. I am further convinced that the militarist party really controls Japanese policy, and that temporary modifications which have been recently announced do not imply any essential change of national plans and ambitions. If to believe and to proclaim this is "Anti-Japanese," then I plead guilty to the charge. I share my guilt with many patriotic Japanese subjects who see, as I see, the perils ahead.

Mr. McKenzie, as he suggests, is not alone in the belief that many of the acts of recent years which have brought the Japanese Government as defendant before the bar of the world's moral judgment have been due to the fact that the civil authorities in Japan, and especially those entrusted with the foreign policies of the Government, have not been able to control the actions of the military authorities, and have thus often found themselves in the humiliating position of having made promises that have not been fulfilled; of having made statements of facts, which have later appeared to be false; and of having been forced to accept lines of conduct concerning the wisdom, not to speak of the morality, of which they have been almost surely unconvinced. This dominance in Japan of the militarists was especially emphasized by Professor McLaren, an authority on Japanese political institutions, in an address which he recently made at Cleveland before the American Historical Association. This feature of Japan's political life is also continually referred to by such journals as the Japanese Advertiser and the Kobe Chronicle in explanation of occurrences which seem remarkable to Americans and Europeans; and, for that matter, the same explanation is frequently given in the Japanese vernacular papers. For example, in a recent issue of the Tokyo Asahi it was reported that the Government had been interpellated in Parliament as to whether there was any basis to the rumor abroad that while the Japanese foreign office was conducting diplomatic affairs through proper channels, the military authorities were secretly interfering. In reply, Mr. Tanaka, the Minister of War, had replied that there was no foundation for such a report. The Asahi, however, made the following comment:

> Perhaps the War Minister could give no other reply. In our opinion it can not be said that the rumor has no foundation whatever. Of course, it may be untrue that the Japanese military officers should clandestinely interfere in the affairs of other countries or foment internal trouble. We believe so for the sake of the good name of the Japanese soldier; perhaps the rumor is a misapplication of the state of affairs in the Balkans and in Central American states. But we regret to have to admit the broad fact that Japan has military diplomacy besides that of the Foreign Office. What of our diplomacy towards China? Has it never happened that while the Foreign Office was making arrangements in accordance with a definite policy, the Japanese military officers in China took a different course of action and showed much activity behind the scene? Did not the army differ from the Foreign Office in regard to our policy towards China and try to override the Foreign Office with the assistance of the Genro? What about Siberia? The Japanese diplomatic authorities and military officers in Siberia are not necessarily in harmony; on the contrary, there is a wide gulf between the two.*

The great power exercised in Japan by that extra-constitutional body, the Genro, is well known. At its head is Prince Yamagata, who for more than forty years has been the chief of the military party. Furthermore, by Imperial mandate, it is provided that in every Cabinet the portfolios of the War and Navy Departments shall be held by military officers of high rank. The result from this provision is that these two Departments have the power, which upon occasion they have not hesitated to exercise, to prevent the formation or continuance of a Cabinet not acceptable to them, by refusing to appoint to it, or by withdrawing from it, their representatives.

It is a regrettable fact that the Japanese people do not seem to have felt a general moral indignation at the acts of their military forces in Korea—acts the commission of which they do not deny—but they do seem very generally to have recognized that political wisdom has not been shown by their Government in its management of Korean affairs. The continued and, indeed, increasing repugnance of the Koreans to Japanese rule has sufficiently convinced them of this. But the writer has been able to find little evidence that the Japanese have even begun to question the wisdom or the moral propriety of the fundamental policy which their Government has pursued in Korea. This policy has been essentially the same as that which, before the war, controlled the Prussian Government in its dealings with the Polish provinces. Japan has sought to crush out all that is distinctive in Korean civilization and to substitute for it her own culture and ideals. The only political status reserved for the former kingdom of Korea has been that of an incorporated administrative area of the Japanese Empire. And the same blindness that has made it impossible for the Japanese to understand why a people should be unwilling to abandon their sovereignty and their nationality in return for the assumed benefits of Japanese rule also accounts for what seems to be their genuine surprise that the Chinese should not be willing to coöperate with them on terms which would mean the subjection of Chinese interests to Japanese direction and control.

These observations upon Japan's policies in Korea have a significance broader than that which they have with regard to the welfare of the Koreans. They have a direct bearing upon the question whether the rest of the world may look with approval upon the progressive realization of Japan's imperialistic ambitions throughout the Far East. They raise the question whether it will be an advantage to the millions of Asiatics, or, indeed, to the rest of the world, that the political ideals for which Japan avowedly stands should find further scope for application.

It is but just to Japan to say that she had recently instituted important changes in the administration of Korean affairs, the two most important of which are the abolition of the requirement that the Governor-General of the peninsula shall be an officer of high rank in the active military service and that the gendarmerie shall be replaced by policemen. There has, however, been no abandonment, or suggestion of abandonment, of the fundamental aim of Japan—the Japanization of the Koreans.

W. W. Willoughby

*Cf. The Japan Advertiser, January 30, 1920.

The Puzzle of National Character

Arrows of Desire. By J. S. Mackenzie. New York: The Macmillan Company.

In spite of Burke's declaration that he did not know how to do it, we are perpetually drawing up indictments against whole nations. We call them estimates of national character. The English, for example, are reputed dull, sluggish, unable to see a joke, in spite of their long array of brilliant wits, Lamb, Praed, Barham, Thackeray, Lang, Gilbert, Calverley, J. K. Stephen, Owen Seaman, Chesterton, and in spite of having produced the greatest and most popular master of the comic, since Rabelais, by name Charles Dickens. If any idea was firmly fixed in the English mind, it was the levity of the French.

The English have a scornful insular way
Of calling the French light. . . .
. . . Is a bullet light,
That dashes from the gun-mouth, while the eye
Winks and the heart beats one, to flatten itself
To a wafer on the white speck on a wall
A hundred paces off? Even so direct,
So sternly undivertible of aim,
Is this French people.

During the war, it was a common observation that the races had interchanged characteristics. How steadfast the French were, let the long-drawn agony of Verdun attest, and the stone-wall resolution never to submit or yield of the whole French people. And the French noted with surprise the inexhaustible gayety of the English in camp and their reckless, headlong élan in the field. How the popular estimates of German character have changed need not be detailed.

It has remained for Dr. J. S. Mackenzie, who at one time held the chair of Logic and Philosophy at Cardiff, to discover that the English are a race of poseurs. That is the form his indictment takes in his series of essays, with the fanciful title from a line of Blake's. Henry V, as represented by Shakespeare, is a typical Englishman, not "Shakespeare's conception of the very perfect knight" (p. 20), but "a character of many conflicting 'humors,' leading to a succession of more or less conscious poses" (p. 24). Dr. Mackenzie is "well aware that this is not the view that has been commonly taken," but he would not go as far as "Mr. B. Wendell" (who is barely recognizable as our own and only Barrett) in calling "Henry V" a dull play. As becomes a philosopher and logician, he is addicted to hedging, that is, guarding himself against attack or retort, by such devices as the verb "seem," and the phrase "more or less." "Shakespeare's answer to this question seems to have been" (p. 24), "that kind of affection at least seems to be distinctly shown" (p. 26); "Henry proceeds to consider practical difficulties in a way that seems to imply" (p. 32). Even more virtue resides in "more or less"; it is a most convenient starting-hole for the fox of argument. In regard to Prince Hal's declaration in his speech over his father's crown,

You won it, wore it, kept it, gave it me;

Dr. Mackenzie writes, "we realize that the precious air of humility, though not altogether hypocritical, was a more or less unconscious pose" (p. 29).

To "try confusions" with such a reasoner is like trying to bind Proteus.

What is a poseur? Dr. Mackenzie says (p. 37), "Henry comes more and more to pose as the simple soldier," and on p. 43, he reaches this astounding conclusion, "He was not an actor, but an unconscious poseur." Surely the essence of posing is consciousness. The plain dictionary meaning of poseur is "affected person," and of posing, "assuming an attitude for artistic purposes." How can one assume an attitude for a specific purpose, and be unconscious of so doing? Such logic is too much for the plain man. There can be no argument without new definition of the terms.

Setting aside for the moment these cobwebs of subtlety, let us consider the origin of "Henry V," and the other historical plays of Shakespeare. When England became a nest of singing-birds, England was a tiny nation of less than five million people, and she had been fighting for the bare life, against the huge, wealthy, world power, Spain. The deliverance of 1588 was not less than the deliverance of 1918. England was on the brink of destruction and was saved. One result was a great outburst of national pride, as plainly to be read in "The Faerie Queene," as in Shakespeare's historical dramas. Patriotism was not yet classed as a vice; the term "chauvinism" was not invented. To rejoice that the enemies of the nation were overthrown was no more reckoned a sin than it was in the days of Deborah, and Barak, the son of Abinoam. Moreover, Shakespeare found the historical Henry V emphatically a good king. English history is not a flatterer of English kings, nor is Shakespeare. He represents them as cruel, tyrannical, treacherous, murderous, weak, incapable of ruling, inferior to their subjects in manhood. He found Henry V already idealized, the figure of an heroic, patriotic king, at whose famous victories over the secular foe every good Englishman would "whinny," as one contemporary critic notes. In his delineation he simply continued a great tradition.

In order to make this heroic figure human, Shakespeare makes him (blessed word!) "democratic." Prince Hal likes to escape from the dulness and strict etiquette of court, and get into touch with reality in the taverns. He likes fun; he likes practical jokes; he likes characters such as Falstaff, Fluellen, Williams, that typical British Tommy. When it comes to courting a princess, he shies off, with an Englishman's dislike of humbug, from doing it in the high style and making a speech. Apparently Dr. Mackenzie sees no comedy in this delightful wooing. Before the great battle, round which the play revolves, the king finds reality by making the rounds of the sentries and seeing how they feel, with their backs to the wall. The knowledge drives him to his knees. In the twentieth century, the same English tendency to insist on their rulers being human is as plain as in the spacious times of great Elizabeth. The behavior of George V during the war, the Prince of Wales on his tours are cases in point. It was not an English king who declared that he was the State, or assumed the title of "All-highest."

The other essays on national character, Scottish, Welsh, Irish, leave the reader with much the same impressions as those obtained by the six blind men who felt the elephant's tail, tusks, proboscis, legs, and side.

Where everyone is free to dogmatize, and no harm done, the present reviewer would "seem" to aver that the outstanding national English trait is a sense of humor "more or less." Where is vis comica more evident than in Chaucer, Shakespeare, Fielding, Dickens, all of them English to the backbone? In this opinion, a forgotten American concurs. He wrote, in a forgotten book:

> It is characteristic of the peculiar humor of the English, and of their love for what is blunt, comic, and familiar, that they have embodied their national oddities in the figure of a sturdy, corpulent old fellow, with a three-cornered hat, red waistcoat, leather breeches, and stout oaken cudgel. They have thus taken a singular delight in exhibiting their most private foibles in a laughable point of view; and they have been so successful in their delineations, that there is scarcely a being in actual existence more absolutely present to the public mind than that eccentric personage, John Bull.

The caricature, or national emblem, which Arbuthnot invented in the eighteenth century, and Irving noted in the nineteenth, is, with changed head-gear, more widely known than ever in the twentieth. It probably comes nearer the essential truth than the learned and ingenious volumes of this Scottish logician and philosopher.

ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN

True Stories

UP THE MAZARUNI FOR DIAMONDS. By William J. La Varre. (Veteran Scout.) Boston: Marshall Jones Company.

THE ROAD TO EN-DOR: Being an Account of How Two Prisoners of War at Yozgadi in Turkey Won Their Way to Freedom. By E. H. Jones, Lt. I.A.R.O. With Illustrations by C. W. Hill, Lt. R.A.F. New York: John Lane Company.

HIGHLY as he may esteem the art of fiction, every novel-reader has experienced the relief of stepping now and again into the free air of the "true story." It is like opening a door out of a hothouse into a garden. A true story, to be worth anything, must be much more than a helter-skelter jotting down of facts. A good narrative is bound to be an arrangement. But the sorting and setting forth of things that have happened is a basically different affair from fiction. We can dismiss at once the wear and tear of assessing the value of the narrative as an invention. So far the art of the story is simpler than that of the "fiction-story," to employ the newspaperman's distinction. But we are more aware than we realize, that the narrative based on fact is an art by itself; though our quaint impulse is to express our praise of it by calling it "as good as a story," that is, as an invented narrative or "fiction-story."

Treasure-hunting is one of the three or four classic bases for "juvenile" fiction. "Up the Mazaruni for Diamonds" appears to be the true narrative by an American boy of a diamond-seeking expedition into the jungles of British Guiana. In his foreword the explorer, Anthony Fiala, commends the spirit in which young La Varre undertook and carried out his adventure. It sounds casual enough from the account itself. One day in the spring of 1917, La Varre (being then nineteen) got a letter from a friend named Lewis in British Guiana. Friend Lewis "needed a partner in a diamond-mining venture." Is La Varre "game to try it out with him"? There will be plenty of hard work and danger in it, "but there are diamonds here to be had for the digging." This appealed at once to friend La Varre. "I had little trouble in arranging this," he remarks, "and wrote him that I would come." Clearly, the stars must have moved kindly in their courses. What fiction-writer would dare begin a narrative in this offhand fashion? Instead of fifty words he would use a chapter explaining how Bill La V., a Virginian by birth, had longed from infancy to be an explorer; how (as is the fact) he rose to the head of the Boy Scouts of New York City; how he sought experience in the open at every opportunity and diligently studied the science and arts useful to explorers. And finally, with a deal of ingenuity, he would account for the fact that our nineteen-year-old hero was sufficiently footloose and handfree to be able to arrange a perilous and presumably expensive journey into the southern wilds without difficulty or delay. Mr. Fiala tells us the other things; but the final mystery remains unexplained. However, in fifty words we are off for Barbados, where friend Lewis meets us; and so to Georgetown, British Guiana, and the treacherous Mazaruni River. Far up the Mazaruni, through the fever-stricken jungle, lie the diamond fields. How our two adventurer-explorers win to them, how they fare there, and how they finally escape with their lives and some thirty thousand in diamonds, is the substance of a remarkably simple, vigorous, and interesting story. Ten of these hundred and forty pages are given to the diamond-mining and its outcome; the rest of the book presents the country, the people, and the conditions of living and traveling in that far land. This is proof of the adventurer's mettle to Mr. Fiala: that "he has brought back from the field information which will help others who intend to traverse similar trails." To blaze one tree in advance is always the primary object of your true explorer.

"The Road to En-dor" is a true story of still more absorbing interest. There is no book like it. Perhaps there is no book which more strongly expresses the "Anglo-Saxon" genius—though the author happens to be a Welshman. A lieutenant in the British forces captured by the Turks at Kut-el-Amara in 1916, he was among the survivors of the brutal cross-country march, or drive, which landed the survivors in prison camp at Yozgad, 300 miles in the interior. It was the Turkish "punishment camp" for British officers of all grades who were suspected of meditating escape. Out of the dullness of camp life begins the action. Lieutenant Hill happens to receive a postcard from Home with the picture of a Ouija board on it. He makes one. He thinks experimenting with it may be at least a new game. He and some cronies play with it for several weeks. Their interest is kept up by the fact that the glass (used as a pointer) undoubtedly moves. But nothing else happens, nothing intelligible is spelt out. It is agreed that after one more night of attempt, they would give it up. The moment comes for the last "shot"; and Jones, lest this faint object of interest be taken from his friends, makes the board write the name "Sally"; and the fun begins. They work with their eyes shut, but Jones finds that he has unconsciously memorized the position of the letters. The "spoof" works merrily, but the manipulator expects to be caught. To his amazement he is not; and presently the time has passed for voluntary confession. He begins to make converts to spiritualism among his fellow-officers. Then notice is taken by the Turkish Commandant of certain alleged war-news communicated telepathically through Jones. The idea comes to Jones that by hoaxing the authorities he may somehow pave the way for escape. And so the big game is on. With amazing patience and ingenuity the commandant and two others are enmeshed in a scheme by which Jones and an officer whom he chooses as confederate may be taken to the coast and given opportunity for escape by water. This plan is blocked by the clumsiness of a well-meaning fellow-prisoner. The remaining hope lies in feigning madness. By this means, they cause themselves to be sent to Constantinople; and, after long months of examination by experts and surveillance by hospital attendants and others, are actually sent Home—some two weeks before their quiescent fellow-prisoners are released by the armistice. "We've been through a good deal, and for very little," is Lieutenant Jones's comment as he shakes hands with his comrade on reaching English soil. . . . "Never mind," answers Hill. "We did our best." Their best has included trifles like self-starvation to the point of collapse, a joint self-hanging (as evidence of madness) from which they are barely rescued, the courting of physical violence on the part of their guards, and so on. But they have played the game, and that ends it.

Apart from its interest as a story, the book has, and means to have, value as evidence against the spook mania. The author, who performed so many marvels in the name of the occult, has not a shred of belief in any aspect of the spiritualist, or psychical, manifestations which the Sir Oliver Lodges and their followers are taking so seriously. His Preface is headed by a text from Huxley: "The only good that I can see in the demonstration of the truth of 'spiritualism' is to furnish an additional argument against suicide. Better live a crossing-sweeper than die and be made to talk twaddle by a 'medium' hired at a guinea a séance." And the author makes his own vigorous protest later on: "God knows I have feared Death. Yet Death has ever had for me one strong consolation—it brings the peace that passeth all understanding. Like me, perhaps, you have watched it come to your friends and lay its quiet fingers on their grey faces. You have seen the relaxation from suffering, the gentle passing away and then the ineffable Peace. And is my Peace, when it comes, to be marred by this task of shifting tables, and chairs, and glasses, Sir Oliver? Am I to be at the beck and call of some hysterical, guinea-grabbing medium—a sort of telephone boy in Heaven or Hell? I hope not, Sir. I trust there is nobler work beyond the bar for us poor mortals."

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

THREE things tend to abate human pride and to teach the Christian grace of humility—a photographer's show-window, the monkey-house in the zoo, and the modern autobiography. Most photographs are smirking, self-conscious imbecilities, the monkeys never allow us to forget that they are our poor relations, and autobiographies, from Rousseau down, are too often so many cases of indecent exposure. Autobiography requires some justification for its existence, such as fame, achievement, noteworthy experience, contact with great men or great events. Darwin turns the whole current of human thought into a new channel, and can with difficulty be persuaded to pen a few memoranda of his career; but, uninvited and undesired, all sorts of nobodies rush into print with "personal and private things," for the edification of a relatively indifferent public.

On meeting some married pairs, an almost irresistible impulse arises in one to ask, "My dear sir, how did you come to marry that woman?" or, "My dear lady, how did you come to marry that man?" But the impulse must be resisted or human intercourse would dissolve. In regard to such books as Mrs. Helen Bartlett's "Within My Horizon" (Small, Maynard), the question is "How did it get into print?" Could it be possible that the writer herself footed the printer's bill?

A writer in the Figaro makes the following rather unexpected comment on American insight into French literature:

> There is no foreign country, I think, where our literature is better understood or followed more attentively than it is to-day in the United States; and one is astonished to find some of our modern and "difficult" authors judged in that country with an originality and a penetration that would do honor to French readers.

After the Germans had made Dinant a martyr town and a place of pilgrimage for Belgian and foreigner by its destruction and by the massacre of hundreds of its inhabitants, the Governor-General, Freiherr von Bissing, ordered a Professor Heinrich to prepare a book on Dinant, which was to describe, with German thoroughness, the topography, history, and architecture of the place. To this scholarly interest of the torturer in his victim, of which a German alone is capable in his "unverfrorenheit," we owe a valuable monograph, published at Munich by the Roland-Verlag under the title "Dinant, Eine Denkschrift." It is difficult to understand the mentality of people who take a pleasure in erecting memorials to their own crimes.

The son of the former Imperial Chancellor von Hertling has published recollections of his father's tenure of that high office under the title "Ein Jahr in der Reichskanzlei" (Herdersche Verlagshandlung). If the book relied on the author's gift for presenting his facts and not on the facts themselves, it would hardly reach a second edition. But the facts invite an interest in the volume which the manner of presentation can not command. Many of them throw a new light on the events of the period from the summer of 1917 to the autumn of 1918, and make the book a valuable complement to Ludendorff's "Kriegserinnerungen." It contains some hitherto unpublished documents, amongst others a remarkable letter of Cardinal Mercier dated February 14, 1918, and a plan of the Admiralty for a new sea barrage against America of June, 1918.

Should a dramatist be allowed the right to veto an inartistic production of his work? The French author Lucien Descares and the Compagnie Générale du Travail have widely different views on this matter. A play by Descares was having a run last month in the Théâtre des Arts at Paris. The Compagnie Générale du Travail, being informed that one of the parts was taken by an actress who was not registered as a member of that organization, demanded that she should be replaced by a "cégétiste." The manager obediently complied and assigned the part to a "syndically" deserving actress. But the author's appreciation of her desert was gained from a totally different point of view and did not fall in line with that of the C. G. T. He fondly believed that considerations of talent should override the question of conformity to union rules and demanded the return of the dismissed actress. The manager, compelled to choose between yielding to his fear of the powerful union or to his respect for the artist, gave in to Descares. But the interests of unionized labor could not thus be

(Continued on page 550)

CROCKER-WHEELER MOTORS

"Niagara's Rival for Dependable Power"

Telephone and Telegraph

Both Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler operated the telegraph key prior to the invention of the telephone in 1876. At that date these two electrical engineers manufactured a telephone a model of which is still in existence.

Both Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler manufactured batteries for telephone and telegraph.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

Alfred L. Aiken, President, National Shawmut Bank, Boston, Massachusetts,

says:

"I want to congratulate you on your success in developing THE REVIEW. I think it is filling a real need and I heartily approve of the general editorial policies of the paper. In these troublous times, it is refreshing to have a weekly journal dealing so sanely and wisely with the social and economic problems with which the country is confronted."

$5 a year

140 Nassau Street
New York

Please mention THE REVIEW in writing to advertisers.

(Continued from page 548)
sacrificed to the claim of art without challenge. The C. G. T., acting on behalf of the cégétiste actress, sued the manager, on a charge of breach of contract, for an indemnity of fr. 5,000. We shall soon hear, no doubt, that no plays can be produced in Paris which are the work of non-cégétist authors. In this way the golden era of the proletarian theatre is being brought nearer.

A German comrade, Rudolph Leonhard, explains in Die Neue Schaubühne why this proletarian theatre will be far superior to that of the bourgeoisie. "The latter remains ineffective because its audience is an accidental gathering of people, unknown to, and out of sympathy with, one another, so that even a powerful drama can not unify them in emotion. They are brought together by the expectation of the play, and if that suffices to keep them quiet and good-tempered within the same walls, what rapturous effect must the performance have on an audience which forms a closely knit community in and outside the theatre! The proletariat alone, the people of the future, with strong feeling and united will, forms the ideal audience for the theatre." We should have thought that the beauty of art's miracle was in its very power of purifying the heterogeneous mass of their conflicting evil passions, restoring to the many that communal spirit of primitive man from which all art has sprung. But in the proletarian theatre the miracle is forestalled by the picking of its audience. The momentary dramatic emotion has its substitute there in the permanent brotherhood of the audience. But would not even the proletarian prefer the thrill of the accidental to the monotony of the permanent?

"The question of Thrace," by J. Saxon Mills, M. A., and Matthew G. Crussachi, B. A. (London: Edward Stanford), deserves special notice now that the treaty with Turkey is the subject of various comments and criticism in the press. The book attempts to persuade its readers of the justice of the Grecian claims on Thrace by the most direct and convincing argument: the presentation of ethnographic maps. The distribution of the colors representing the various races gives an immediate and comprehensive conception of the ethnic conditions in the Balkans, such as the laborious perusal of a written exposé can never yield. The reliability of the cartographic material is established by the fact that the larger part of it is based on Bulgarian data, although the volume has the professed purpose of refuting Bulgarian claims. Those data are derived from a book brought out in 1917 by Dr. Dimitri Rizoff, then Bulgarian Minister at Berlin, entitled "The Bulgarians in their Historical, Ethnographical and Political Frontiers." Rizoff wrote with a view to proving the Bulgarian claims as against Serbia and Rumania in the Dobrudja, the Morava, and Timok valleys and Macedonia, but incidentally the book affords very substantial evidence in refutation of any Bulgarian claim to Thrace. To those who are interested in the Balkans and the problems which that part of Europe supplies for the League of Nations to solve, "The Question of Thrace" will prove a helpful guide.

There are two ways of writing a book on American literature for the use of high school or college students. Each may recognize that the most instructive fact about our literature is that Americans have produced it, that it is the best medium for a study of the development of American intellectual character as we now understand it. One book, however, will attempt to indicate the steps in that development as illustrated by the most significant writers, subordinating to that purpose the presentation of information. The other will offer the information chronologically or topically arranged but leave most of the necessary interpretation to be done by the teacher in the class room. Percy H. Boynton's "American Literature" (Boston: Ginn and Company) is a book of the first sort, Walter C. Bronson's with the same title (New York: D. C. Heath and Company), of the second. Each has the merits and defects of its kind. The former makes by far the better reading. Sufficient space is given to such figures as Jonathan Edwards, Crèvecœur, Emerson, Longfellow, Whitman, and Mark Twain to enable the author to state vigorously what he conceives to be each man's essential contribution to intellectual history. Critical apparatus is conveniently put into chapter appendices, fortified by suggestions for further reading and discussion. Space is not sufficient, however, for explicit presentation of an ordered conception of the growth itself. Consequently the book reads, at times, not like a history but like a series of more or less loosely related but suggestive essays on American authors. Professor Bronson's book, on the other hand, though attempting "to give . . . a literary atmosphere, in the conviction that textbooks on literature should contribute directly to the student's culture as well as to his knowledge of facts," does in effect give him more facts than atmosphere. It runs over the bead-roll of American authors of all magnitudes, and gains or suffers accordingly. It includes much, but it interprets little, and that little, through compression, in terms rather abstract and conventional. As a small manual for reference, however, it is excellent.

My Friend the Print Seller

THERE is an old print shop behind Grace Church that has been a chosen haunt for the collector of engravings for more than twenty years. And old Goodbody, the presiding genius of the place, is considered by many of his customers to be the most interesting item in his endless collection. He has the stock, and he knows probably more about prints and "states" and values than most of the fashionable uptown dealers will ever know.

Old Goodbody is a man of infinite humor. He is as round as Mr. Pickwick and as merry. His clear gray eyes beam at you through gold-rim spectacles while he tells you a tale of some fortunate find in a Brooklyn attic, or introduces you to one of his patrons who happens to be looking for the same kind of sporting prints or old ships you are after. The shop is a meeting place for characters. Here come men of every temper, bent, and bias in the goodly fellowship of print collectors, from the picker-up of unconsidered trifles to the expert on old masters, who turn the shop into a riding school for their hobbies. I have met every kind there; artists, actors, lawyers, brokers, cabinet members, sailors, and doctors. Among all the professions doctors seem to be the most constant and intelligent buyers. They go in for Whistler or Méryon or Seymour Haden. There is something about the clean, sure lines of an etching that appeals to their trained eye and practised hand. The etching needle, like the lancet, must be deft and unerring, and the work of a master hand is never lost on a doctor. He will not tolerate the second rate.

Since the days of Hogarth the print seller's window has always been the poor man's picture gallery. There you saw the newest political cartoon, the caricatures of Gilray and Rowlandson, and the latest portrait of popular actor or divine, the sweet domestic groups of Moreland or the spritely quips of Cruikshank. It cost you never a pin to look. You could laugh or curse over the prints

Concerning radical readjustment between the peoples

"The Brotherhood of Man"

This book by Dr. A. R. L. Dohme is an earnest stud[y] of general economic and political conditions. D[r.] Dohme concludes with an interesting practical outlin[e] for a World State and new human relationship[s]. By mail, $1.10.

THE NORMAN, REMINGTON COMPANY
Publishers - Baltimore

Applications are invited for an Instructorship i[n] French and Spanish. Stipend, $2000 or $22[00] with the summer school. Young Canadian or man [of] Latin origins preferred, but applicants must speak bo[th] languages and have had college experience in teachin[g]. Letters, with references and recommendations, may [be] sent to the Dean, Dr. W. Sherwood Fox, Wes[t]ern University, London, Canada.

exhibited quite as freely as the dilettante at your elbow who could afford to go inside and buy an impression for his cabinet. So to-day you will usually find a knot of idlers gazing in at Goodbody's window display with much the same curiosity. There is a row of the Houbraken heads of English worthies hung along the top and below the big Piranesi plates of old Rome.

But these hold me only a moment outside. I step down the long, gloomy shop, lit by tiny points of gas, past the counters and tables heaped with interminable piles of prints, the cheap, the sentimental, the curious. At the far end sits old Goodbody, the light shining on his bald head as he bends over his table checking up a catalogue for to-morrow's sale. The short cigar that he is forever relighting is already a stump and I share a match with him while he shows his latest bargain. In defiance of the fact that the neatly indexed shelves around us are groaning with old portraits, the drawers and portfolios bursting with mezzotints and etchings, he is forever buying more. Of course there are a few old masters that he keeps for his own private relish. Albert Dürer is one of these. Here is an artist-craftsman whom he loves for the simple directness of his line and the romantic invention of his subjects. He fingers the paper as tenderly as old lace and hands you a glass to study the delicate beauties of "St. Hubert" kneeling before a stag, with a miraculous crucifix on its head, or the exquisite skill and vigor of "St. Jerome in his cell."

There is one process of Goodbody's trade that I as a booklover can never quite forgive. It is to find him some afternoon ripping a pile of old books apart to get out the engravings. I know that the letterpress is rubbish and the prints thus brought to light are worth more than the books can ever bring, yet this body-snatching business did gag me at first. The people who revel in this unholy pursuit are known as "Grangerizers," from the Rev. James Granger, a pious vicar of Oxfordshire who published in 1769 a "Biographical History of England" in which he strongly urged the value of a collection of engraved portraits. Thus the craze for extra-illustration began. It has grown now until these vandals think nothing of destroying a whole set of books in order to illustrate one. I have met them often at Goodbody's feverishly thumbing over small prints of historical or biographical interest with which to extra-illustrate some favorite author. Whatever their subject they never seem to get quite all they know must have been engraved for their purpose. Napoleon and the French Revolution are prime favorites. Here comes a customer who has just about

(Continued on page 552)

New STOKES Books

POEMS BY A LITTLE GIRL

HILDA CONKLING

"Probably no other book of the season will stimulate a greater interest and certainly none will hold the reader in dearer enchantment," says Mrs. Marguerite Wilkinson in the N. Y. Times. "Readers will be glad of the book, not only because it was written by a child but because it contains beautiful poetry."

Miss Amy Lowell, in her Preface, says of this verse by eight-year-old Hilda, "I wish at the outset to state, and emphatically, that it is poetry, the stuff and essence of poetry, which this book contains. I know of no other instance in which such really beautiful poetry has been written by a child." Net $1.50.

FLYING the ATLANTIC in SIXTEEN HOURS

By SIR ARTHUR WHITTEN BROWN
Assisted by Capt. Alan Bott

The only book about the first non-stop flight across the Atlantic that can ever be written. Arthur Whitten Brown and John Alcock jumped the Atlantic Ocean in a single leap in the most remarkable aeroplane journey ever made. The story of their flight is of thrilling interest. Illustrated from photographs. Net $1.50.

SOCIAL THEORY

By G. D. H. COLE

A consistent analysis of social theories, so dispassionately and logically developed that the whole question of man's relationships in his various associations from the Family to the State is seen in an entirely new light. Mr. Cole's exposition is so brilliantly convincing that the air is at once cleared of all mistaken ideas. An invaluable book for teachers and students of economics and social science. Net $1.50.

"SHAKESPEARE" IDENTIFIED

By J. THOMAS LOONEY

There is no cipher, no cryptogram, no mystery in this important treatment of the Shakespearean controversy. Its straightforward attitude must appeal to all intelligent readers, whether Shakespeare scholars or not. The growing doubts regarding the claims of William Shakespeare of Stratford are here crystallized, and a logical presentment of the known facts, backed by newly discovered evidence, strongly points to Edward de Vere, Seventeenth Earl of Oxford, as the real author of the plays. Net $5.00.

WOMEN'S WILD OATS

By C. GASQUOINE HARTLEY

Downright, straight-from-the shoulder common sense on the present relationships of women and the outlook for the future. The author, neither "old-fashioned" nor "advanced," sets the facts down plainly and faces them fearlessly. A book for everyone who can stand clear thinking on conditions as they are. Net $1.50.

Good Fiction

MR. WU

By LOUISE JORDAN MILN

If you like thrilling mystery, tender love scenes, beauty, there's a real adventure for you in this novel of a wealthy Chinese mandarin and a fearless American woman. Net $1.75.

WILLIAM, AN ENGLISHMAN

By CICELY HAMILTON

"It seems rather surprising that a book which won the French Academy prize of 20,000 francs as the best novel of the year published in any language should not have been taken up by some enterprising American publisher," says George H. Sargent in last Saturday's Boston Transcript. We accepted this novel novel last Summer, but strikes and other manufacturing delays held back publication. Now ready at all bookshops, net $1.25.

443 Fourth Ave. FREDERICK A. STOKES COMPANY New York

(Continued from page 551)
completed his set of portraits for Boswell's "Life of Johnson," which will probably be extended to twenty volumes before he has done.

A rainy afternoon is the best time to find old Goodbody alone. Then he is content to fold his legs and have his talk out, while the air grows pleasantly dim with tobacco smoke. Such stories as he can tell of dealers and queer customers and adventures with old Mr. Keppel, the veteran print seller, who often called Goodbody in consultation over a faked print or a forgery. There are shoplifters, too, clever gentry who collect in their own secret way whatever their chance offers. A stolen print, however, never gets very far away in these days of the telephone, for dealers have their own private marks, and the thief never fools the same dealer twice. My friend's knowledge and unvarying honesty has won the confidence of many collectors who will not buy anywhere without his assurance that their purchase is genuine.

Behind the shop are a couple of dark rooms where Goodbody keeps his choicest treasures. This is the inner shrine of his collection which is not opened for the casual or merely curious shoppers. Some name will come up in our talk and to settle a point he will beckon me into the sanctuary, switch on the light and display for my special delectation an exquisite impression from Whistler's "Venice Set," a Lapère landscape or one of C. Y. Cameron's cathedral etchings. Here his rare prints are shown in glass cases along the wall. Higher up hang framed engravings of prelates and princes of old France and mezzotint portraits of belles and statesmen who sat to Reynolds and Lawrence. There is still an inner room, beyond this little portrait gallery, for paintings, drawings, and a great variety of framed lithographs of old New York. It is amazing the prices these early views and maps of Manhattan bring. Goodbody, as a born and bred New Yorker, has a sentimental as well as a collector's interest in these vanished landmarks. A color print of the Battery with Castle Garden among the trees will start him talking of Jenny Lind's first appearance there. The scenes on Broadway showing Barnum's Museum, the old Astor House, and the horse busses running as far uptown as Union Square, all awaken for him vivid recollections of the time when skyscrapers and subways were as yet undreamed of.

One of the greatest buyers of old prints I ever met at Goodbody's was the late Evert J. Wendell. By "great" I mean a purchaser of mere bulk, for he bought literally everything he could find in his chosen field, the drama. At the time of his death this vast hoard, stored away in packing cases, filled an entire floor in a loft building. The whole mass of prints, playbills, books, and photographs was bequeathed to the Harvard Library. They selected the best but found enough duplicates to stock a score of libraries on the theatre. It took three weeks of three sessions a day to dispose of the remainder at auction. Goodbody would often caution his patron against buying duplicates of a print when he had several copies of it already, but the warning was useless. This habit of accumulation was too strong to resist. Another collector of the drama whom I know, was a more cautious buyer. He waited three years to pay Goodbody his price for an old John Street Theatre playbill, only to find that it had been sold an hour before he got to the shop.

A love of old prints grows by what it feeds on. There is always a feast at the Museum or the Public Library Print Room and a variety of shows at the dealers to pique your appetite and improve your taste. You look and long and wonder how you can manage to possess this "cheap luxury." Charles Lamb had a special love for his set of Hogarths in their neat black frames, and he tells how at each new purchase he and Mary "used to debate two or three days before, and to weigh the for and against, and think what we might spare it out of." Among his prints after Raphael, Poussin, and the older painters was a graceful head by Leonardo da Vinci which he had christened the "Lady Blanch." One day he was showing this print to a dull gentleman whose matter-of-fact soul betrayed him into a remark that must have delighted Elia. "After he had examined it minutely I ventured to ask him how he liked 'My Beauty' (a foolish name it goes by among my friends)—when he very gravely answered me that 'he had considerable respect for my character and talents' (so he was pleased to say), 'but had not given himself much thought about the degree of my personal pretensions.'"

LAWRENCE WILLIAMS

Certificate Borrowing and the Floating Debt

[Dr. Jacob H. Hollander, Professor of Political Economy at Johns Hopkins University, has long given special attention to the important question of borrowing by United States Treasury certificates, which he discusses in the following paper.]

THE papers on "Inflation" read at the recent meeting of the Academy of Political Science give an enlightening account of the relation of our public financing to credit expansion and high prices. Even where the exposition is official rather than thorough-going it possesses an important documentary value as setting forth the purposes governing our financial administrators during and after the war.

In one particular, however, the exhibit of the factors responsible for inflation is glaringly defective. A significant allusion in the brief but trenchant comment of that sturdy champion of sound financial practice, A. Barton Hepburn, is practically the only reference to the part that the Treasury's war-time and after-war-time practice of bank borrowing by means of certificates of indebtedness has played in bringing us to the present pass. Emphasis is put upon the use of bank credit by the general public in Liberty Loan and Victory Note buying; but to the Treasury's wholesale resort to such credit in its certificate borrowing, during and since the war, the barest reference is made. The omission is unfortunate not only as impairing a complete analysis, but more practically in relation to the Treasury's impending problem—sound treatment of the nation's floating debt.

On April 30, 1920, the unfunded public debt (exclusive of War Savings Securities) was $2,994,272,555—all outstanding in the form of Treasury certificates of indebtedness bearing interest from 4¾ to 5¼ per cent., and of various maturities extending up to March 15, 1921. The aggregate of Treasury certificates was made up as follows:

Tax	$2,278,495,500
Loan	455,204,500
Pittman Act	259,375,000
Special issues	1,197,555
	$2,994,272,555

The manner in which this huge "floating debt" will be cared for in the next twelve months is of the gravest national concern. On the one hand lies the hard straight course of liquidation and funding—the course which England, in like plight, is now about to enter upon with a fine loyalty to her best financial traditions. On the other hand is the easy tempting descent to further bank loan renewal with its certain penalties of fiscal danger, business embarrassment, and social injustice. Our one chance of following the first course and of avoiding the second is to understand clearly the evil which the Treasury's policy of certificate borrowing has caused in the past and the mischief which it threatens for the future.

Bank borrowing as practiced by the Treasury during the war and as resumed on August 1, 1919, eight months after the armistice, and continued uninterruptedly up to the present time, has consisted in the issue of certificates of indebtedness nominally in anticipation of war loans and taxes, but more recently in renewal of maturing unfunded obligations and in discharge of actual deficit requirements. Such certificates of indebtedness when emitted by the Treasury have been taken, under a form of administrative compulsion, almost entirely by the banks for themselves and their customers. In either event they have been paid for by the banks, again almost entirely by credit. The purchasing banks, qualified as Government depositaries, have credited the purchase price to the account of the Treasury as Government deposits and against such Government deposits no reserves have been held. From time to time, as required, such deposits have been withdrawn by the Treasury and disbursed through the Federal Reserve Banks in payment of public accounts, ultimately accumulating in individual deposit accounts. An additional volume of deposit currency has thus been created, dictated solely by the Treasury's convenience and entirely unrelated to commercial requirement. As I have elsewhere stated, if the greenbacks of our Civil War period are properly described as fiat money, it is right to speak of Government bank deposits made in this way as fiat credit.

Certificate borrowing has had an unwholesome effect in three quarters—(1) the price level, (2) the money market, and (3) the Treasury. As to the price level, the certain tendency of certificate borrowing has been to aggravate the problem of rising prices by the direct creation of additional deposit currency in obedience to fiscal convenience rather than to business needs. Such emissions of bank credit, liberated among individual deposit accounts, have operated, first, to increase prices, and thereafter, to delay, restrict, or prevent an otherwise possible fall.

As to the money market, the signal advantage of certificate borrowing was avoidance of monetary strain—as long as the Treasury pursued, under justification of war-time exigency, its policy of a mounting balance and as long as the banks could meet withdrawals from certificate-created deposits by preferential rediscounting with the Federal Reserve Banks. This artificial ease disappeared as soon as the reduced Treasury balance made it impracticable for certificate credits to be left for any considerable time in the depositary banks, and the profit-yielding differential on war paper was wiped out. Thereafter, withdrawal of funds subjected the resources of the banks working with scanty reserves to strain and the money market to pressure. Eventually, resort was of necessity had to the Federal Reserve Banks, with a consequent further reduction in the reserve ratio and ultimate

(Continued on page 554)

Owen Wister's New Book

Owen Wister's new book meets a need which has long been felt by thinking Americans. It is a book of facts about England and the British Empire written with the avowed intention of creating a better feeling between English and Americans.

A STRAIGHT DEAL
OR THE ANCIENT GRUDGE

"Mr. Wister has written a good book; and in writing it he has done a good deed . . . He knows the English at home and abroad and he is an American of the Americans. He is therefore unusually well equipped to discuss the social usages and national peculiarities of both countries; and he is very direct in doing so."—N. Y. Times.

Price $2.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, Publishers, NEW YORK

A Tower of Strength

THE STRENGTH OF THE BANKERS TRUST COMPANY is founded upon the bedrock of character, experience and great financial resources.

For this reason, the Company has come to be regarded as a tower of strength in the financial community. Many important business concerns are looking to it for the service and co-operation obtainable only from an institution of unquestioned dependability, complete equipment and far-reaching banking connections.

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY
Member Federal Reserve System
New York
Resources
Over Four Hundred Million Dollars

(Continued from page 553)
recourse to deliberate credit restriction.

As to the Treasury, certificate borrowing exposed us, disadvantageously, to the hazards of a floating debt policy. Four months ago I ventured to say:

> Were the prospect encouraging that such floating indebtedness could, in the near future, be either extinguished from surplus revenue or funded upon more advantageous terms than are now obtainable, the wisdom of delay would at best turn upon the question of whether or not such ultimate gains, if realized, more than counterbalanced the present injuries of renewal. But there is no possibility of extinguishing floating indebtedness from out of current surplus, certainly none within the present fiscal year; and the prospect of radical improvement in the investment market is an uncertain chance more congenial to speculative venture than to prudent financial administration.

In this venture, it is now possible to assert definitely, the Treasury has lost. The most recent issue of certificates were placed at 5¼ per cent., with an immediate corresponding reaction upon the market value of all other Government obligations.

These are, then, the conditions which the Treasury faces: Continued adherence to the practice of certificate borrowing with the likelihood of added price inflation, progressive monetary strain and ultimate fiscal inconvenience—or a frank recognition of the facts of the case, and courageous resort to retrenchment, taxation, and funding.

JACOB H. HOLLANDER

Drama

Sothern and Marlowe at the Shubert Theatre

THE performance of "Twelfth Night" was at the same time zestful and mellow; that union was its keynote, the keynote of Miss Marlowe's Viola, which was the heart and mainstay of the presentation. No performance could be more active; action is not only brought out, it is brought in. When Sir Toby expresses his modest intention of living forever, the text gives to the clown the natural retort: "Sir Toby, there you lie." This thrust, purely verbal in Shakespeare, is made the occasion for the lying down of Sir Toby on the stage floor and the clown's use of him as a seat. But, though lavish, the action is hardly extravagant; frolic does not broaden into orgy. The poetry is always there, or, if not actually there in the sorties of burlesque, is no further off than the church from the Clown's dwelling.

The Malvolio of Mr. Sothern is not one of his larger parts. The capers of solemnity are always diverting, and Mr. Sothern extracts plenty of amusement from the grimaces of the puritanical steward. But Shakespeare's Malvolio is not merely puff-ball. He is fatuous, I grant, but not inane; Mr. Sothern's Malvolio is inane as well as fatuous. It is true that in the last scenes, where Malvolio unquestionably rises, Mr. Sothern seeks to rise with him. In the Topas scene he nearly re-creates the part, but there are times when, between his grave and moving utterance, he inserts sounds which may almost be described as whinnies. The effect is intentional, but hardly good. Likewise in his last minute on the stage he is strong, and Malvolio seems about to pluck a dignity from the very mire and pit of his humiliations, when Mr. Sothern reconsiders and restores the old Malvolio by a parting antic. The actor fears lest his Malvolio should not be fatuous enough. His alarm is groundless.

Miss Marlowe has imparted to her Viola a fine originality, a delicate consistency, and a surprising variety of detail and perfection of finish. If her Viola is not precisely Shakespearean, it is exactly in accord with certain hints of Shakespeare's. The dramatist's Viola is a woman, who, while tears for a brother's death still mingle with the sea-spray on her face, can interest herself in the fact that Orsino is a bachelor. That is Miss Marlowe's Viola to the life. Both Violas are combinations of artlessness and sophistication; but in Shakespeare's the groundwork is the artlessness; in Miss Marlowe's it is the sophistication. Here is a very knowing Viola, even a naughty and saucy Viola, though the naughtiness is never madcap and the sauciness is never pert. What is crisp in the common actress becomes mellow in her hands.

For Miss Marlowe the part is almost purely humorous. The sensibility is present as the occasion for the humor. For instance, I had always taken in entire seriousness Viola's two little replies to the Duke: "Of your complexion" and "About your years my lord." In Miss Marlowe they are comic, pleasingly comic. In the duel scene her fright is genuine, but she mocks at her fright nevertheless. In fact, she abounds in that delicious self-mockery which is the only decent apology and atonement human nature can make for the mockery of other people. She can be cooingly innocent, but the innocence itself is comedy; the child in her, like the man, is nothing but apparel. If this infiltration of sensibility into humor obscures the sensibility, it bestows on the humor a rare delicacy and richness. Possibly in this point Miss Marlowe goes a step beyond Shakespeare, but Shakespeare himself, in the whole frame and temper of the comedy, has furnished her with the incentive. The sentiment in the play, the Duke's, Olivia's, even Viola's, if it is not part of the joke, is at all events part of the game. Miss Marlowe's Viola is a beguiling incarnation of this spirit.

Mr. Sothern's Petruchio is best in the never rusts—products exposed to weather, such as window screen, marine equipment, automobile fittings, are not destroyed even by the metal-eating action of sea fog or city smoke.

INCO
Monel metal

The name Monel is given to a line of metal products produced by The International Nickel Company from a natural alloy—67% nickel, 28% copper, and 5% other metals. These products include Monel blocks, Monel rods, Monel castings, Monel sheet, Monel wire, Monel strip stock, etc.

THE INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY
43 Exchange Place, New York

The International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited
Toronto, Ontario

earlier scenes of "The Taming of the Shrew"; Miss Marlowe's Katharina in the later. The scold is hardly imitable by Miss Marlowe. Vixenish indeed, though only in jets and sallies, she can be; but she lacks the hardihood, lacks the constitution, required by the histrionic shrew. She has the effect of reminding herself at intervals that she is a termagant. Her strong work is done in the later scenes, in the element of slyness and playful malice in the reformed Katharina, the indulgence, the mockery, the condescension, which almost put the rough master in the position of a rude schoolboy. There is scope here for that delicate embroidery which is the distinction and attraction of her art.

One finds in Mr. Sothern's Petruchio a fine heartiness and impetuosity. From the first he is a walking riot, but a riot in which the man is seen behind the brawler and the gentleman divined, if not discerned, behind the man. He is happy in the first scene with Katharina, where, making much of her in the abstract, in the third person, so to speak, he ignores, smothers, obliterates her as a partner or opposite in conversation. He surrounds her, both literally and figuratively; there is no egress from his arms or from his volubility. In the later scenes I felt the presence of an excess which I do not clearly recall in the performances of earlier times. Torrential Mr. Sothern is and ought to be; but he is also battering, and I doubt the rightness of the latter trait. The deliciousness and subtlety of the part, its point of difference from the vulgar handling of a common theme, is Petruchio's good-humor toward Katharina, a tempestuous, but still a real, good-humor. Shakespeare himself has not been quite unfaltering in his adhesion to this excellent ideal, and the actor has exaggerated the deviations of Shakespeare.

Mr. Sothern's Hamlet does not grow old; no auditor could fasten on him the words, "He's fat and scant of breath," in which the queen showed herself possessed of an unmotherly, but not unwomanly capacity, for retaliations. He is active, dexterous, and versatile. The part has been studied minutely and intensely; not a comma has escaped the probe. The result is a variegated, a profoundly checkered, Hamlet; the part lightens and darkens, flushes and pales, mellows and roughens, from passage to passage, often from moment to moment. In this he has Shakespeare behind him—behind him in a quite special sense, since this is a point in which he has pursued Shakespeare, overtaken him, and to my feeling passed—I would not say surpassed—the poet. He has even passed beyond his former self.

If an example is wanted, one of the things that went straight to my heart in

(Continued on page 556)

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED

LACKAWANNA

THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

(Continued from page 555)

the earlier personation was the "Except my life, except my life, except my life," in which the monotony of the iteration carried with it the terrible implication that the hatred of life had already become grey and commonplace. Mr. Sothern now makes three points out of these three phrases, and enlarges and enforces the third by the strong measure of flinging himself in a half-recumbent posture upon the steps. The fashion of the act is excellent, but I was more touched by the earlier simplicity. The agility of an actor's mind and frame must find its correlate and limit in the agility of the observer's mind and eye. For my part, I can not feel three ways in three seconds.

This leads to a word on the invented and inserted business in the play. Every actor does, and must, introduce action that is not enjoined by the text, but there is a clear distinction between action that reënforces or fulfills Shakespeare's recorded word, and action that is not only unprescribed, but unsuggested; to underline and interline are distinct processes. For example, Hamlet's affectionate gesture toward Ophelia in Act III, Scene I—by no means peculiar to Mr. Sothern—practically rebuilds or rewrites the entire scene; it turns all Hamlet's brutality into feint and semblance. Again in Act I, Scene II, Hamlet bestows a caress upon the fool whom Mr. Sothern has imposed upon the play for the express purpose of receiving that unauthorized caress. I am of two minds with respect to insertions of this kind; I am confounded by the actor's boldness and am thankful for his mercy. Hamlet on the stage rather daunts and confuses me; I am reduced to a sort of daze by the gyrations of that mercurial and vertiginous young man. This is a mask undoubtedly, but the slits in the mask through which the tender and contemplative Hamlet is descried are too few and too narrow for my comfort. On this point Mr. Sothern feels as I do; he feels, in other words, that the play's Hamlet is much less tender than Shakespeare's. He accordingly injects a little more Shakespeare into the play.

I am a little surprised by the extent of Miss Marlowe's success as Ophelia. Ophelia is of all Shakespeare's characters, with the possible exception of Virgilia, the most inarticulate. Miss Marlowe, on the other hand, is the most articulate of actresses. Articulation means in essence the division of the flow of the voice into significant elements. Taken in a broad sense, this division is the specialty, the virtue, almost the excess and eccentricity, of Miss Marlowe. The final speech in "The Taming of the Shrew" may serve as illustration. It is greatly to her credit that a pencil so exact can be just to a figure like Ophelia's which is half a blur. Even the hardest speech in the rôle, the "O! what a noble mind" (hardest because its savor of official panegyric seems wholly misplaced in Ophelia's mouth) is simplified, is liquefied as it were, with an admirable instinct for congruity. She is happy also in the straying quality of the mad scenes, the quality which binds the scattered fragments together by the very deftness with which it marks their separation.

O. W. FIRKINS

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street | Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.

NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE

Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mrs. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES

Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

Books and the News

Living Expenses

THREE subjects have been on the front pages of the newspapers practically every day since I began to write these book-lists. These are: strikes, the Treaty of Versailles, and the high cost of living. Books have been suggested with reference to the first two of them. Here are some about that subject which is so dreary to all but the political economist, and so urgent with every one of us—living expenses.

A general treatise is J. Laurence Laughlin's "Money and Prices" (Scribner, 1919). Frederick C. Howe's "The High Cost of Living" (Scribner, 1917) and Fabian Franklin's "Cost of Living" (Doubleday, 1915) are specific discussions, as are Walter E. Clark's "The Cost of Living" (McClurg, 1915) and W. Jett Lauck's "Cost of Living and the War" (Doyle & Waltz, 1918).

A few of the books, not so recent in date, are Scott Nearing's "Reducing the Cost of Living" (Jacobs, 1914) and "Financing the Wage-Earner's Family" (Huebsch, 1913), by the same writer, John A. Hobson's "Gold, Prices and Wages" (Doran, 1913), and Harrison H. Brace's "Gold Production and Future Prices" (Bankers' Pub. Co., 1910).

Some later ones are "The Flow of Value" (Century, 1919), by Logan G. McPherson; Irving Fisher's "Why Is the Dollar Shrinking?" (Macmillan, 1915); G. H. Gerber's "The High Cost of Living" (N. Y. Book Co., 1915); Oswald F. Boucke's "Rising Costs of Living" (Banta, 1916); Clyde L. King's "Lower Living Costs in Cities" (Appleton, 1915), and Winifred S. Gibbs's "The Minimum Cost of Living: a Study of Families of Limited Income in New York City" (Macmillan, 1917).

A book upon a related and pertinent topic is Ellen H. Richards's "The Cost of Living as Modified by Sanitary Science" (Wiley, 1910), while a contribution to the belles lettres of this subject, and perhaps a pleasant relief after so many graphs and tables, is "The Art of Living" (Scribner, 1899), by Robert Grant.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

Current Investment Publications

A twenty-eight-page illustrated booklet under the caption "Greater France and Three Cities" (Bordeaux-Lyons-Marseilles) was recently issued by the Guaranty Trust Company, New York. Its pages include a clear and forceful statement of the resources of France and her three southern industrial centres.

"Some Recent Issues of Industrial Preferred Stocks" is the title of a booklet just issued by Dominick & Dominick, members of the New York Stock Exchange, 115 Broadway, New York. The recent preferred stock issues of forty industrial corporations are described and explained. The arrangement of the matter is designed to make easy thorough comparisons between the stocks of the several companies whose issues are included.

"A Trust Company as Transfer Agent and Registrar," a new booklet published by the United States Mortgage & Trust Company, 55 Cedar Street, New York, presents a brief statement of the manifold advantages of such service by a trust company fully qualified and equipped to act. Its appeal is addressed particularly to those organizing new corporations.

"International Investments and their Relations to the Foreign Exchanges," a booklet issued by Brown Brothers & Company, New York, includes the description of a number of bond issues of foreign Governments and municipalities, along with an explanatory foreword. This publication is in the second edition.

Readers of the Review desiring copies of any of the booklets noted in the foregoing should write directly to the issuing house. Copies are free.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 55 New York, Saturday, May 29, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 557
Editorial Articles:
Two Aspects of Mr. Hoover's Candidacy 560
The Wave of Price-Slashing 560
Stock Dividends Again 561
Peace for Hungary 563
The Problem of Palestine. By Edward Bliss Reed 564
The Social Revolution in France. By Raymond Buell 566
A Composing Room Colloquy. By Weare Holbrook 568
A Canadian Ambassador at Washington. By J. K. F. 568
Correspondence 569
Book Reviews:
What to Do About News Juggling 571
Is There a Religious Revival in France? 572
Germany on the Eve of the War 572
Yeast and Phosphorus 573
Minor Dutch Painters 574
The Run of the Shelves 575
Dramatic Art in Holland. By J. L. Walch 577
Books and the News: Motor Trips. By Edmund Lester Pearson 578
Educational Section 579
The Collapse of Japan's After-War Boom. By Charles Hodges 582

TO consider the question of our taking a mandate over Armenia in the light of a financial investment, as Senators Smoot and Borah are reported as doing, is to disgrace the Senate and the country. The desperate plight of Armenia is one which should go straight to our hearts. The great majority of Americans, we are confident, already see, or could easily be made to see, that nothing should be left undone to relieve the distress and to safeguard the rights of this much-tormented people; and he must be a hidebound politician who is not stirred by President Wilson's message to the Senate. If the question could be answered by resorting to the direct impulse of the Senate and the American people, there is little doubt that the President would get a favorable, hearty response. Unfortunately, the problem is not as simple as it might seem, and is precipitated upon the Senate at the tail end of a distracted session, when it is impossible to give to the complexities involved anything like the proper amount of thought. The question of the mandate over Armenia should not be mixed up with party politics, as it is almost sure to be by any hasty discussion at this time.

ARCHBISHOP KHOREN of Armenia, who, prior to the formation of the present Republic, was president of the National Union then ruling the country, says that President Wilson virtually promised the Armenian delegates in Paris that America would take the mandate for Armenia, should such an offer be made. The Armenians are threatened with war and fresh massacres from the Turkish and the Russian side. The Soviet Government of Azerbaijan, therein supported by the Bolshevist commissary of northern Caucasus, has demanded from Armenia the immediate evacuation of the districts of Karabagh and Cangezour, while the Turks are making preparations to attack them from Erzerum. Turk and Bolshevik together will have delimited, in their Asiatic fashion, the frontiers of the new Armenia, we fear, before Mr. Wilson can give effect to his acceptance of the task assigned to him by the Allies. Immediate action is necessary, as otherwise there will soon be no nation left for Mr. Wilson to circumscribe with border lines.

WHEN the House Foreign Affairs Committee asked the Secretary of State to appear before it for the purpose of throwing light on the Irish resolutions it was considering, of which the principal one proposes recognition of the "Irish Republic" and the sending of an American representative to it, the object of the committee was either to get information or to put the President in a hole. In either case, Secretary Colby's letter was an entirely proper answer to the request and to Chairman Porter's letter of inquiry. Anybody that needs information as to the propriety of recognizing the "Irish Republic" is incapable of profiting by it. And of course the State Department, as Mr. Colby says, is in possession of no facts "which should deter your committee from any action which is dictated by good judgment and which it may feel conscientiously impelled to take." If the committee does nothing but what it is "conscientiously impelled" to do, we shall hear nothing more of the resolution. But the "judgment," good or bad, which Congress has exercised on Irish resolutions has related to the political value of a given amount of buncombe, and has had no more to do with conscience than with astronomy.

THE whole batch of heresy-hunting bills, the passage of which, together with the expulsion of the five Socialist Assemblymen, was the principal achievement of the New York Legislature at its recent session, have been vetoed by Governor Smith. This action will redound to his lasting credit, and will doubtless also be of advantage to the Democratic party in the coming election. In the reasons assigned for his vetoes, the Governor hits straight from the shoulder. Concerning the monstrous bill designed to rule the Socialist party off the official ballot, he first points out the fatal objection relating to the proscriptive power which it would vest in a particular court; but he goes on to enunciate the broad principle involved:

> The voters of this State are entitled to the privilege of choosing their own candidates and their own officials and to enunciate their own platforms. No majority should have the right to exclude any minority from its just participation in the functions of government.

Likewise on the school censorship bill he says:

It is unthinkable that in a representative democracy there should be delegated to any body of men the absolute power to prohibit the teaching of any subject of which it may disapprove.

Altogether, Governor Smith makes a clean sweep of the curious mass of intolerance to which—at first under a momentary obsession, and afterwards apparently through obstinacy or fear of seeming inconsistent—the Republican leaders at Albany and the bulk of their followers committed themselves. The State of New York is to be congratulated on having its statute books unstained by legislation of which, before long, we are sure that nearly all of its citizens would have been ashamed.

SENATOR JOHNSON, defending himself from a grievous charge, says that the word radical is one of the "war-torn epithets" that are being "hurled at all who will not bow to arrogant power or exploiting wealth." We are not concerned about the meaning of "radical." It used to mean something fairly definite; now it serves well enough to describe a group of persons violently and vaguely disgruntled. Measured by this test, Senator Johnson easily qualifies for membership in the group. He has the radicals' manner, and manner is everything in these matters; since of any definite body of intellectual doctrine among our strong-feeling American radicals there is no trace.

"WE gave no encouragement whatever to the Polish Government in its offensive and expressed no opinion," said Bonar Law, as the Government's spokesman, in reply to questions asked by members in the House of Commons. The second half of the denial amounts to a refutation of the first, because for the British Government not to express any opinion on the Polish action is equivalent to a silent approval of it. The Poles appear to take it as such, and claim to be doing work deemed necessary by the Entente. And their official spokesmen will cling the more firmly to this cat's paw version of Poland's offensive if, as seems not improbable, the initial victory is gradually turned by subsequent events into a defeat.

FRENCH opinions on the upshot of the conference at Hythe vary greatly, ranging from denunciation of Millerand's alleged outwitting by Lloyd George to eulogies of his diplomatic achievement. The criticism, however, is more insistent and vociferous than the praise. The chief question at issue, the fixing of the amount of reparation to be paid by Germany, is still left pending, as the tentative figure of a hundred and twenty billion marks in gold will be submitted to the opinion of experts, on whose report the definite decision will be based. Nor is there great satisfaction over the arrangement which releases France of the obligation to pay her debt to England in case of Germany's failure to discharge her debt to France.

THE decision taken at Hythe to postpone the Spa Conference until after the German elections gives support to the distrust in the correctness of the statement that the German delegates will not be allowed to discuss the decisions of the Allies. There would be no reason for holding that Conference at all, let alone for postponing it on account of a prospective change of government in Germany, if that country's representatives were to remain without the slightest responsibility for what the Conference should decide. Herr Müller would do just as well as any other German, reactionary, communist, or moderate, who may rise in June to the head of affairs, if his only business at Spa were to receive with a stiff bow and in silence the dictates of the three Premiers.

THE German and neutral press is being supplied by Berlin headquarters with information "from strictly reliable sources," with rumors and hearsays as to the programme which the German delegates at Spa will try to carry through. Retention of Northern Silesia and restitution of part of the mercantile fleet and of some of the German colonies are said to be included in the list. The reliable sources will, no doubt, go on bubbling until the opening of the Conference, bringing up to the surface such a variety of demands as, if granted, would cancel the principal part of the Peace Treaty. The object of this active rumor-floating is obvious: having prepared the public in Germany and neutral countries to expect an impressive array of demands, the German Government will seem, by comparison, extremely moderate when the actual list comes to be presented at the Conference; whereas the Allies can then be decried as being set on ruining innocent and well-meaning Germany, on the evidence of their refusal to grant even the little that was asked.

THE gifted seer who pens the American editorials for the Manchester Guardian sets forth his carefully framed judgment that the recent outlaw railway strike "may be said to mark the definite passing of conservative unionism and to foreshadow the overthrow of Mr. Samuel Gompers." It may be so. We do not profess to know. But we recognize that there ought to be some measure of truth in a saying so venerable and so often repeated. Away back in 1885 it was the invention and property of the Knights of Labor. Later it came into the possession of Daniel De Leon, the head and front of the Socialist Labor party, and from the early nineties onward was used in hard and frequent service. As Partridge, the almanac maker, was wont regularly, over a long period of years, to foredoom

The fate of Louis and the fall of Rome, so De Leon regularly predicted the collapse of trade-unionism and the extinction of Mr. Gompers. The Socialist partyites (most, but not all of them) took up the prediction, the I. W. W. followed, and more lately it has been conscripted to serve under the banners of the New Republic, the Nation, and other journals of that sort. That it has crossed the seas for foreign service is but new proof of its unimpaired robustness. Age can not wither it, nor custom stale its viridity. Malatesta will take it next, Trotsky before long; and after the Bashi-Bazouks have been bolshevized and they begin to look over this way for signs and omens, they, too, will repeat it in the identical form in which it appeared in 1885. In the meantime Mr. Gompers can be found any day at the old stand.

MOST of the big chiefs of Soviet Russia, including Lenin and Zinoviev, contributed to a special Easter publication, for circulation among the faithful, articles on the new labor code. All of them, according to a sympathetic source, explained "the difference between compulsion and disciplined labor in the capitalist state and the same in the Socialist state by saying that in one men were working for employers, and in the latter each man was working for the good of all, including himself." It is an interesting explanation, but one can not help wondering how, among other than the most stupidly credulous, it was received. The argument that each man's toil is for the good of all was quite as serviceable in the Tsar's day as it is in the day of Lenin. And as for the matter of employers, they are increasing in number all the time in Soviet Russia, and should foreign capital accept the tempting offers made, the number will be immeasurably augmented. Prospective employers, officially assured not only of valuable concessions but of a steady supply of compulsory labor, merely await a signal from the Allies in order to begin. The Russian worker of even ordinary intelligence must therefore look at the official explanations with some dubiety. For even if there were no private employers, he knows that forced labor is forced labor, no matter what Lenin calls it. "Disguise thyself as thou wilt," said Sterne in the episode of the starling, "still, Slavery, still thou art a bitter draught." No degree of stupid credulity can long serve to hide its reality.

BELGIUM is showing the same pluck in tying up the broken threads of her industrial life that she displayed in holding to her moral integrity, first against the attempted bribes, and then under the crushing heel, of the invader. The Guaranty Trust Company of New York has compiled some highly gratifying statistics of the rapid progress already made in reconstruction. Although 2,000 kilometers of her railways and 1,800 bridges had been destroyed, and 60,000 cars and 2,500 locomotives had been taken, 80 per cent. of the pre-war number of freight trains were moved during the first quarter of 1920, and 60 per cent. of the pre-war passenger trains. Steel mills reached 40 per cent. of their pre-war production, textile factories 80 per cent., while the woolen mills reached the normal pre-war level. The output of the Belgian coal mines for the entire year 1919 was over 80 per cent. of the 1913 production, while the rate so far for 1920 is above that of 1913. The movement of exports and imports indicates that by the end of the present year Belgium will be free from the necessity of appealing to foreign financial markets for assistance. There can be no jealousy over Belgium's precedence in the pathway of post-war reconstruction; it is thoroughly fitting that she should be first to rise again, as she was first to suffer.

MR. CLINTON SCOLLARD is, needless to say, wholly within his rights in penning "An Epistle to Alexander Pope," which appears in the May Harper's. But he invades others' rights, including Pope's, when he makes such a jingle as this:

> But just a sort of rhyming sham,
> As formal as your Twickenham.

It won't do. The name Twickenham, as is not unknown to the world, is one that gives the word of promise to the eye only to break it to the ear; and no possible twist to its pronunciation can furnish a rhyme for "sham." To Pope himself it was "Twitenham" in prose, or "Twit'nam" in verse. In the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" we have:

> All fly to Twit'nam and in humble strain
> Apply to me to keep them mad or vain.

"Twickenham" is "formal" enough, as Mr. Scollard rightly avers; but it is altogether too formal for the use he has made of it. So we protest. And while we are on this subject we may as well caution Mr. F. P. Adams to look out for one of the contributors to his "Conning Tower" who insists on rhyming "bowie" with Chloe. Of course that will do here in Gotham, where the article is unknown; but in the Great Southwest, where it flourishes (or is flourished), a usage so gross will hardly pass without trouble. Gun play, or even bowie play, has followed less provocation. In no lyric to Chloe, nor yet in any threnody on the death of John Alexander Dowie will the word furnish a serviceable rhyme. But should one want to sing something about Le Grand Monarque, or any of his thirteen predecessors or four successors of that name, then, indeed, he may clinch the word at the line's end as often as he pleases.

THE tentative and fitful appearance of the straw hat in spring—first one in the streets, then a dozen, then none at all if the day proves inclement, and finally, when the weather has declared itself indubitably for summer, a whole sea of jolly, dancing little baskets—is in striking contrast with the sudden and complete disappearance of the same headgear in the autumn. It is a foolish custom that proscribes the straw hat after September fifteenth. The sun has still something of his summer fervor, which he will show on occasion, to the end of the month, and for good St. Martin's sake reserves a taste of his quality even for November. While the leaf clings to the bough, let the straw hat henceforward remain unmolested on the head of him who chooses to exercise his God-given reason and to wear it. Henceforward, whoever lays aside a still wearable hat out of deference to a foolish custom should be held a fool for his pains; and whoever presumes with his more courageous neighbor "greatly to find quarrel in a straw" should be known for an enemy to society. The public is no longer a shackled slave; it has learned its power and has used it. The tyranny of a few Wall Street brokers' clerks, who may be supposed to have been the authors of the by-no-means ancient taboo, should no longer be borne.

Two Aspects of Mr. Hoover's Candidacy

WHEN the candidacy of Mr. Hoover first became a conspicuous subject of national interest, the Review expressed in the strongest possible terms its appreciation of his superb achievements and his splendid character. Those achievements and that character give ample assurance that in everything that pertains to administrative excellence and efficiency Mr. Hoover would be a President whom the country would be most fortunate in having at the head of its affairs. Moreover, the situation of the country at the present time, and also its relations, financial and philanthropic, with the old-world countries struggling up from a condition of unparalleled difficulty and distress, make the exercise of those abilities in which Mr. Hoover so remarkably excels a matter of supreme importance. It is impossible to overestimate the benefits that might flow from his proved skill, his inexhaustible energy, and his coördinating genius in the handling of the great concrete problems which will press upon us in the next four years.

Feeling so strongly as we did—and do—on this great aspect of the question of Mr. Hoover's claims to the Presidency, we nevertheless expressed a doubt relating to another aspect to which we could not shut our eyes. We may be pardoned, perhaps, for reproducing here what we said upon that occasion on this second aspect of the question:

> Whatever other issues there may be in the Presidential campaign, one issue is bound to run through it, whether explicitly formulated or not. We are either going to stand by the fundamental principles of the American political and economic system, or we are going to drift away from them. It may or may not be that Mr. Hoover has profound or well-defined convictions on these principles; it may or may not be that he realizes the essential importance of surrounding himself with men who are devoted to them. We can not afford to be saved by a wonder-worker, or a superman. We want to get the benefit that such a man is capable of conferring on us in a time of great and extraordinary need, but we do not want to purchase those benefits at the sacrifice of the permanent character of our institutions. In a word, we must know what the election of Hoover would mean politically, before we can decide whether he is the man that we ought to have for President.

What leads us to hark back to this is the publication in the newspapers of some extracts from an article by Mr. Hoover which is to appear in the forthcoming July number of System. In this article Mr. Hoover says many things that are both sensible and humane about the relations between labor and capital, and between both and the general public. But he also indulges in some very broad generalities, which perhaps he set down without careful deliberation, but which, coming from a leading candidate for the Presidency, will certainly be taken by the "man in the street" as meaning all they say and probably more. We have in mind especially this passage.

> The problem goes far beyond the mere settling of disputes. I have seen growing out of the masses of people in every country aspirations for a great economic change. That change broadly will be that those who work with their hands will obtain a larger proportion of this world's goods and those who work with their brains will obtain less. Those who do not work will probably obtain nothing.

Now, it is highly probable that those who work with their hands will, in the course of an economic development which is already well under way, obtain a larger proportion, and those who work with their brains, a smaller proportion, of the joint product than has hitherto been the case. And there is no harm in attention being called to this fact. But what does Mr. Hoover mean by saying that "those who do not work will probably obtain nothing"? Does he mean that inheritance is to be abolished? Does he mean that interest on capital is to exist no more? If he does not mean either of these things, it is difficult to see what he does mean; for he could hardly be thinking of the mere triviality that rich men, while in the enjoyment of income from property, should be compelled to work a certain number of hours a day, as contemplated in the childish anti-loafing laws which for a time were a popular fad. The sentence may have been a mere slip, but if so it was a very bad slip, and not the kind of slip that a man would be likely to make who has profound and well-defined convictions on the fundamental principles of our economic and political system.

It is in no spirit of hypercriticism that we dwell on this element of doubt in relation to Mr. Hoover's potentialities. Of all the candidates named he is the only one whose past career gives solid reason for expecting personal achievement of extraordinary character, and of surpassing value to the nation. But precisely because of his strong qualities, and especially of his life-long habit of pursuing to achievement anything he undertakes, any error he may commit in his attitude toward the fundamentals of our political and economic life will be fraught with unbounded possibilities of evil. The influence he has so well deserved by his acts will extend to his opinions. If those opinions are crude or undefined, if his hold on fundamentals is not sure and strong, there is no telling what sacrifice of permanent good may result from his leadership, however admirable it may be in meeting the immediate exigencies of the time.

The Wave of Price-Slashing

THE overalls crusade, of little consequence in itself, has proved to be of great significance as a symbol. Determination to curtail spending has become so widespread as to cause, at least in the case of clothing and similar articles, a general lowering of retail prices. The wave of price-cutting by retailers that has swept over the country is pretty unanimously explained as due in the main to downright necessity, and this necessity has been created by a combination of two factors—the attitude of the consuming public and the attitude of the banks. The restrictions on credit, which had for some months been increasingly put into effect, in pursuance of the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, naturally bore with peculiar force on the situation which confronted dealers stocked with a large supply of goods which they had expected to sell at high-water-mark prices, and which the public refused to buy. Whether the mood of the public would have held out, and in any event gained its point, is matter for conjecture; in point of fact, the merchants were in large measure compelled to convert their stocks into money at reduced prices, for want of any other way of getting necessary funds.

Whether the reduction of prices is permanent, and whether, if so, it will be attended by acute depression and disastrous disturbance of business, is also a matter on which it is impossible to form a confident judgment. No question is more difficult, and no problem is more delicate, than that of the descent from a scale of inflated prices. Rise of prices takes care of itself; it inflicts serious hardships on consumers, but, broadly speaking, it does not result in economic disasters. On the other hand, falling prices may bring about the bankruptcy of many business enterprises and the slowing-up of others, with the result of causing widespread unemployment, which in turn accentuates and extends the depression. It may be that we shall have to go through such a stage; and the problem of banking policy—as tough a problem as it ever has to tackle—is to effect the necessary restraint upon credit so cautiously in point of degree, and so judiciously as regards the particular directions in which it is applied, that the process shall be attended with as little damage as possible.

While reduction of prices is a prime need of the public, it is agreed on all hands that increase of production is an equally fundamental need, both for its own sake and as a means of bringing down prices. If prices had come down through an increase of output of the goods the public needs, the state of things would be comparatively simple. But so far from this having happened, it seems to be the fact that the physical volume of the nation's production is decidedly below normal, and was less last year than the year before. Now a lowering of prices tends, in the first instance—whatever may be the case after a readjustment has been effected all round—to discourage and diminsh production; and this is one of the reasons why in many quarters doubt is expressed as to the remedial efficacy of this particular kind of drive against high prices. But the question, as we have said, is too complex to admit of confident prophecy.

One consideration pertaining to it is of more cheerful augury. Diminished production has been due to a great number of causes—among them strikes, slack labor, disorganization of transportation, etc. But a highly important element in the case is the impairment of capital not through destruction in any ordinary sense, but through failure to keep it up in quantity and character. If, as is usually and probably correctly said, we have been consuming on a magnified scale and yet producing on a diminished scale, how has the consumption been supplied? There would seem to be but one answer—that a large part of the productive activity that should have been devoted to the maintenance or enlargement of capital has been directed towards the supply of immediately consumable commodities. The railroads furnish an example of this on a grand scale; roadbeds have been wearing down, and rolling-stock has become sadly deficient. But the same thing must have gone on in a hundred directions. The building of houses, the making of repairs, the upkeep of machinery and the installation of new machinery—in these and many other things there has doubtless been such deficiency as to affect materially the productive capacity of the country. And the point we have in mind is that if the country is entering upon a long period of genuine thrift, then, whatever may be the momentary consequence of the new departure, its result before very long must be a great increase in productive efficiency. The money which people stop squandering they will not hide away in stockings, but will invest; and that means that the productive energy which has been directed to the satisfaction of wasteful expenditure will be turned to the upbuilding of productive capital. When we add to this the even more direct relief that would come from the reduction of the vast number of persons now engaged in producing luxuries—whether it be automobiles or millinery—and their utilization in production more conducive to the general welfare, we may see in the thrift movement, provided it is a genuine one, the promise of real amelioration of the conditions under which we have been laboring.

Stock Dividends Again

THE stock-dividend tax which is provided for in the bill reported by the House Ways and Means Committee for the purpose of raising money for the proposed bonus, will revive interest in the general question of taxation of stock dividends. When the Supreme Court rendered its decision declaring that stock dividends were not income, and therefore could not be taxed under the Income Tax amendment to the Constitution, we set forth with some fullness the reasons why we regarded that decision as absolutely sound. Doubtless the first impression of many persons on reading of the tax now proposed will be that it is an attempt to nullify the Supreme Court decision, but such is not in any proper sense the case.

The proposed new tax is not a tax upon the individual receiving the stock dividends, but a tax on the corporation for the privilege of dealing with its stock in that particular way. The distinction is not a mere technical subterfuge, but a real distinction. The Federal Government has a right to lay a tax upon any particular kind of corporation action, if in its judgment such tax is called for in the public interest. If a ten per cent. tax on the issuing of stock dividends is desirable from the standpoint of public policy, there does not seem to be any Constitutional bar to its enactment. A stock dividend is of course not income to the corporation, and the proposed taxation of it could not pretend to be an income tax; the proposed tax is an excise tax, not based upon the idea of income at all. To our mind it is equally clear that a stock dividend is not income to the individual receiving it; this is the point that was decided by the Supreme Court. The point that would be raised by the corporation tax now proposed, if it were enacted and came before the Supreme Court for decision, would be wholly unrelated to the question decided in the recent case.

So much for the main principle of the matter. The retroactive feature of the proposal brings up a different order of considerations. Whether Constitutional or not, a retroactive tax of this kind is wrong in principle, besides being open to grave objection from the standpoint of practical business policy. The corporations which declared stock dividends after the Supreme Court had rendered its decision were acting upon a state of facts which they had every reason to regard as absolutely settled so far as concerned any action taken at the time. Any tax laid upon them for action thus taken would be essentially punitive, whether technically so or not; and would therefore be open to all the objection that lies against ex post facto laws in general. The tax upon future dividends would be deterrent, but not punitive; and the question whether it should be levied or not is purely a question of good public policy.

The effect of the issue of a stock dividend is solely that of causing actual money dividends of a given amount to have the appearance of a lower percentage rate than they would otherwise have. A company that has been in the habit of declaring dividends at the rate of eight per cent. a year, for example, issues a stock dividend of fifty per cent., and continues its eight per cent. annual rate. The shareholders will thereafter, as theretofore, receive eight dollars a year on every hundred-dollar share they possess, but this will be equivalent to twelve dollars on every hundred-dollar share that they held before the stock dividend was declared. Their income from the shares will have been increased by fifty per cent., and on this increased income they will be taxed; the mere bits of paper representing the stock dividend, on the other hand, were not to them income at all, and, as the Supreme Court decided, could not be taxed as income. But if Congress desires to discourage this method of concealing from superficial view the advance that has taken place in the rate of return on the original shares, it has a right to do so by taxing the corporation for the privilege. Nor is this a merely legal distinction. The practical difference is that in the one case you break down the Constitutional limitation on the general taxing power of the Federal Government, and in the other case you do not.

The matter of retroactive taxes had come up in a different form in a previous project connected with the bonus. It had been proposed to levy a fresh tax on incomes (though only on that particular part of incomes which is designated as "war profits" or as "excess profits") covering the entire period since the beginning of the war—a tax additional to that which had been paid year by year, as existing law required. The question was accordingly raised, "How long is income income?" Discussing this question, the New York Evening Sun made these pertinent remarks:

> Plainly the receipts or profits of any given year from investment or activity are income during that year. But can they be regarded in any sense as income in the succeeding twelve months? If so, will they be still income in the following year or ten years hence? Conversely, if the gains of 1919 are still income, and those of 1917 are still income, why not those of any year back to 1913, when the income tax first became constitutional? Where is the line to be drawn whereat money received ceases to be income and becomes personal property? . . . If the line is a movable one, subject to relocation at the whim of Congress, plainly nothing any man owns is safe, for it was income at some time, even though that time had been the day of his birth.

While there is doubtless room for argument on the subject, it seems fairly plain to us that only current income can properly be regarded as income for purposes of income taxation. If a law passed in 1933 can not lay a tax upon what was income in 1913 but has since either been spent or become capital, neither can it do so in the case of the income of 1923 or of 1928; there is no difference in principle between the cases. When it comes to the very next preceding year, the case may be regarded as somewhat different, but rather upon the maxim de minimis non curat lex than for any other reason.

This does not offer any obstacle, however, to the taxation as income, in a given year, of gains that may have been accruing for many years but which did not take the shape of income until the current year. It is a more or less disputable question whether the gain which a person makes through the sale of property should be regarded as income or as increment of capital. But if it be regarded as income, as it is under our laws, then it does not matter how long a time that gain has taken in accruing; the whole of it is income, just as much as if it had accrued within one year, or within one month. The gain from year to year in the market value of the property was not income, and was not treated as such; the whole amount of the gain became income, and subject to taxation as such, when it was realized through an actual sale.

There is, however, a further point in connection with this which is of most important practical bearing, and which ought to receive the attention of our lawmakers. While the entire gain realized on a sale, however long the property may have been held, can, so far as the legal aspect of the question is concerned, be regarded as income, yet it is not fair to treat that gain as income for the single year in which the sale is effected. If the income tax were at a horizontal rate, this would be a question of little importance; but with a graded tax it becomes the cause of obvious and avoidable injustice. A person whose usual income is $6,000 a year, say, may sell his entire possessions—the result perhaps of many years of careful management and saving—for the purpose of investing the proceeds in some form desirable as permanent provision for his family and for his own old age. If the gain he realizes on the sale is $100,000, he has to pay a very heavy supertax, a supertax designed, of course, to be borne only by very wealthy persons, persons whose annual income is something like $100,000; in his case the $100,000 is the accumulation of perhaps twenty or thirty years. The tax ought to be reckoned accordingly; the whole amount ought to be taxed, but it ought to be taxed not as $100,000 acquired in one year, but as $5,000 acquired in each of twenty years, or something of the kind. This, however, is a question of equity, not of law; and moreover it is but one example of many imperfections which exist in the law, and which call for remedy by Congress, acting after thorough-going consideration by the most competent experts.

Peace for Hungary

ON the 4th of June the Hungarian delegation will sign the peace treaty in the Grand Trianon Palace at Versailles. The ceremony officially closes a period of nearly four hundred years in which the destinies of Hungary were knit up with those of Austria and the Hapsburg dynasty. It was in 1527 that the Hungarians offered the Crown of St. Stephen to Ferdinand of Austria, brother of Charles V, in order to strengthen their resistance against the Turk. As an outpost of European civilization against the menace of the Asiatic intruder Hungary, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, gained the admiration and gratitude of Europe. But in her present humiliation she shares the fate of her old enemy, with whom she was joined in the mad attack upon Western civilization.

Still, it can not be said that the Supreme Council has been a vindictive tribunal in drafting Hungary's verdict. The territory that she loses is not taken from her as a punishment for her part in the war, but in conformity with the principle of national self-determination which her ill-fated complicity made it possible to put into practice. If the old Hungary had been a country of Hungarians, the new Hungary would not differ from it in size. But as a matter of fact only 55 per cent. of its inhabitants were Hungarians, and ruled the country, before the war, with utter disregard of the rights of other nationalities as guaranteed them by the Hungarian Nationality Law of 1868. By means of later additions, by the partiality of the Magyar law courts, by everyday practice, the spirit of this liberal law evanesced, leaving nothing but the dead letter. Ferdinand of Austria, when taking the Hungarian crown in 1527, had to pledge himself not to destroy the native language: "Nationem et linguam vestram servare non perdere intendimus." For refusing to Rumanians, Slovaks, and Slovenes, that respect for their languages which they claimed from their Hapsburg kings for their own, the Hungarians have now to pay the penalty. By resorting to forcible means in attempting to Magyarize those foreign minorities, they created the very elements of hostility which made for the dissolution of the kingdom.

In tracing the frontiers of the new Hungary the Supreme Council has found it impossible to make the political boundaries coincide everywhere with the ethnic divisions. Islets and peninsulas of Hungarian nationality were thus severed from the compact mass of the nation now forming the population of Hungary. The delegates in Paris protested against this inclusion of Hungarian nationals within neighboring territories in the name of the same principle which released alien minorities from Magyar rule. The Council's reply was not an absolute non possumus. It admitted the possibility of injustices committed, and pointed the way to their rectification by a peaceable procedure of international law. It is this conciliatory attitude that gives the Peace Treaty with Hungary a special significance.

The "lettre d'envoi," which, together with the text of the treaty, M. Millerand, in the name of the Allies, addressed to the Hungarian delegation, referred to the problem of the frontiers in the following terms:

> If the delimitation commissions, in the course of their work, should come to the conclusion that the provisions of the treaty create anywhere an injustice which it is of general interest to eliminate, they have the right to address a report on the subject to the Council of the League of Nations, which, if one of the parties concerned requests it, can offer its services for an amicable rectification of the original frontier line.

But the reduction to a minimum of the friction between Hungary and her former subject races over the tracing of the lines of division is subsidiary to the question how to restrict that division to the political life of the nations, so that economically they may recover part at least of their former unity. In order to promote the resumption of the pre-war exchange of products between the new created, aggrandized, and diminished states, the Council has added a new paragraph to Article 207 of the treaty:

"In order to enable Poland, Rumania, Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Austria to supply one another with the products which, until now, were exchanged between the territories of these States, and which would be indispensable to the production or the commerce of those territories, one or other of these States shall, within six months from the coming into force of the present treaty, open negotiations with a view to concluding separate conventions with one or other of its neighbors." . . . If the negotiations, within six months, have not led to tangible results, the State which has taken the initiative "may address itself to the reparations committee and request it to expedite their conclusion."

In one instance the Supreme Council has not left it to the initiative of the States themselves to create a beginning, or rather a resumption, of cooperation for their common interest:

> Considering the vital importance, for the basin of the middle Danube, of the maintenance, in general outline, of the existing régime of the river, the Allied and Associated Powers have inserted a new Article 293 in the treaty, under which a Commission for the middle Danube is instituted, composed of a representative of each of the States concerned and of a president appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

Thus the treaty which codifies the division of the old Hungary supplies, at the same time, the means of obviating the evil effects which that division would otherwise have on the international situation of Southeast Europe. Self-interest may induce the nations which it concerns to make use of those means, though racial animosities should throw obstacles in the way towards a rapprochement. The Great Powers can do no more than help and advise them in clearing the road. Whether they shall follow it to their common goal rests with the nations themselves.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

The Problem of Palestine

THE Supreme Council at San Remo has made Great Britain the mandatory over the Holy Land, writing into its mandate the Balfour declaration that in Palestine shall be established a national home for the Jewish peoples without prejudicing the civil or religious rights of non-Jewish communities, that is, of nine-tenths of the present population. The Zionists announce that Great Britain has given them every assurance that within a few weeks army rule, "which has been far from satisfactory to the Jews, will be changed to a sympathetic civil rule." From now on, to quote the Zionist propaganda, the work of Zionism is to prepare Palestine for the vast migration that will ensue of the hundreds of thousands of Jews now waiting at Odessa, Constantinople, Constanza, and Vladivostok for passage to their new home, and for the much greater number that will come eventually.

The signing of the peace treaty at Versailles did not put an end to the censorship, for it did not put an end to war. Little or no news comes from the Near East, yet brief cables from Palestine have hinted at a strange prelude to the establishment of the Jewish national home which, in the words of Rabbi Wise, is to translate into life the Jewish dream of brotherhood. Evidently the non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine fear that they are to be the younger brother to whom falls but a slender portion of the inheritance—or none at all. On February 27, Moslems and Christians marched through the streets of Jerusalem in formal protest against the Zionist demands and handed their remonstrance to the British authorities and to the consuls of other nations represented at the Holy City. To one at all familiar with the Near East, the united action of members of these two faiths is of extraordinary significance. On the same day there was an anti-Zionist demonstration at Bethlehem. On March 8 Jerusalem saw a much more important demonstration, representing not merely the capital of Palestine, but the surrounding communities and towns. Led by the Mayor of Jerusalem, accompanied by Arif Pasha, President of the Islamo-Christian Association, by ex-deputy Said Effendi al Husseini and many other notables, the procession marched to the Military Governate, the consulates of Italy, France, and America, and renewed the protests of Palestine, for which they claimed to speak, against the Zionist plan to dominate the country. When the procession broke up at the Joppa Gate, many of the Christians proceeded to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and there took oath to defend their country against the Zionists. This same day, at Haifa, the future port of Palestine, there was a similar anti-Zionist demonstration. On Easter Sunday came the first bloodshed; fighting between Jews and Arabs was carried on for nearly three days, and, if newspaper accounts are to be trusted, five Jews and four Arabs were killed, while twenty-four Arabs and more than two hundred Jews were wounded. Martial law, with machine guns and aeroplanes, finally restored order. Not for many years have there been anti-Jewish outbreaks in Palestine.

The cause of demonstration and rioting can be understood only when the plans and actions of the Zionists are comprehended. It is unfortunate in the highest degree that so many Americans know little or nothing concerning them. Only a year ago, Mr. Norman Hapgood wrote in a Zionist monthly, "I have seen no request to the Powers for special favors to the Jewish population," and the general public is similarly ill informed. In the first place, it is of the utmost importance to understand that Zionism desires in Palestine more than a place of refuge for oppressed Jews. The Jews that emigrate there will not go in the same spirit in which thousands of Europeans have sought our shores. They do not wish merely to aid in the development of Palestine; they desire to control its development, to change an Arab country into a Jewish State. Feisal, the foremost Arab leader, proposed last fall a regulated Jewish immigration to Palestine where Jews should have equal rights with Arabs, taking part in the government in proportion to their population, and where they should have full control of Jewish schools and the means to establish a Jewish cultural centre. To quote his own sensible words, "We naturally should prefer an immigration of Jews to that of any other people, not only because Jews have vast resources by which the land can be developed, but because they are Semites like ourselves." In an Arab country he would have Zionists assured of "equal rights, equal opportunities, and an absolute non-differentiation between Arab and Jew." But Zionists do not wish equality of privilege for Christian, Arab, and Jew such as we should offer in America. They wish to establish not a Palestinian, but a Jewish State, that is, a government dominated by members of but one faith. In his "Zionism and the Future of Palestine," a book which deserves the widest circulation, Professor Morris Jastrow, Jr., has given a clear and convincing study of the fallacies and dangers of political Zionism. He points out the fact that a Jewish State inevitably sets up a barrier, whether we express it in terms of religion or of nationality. "As a writer pithily puts it, 'if it be Jewish, it can not be a State; if it be a State, it can not be Jewish.'" There is then a religious injustice in the Zionist State which would never be tolerated in our own land and which stirs Palestine deeply.

To this idea of a State, in conflict with modern liberal thought, there must be added the economic injustice of Zionism. Balfour's "National Jewish Home" is an ambiguous phrase, yet the Zionists have given it a very exact interpretation. To them it means but one thing—an autonomous Jewish State. Palestine is an important organ of English Zionists. The longest article in its issue for March 13 is a reprint from the Manchester Guardian of a letter from a Zionist in the Holy Land. No exception is taken to any of its statements and it may be considered as representing Zionist opinion when it discusses the "minimum requirements" to be made of Great Britain. To cite one of the first, for the next few years the goal of a Jewish Palestine and of an autonomous commonwealth must be steadily before the eyes of the mandatory and its servants and "direct their course." In general it has been assumed that a mandatory Power would govern a country impartially; the "sympathetic" British administration is to work for one goal, the autonomous Jewish State.

Among the first two or three world leaders of Zionism is Dr. Weizmann, the head of the English Zionists. At the recent extraordinary convention of the Zionist Organization of America, held in New York, Professor Felix Frankfurter of Harvard, one of the most prominent American Zionists, presented a resolution of gratitude to Dr. Weizmann for his leadership. Endorsed by Americans, he speaks with authority, and he has recently declared that the autonomous Jewish State is a possibility in ten years. This is no hasty judgment, for to quote a Zionist journal, Dr. Weizmann "has been able to make his calculations with the aid of experts on the spot, after paying full consideration to all the manifold factors involved."

Let us double Dr. Weizmann's estimate. For twenty years, under the watchful eye of Zionism, Britain is to prepare the coming of the Jewish State, and the Zionists themselves have indicated some of the practical steps to that end which the mandatory should take. Through extortion and robbery of the natives, a large part of Palestine came into the possession of the Turkish Crown. Among these Crown lands, for example, are a part of the fertile plain of Esdrælon, a large section of the Ghôr, the broad plain of the Jordan about Jericho, and a wide region near Beersheba. If the mandatory is to throw open these lands, as Indian lands in America were awarded to settlers, naturally the non-Jewish Palestinians wish a large part of them; yet to cite again the letter in Palestine, Zionism requires "a preference in the settlement of the waste and dead lands and of the State domains," that is, these Turkish Crown lands. Palestinians, then, may receive only what the Zionists do not want. Similarly, in the construction of all manner of public works, greatly needed in Palestine, "preference shall be given to a public utility organization representing the Jewish people and the Jewish Palestine."

One of the most important questions before the country is the proper method of developing its natural resources. Oil has been found in the region of the Dead Sea, whose very waters are rich in potassium; systems of irrigation must be installed throughout the country; and the swift-rolling Jordan must be made to furnish electricity to run factories and illuminate the land. Whether non-Zionists may direct any of these projects must depend entirely on the pleasure of Zionism, if its demands, formally presented to the Peace Conference, have been granted. These demands, typical of others, required for Zionists "priority in any concession for public works or the development of the natural resources of Palestine." "Preference" and "priority" have a better sound than "monopoly."

To sum up these "minimum requirements," while Great Britain is the mandatory, Zionists should have priority on waste lands, on State lands, in the construction of all public works, in any concession for public works, or the development of natural resources. For a beginning, this should help. Within a few years it will be more simple, for when Great Britain has finished its work of preparation for the new State and turned the country over to its new rulers, Zionism has but to say, "L'Etat, c'est moi."

If educated Palestinians who realize the scope of these demands have protested indignantly against them, the ignorant, illiterate fellahîn can readily perceive that the Zionist State will work them injustice. For example, Zionists will naturally undertake all manner of private and public works, yet on these works organized Jewish labor in Palestine has declared that only Hebrews shall be employed. In America, this would be called a State boycott on Arab labor. On the other hand, during the interim of the British mandate, the letter reprinted in Palestine would require in any public works undertaken by the mandatory an "adequate employment of Jews in constructing and operating them."

Even before Great Britain obtained the mandate, Palestinians of all classes, educated and uneducated, well-to-do or poor, have been irritated at seeing the Zionists display a flag they had made with the simple explanation that it is to be the flag of their country. They hear the "Hatikvoh" and are informed that the Hebrew words and music are to be their country's national anthem. They hear a Palestinian Zionist object to a "mixed" school at Haifa, a public school in the American sense of the word, where Jews, Moslems, and Christians would be on an equality, on the ground that a school for Zionists must be Hebrew in spirit as well as in language. They see Professor Geddes brought from Scotland by Zionists with a "commission" to draw plans for the reconstruction of Jerusalem, a city in which the Jews are in the minority, and they learn that similar plans are being prepared for the development of Jaffa, Haifa, and other places. They wonder whether they are to be heard at all, whether they are even to be consulted on the questions of reconstruction and government of the land they possess. They should not wonder. Aliens, chiefly Russians, Poles, and Rumanians, are to come in and possess the land through "preferences" and "priorities" denied Palestinians whose families have lived and worked in the land for generations. Comprehending this part of the Zionist programme, Palestinians believe they can see what will be their fate when Great Britain withdraws entirely and Zionism is in full control.

The military rule in Palestine is to be replaced at once by a civil administration. General Bols, Chief of Staff in Allenby's Palestine campaign, is at the present moment Chief Administrator for Palestine. The Arab newspaper, Meraat-Al-Shark, published at Jerusalem, gives a careful statement from General Bols representing the policy of the British military authorities. In this, General Bols states that the Entente Powers, with America and France at their head, had approved the Balfour declaration. England will organize the Zionist immigration within limits and certain conditions in order that this immigraton shall not injure the economic stability of the country. General Bols had been informed by Dr. Weizmann that the Zionists would not send any Jewish immigrants unless they were workmen, professional men, or persons of means who would not be a burden on the inhabitants of the country. The British Government will protect the ground of the fellahîn, not allowing any man to sell his land unless it is necessary; it will control the country justly and will guard the rights of the weak. The Entente Powers have no intention of founding a Jewish Government in the country. Its inhabitants will rule themselves, statutes will be drawn up by an assembly chosen by a majority vote of the people, and guarantees will be given for the rights of the inhabitants, who will be prepared for self-government. As for the Crown Lands, a commission will examine the whole question, especially the claims of the fellahîn from whom much of the land had been taken unjustly. General Bols concluded, "The inhabitants may be assured that the Government is well-intentioned towards them and holds only the scales of justice in its hands." From an American or British point of view, this would seem an excellent statement; the idea of even-handed justice agrees with the best traditions of both countries. To the Zionists, however, this military administration has been "far from satisfactory."

"The Balfour declaration," said Rabbi Wise, "is only a scrap of paper, but it is written in English." Unfortunately its English must be very ambiguous. Friends of Palestine may be permitted to hope that its phrase "the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities" is perfectly clear and that it will be given its natural interpretation of no discrimination in favor of any race or creed. In that case, all "privileges" and "priority" claims of the Zionists must be disregarded; yet even so, Palestine, properly organized and developed, can become a home land for scores of thousands of Jewish immigrants who will inevitably rise to leadership if they prove to be the most capable element in the country. On the other hand, if a "sympathetic" civil administration follows even such "minimum" requirements as I have cited, the rights of the majority of Palestinians will not merely be prejudiced but trampled upon. America has a great responsibility in this matter, inasmuch as eight-tenths of the Zionist funds raised last year came from this country; and Zionists have stated that America will have to supply most of the funds until the new State is functioning, that is, for the next decade at least. Public opinion should support the enforcement of the one clause in the Balfour declaration that promises security to the great majority of Palestinians who are not Zionists; otherwise, the riots in Jerusalem will prove to have been the few scattered drops that foretell the approaching storm, a storm that may possibly sweep more than the Near East.

EDWARD BLISS REED

The Social Revolution in France

THE increasing number of strikes in France and the equally increasing vociferousness of the radical movement in the ranks both of the Socialist party and of the General Confederation of Labor, have naturally aroused serious apprehension as to the permanence of the French social order. In fact, this destructive devolution has been the outstanding feature of French political life since the armistice. During the war, the Unified Socialist party gradually changed from a loyal support of the Government to an acrid denunciation of Allied "imperialism." In a national Congress held at Easter, 1919, the party renounced all participation in a "bourgeois" Ministry and refused to vote credits for the support of any but a Labor Government. For the time being, however, it decided to maintain its membership in the old or Second Internationale. The November elections came, and when the ballots had been counted, it was found that the Socialist representation in the Chamber of Deputies had been reduced from 104 to 68. They were reconciled, however, by the fact that they had polled a vote of 1,700,000—300,000 more than in 1914. The new electoral law, combining the bad features of the old majority system and of proportional representation, had neutralized these additional votes. A significant result of this defeat was that it intensified the efforts of French Labor to secure their ends by "direct action" instead of by political means. As they were still in a hopeless minority and as the electoral laws worked against them, they believed that the ballot box offered but little hope. Hence they redoubled their strike activities.

The party took the next step towards the left at the Strassburg Congress (February, 1920), where it decided to withdraw from the Second Internationale (to which it had proclaimed a conditional adherence at its Easter convention), and to enter negotiations for membership in the Third Internationale, created by the Bolsheviki at Moscow. Thus the party completed the labored process through which it had passed from a patriotic support of the French Government in its resistance to German aggression to an almost complete association with Bolshevist programmes and sympathies.

Within the ranks of the Confédération Générale du Travail the same devolution has been apparent. For this organization had also rallied to the support of the war. Léon Jouhaux, its secretary-general, had served on various war committees, and was appointed as a labor delegate to the French Peace Commission. But despite the patriotism of the leaders of the C.G.T., a small group, headed by Pierre Monatte, carried on an insistent propaganda, until the revolutionaries within the organization were on the way to victory by the first of May, 1919. As a result of the tactics employed by the Government to suppress the labor manifestations in Paris at that time, M. Jouhaux, with an outburst of invective against M. Clemenceau, resigned from the French Peace Delegation. With his resignation the truce between organized labor and the Government was terminated and the old-time warfare resumed.

The General Confederation of Labor illustrated the complete desertion of its past policy of restricting its activities to economic purposes by the programme it enunciated—before the labor demonstrations of May 1, 1920. This programme called for (1) the nationalization of public services and mines, (2) the right to organize for Government employees, (3) disarmament, (4) withdrawal of troops from the right bank of the Rhine, (5) the discontinuance of colonial expeditions, (6) the demobilization of the Class of 1918.

May Day, 1920, began an attempt to institute another general strike in an effort to secure these ends. The railway men did not return to work upon the 2nd of May. On the 5th the C.G.T. ordered the miners to stop work; shortly afterwards, the dockers, transport workers, the electricians, and gas workers were also ordered out. Thus the C.G.T. had embarked on a vast programme to enforce its demands for nationalization by direct action. It seemed that it was upon the point of tying up the very arteries of French industry and of even placing Paris in utter darkness. Must France fall into the hands of Labor? Must it succumb to this "peaceful" yet overpowering revolution, which threatened the very fundamentals of existing society? These questions the Millerand Government was compelled to answer.

France is not afraid of the issue of nationalization; in fact, it was the first Clemenceau Government (1906-09) which nationalized the Western line. France is not afraid of collective ownership, as the match, the tobacco, and the munitions industries show. But the real issue which is now being fought out is whether or not an organization comprising but a small minority of the population shall depart from the ordinary parliamentary means of securing political reforms, and force its demands upon the country by the strangle-hold of direct action and the general strike. This is the issue, and in seriousness it constitutes the very trial of parliamentary government.

However, the misgivings as to the stability of the French social order, because of the destructive aims and the great strength of the French Labor movement, are apt to be exaggerated by public opinion. It is true that the Socialist party had an active membership of 57,159 in 1919. But when one recalls that in 1912 the party had 63,000 members and that in 1870 the International Workingmen's Association in Paris alone had a membership of between 70,000 and 80,000, the present strength of the Socialist party is by no means appalling. And who is there who will say that the present situation equals in seriousness the Wine Revolt of 1907?

Secondly, the apparent growth in strength of the Socialist party, as measured in votes—an increase from 1,000,000 in 1906 to 1,700,000 in 1919—can be explained by the comparatively recent rapprochement of Socialism and Syndicalism. Although both of these movements have the same ultimate end, they differ radically as to the means by which the Marxian order is to be ushered in. The Socialist party looks upon the political conquest of Parliament as the natural means of inaugurating a Socialist state; and it considers a parliament an essential component of its conception of the new order. The Syndicalists (represented by the C.G.T.), on the other hand, insist on direct action as the only means strong enough to win the demands of Labor. The leaders in control of the C.G.T., just before the war, also limited their activities to improving the lot of Labor, and paid little attention to the political reforms the Socialist party in Parliament was endeavoring to institute. But as a result of the growth of radicalism within the ranks of the C.G.T. during the armistice, thousands of laboring men awakened to the political demands which the Socialist party was making. And when the November elections came, these men cast their votes almost solidly for Socialist candidates. Thus the increase in Socialist votes is not absolute—it does not necessarily represent the growth of radical sentiment in France; it merely means that the C.G.T., composed of thousands of workingmen who hitherto remained aloof from elections, is now combining forces with the Socialist party. The efforts of the latter party to secure the Eight-Hour Day law has increased its standing with the C.G.T.; and the Socialist failure at the November elections has also increased the reasons for them to adopt the C.G.T.'s "strike theory."

Thirdly, the very size of the C.G.T. is diminishing the imminence of a social revolution. During the spring of 1919 a great "syndicalist" movement swept over France, engulfing every social class (except the peasants) from college professor to choir singer. This movement was caused largely by the problem of la vie chère. Violating the terms of the Organization law of 1884, which prevented the organization of labor unions by Government employees, the National Association of Functionaries, as well as nearly every subordinate "amicale" of Government employees, joined the C.G.T., in order to give strength to the demand for increased salaries. Even the journalists and the dramatic artists followed suit. This astonishing movement among typically bourgeois classes increased the membership of the General Confederation of Labor from 600,000 to the tremendous figure (according to some estimates) of 2,000,000. The presence of these moderate elements in the C.G.T. has prevented the success of the "political" strikes. The bourgeois membership of the C.G.T. is wholly out of sympathy with the principles of "proletariat dictatorship." It has nothing but disgust and horror for the experiences of Bolshevism. It looks upon any movement to enact such a régime in France with the greatest apprehension. Consequently, its participation in the C.G.T. will only be for "corporative" purposes.

Fourthly, the very character of the workingman is bringing about the failure of the general strike.

This is shown by the fact that only a fraction (from 20 per cent. to 50 per cent.) of the men obeyed the strike order, that many soon returned to work, and that the industries continued to function. Labor does not intend to suffer the losses inevitably attendant upon strikes for the mere conquest of certain political ideas. The cost is too much. During the strike period which started in June, 1919, the metal workers lost 125 million francs in wages, the transport workers, 58,500,000, the miners 58,500,000, and the chemical workers 29,000,000. To justify such a sacrifice, some definite economic gain from a strike must accrue. In fact, the very materialism of Marxian doctrines precludes martyrdom for vague ideals. The efforts of the C.G.T. have proved that direct action has its obvious limits—namely, to secure strictly economic and corporative ends—and that parliamentary and constitutional processes must be relied upon for the achievement of purely political reforms.

Finally, the Government is approaching the situation with a highminded conception of its duty towards the nation. A National Labor Council has been established, with equal representations upon it of Capital and Labor. A bill has been introduced to compel profit sharing. A still more important measure is the Bill for the Settlement of Labor Disputes, which M. Jourdain, Minister of Labor, introduced into the Chamber in March, 1920. It provides not only for voluntary conciliation in all industries, but for compulsory arbitration and the prohibition of all strikes, before the arbitral decision is arrived at, in the following industries upon which the life and health of the nation depend: (1) means of transportation, (2) gas and electricity works, (3) coal mines, water and power plants, (4) hospitals, (5) in towns over 25,000 inhabitants, funeral establishments and industries involving the public health. In the event that a strike illegally occurs in any of these industries, the Government may requisition the plant and personnel, and impose severe penalties.

Although it may be impossible to enforce compulsory arbitration upon French Labor now, especially as long as employers persist in violating the Eight-Hour Day and other labor laws, the Millerand Government seems to be on the way to a solution of the country's pressing industrial problems.

RAYMOND BUELL

A Composing Room Colloquy

"GERALD!" she cried, suddenly freeing herself from his embrace. "It's my husband—Heaven help you! Quickly—over the garden wall, before he sees! Oh—"

A shot rang out in the darkness. He felt a screaming pain under his arm as he sank to the ground. Vaguely he could see forms above him swaying like weeds under water. He felt tired . . . very tired. What did it matter? What did anything matter, for that matter? He had lived . . . He had loved . . .

FINIS

"You notice I always get in whenever there's any excitement going on," remarked Em Dash complacently.

"Yes," replied Dottie, "but I usually get the ultimate word . . . "

"You have spread yourself considerably in the last few years," Em admitted. "Don't you think there's danger of your being overdone?"

"By the vers libre crowd, you mean?"

"Yes, and by the British novelists, too; especially those realists."

"Well, why not? You were all the rage once, Dash, old dear. Remember 'Tristram Shandy,' for instance. And as for poetry, Browning gave you a stiffer work-out than Amy Lowell has ever given me . . . so far. Think of the famous dashes in history: Peary's dash to the North Pole, Cook's hyphen in the same direction, Bryan's dash for—"

"Pardon me," Em interrupted, "but Bryan is yours; he belongs in the Province of Three Stops. The trouble with you is this: you're too—indefinite. Punctuation should be obvious, open, and aboveboard. Now, I can tell you just what I stand for, whether it's a sob, a gasp, a sudden change in thought, or just an ordinary interruption."

"So can I. I stand for . . . I stand for . . . " Dottie hesitated.

"See!" cried Em triumphantly. "You don't know—you can't tell me."

"That's just it," Dottie explained. "I define myself by my inability to define myself. I'm a caesura, a void, a suspended utterance, an adjournment of ideas. I'm the three walnut shells . . . and I defy you to find the pea. I'm the original little je ne sais quoi."

"Humph! come to think of it, you are French. You used to be a gay young thing in your buff-cover days, too. But as soon as you crossed the Channel you began to act like a regular prude. You eternally butted in at the most interesting moments, you covered a multitude of sins with the same old pattern, until people knew just what was going to happen as soon as they saw you coming. And gradually they lost interest in you."

"Ah," Dottie murmured fondly, "the days of the asterisqué! . . . but I had to concede to Mudie's sooner or later. And don't forget George Moore. He goes on using me as if I were quite as devilish as ever, and look at the prices he gets for his books."

"You simple little constellation," said Em with contempt, "you don't imagine that George uses you for your devilishness, do you? He three-dots simply to give a moral tone to his work. Besides, you are not only restful to the eye, but to the mind—particularly the mind of the writer. In the last twenty years your character has changed completely, and I believe you don't realize it. Why, do you know where I saw you the other day?"

"Where?" asked Dottie.

"You'd never guess." Em looked at her scornfully. "I saw you in the Congressional Record! I think you were supposed to indicate applause."

WEARE HOLBROOK

A Canadian Ambassador at Washington

SIR ROBERT BORDEN has at last returned to Ottawa, has appeared in the House of Commons, and, what is more important, has delivered a speech. Some people were unkind enough to suggest that he had been simply suffering from a "diplomatic indisposition"; but his appearance in the House, and especially his delivery, would indicate to even the least observant that Sir Robert had been overtaxed. The occasion, however, was not a propitious one. The question was regarding the course taken by the Government in connection with the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington.

Sir Robert's defense of the Government's course in the matter amounts to this: "I have seen the official correspondence, the proposals and the decisions of the British and the American representatives regarding Canada's future relations with the United States; it is indelicate and undiplomatic on the part of the representatives of the Canadian people to ask for any further information." When the vote was taken, the Government, which has a normal majority of between thirty-five and forty, escaped defeat by the small majority of five. The attitude of the Opposition reflected the disinclination of the Canadians to become "delicate" and "diplomatic."

Canada's relations, commercial and other, with the United States are so intimate that it is high time that communications between the Governments at Ottawa and at Washington should be direct. The roundabout way of having all matters of interest to the two countries pass through the channel of the British Embassy at the American capital savors too much of old-time colonialism to suit the spirit and the needs of the twentieth century. Moreover, Canada's experience of British paternalism in the case of negotiations between the Dominion and the American Republic have not been of the happiest. Hence the members of the Canadian House of Commons felt that they should be taken more fully into the confidence of the Government and given some slight inkling of the proposed status of the intended Canadian Ambassador to Washington. The debate closed without the people of Canada being a whit the wiser on the subject.

It does appear, however, that this new official of the Canadian Government will be endowed with special and extraordinary prerogatives. For example, while he is to have charge of all matters that affect Canada alone (in the Dominion's relations with the United States), he will also replace the British Ambassador at Washington, should the latter be ill, or absent, or in any way unable to perform the duties of his high office. At first blush this would seem to be a promotion for the Canadian representative and a mark of British confidence in Canada. But it may prove to be a very questionable distinction, and one fraught with incalculable complications and dangers. Suppose, for example, that during the absence of the British Ambassador a question arises in which the interests of England and those of Canada are in conflict; will the Canadian representative be expected to face the matter from the British or from the Canadian point of view? Let us suppose the case of the British Ambassador being recalled by his home Government; will the Canadian representative, who takes up his duties for him, be supposed to continue his policy, or to inaugurate another more in accord with the views of the British Government? If so, what becomes of Canada and her special interests?

In a word, there is absolutely no objection on the part of Canadian people to the appointment of a representative, with plenipotentiary powers, at Washington; quite the contrary, the closer the relations between the Dominion and the American Republic the better for both countries. But the possibility of British responsibility falling, even temporarily, on the shoulders of a purely Canadian official arouses a question in many minds; a question complicated by the danger of Cabinet authority (through secret diplomacy) challenging the supremacy of Parliament and heedless of the voice of the people. There is ground for hope, however, that in practice these difficulties will not arise to block the forward movement along the highway of Canadian national developments.

J. K. F.

Ottawa, Canada, May 18

Correspondence

The Lodge Reservations

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your number of May 15 I find this statement: "Mr. Taft, in his usual quiet manner, states the cardinal facts about the treaty as they stand":

> The Lodge reservations leave the treaty nearly as effective as without them. The reservations affect only Article X. . . .
> The Lodge reservations preserve the three great things in the treaty: first the limitation of armaments . . . . Article X is not destroyed but only limited by the reservations. The obligation of the United States to participate in international crises is left to the discretion of Congress.
> All the other countries in the League are bound by Article X.

This statement may be lucid, but is it not misleading?

The Peace Commissioners went to Paris in order to make a lasting peace, which should make future war as nearly impossible as the weakness of human nature permits, and should at least protect the world against further attacks by Germany.

These objects could only be accomplished by an agreement between all nations to combine against any one which should commence war, and to use both military force (Art. 10) and economic pressure (Art. 16) to control the offender. France gave up terms which she thought essential to her protection because she felt that the League of Nations and the separate treaties with England and the United States by which they promised to defend her were protection enough.

Now the United States refuses to sign the separate treaty, and also refuses to join the other nations in the agreement to use any force against a nation which breaks the peace, and insists on being left entirely free to do as it pleases in any emergency, precisely the position which it would occupy if there were no treaty. If I agree, in writing, to sell you a horse on condition that you agree to pay me the price, and you modify it by reserving the right to pay or not as you please, is such a reservation properly described by saying that the contract "is not destroyed but only limited by the reservation?"

Is it not true that the reservations also destroy any obligation under Article 16?

Does any one suppose that France will disband her army in the face of Germany's present attitude, or that England will do the same with her navy, while the Senate of the United States uses its influence in favor of Irish secession? Will either nation feel disposed to rely on our help instead of its own arms, trusting that Congress may disregard the votes of Sinn Feiners, German sympathizers, and all the other opponents of war especially in aid of England or France, which this country contains?

Mr. Taft may say very lucidly that the Lodge reservations preserve "the limitations of armaments," but is it not clear that, without a binding league, disarmament is impossible? If we will put ourselves in the place of the French, we should never dream of leaving our country at the mercy of Germany, and if France does not disarm, no country will.

MOORFIELD STOREY

Boston, Mass., May 18

Party Membership and the Vote

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The practice of associating in its organization those unqualified to vote is not confined to the Socialist Party. In every Southern State the qualifications for voting in the general elections are quite distinct from the qualifications for voting in the primaries. For example, my native State, South Carolina, under its present Constitution (1895), requires that the voter shall be able to read and write, or that he pay taxes on three hundred dollars' worth of property; the Democratic Party—the only party active—requires nothing more than a very rigid oath to support the nominees of the party. The result is that in the Democratic Primary 140,000 men vote; whereas in the general election the combined vote of all parties never exceeds 60,000. I suggest that our legislators consult that section of the country least subject to the extremes of the passing hour before passing legislation restricting party membership.

F. B. SIMKINS

New York, May 25

"Two Plans For a National Budget"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

While, in the main, I agree with the excellent article "Two Plans for a National Budget" in your issue of May 15, by Mr. Ralston Hayden, I want to call your attention to what seems to me a serious defect in his reasoning in respect to the advantage of making "the Secretary of the Treasury the initial point of administrative articulation," by putting the budget bureau in the Department of the Treasury. He himself gives the best reason why this should not be done. The budget officer would be "aut Cæsar aut nihil," and it is because the Constitution has already established a Cæsar in Washington and that Cæsar the President, that I approve of the plan of the Good bill. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" is a rule which Mr. Hayden himself can not escape, since he says that, so far as the formulation of the budget is concerned, "it is the President who is ultimately responsible." The weakness of the McCormick bill is that it makes the President responsible without giving him the means to carry that responsibility. For if he is to decide wisely between the conflicting claims of his own Cabinet officers, he must have some means of ascertaining for himself the facts upon which he is to decide. According to the McCormick plan, however, to settle a dispute between the Secretary of the Treasury as budget officer and the Secretary of War the President must depend on information gathered by one of the parties to the contest—the Secretary of the Treasury—and has no means of instituting an independent investigation.

Under the McCormick bill the budget comes into the Cabinet as the proposal of one of the Cabinet officers; under the Good bill it comes before the Cabinet as the proposal of the President; and the jealousy which is certain to arise among other members of the President's official family by the interference by one member of that family in the affairs of the other, will be avoided.

Ex-President Taft agrees with Mr. Hayden that in the preparation of the budget it is "aut Cæsar aut nihil":

> . . . If you intend to have exercised the power of pruning down the estimates of the various departments, so as to create a budget that will be economical, you have got to give the necessary power to the person who does it or put that function into the hands of the man who has as much prestige and power as there is in the Government, and that is the President of the United States." [Hearings before the Select Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives on the Establishment of a National Budget System, 66th Cong., 1st sess., Sept.-Oct., 1919.—Statement of Hon. William H. Taft, pp. 464-470, on p. 468.]

The suggestion that the McCormick bill "conforms to the practice of almost every other nation" in this respect is met by the author's own answer to the proposal that the Congress, like the British Parliament, should not be permitted to increase estimates. In one instance, as in the other, such a system "is workable only as part of the parliamentary system," and the precedent of the British parliamentary system is no more applicable in one case than in the other. I agree entirely with Mr. Hayden in his opinion in respect to limiting the power of the Legislature to increase or add items.

Another objection, however, to putting in the hands of the Secretary the power to prepare the budget, which includes the power of supervision over the Administration, is the fact that he is now the head of the largest civil executive department of the Government. The War Risk Insurance and the Internal Revenue are two of the largest bureaus in Washington, and they only form a part of the Department of the Treasury; so that, from this point of view, the Department differs from the Treasury in Great Britain, which has not even control of the Inland Revenue. The secretary will not have the time, any more than the President, to scrutinize and carefully study the estimates submitted to him, nor will other heads of Departments believe that he has scrutinized the estimates relating to his own Department, among the largest in the Government service, as closely as he has scrutinized those in the other departments. Practically, the Secretary of the Treasury is merely another wheel introduced into the machine between the commissioner of the budget and the ultimate authority, the President. His present duties are manifold and important. They have to do with the financial and fiscal affairs of the Government, as well as with the manifold other operations of the Department, not with the efficiency of the governmental organization, and it is impossible that he should give due attention to the preparation of the revision of the estimates which, to be effective, means the reorganization of the whole governmental machine, to prevent overlapping and waste, and to keep it tuned up to efficient operation.

J. P. CHAMBERLAIN
Legislative Drafting Research Fund
New York, May 17

Salvaging the Facts of Business

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

On the occasion of the tenth annual meeting of the Special Libraries Association, held recently in this city, several hundred librarians and research workers connected with the country's leading financial, industrial, and business firms gathered together to discuss professional problems and to consider plans for the further extension of library and research service to commerce and industry.

The Special Libraries Association is affiliated with the American Library Association and its members have coöperated with the public librarians of the country in drawing up the recently proposed Enlarged Programme of Library Service. Mr. Carl H. Milam, Director of the A. L. A. Enlarged Programme, addressed the convention, describing recent progress, and a joint committee of the two associations was authorized for the furtherance of this important work.

Since the signing of the armistice American firms have given increasing attention to the study of business problems, and it is now generally maintained that the decisions of the business executive should be based upon a knowledge of the underlying facts. The importance of accurate record keeping has been greatly underestimated by many business firms in the past. Important documents are mislaid or lost and little or no effort has been made to collect and classify the facts and data bearing upon special business problems. Lacking such information, many firms have found it necessary to call upon experts and special investigators to help them discover "weak spots" and inefficiency.

The Special Libraries have demonstrated their ability to salvage important information and so to classify and arrange such data as to be immediately available to aid in the solution of current administrative problems. It is estimated that there are more than 2,000 American firms that have felt the need of this kind of service to aid in the development of their business.

The Special Librarian brings a new point of view into the business world. He feels the romance of business life in the fabrication of new products, the articulation of transportation facilities, the vagaries of credit, and the financing and management of business enterprise. All these activities he views in their relation to the community and to the nation, and he has a keen appreciation of the need to understand and to interpret, not only for the enlightenment of the present generation, but for those that are to come.

War-time conditions drew American men and women into closer contact with the processes and the fabric of industrial and business life. This relationship has resulted in a more intelligent interest in commercial undertakings and an increasing demand for business information. That American business firms are responding to this demand is demonstrated every day by the creation of new business libraries and bureaus of research and information. A considerable literature of business is rapidly springing into existence whose benefit is evident in the enthusiasm and increased efficiency of employees, as well as of executives. That the business library has come to stay there can be little doubt, and much certainly is to be hoped from the further extension of constructive services of this kind.

DORSEY W. HYDE, JR.
President, Special Libraries Association
Detroit, Mich., April 21

The Sixth Dante Centennial

[The author of this letter is the son of the late Augustin Cochin, the Paris friend of Longfellow, Garrison, and several other well-known Americans of the Civil War period, and the brother of M. Denys Cochin, of the French Academy. He was for many years a member of the Chamber of Deputies and is an authority in France on Petrarch and Dante.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Italian historical studies are very popular in the United States. The finest Dante collection in the world is that of Willard Fiske, at Cornell University, of which an excellent catalogue appeared not long ago. So I feel sure that American academic circles will learn with interest of the movement now on foot in Europe to celebrate in 1921 the sixth centennial of the death of Dante Alighieri.

The great poet died on September 14, 1321, and all Italy is preparing to commemorate the date. The Italian universities have already announced some handsome publications, particularly the final edition of the "Divine Comedy," the fruit of the long labors of the learned Vandelli; and the universities of France and Belgium are not deaf to the celebration.

It is remarkable, also, to note that the first steps for the jubilee were taken by the Catholic Church. In October, 1914, a memorable communication was addressed by Pope Benedict XV to the Archbishop of Ravenna which dwells on "the irreproachable faith of Dante," despite the impassioned attacks which he directed against certain heads of the Holy See, and which vindicates the great poet in the eyes of the Roman Church by referring to him as "Noster Dantes."

As Dante died at Ravenna, that city will be the centre of the religious ceremony. The Holy See has also expressed the desire that the jubilee should be honored by Catholics throughout the world, and, to this end, committees have already been formed in France, through the initiative of the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, and in Belgium under the auspices of Cardinal Mercier, who has just published in the Revue Universelle a scholarly study of Dante and St. Thomas of Aquino. Other publications have also been announced, especially a new translation of the "Divine Comedy," by the scholar and poet André Pératé, which is very faithful to the original, and in rythmic prose. It will appear first in a de luxe edition, with wood engravings by Jacques Beltrand after Botticelli, and later a popular edition will be brought out. There will also be published here in the near future a Bulletin which will present the unpublished works of several noteworthy writers concerning Dante, his writings, and his period. This Bulletin will be published, with appropriate illustrations, by the Librairie de l'Art Catholique, Paris.

I trust that this information may be of some interest to the literary readers of your periodical and that we may soon have the satisfaction of learning that the universities of the United States are also preparing to celebrate the jubilee of the greatest poet of the world.

HENRY COCHIN
23 Quai d'Orsay, Paris, May 1

Book Reviews

What to Do About News Juggling

Liberty and the News. By Walter Lippmann. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe.

MR. LIPPMANN believes that as long as we are content "to argue about the privileges and immunities of opinion" we are wasting time. We shall never succeed in fixing a standard of tolerance for opinions. "In going behind opinion to the information which it exploits, and in making the validity of the news our ideal, we shall be fighting the battle where it is really being fought." Liberty is not so much a condition as a mechanism. "In this view liberty is the name we give to measures by which we protect and increase the veracity of the information upon which we act." Our aims should be the protection of the sources of the news, the organization of the news so as to make it comprehensible, and the education of human response so that mankind will act intelligently in the light of the information it receives.

Few persons will agree with the author that the argument about the privileges and immunities of opinion is a waste of time. It is an argument in which most persons have indulged since the tribal days of the race and which seems to wax stronger as society becomes more complex. The fact that no enduring standard of tolerance can be found has small influence on the disputants, for the argument continues. It may be temporarily stifled, as in Soviet Russia, or it may be loftily ignored by an individual here and there in freer climes; but wherever it is permitted it is heard, and though its finer technicalities are of course reserved for the few, its more obvious phases are the subject-matter of the many.

Drawing the line on expressions of opinion is a fundamental need of social organization, and argument as to the location of the line is an inevitable consequence. No state, political party, church, guild, coöperative society, or trade-union can avoid the necessity. Each of these societies knows that, for its own preservation, it must prohibit among its members expressions deemed harmful to itself, and within the limits of its power penalize the seditious. There are persons who, while granting this right to the trade-union or the church, deny it to the nation; and there are other persons who, while granting it to the Lenin-Trotsky duumvirate, deny it to the democratic republic of the United States. But none denies it absolutely, and so long as men band themselves together for any purpose, from the organization of a state to the organization of a hunting party, they will set metes and bounds to the conduct of the membership; and they will consider the expression of non-conformist opinion as a vital phase of conduct. It is here that a large part of the battle is really being fought and always will be.

Still, the protection of the sources of the news, though but a part of the battle, is a most important part, and one listens eagerly for a hint of practical method. The evil of coloring, distorting, and suppressing news is widespread and glaring. It is impossible to say, from a close reading of this book, how general the author conceives this evil to be. He seems to think the capitalist news journals the chief offenders. "The current theory," he writes, "of American newspaperdom is that an abstraction like the truth and a grace like fairness must be sacrificed whenever anyone thinks the necessities of civilization require the sacrifice." I take it that he means capitalist newspaperdom; and this view is confirmed by his statement that "change will come . . . only if organized labor and militant liberalism set a pace which can not be ignored." An astigmatism so pronounced as to prevent one from seeing the persistent juggling of news by the critical and pretentiously ethical journals, does not promise much aid in the difficult task of safeguarding the news supply.

Yet the programme which the author proffers is a worthy one. Would that it could be attained! Progress toward its attainment will, however, require considerable soul-searching and inner reformation on the part of responsible persons connected with the handling of the news; and this is likely to require rather large drafts on the bank of time. A consideration of the specific details makes the attainment seem even more remote. Reporters must be supermen, rigorously trained in all the social sciences, in the use of words and in the technique of observation. They must set down impartially the objective fact. The news must be signed or documented, so that we may know where it comes from and who is responsible for it.

We want all this if it can be had. But we want something more. We want some assurance that after the news has come from an expert and an honest source it will be honestly used; that it will not be suppressed to make room for news from an inexpert source. It happens, for instance, that one of the favorite witnesses of the New Republic and other insurgent journals regarding Soviet Russia has been Arthur Ransome, a gentleman who, according to Professor Samuel N. Harper, rather prided himself (at least up to November, 1917) on his inability to understand politics. In other cases these journals have shown their preference for the hand-picked and pap-fed correspondent over the trained and informed observer. Under present circumstances, therefore, it can hardly be said that this proposed remedy offers a speedy cure for a confessedly bad situation.

"A rigorous discipline in the use of words" would no doubt help enormously. It is quite true that "education that shall make men masters of their vocabulary is one of the central interests of liberty"; and no doubt this truth has often occurred to the baffled reader of imposing arguments in the critical journals. But reform in this matter, so far as the radical reformers are concerned, seems a long way ahead; and the present tendencies in this field toward a more copious and cloudy verbiage give the observant reader only the sick heart of a deferred hope.

Finally, there is the "education of human response." This is a task upon which the best and the wisest of mankind have been assiduously working for several thousand years. As a proposal it has thus small measure of novelty. But it remains, after all, about the most promising proposal made. Its results so far have generated in some souls nothing but pessimism; in others, indifference; in most, only a chastened and subdued hope. Yet, to keep going, we must believe in it; we must believe that with the process of the suns men in the mass are rendered more intelligently responsive to truth and fact. Even the most optimistic person will at times doubt this evolution; but he will, if wise, continue, even in his times of gravest dubiety, to act as though it were true. Something can always be won by an appeal to the innate love of truth, to the instinct of fairness, to a sense of the dignity of sober reason and calm judgment. This appeal, made in behalf of a single standard of probity in furnishing the news—a standard as obligatory upon the harbingers of a "new world" as upon the defenders of things as they are—may in time work some part of the miracle that is expected of it.

"Our sanity," writes the author, "and therefore our safety, depend upon fearless and relentless exposure conducted by self-conscious groups that are now in a minority." True enough; but why the restriction to the minority? It is equally important—indeed, far more important—to the interests of social organization that the self-conscious majority should expose the falsifications and distortions of the insurgent groups. An increasing demand for a single standard of veracity in the news will start us well on the way to the desired goal.

W. J. Ghent

Is There a Religious Revival in France?

Guerre et Religion. By Alfred Loisy. Paris: Emile Nourry.
Mors et Vita. By Alfred Loisy. Paris: Emile Nourry.
La Paix des Nations et la Religion de l'Avenir. By Alfred Loisy. Paris: Emile Nourry.
En Ligne. By Frédéric Rouvier. Paris: Perrin.
Le Clergé et la Guerre de 1914. By Lucien Lacroix. Paris: Bloud and Gay.

IS there a religious revival in France? Abbé Loisy in his three pamphlets answers in substance, No, while M. Rouvier, in his large volume of over 550 pages, says Yes, and Bishop Lacroix is rather less positive in both directions. All three speak with authority: Abbé Loisy is the author of a score of books and pamphlets on religious questions and is to-day Professor of the History of Religions at the College of France; M. Frédéric Rouvier has published half a dozen books and pamphlets on Catholic subjects which have gone through many editions; and Mgr. Lacroix, Professor at the Sorbonne, is not surpassed by either of the foregoing in the number and variety of his writings on ecclesiastical subjects, besides which he printed "Yankees et Canadiens," a volume of impressions of a voyage which he made to America in 1895.

After the war of 1870, the churches—Catholic as well as Protestant—acclaimed a religious revival in France; but the years that followed showed that they were mistaken. In the last half of his pamphlet, "Mors et Vita," whose purpose is to combat the idea advanced in Paul Bourget's "Le Sens de la Mort" and Ernest Psichari's "Le Voyage du Centurion" that only the faithful Roman Catholic can live morally and die bravely, Abbé Loisy examines the movement which started before the outburst of the war and which pretended to be a "return to the Church," but which he describes as "a current, neither wide nor deep, of mysticism," a sort of "nationalistic Catholicism quite different from the old traditional Catholicism which is still officially the religion of the Church of Rome." He speaks of "the transformation, not of Catholicism, which changes slowly, tardily, and in spite of itself, but of our society which more and more tends rather to disengage itself from Catholicism," and he holds that what was before and during the war will survive the war —"a religion of devotion to one's country will be our common duty."

In "Guerre et Religion," Abbé Loisy declared as early as 1915 that "the war will not change the respective positions of the religious parties in France," and he then returns repeatedly to this idea of religion being swallowed up in patriotism. "The religion which rules at the front and which for a very great number is the only dominant one is not the Catholic faith, but the worship of country."

In answer to the question as to "what will be the foundation of this religion and its essential idea," Abbé Loisy replies that "all domestic religious differences sink into insignificance in comparison with the question of the future religion—the religion of humanity, which is now beginning to make its way into the world;" which he defines as "a religion which will have humanity as the object of its faith and its service; not only the existing humanity but that superior ideal in which we delight to contemplate it and to which we could elevate it."

Bishop Lacroix is less speculative and less emotional in his examination of the problem but arrives at about the same conclusions as those of Abbé Loisy.

> It is a truth taught by experience that the religious sentiment, which too often in times of prosperity slumbers in the depths of our souls, awakens and becomes especially fervent in moments of trial. . . . Men pray better. It can not be denied that, particularly at the beginning of hostilities, all the belligerents showed an increased propensity to resort to prayer, the like of which finds few similar examples in the history of humanity. . . . This unexpected fervor, this unhoped-for sympathy for religion, showed itself still more strikingly at the front.

But Bishop Lacroix has to admit that the religious ardor which characterized the first days of the war gradually cooled. He gives the causes for the change, chief among them the long duration of the struggle. The soldiers grew accustomed to the ever-present danger and were less prone to look to the supernatural for protection; and as the months rolled into years, the poilus and officers, who were piously inclined in August, 1914, were gradually replaced by those who had not felt the effects of that initial wave of deep sentiment. "The commanding generals began to take less and less interest in the chaplains." And when the soldier returned home for a few days' furlough, "he found that the religious fervor behind the lines did not equal that in the trenches." Of the energy and heroism of the priest at the front one may read at length in Frédéric Rouvier's "En Ligne."

Mgr. Lacroix devotes the closing section of his study to a consideration of "what will survive the war." He thinks that "there will be a renewal of good feeling among the people for the clergy as a body and especially for those of them who were at the front," but he does not predict any real revival of religious sentiment.

What has really happened in the churches of France since the armistice is not a revival of interest in religion per se, but a renewal of the old politico-theological struggle between the Vatican and the Republic. The renewal of diplomatic relations may be interpreted as a victory for the former; but the end is not yet.

Theodore Stanton

Germany on the Eve of the War

The Evolution of Modern Germany. By William Harbutt Dawson. New and Revised Edition. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE publication of a new edition of Mr. Dawson's admirable book, which has been a standard authority since its first appearance in the year 1908, is important at the present time in that it calls attention to the social and economic forces that were dominant in Germany before the war and gives occasion for the revision of judgment concerning German life and character. This book, like many others by the same author, was orginally intended to contribute toward a better understanding between Germany and the United Kingdom, and although the author's views have been greatly changed in recent years, he scrupulously refrains from criticism of German behavior and makes no forecast of future reconstruction. Prophecy is discredited in these days, but intimate description of social conditions and tendencies is of perennial interest and value.

Mr. Dawson does not indulge in analogy, yet his picture of German progress and prosperity before the war reminds one of the Niagara River above the falls, moving on between its banks, proud and confident, until the moment when it plunges into the abyss. Again, his account of the growth of Germany's population suggests the pressure exerted on all sides by the accumulation of a great body of water impounded in a reservoir and the disastrous effects of inundation when it breaks its bounds. In 1871 the population of the newly formed German Empire was, in round numbers, 41,000,000; in 1910 it was 65,000,000; and the annual increase of over 800,000 per annum must have brought the total up to 68,000,000 before the war began. The birth-rate, it is true, had declined from 38 per thousand in 1871 to 28 per thousand in 1913, but in the same time the general death-rate had fallen from 27 to 15 per thousand, so that the excess of births over deaths was greater in 1913 than in 1871, though less than in the decade 1901 to 1910. These simple facts measure the tremendous growth of Germany in almost every respect, and partly explain the feeling of Germans that they were ringed about with enemies, and the fear among the surrounding nations of an impending German invasion.

At first glance one might think Mr. Dawson's book a panegyric on modern Germany, but reading between the lines and in the light of recent events, one finds a shady side to most of their achievements, even as all things human have the defects of their qualities. The population of Germany after the war with France increased by leaps and bounds, until she could no longer raise all her food supplies, and the time was approaching when, as Dr. Paul Rohrbach said, it would be necessary to import one-half of her bread, and the only alternative to the dreaded "industrial state" would be immigration on a colossal scale. The Raiffeisen coöperative associations, the protective tariffs, and state assistance had done much for agriculture, but the "land-flight" of agricultural laborers was increasing until both large and small landowners were threatened with disaster. Manufacturing had grown enormously, but hardly any of the raw materials were produced in sufficient quantities at home. Germany's shipping and foreign trade had grown until she was second to England alone, but her great rival was her best customer and her trade was more or less menaced by preferential tariffs. Much attention had been given to colonies and colonial policy, but most of the German colonies, being tropical, were unfit for European settlers, while Germany's colonial administration with all its Kameralwissenschaft was an egregious failure.

Much has been said, and justly, in praise of Germany's domestic administration, with its system, its discipline, and its general efficiency, as shown notably in the well-managed Prussian railways; but it tended to suppress individuality and initiative, and it was a perpetual complaint that the best business men were found, not in the service of the state, but at the head of industrial, commercial, and financial undertakings, offering emoluments beyond the means of the national treasury. Even the cartels and syndicates, which dominated the staple manufacturing industries, were not without their bad features, for, while they gave Germany great power in foreign markets, through price control and systematic dumping, they did it at the expense of the domestic consumer and the manufacturer of finished products.

German labor legislation, especially the laws providing for industrial insurance, had many admirable features, yet it did not serve to allay the deep-rooted hostility between capital and labor. Moreover, certain vestiges of serfdom still remain, as the Prussian "Servants' Ordinance," by which domestic servants and agricultural laborers, unlike the industrial workpeople, were legally disqualified from combining for economic ends. Then, too, the general attitude of workmen toward the plans of benevolent employers, such as special pension and benefit funds, holiday festivities, assisted savings banks, workmen's dwellings, workmen's colonies, premiums, and gratuities of all kinds, is unappreciative if not absolutely thankless. Employers complain loudly of the "ingratitude" of their workpeople, who dislike accepting as a gift what they hold is theirs by right, and prefer to secure advancement through their own unions, especially the Socialist organizations, which, in 1912, embraced more than half of the organized workers of the country. On the other hand, many employers, like Herr Kirdorf, former head of the Coal and Steel Syndicate, the Judge Gary of Germany, refused to deal with labor organizations of any kind, and even advised measures that should do away with the excessive turnover of labor by providing for every industry, in so far as possible, a stationary band of workers.

In other respects, also, German social conditions before the war were far from ideal. The Polish question, for example, was a continual aggravation, and the efforts of the Prussian Government to Germanize the Polish provinces through compulsory purchase of land, settlements, interference with schools, and other harsh measures had effects the very opposite of those intended. The Poles were enriched at the expense of the German taxpayers; a Polish artisan and merchant class was built up; Polish agricultural laborers migrated to the industrial centres of West Prussia and other districts formerly exclusively German; and, in general, the whole policy tended to make bad Germans out of good Poles.

So many and varied were the internal troubles and perplexities of Germany, largely due to her rapid increase in wealth and population, coupled with popular education and the growth of democracy, that Mr. Dawson, like many other writers, deplores the passing of the good old times when Germany was nothing but a geographical expression; when Germans were poor in the world's goods but rich in faith, with ideals and illusions, humility, sentimentality, hospitality, and gemütlichkeit; when baron and pastor received due meed of reverence; when the employer was a benefactor and the foreign traveler a friend; when Kant and Fichte ruled in philosophy and Goethe and Schiller in literature; when, in brief, there was universal plain living and high thinking and the demon of ambition had not yet entered the German soul. Doubtless, the primitive Teuton was asleep in those days, but latterly a change has come over the spirit of his dream. In the words of the late Professor Paulsen: "Two souls dwell in the German nation. The German nation has been called a nation of poets and thinkers, and it may be proud of the name. To-day it may again be called the nation of masterful combatants, as when it originally appeared in history."

Apologists for Germany have frequently called attention to some such dual personality among the Germans, as though the mass of the people, by nature peaceful and gemütlich, had been overruled by a few junkers and industrialists, and thus misled along the path of militarism, navalism, and Weltpolitik. Mr. Dawson does not say exactly this, although he recognizes the differences which exist among Germans of various regions and social classes. He rather takes the view that the logic of the situation pointed toward foreign conquest as the most promising remedy for internal ills, and he clearly shows that not merely the Navy League and the Pan Germans, but university professors, churchmen, journalists, and even the leading Socialists were united in the opinion that Germany must secure her "future on the ocean" and her "place in the sun," even though the new policy should involve the downfall of her chief rival—the British Empire.

J. E. Le Rossignol

Yeast and Phosphorus

Passion: A Human Story. By Shaw Desmond. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Responsibility: A Novel. By James E. Agate. New York: George H. Doran Company.

Peter Jameson: A Modern Romance. By Gilbert Frankau. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

In his latest volume of "Shelburne Essays," Mr. More has a paper on "Decadent Wit," which was occasioned by a book, rather worshipful, on "The Eighteen Nineties." Mr. More has small patience with the sickliness of that period; nor does he hesitate to assert that its false theory of the relation between filth and spirituality is still active: "In subdued form, befitting what remains of the reticence of the English temperament, it lurks among the present-day inheritors in London of the Yellow Nineties." If this was written some years ago with Shaw and Galsworthy especially in mind, what does the scholarly censor make of Messrs. W. L. George and James Stephens, and all the younger fruitage of the medlar school? In most of them, he might note, the English temperament is less in question than the Scotch or Irish.

Shaw Desmond's "Democracy" was a fiery study of a social and industrial England trying vainly to escape the tyranny of the past. It was noteworthy as the book of a radical who does not pretend omniscience—is sure of no solid ground ahead even for the next step. "Passion" is inscribed to "The Children of the New Age": a book of yeasty turmoil lighted by a kind of desperate idealism. The young Irishman in London who is its central figure and narrator is a-quiver from the cradle with consciousness of his strange position in a world which has been made without his advice or even his permission. Clearly there is much to be done: but what? The arrangement of his nursery is not what it might be, the servants who care for him are imperfect, and his parents leave much to be desired. An English public school is conducted according to principles fatally different from his own. Sex is a rather nasty fact made nastier by the prudery of the Late Queen and her minions. Big Business, as he comes to know it presently in London, is not good enough for him. Despite its title, the theme of the book is Big Business rather than sex. In Golgotha House and in Fear Street our Anglo-Irish youth serves his time as "a fighting competitive animal" and as an amateur fellow-citizen. Presently he turns for safety to love and its mystical enlightenment: "And as I listened to the Passion of the Hours and to the mighty congregation that hurried towards it, I knew that there was no death, and that this passion-play was the passion-play eternal—knew that the age, this nervous, passionate age, held leashed in its heart unknown potentialities—that this rotten, imaginative, wonderful age was the age of the Big Idea as well as of Big Business—an age of struggle and despair, of defeats and victories . . . but an age reaching forward through the passion of men like myself, through that passion of love fulfilled, to splendors yet unborn; to human beings who shall be as gods . . . And through it all the face of the woman and the cry of the child came to me—that insistent, pulsating, whelming cry—the cry of passion, and of life." The book is full of that eager, hectic, well-wishing for mankind which now so frequently passes for idealism. We can but note how words like "rotten" and "imaginative" come together in the visionary's mind.

The author of "Responsibility" appears to be the very latest article in British novelists. England's reviewers have hailed him with their customary enthusiasm. The Saturday Review calls him "a star of the first magnitude—Aldebaran among our pasty twinklers—" alas, poor twinklers, each of whom has been greeted as a star in his brief day, namely, on the day of his first appearance. The book is a hodge-podge. Dedicated to Arnold Bennett, it strives to be worthy of a Clayhanger age and is busy enough at times with Wellsian topics, including socialism, suffrage, big business, and the war. Like "Passion," this is an autobiographical tale, in the sense that the central person tells the story. He provides also a long and labored "Introduction" which, like much of the text, is strikingly in the vein, or style, of the Yellow Nineties: a mincing, smirking style which invites us to make much of the stylist and to listen to the tale for his sake. Paradox and nonconformity in the matter, preciosity in the manner, make up the compound. Samuel Butler haunts the backscene, arm in arm with Oscar Wilde. The persons of the story, above a certain social level, all talk alike—that is to say, like the author—witty to a man, after the gentry of Shaw's plays. In the foreground, "realism," exulting in the beauty of squalor. After a revolting description of a prize-fighting scene, comes the inevitable bounce: "And the inherent beauty? Oh, convincingly, imperishably, the beauty is there." And of the music hall:

"Lovely, beyond all imagination lovely in sheer incredibility these palaces of the people, . . . There is enchantment in the place . . . Enchantment in the quintessential commonness. To it, mediocrity, and pell-mell! Sentimental obscenity telling the beads of passion flagrantly factitious, you on the stage are an amusing sister to the high-born marketry zealously trumpeting her wares in the half-penny press. Enchantment everywhere, in vice so decently veiled that we need not pretend to turn our heads, in the stolid unobservant policeman, in the doorkeepers into whose soul the pitiful buffoonery has so pitilessly entered."

"Peter Jameson" has for me a queerly belated, almost antiquated quality. It is the latest if not the last of the Britlings. Peter Jameson is a well-bred middle-class Englishman, comfortably married, otherwise comfortably "off," and greatly interested in business as a sport. The war breaks and makes him: quite two-thirds of the book is given to his experiences at the front, which read very much like other experiences we have been hearing of. Once again the filth and squalor of war are set forth without mitigation or remorse of print. And dovetailed with all this methodical naturalism is the laboriously romantic love-tale of Peter and the spouse who is to become his mistress and his mate. "Oh, boy, boy, I believe you . . . You're such a rotten lover, boy," is her song of surrender. Peter has returned from the war a sufferer from an obscure form of shell-shock, and it is his wife's father who urges her, for Peter's sake, to "make love to him as if she were his mistress." "The words themselves conveyed nothing whatever to a woman utterly unversed in the wiles of sex; but they filled her with a delicious feeling of fright." . . . Peter's Patricia is about as real a woman as Mr. Wells's Ann Veronica—a tailor-made she . . . The book is clever, veracious in spots; oh, so anxious to get at the truth about life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and quite without creative vitality as a whole.

H. W. Boynton

Minor Dutch Painters

Künstler-Inventare. Urkunden zur Geschichte der Holländischen Kunst des XVIten, XVIIten und XVIIIten Jahrhunderts, von Dr. A. Bredius. Haag: Martinus Nijhoff.

In 1915 Dr. Bredius brought out the first volume of his "Künstler-Inventare." Since then four other volumes have seen the light, and the author, who found his material growing under his hands, promises the issue of yet another. In these six volumes, numbering together over 2,000 pages, are contained the results of nearly forty years of indefatigable research in the State and Municipal archives of Holland. A fascinating story can be gleaned from these dry and dusty documents. Dr. Bredius prints them with scarcely any comment, leaving to the reader the full enjoyment of calling up, with the help of his own imagination, the intimate picture of the past which these pages reveal in spare outline and faint, though suggestive, little touches.

Many a painter's life story is laid bare from the cradle to the grave, the goose-quill having recorded, with equal exactitude, both the tearful moments of baptism and burial and the minor incidents of the intervening span of life which required a notary's official interference. The artist's career began on the day when his parents signed the contract which bound him apprentice for a number of years to his first master. He entered upon it at an early age. Abraham Furnerius, who died in his twenty-seventh year and who is only known for his exquisite landscape drawings, was scarcely thirteen years old when he became Rembrandt's pupil. Uneventful lives most of them led of hard work for small remuneration. They often ended, as Rembrandt's did, in the bankruptcy court, and many a painter's furniture and pictures, left by him at his death, were seized upon by relentless creditors. But now and then we get a glimpse of a more romantic career. Michiel van de Sande, on record in a document of 1610 as a citizen of Rotterdam, appears in 1625 as "Lieutenant in the service of the Signoria of Venice," and again, four years later, as a recruiting officer in the service of the King of Sweden. Either the attraction of Italian art, or the love of adventure, or the hope of a better livelihood elsewhere, drove him, and many of his fellows, abroad.

The difficulty for a minor painter of making both ends meet by exclusive application to his art explains why so many combined the art dealer's business with the painter's profession. An illustrative case is that of Maerten Adriaensz Balkeneynde, of Rotterdam, who at his death in 1631 left a collection of a hundred pictures, which, in business-like fashion, were inventoried with special mention of their proportions, in terms, unfortunately, to whose meaning we have lost the clue. Sometimes it was the artist's wife who owned and ran the business, while her husband plied the brush. Cathalijntie van den Dorp, wife of Anthony Waterloo, the landscape painter, willed to the latter, in 1641, all the furniture and silver, besides a picture by Jan Martsen, "that being a piece not included in the business stock." From a curious document of 1636 we gather that the dealer's stock was not only for sale, but could also be rented for special occasions. A certain Gerrit Luycken declared, in that year, before a notary in Amsterdam that he had received on loan from Elias Homis, painter and dealer, four pictures with which to decorate his house on the occasion of his wedding and which he promised duly to return when the festivities were over. The painter Gerard Uylenburgh, a relative of Rembrandt's Saskia, was for a time so successful as a dealer that contemporary poets celebrated him in verse not for his art but for his enterprise in business, especially in importing Italian masters, whose works he went personally to Italy to purchase. The eulogy of the poets is strangely contrasted with what we learn from the documents about a transaction of his with the Elector of Brandenburg, who called either his honesty as a dealer or his knowledge as a connoisseur in question. Of thirteen Italian masters which he sold to that prince in 1671, twelve were returned as worthless fakes. The experts called by Uylenburgh in his defense were of a different opinion. They found some good Italian works among them and also a few which were subject to doubt but, though not perhaps by the artists to whom Uylenburgh ascribed them, yet valuable pictures of good quality. When, nevertheless, the Elector refused to take them back, the collection was sold by public auction in 1673, and it may well be that Uylenburgh paid the poets to write their rhymed eulogies as an advertisement for the occasion. Either the notoriety of this case or a slump in the trade caused by the war with France brought on Uylenburgh's financial ruin. In 1675 he appeared in the bankruptcy court and, after the sale of all his possessions, emigrated to London, where he is said by Houbraken to have earned a scanty livelihood as an assistant of Sir Peter Lely. The catalogue of his stock drawn up on that occasion contains a list of 153 paintings and 52 pieces of sculpture. The notary's clerk has played sad havoc with the Italian names, some of which are hardly recognizable in the forms he put down, apparently, from dictation. Parmiggianino appears as Perments, Giorgione as Schorson, Paolo Veronese as Paulus Fernijs, Guido Reni as Gridorin, Caracci as Caras. No prices were added, but from the evidence given by the experts we gather that the Italian masters were highly valued in Holland at that time. "If the pictures," they said, "had been undamaged and exquisite samples of the art of these same masters, their price would have been reckoned not in hundreds but in thousands of guilders."

That is more than even Rembrandt ever got for his portraits, 500 guilders being the highest price that he, and he alone, could charge. In the early eighteenth century better fees were paid, as we gather from the documents relating to the flower painter Jan van Huysum (†1749), who received as an average one thousand guilders apiece. This vogue of van Huysum's painstaking art is characteristic of the declining taste of that period. On the same day that an "extra fine flower vase" by Van Huysum was knocked down for 1,245 guilders, a picture by Albert Cuyp went for thirteen, two by Jan Steen for thirty, and a portrait by Rembrandt for twenty-five! In England Van Huysum's art was just as popular. A younger brother of his settled in London, where he painted copies of Jan's pictures which sold as genuine Jan van Huysums at £50 a pair.

Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. A fair gauge of an artist's fame among his contemporaries is the frequency with which his work was copied. Among the pictures which the Leiden painter, Abraham de Pape, at the time of his wedding, declared he possessed were eight copies after Gerard Dou. A skillful copyist like De Pape could acquire the manner of the master he imitated sufficiently well to palm off his own original work as work of the greater master, or if he did not do so, it would soon be fathered on the latter by an unscrupulous dealer or an ignorant collector. In the Art Institute at Chicago the writer of this article saw, not long ago, a beautiful picture purchased from the Demidoff collection, a scene in a cavalry stable, signed D. Teniers. But both the composition and the color betrayed so unmistakably the hand of Jacob Duck that he felt little hesitation in discrediting that signature as a forgery of this kind. Such practices may account for the mysterious disappearance of the entire œuvre of minor artists whose names alone have survived in the old histories of painting or are revealed to us by the documents from the archives. In a private collection at The Hague, now dispersed, hung formerly a rare painting by Lucas Luce, clearly signed L. Luce f. In 1914 Dr. Bredius came upon this very same picture in the gallery of Count von Hallwyl, in Stockholm, but it no longer bore the signature of L. Luce and was catalogued as a work by Simon Kick!

In this way many a deserving talent, not strong enough, however, to impress an individual stamp on his paintings, has been robbed of both his work and his name by the fame of more original masters, from whom they drew their inspiration. Since Dr. Bredius has rescued their names and, in many a case, particulars of their obscure lives from utter oblivion, we possess some data by the help of which it may be possible to restore to them part of their œuvre as well.

A. J. BARNOUW

The Run of the Shelves

SOMEHOW one never thought of Keats as having a house; one thought of him as passing uninterruptedly back and forth from stables and hospitals to the realms of gold. For the last three years of his life, before he went to Italy, he had rooms in a house at Hampstead, in the other half of which dwelt Fanny Brawne and her mother. It was at its best not a very attractive house, but it was surrounded by a garden which was sufficient to give—to Keats—inspiration for the "Ode to a Nightingale." The garden is still there, and within doors a sitting-room and a bed-room retain many of the features they possessed when the poet moved about them. As an alternative to the impending destruction of the house it is proposed to raise £10,000 by subscription, which will serve to make of the place a permanent and suitable memorial. It is as easy to be cynical as sentimental about such a project, but it does seem a pity to pull the house down as if it had been occupied by one whose name had indeed been writ in water. Anima mundi, sis memor! Subscriptions may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, Sir Sidney Colvin, Town Hall, Hampstead, N. W. 3.

Is a revival of John Addington Symonds under way? Not long since we received a little book, "Last and First," containing a notable study of Clough and a characteristic essay on the spirit of the Renaissance; and now, from the Macmillan Company, there comes another volume of hitherto uncollected, and in part unprinted, essays called from the first of the series "In the Key of Blue." Some of the essays in this second collection, those particularly which record certain personal experiences of the author in rather a sentimental, if not a sickly, vein, seem to us scarcely worth resuscitating. But others, of a more scholarly sort, rank with Symonds's best work and deserve to take a place in the not too large body of permanent English criticism. Such is the excellent study of Fletcher's "Valentine," which, while admitting the verbal excellence of the English romantic drama, shows how completely it falls down in the delineation of character. Equally notable is the distinction drawn in the essay on "The Dantesque and Platonic Ideals of Love," in which the author's large acquaintance with both Greek and Italian literature leads him to make discriminations often missed by critics of a more one-sided culture. Perhaps, best of all the chapters, because dealing with the least familiar subject, is the eulogy of the forgotten poet, Edward Cracroft Lefroy, if that can be said to be forgotten which was really never known. It would be difficult to-day, we presume, to find a copy of Lefroy's Sonnets. Symonds quotes from them so freely that the owner of this book of essays may congratulate himself on possessing the best of a poet well worth treasuring in memory.

"Essays on Art," by A. Clutton-Brock (Scribners) are a dozen papers collected from the London Times Literary Supplement. Though the author treats with insight such personalities as Leonardo da Vinci, Poussin, and Mozart, the essays generally bear on the relation of the artist to society and to morals. Thus he takes sharp issue with Whistler's famous dictum that art occurs through the mere accident that an artist gets born. "I believe," writes Mr. Brock, "that the quality of art in any age depends, not upon the presence or absence of individuals of genius, but upon the attitude of the public towards art." Similar is the comment on Croce's view that art is merely expression—the artist's explanation to himself. "If the artist knew that the beauty he perceives was a product of his own mind, he could not value it so . . . in the beauty of art there is always value and wonder, always a reference to another beauty different in kind from itself; and we, too, if we are to see the beauty of art, must share the same value and wonder." We are denied this experience by the general feminization of taste (Essay, The Pompadour), and by an immoral exaltation of processes over persons. Here we reach the Germans and the war. Of humanity reduced to foolish and destructive process, Mr. Nevinson's cubistic war sketches seem to the author a very proper symbol. The same delusion of process works havoc in art, reducing it to an ostentatious professionalism. Apropos of the William Morris celebration, the final essay discusses Waste or Creation. The real quarrel of labor, he thinks, is less with poverty than with a toil which the laborer dimly divines to be unreasonably conducted and futile. "He may think he is angry with the rich because they are rich; but the real source of his anger is the work they have set him to do with their riches." Enough to show the gravity—real gravity—of Mr. Brock's view. In compensation the publishers have made the book small enough to sit comfortably in any pocket. With the strong ethical perceptions, Mr. Brock combines sensitiveness. He seeks a humanistic interpretation of art. If we still need a remedy for the individualistic green sickness of the "naughty nineties," we have it here.

The prize of $500 for the best volume of poems written by an American citizen, which the Poetry Society of America has for the past two seasons given through Columbia University, will this year be awarded directly by the Society. As the prize is not competitive but in the nature of an award, books need not be entered for it as in the ordinary prize competition. The judges for the present season are Professor John Livingston Lowes of Harvard University, author of "Convention and Revolt in Poetry"; Edwin Arlington Robinson, and Alice Corbin Henderson, Associate-Editor of Poetry: A Magazine of Verse.

The Poetry Society of America offers the William Lindsey Prize of $500 for the best unproduced and unpublished full length poetic play written by an American citizen. By "full length" is meant a play that will occupy an evening. No restrictions are placed upon the number of acts or scenes, or on the nature of the subject matter. The judges of the contest will be George Arliss, Professor George Pierce Baker, of Harvard, Clayton Hamilton, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, and Stuart Walker. Manuscripts should be sent by registered mail, the author's registry receipt to be considered sufficient acknowledgment. They must be submitted in typewritten form, fastened along the left edge of the page in one volume, and signed with a pen name. An enclosed sealed envelope should be inscribed with the title of the play and the pen name, and contain a card with the correct name and address of the author, as well as the title of the play. This sealed envelope should also contain one self-addressed bearing the full amount of return postage, including registry. The contest closes July 1, 1921, and the successful play will be announced at the October meeting of the Poetry Society. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Drama Committee of the Poetry Society of America, care of Stuart Walker, Chairman, Carnegie Hall, New York City.

Mr. Coulson Kernahan's "Swinburne As I Knew Him" (John Lane) is more agreeable than most books of its class. It is more organic; it is less fragmentary. The trouble with books of reminiscence is that memory is not only a sieve, as we all know to our cost, but a grater: it loses much, and what it keeps, it keeps in a granular—not to say a powdery—form. It is the peculiarity of Mr. Kernahan's mind that his recollections band themselves together, that they acquire—in the measure permitted by the form—body, breadth, and contour. His is not what we may call the pincushion type of reminiscence—the mealy, lifeless mass, prettily encased, into which anecdotes are thrust like pins.

There is possibly a danger for Mr. Kernahan in this very superiority. The fullness and balance of his narrative may excite ungenerous suspicion even in those who are friends to generosity. Truth is so constitutionally slipshod that, when the tie of her cravat or her shoestrings is geometric in its regularity, it is hard not to suspect that she has engaged a valet. Here, for example, in Chapter IV are four pages of fashioned and finished English, which are supposed to have fallen in their perfection from Philip Marston's extemporizing lips and to have been received and recorded in this intact perfection by Mr. Philip Kernahan's superhuman memory. Be this suspicion true or not, Mr. Kernahan has done that rare thing—written reminiscences which the reader can recall. The style is good for its purpose—broad, roomy, outreaching with a certain informal dignity which never hardens into pomp. There are four letters of Swinburne to his cousin, Lady Henniker Heaton, one of which is an affectionate refusal to act as godfather to his cousin's child from the hatred of a ceremony which views a little angel as a "child of wrath."

In the early part of 1873, M. Victorien Sardou offered to the Vaudeville Theatre of Paris a play entitled "Uncle Sam." The rehearsals began, but the French authorities learned that the piece contained passages which would offend the American colony. So the manager was informed that unless he got the approval of the American Legation the play could not be given. But when our Minister at Paris, Elihu B. Washburne, was applied to in the matter, he gave the very diplomatic reply that "this was not one of his functions." Thereupon, M. Jules Simon, Minister of Public Instruction, in whose department was lodged the power of censorship, prohibited the production of the play in France.

Then that very enterprising New York manager, Augustin Daly, decided to bring out "Uncle Sam" in the United States, and early in March the city dailies contained this advertisement:

> Grand Opera House, corner of 23rd Street and 8th Avenue, Monday, March 17th, first time on any stage of Sardou's prohibited comedy of "Uncle Sam," which will be given with extraordinary realistic scenery, magnificent appointments and with a cast that can not be excelled.

And on March 18 William Winter had this to say in the Tribune:

> The public knew before that "Uncle Sam" was abusive; they know now that it is dull. . . . A piece of blackguardism . . . The Grub Street allegation that American women are unchaste and that every one of them has her price,—this is substantially the allegation of "Uncle Sam" . . . A satire on American society as might suit the mental calibre of stable boys. . . . As a whole, "Uncle Sam" was a fizzle.

Mr. Winter's final statement proved to be correct, for the play was given for the last time on April 13. It did not hold the boards a month.

At the beginning of the present year M. Brieux, also of the French Academy, tried his hand at putting Americans on the stage, and "Les Américains chez nous" was not only not censored but it is still appearing at the Paris Odéon.

M. Brieux has been good enough to send us a copy of his play and, after reading it, we can well understand why it has not met the fate of the production of his fellow academician. After the part which our soldiers took in saving France on French soil, and with over 60,000 buried in French cemeteries, the Sardou method of treating us was of course impossible. But M. Brieux rises above all such considerations; the dedication shows what is in his heart:

Cette pièce est dédiée aux femmes des Etats-Unis qui se penchèrent sur nos douleurs. Humble et respectueux hommage de reconnaissance d'un Français.

M. Brieux takes an international and psychological view of the question and distributes his praise and criticism equally between both countries. His play closes with two international marriages confined to Americans and French, and where both sexes are impartially treated, there being a French bride and a French groom, and an American bride and an American groom. In a word, just as M. Sardou's comedy tended to push the two nations apart, M. Brieux's drama conduces to draw them more closely together.

Alexandre Dumas had a modest collaborator in his friend Auguste Maquet; though Maquet had a share in the composition of Dumas's most popular productions, he did not insist on his name being coupled with that of Dumas on the title page. Only the plays which he drew from the novels were proclaimed as the joint work of the two. The heirs of Maquet, however, are prouder of his authorship than he was himself. They demand the publication of his name on the title page of "Le Comte de Monte-Cristo" and other novels, and among the heirs of Dumas there are said to be some who are not averse to this official recognition of the dead partnership. Maquet died eighteen years after Dumas. The latter's œuvre becomes public property in 1924. By rendering to Maquet the honor which the Maquetists claim as his due, the Dumasists retain for eighteen years more a claim to part of the royalties which, otherwise, they will cease to draw altogether. "La vie chère" will make it hard for them to choose between their ancestor's fame and their own purse.

The Venus of Milo, whose beauty launched so many thousand ships from these shores, has never been seen by her American admirers in the lighting that could reveal her full glory. A headline quotes Mr. Robert Aitken as having said that the "Venus de Milo in the Louvre is worst placed of all." We could not discover the superlative in his speech as it was printed. If he did use it, he did injustice to the famous Ariadne of Dannecker in Frankfurt, which has the distinction of being the worst exhibited statue in Europe. She is made to revolve on her pedestal while a rainbow of light is thrown on her marble whiteness. To change the repose of the sculpture into a gaudy movie show is the worst indignity one can offer to the artist's creation.

Since neither the Paris Peace Conference nor the Secretariat of the League of Nations published an official collection of documents relating to the birth of the League, the International Intermediary Institute at The Hague has undertaken to do this unofficially. The success of the League depends on the confidence of the members in the impartiality of its working and in the reliability of the Covenant itself. Mrs. C. A. Kluyver, who performed the task of compiling these "Documents on the League of Nations" (Leiden: A. W. Sijthoff's Uitgeversmaatschappij), has supplied the means wherewith the real sense of the provisions of the Covenant and of their bearing on future possibilities of the League may be better understood, an understanding which is the necessary basis for the mutual confidence of all its participants. Mr. C. van Vollenhoven, of Leiden University, has written a preface to the volume in which he summarizes the chief uncertainties and ambiguities proffered by the twenty-six articles of the Covenant. The material published by Mrs. Kluyver does not throw much light on these. They will have to be cleared, not by the statements of diplomats and politicians, but by the practice of future days. In the collection are not included any documents relating to Part XIII of the Peace Treaty, which deals with the problem of Labor, nor does it contain any material reflecting the growth and gradual development during the war of the conception of such a League. Otherwise the material contained in this volume provides a comprehensive and impartial survey of the various contributions from all parts of the globe towards the establishment of the League.

"Ships Across the Sea," by Ralph D. Paine (Houghton Mifflin), deals with both the regular and the "trick" navy. Adventure is the ruling note—quest of subs and quest of spies, but Mr. Paine hits off well the odd mixes that the war brought about in fo'c's'l and ward room. These are tall tales and of a high seagoing quality, yet they keep close enough to the facts of the armed guard, the flying boat service, and the interminable chase of the destroyers. From a literary point of view "punch" is more in evidence than finish or fine shades of any sort. Perhaps a yarn shouldn't be very literary. These are good yarns, with a sufficient backing of experience and fact.

Dramatic Art in Holland

DRAMATIC art is in less esteem in Holland than poetry and music. The strong Calvinistic element in the nation accounts for the difference. To the puritanic followers of Dr. Abraham Kuyper the theatre is an invention of Satan, which one had better not mention at all. The history of the Dutch stage during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is a long concatenation of wrangles between its upholders and the zealous orthodox "dominees," who always tried to persuade the municipal authorities to suppress this suggestive and influential form of art. The result was that at the beginning of the last century the drama as an artistic mode of expression was practically non-existent in Holland.

Another cause, whose working, it is true, is not confined to Holland, joined with this puritanic prejudice to keep the stage in disrepute: the difficulty of distinguishing between real art and its counterfeit, which in the dramatic field is infinitely greater than in music, poetry, and painting. The public, though it may buy gaudy oleographs and the lastest music-hall song, is not unconscious of the fact that all these productions have little to do with art. But in its appreciation of the drama it does not make such a distinction. It would find it difficult to imagine that Mengelberg, the great conductor of the Amsterdam orchestra, should include jazz music and ragtimes in his repertoire of classical compositions, but that same public sees nothing astonishing in the alternating production by one and the same company of Shakespearean drama and the lowest German farce.

The true lovers of the drama, however, did not despair. They remembered how, about 1890, Dutch music was at almost as low an ebb, and that, thanks to the initiative of a few wealthy and enterprising Amsterdammers, Willem Kes, and after him Willem Mengelberg, were enabled to build up a purely artistic orchestra, whose fame has spread far beyond the Dutch frontiers. Mengelberg's genius and enthusiasm raised the standard of musical performance all over the country; and the lovers of the drama thought that, in the same way, the stage could be brought to mend its ways.

The task which they undertook, however, was infinitely more difficult, as they could rely on the support of only a small part of the nation: The Calvinists kept aloof, and the Roman Catholics would only hesitatingly lend their aid under strict reservations and conditions. But in spite of these drawbacks, the stage has been brought nearer to the ideal. September 1, 1908, will be remembered as a red-letter day in the records of the Dutch theatre: on that date the Netherland Society, Het Tooneel (The Stage), gave its opening performance under the direction of Willem Royaards, the man who did for dramatic art what Kes and Mengelberg had achieved in music. Some good pioneer work had, indeed, been done by a few predecessors, but none possessed his unfailing instinct for true literary value and his insight in the secrets of an all-controlling stage management. Descending from an old, patrician family, he brought his native distinction into both the scenery and the action of his plays, which won him the interest and the support of aristocratic circles where, until then, all theatrical enterprise, unless it came from Paris, had been ignored.

From other quarters Royaards received encouragement when he began to revive the seventeenth century drama of Joost van den Vondel, Holland's greatest poetic genius, of whose "Lucifer" Mr. Leonard van Noppen produced an excellent English translation some years ago. Patriotic feeling was gratified by this demonstration of the high artistic value of these early dramas, and saw in their revival a national movement worthy of financial and moral support, and the Catholics especially, who love to call the poet theirs because of his conversion, late in life, to the Mother Church, regarded Royaards' Vondel performances as an honor to themselves and flocked to the theatre to attend them.

In this way Royaards succeeded in transforming the theatre from a place of mere amusement into a temple of art, an achievement which, last year, was duly, though not very appropriately, recognized by the conferring, honoris causa, of the degree of doctor of Dutch Philology, by the University of Utrecht.

The Government, shortly after this academic recognition of the nation's indebtedness to the stage manager, gave evidence of an incipient interest in the stage: The Minister of Education, Art, and Sciences instituted a commission to advise him on the question of subsidizing dramatic art. This official admission of the importance of the stage as a national institution was highly gratifying to all who take its welfare to heart. Their satisfaction, however, was greatly diminished by the report which this commission submitted to the Minister. Those members who belonged to the Right, the Clerical block which does not care for the theatre or is even hostile to it, carried in the committee meetings a complete victory over their politically less experienced colleagues of the Left by making their standpoint prevail that the grant of a subsidy should be made conditional on requirements of a religious, political, and moral nature. If the Minister accepts the advice, which is but all too probable, the Government being a Clerical one, there is great danger of the subsidy being refused to a company because of the occurrence, in one single play, of a statement which is aimed at the established form of government, or which might be deemed to hurt the political or moral feelings of certain people. Every year, during the debate on the budget, the Calvinist members of the Chamber will not fail to bring their pressure upon the Minister to retrench the subsidies on account of all sorts of complaints, and though there may be some among them of a more liberal disposition, party discipline will prevent them from voting against the anti-stage majority of the Clerical block.

The decision of the committee does not, it is true, establish a censorship of the stage. The companies which forfeit the subsidy retain perfect freedom to produce the incriminated play, although the burgomasters, who have the power of prohibition, will feel encouraged by this evidence of Governmental displeasure to make use of that power with less scruple than formerly, especially when plays are performed that clash with their own political convictions. But the loss of the subsidy will make it hard for such companies to keep up the competition with their officially approved of rivals.

The advisory commission would have placed itself on higher ground if it had declared the artistic value of a play to be the only reliable test. Pure art is incompatible with what is ugly from a moral or a religious point of view. And if it had adopted the principle of subsidizing only such companies as produce, exclusively, artistically important drama, this unique opportunity of enhancing the æsthetic and social prestige of the stage would have been made the most of. Instead, conditions have been created for a new political conflict over the theatre, as bitter and barren of result as the recently ended conflict over the free school, which has vitiated domestic politics in Holland for the past two decades.

J. L. WALCH

The Hague

Books and the News

Motor Trips

THE blue book is the most practical book to take with you on a motor trip, and it is the only one you will take, unless you are unusually fond of reading. But in the early days of summer, before you have decided on your route, or while you still wish to refresh your memory of some place which you intend to visit, it is possible to get information and enjoyment from books which other explorers—in motors and on foot—have written of their trips. These books cover all parts of the country.

Sarah Comstock's "Old Roads from the Heart of New York" (Putnam, 1915) and John T. Faris's "Old Roads Out of Philadelphia" (Lippincott, 1917) start the city dweller on short trips. To go farther, and into New England, there is Louise Closser Hale's motor-trip: "We Discover New England" (Dodd, 1915), "The Lightning Conductor Discovers America," by C. N. and A. M. Williamson (Doubleday, 1916), and Katharine M. Abbott's "Old Paths and Legends of New England" (Putnam, 1904). The same author describes the nearer regions of New England, chiefly Connecticut, in "Old Paths and Legends of the New England Border" (Putnam, 1907). Edwin M. Bacon is the writer of two books: "Literary Pilgrimages in New England" (Silver, 1902) and "Rambles Around Old Boston" (Little, 1914). One of Mary C. Crawford's interesting books is "Little Pilgrimages Among Old New England Inns" (Page, 1907), while Walter Emerson's "The Latchstring to Maine Woods and Waters" (Houghton, 1916) is readable and pleasing. Two of the older writers may be represented by Thoreau's "Cape Cod" (Houghton) and Celia Thaxter's "Among the Isles of Shoals" (Houghton, 1873), although I forget whether motorists—as such—go any nearer to the Shoals than the road through the Hamptons.

David M. Steele's "Vacation Journeys East and West" (Putnam, 1918) is mostly about the mountains and seaside of New England and New York, but there are chapters on the far West. "Chauffeur's" (A. J. Eddy's) "Two Thousand Miles in an Automobile" (Lippincott, 1902) is about New York, New England, and Canada. One of Mr. Clifton Johnson's admirable volumes, "Highways and Byways from the St. Lawrence to Virginia" (Macmillan, 1913), describes, as in his other books, rural life and wayside conversation. Pennsylvania and Maryland are also included in "We Discover the Old Dominion" (Dodd, 1916), by Louise Closser Hale. New York, New England, and the South furnish chapters for Walter Pritchard Eaton's "Barn Doors and Byways" (Small, 1913), perhaps the most charming of them all. S. D. Kirkham's "East and West" (Putnam, 1911), speaks of Cape Ann and Long Island, and also of Arizona and the far West. Another comprehensive book, with fine pictures, is Robert H. Schauffler's "Romantic America" (Century, 1913). Julian Street goes West in "Abroad at Home" (Century, 1914) and South in "American Adventures" (Century, 1917).

For the South, Margaret W. Morley's "The Carolina Mountains" (Houghton, 1913) and Mildred Cram's "Old Seaport Towns of the South" (Dodd, 1917). A houseboat, not a motor trip, from Chicago to New Orleans, is in John L. Matthews's "The Log of the 'Easy Way'" (Small, 1911). For the West: Agnes Laut's "Through Our Unknown Southwest (McBride, 1913), Enos A. Mills's "The Rocky Mountain Wonderland" (Houghton, 1915), and John Muir's "The Yosemite" (Century, 1912). Three more general books are H. G. Rhodes's "In Vacation America" (Harper, 1915), John T. Faris's "Historic Shrines of America" (Doran, 1918), and Clifton Johnson's "What to See in America" (Macmillan, 1919), which has a chapter for every State in the Union. Emily Posts's "By Motor to the Golden Gate" (Appleton, 1916) is an account of a trip from New York to San Francisco.

EDMUND LESTER PEARSON

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

WE remember reading, a few years ago, an indictment of democratic education in Denmark, "Lighedens Land," the land of equality. The writer, Dr. E. Lehman, raised a warning voice against the levelling tendencies of the modern educational system. Denmark, he complained, has now grammar schools without Latin and people's schools with a smattering of languages and mathematics. For to level means to lower the standard of the eminent few to the scale of the many. The greatest possible number of students is made happy with the smallest possible education. But a nation's worth should be gauged by the height of its greatest men, rather than by the average height of the masses. Our sentimental nursing of the average has made the nation like to a dense underwood choking the noble stems that try to shoot upward in their growth. Dr. Lehman based on these facts a sweeping condemnation of the democratic system.

Professor Irving Babbitt, writing in the English Journal of February on "English and the Discipline of Ideas," does not blame democracy for the same faults which he deplores in the educational system of this country. "True democracy," he claims, "consists not in lowering the standard but in giving everybody, so far as possible, a chance of measuring up to the standard." The case, therefore, is not one between democracy and aristocracy, but between true and false democracy. It is not democracy that is at fault, but the faults of that democracy which is now blatant. Democracy stands or falls with its true or false conception of liberty, and ours preaches one that is "purely centrifugal, that would get rid of all outer control and then evade or deny openly the need of achieving inner control." "Those who stand for this conception of liberty call themselves idealists; they not only spurn the past but barely tolerate the present; the true home of their spirit is that vast, windy abode, the future." Education entrusted to teachers of this bent of mind fails to build up background in the students. The contact with the past will be lost, unless a reaction sets in "to preserve in a positive and critical form the soul of truth in the two great traditions, classical and Christian, that are crumbling as mere dogma. To study English literature with reference to its intellectual content will do more than anything to make it a serious cultural discipline. Teachers of English have a choice to make between a humanistic conception of their subject and the current naturalistic and humanitarian conceptions."

The Beginning of Education

ALL sentimental journeys, however different the fields they traverse, end alike. Intoxication is their common origin. A fancied summum bonum is their common aim. Their common destiny is to arrive, if anywhere, at self-pity, confusion, despair, and unavailing sorrow. There is the sentimental journey amatorious, with which, perhaps, we are most familiar, since it has been elaborated in fiction ad infinitum if not ad nauseam. This is the sweetest variety, being generally incomplete, poised in a pink dawn of surrender before realization. But there is also the sentimental journey revolutionary with several variations. There is the Rousseau sort, misery intoxicate but still in love with itself. There is the Wordsworthian sort of the Waterloo period, stubbornly shutting its eyes and turning respectable. There is the portentous Byronic sort of the Regency, strutting, glooming, scoffing, complete bud, flower, and fruit. "Get very drunk," says Byron,

> Get very drunk, and when
> You wake with headache, you shall see what then.

But among all the nuances of intoxication none is more alluring than that which meanders after the heavenly maid education, and among all the sentimental journeys after education none latterly has been more piquant than that which moves with all the Bostonian elegance of Henry Adams.

Whatever the lengths to which the sentimental journey is made to go, the essential characteristics of the sentimental soul remain the same. It is forever like a child running down hill. A mysterious power lends it wings, and then when its head gets to going faster than its feet, trips its heels, and bumps its nose in the dirt. The child picks itself up, so hurt, so balked by the mystery of its flight and fall that it weeps and could die for vexation and shame, but continuing incorrigibly to live, endures by laughing angrily and bitterly at itself, and at the universe.

Superficially, of course, there are many differences between the sentimental Byron and the sentimental Henry Adams, but in the case of each the truth that hovered about him without ever alighting turned what was once romantic to burlesque. Byron had imbibed with the children of his generation the notion that happiness consisted in doing what you liked, Nature having saved you the trouble of deciding what that might be, and that freedom or the habit of emotional abandon was the certain means to happiness. Adams had inherited the notion that personal satisfaction was to be found in personal control over the current of human affairs, the direction of the flow being called progress, and determined, it would seem, by the direction in which you happened yourself to be going. The means of securing such control was education or the acquisition of knowledge. Now social circumstances gave to each man singularly ample opportunity for testing his particular open sesame with the result that each found himself impaled upon a dilemma from which he could not escape. The more Byron did what he liked the less other people liked what he did; the less other people liked what he did the less he could do as he liked or the less he liked it when he had done it, the less certain, in other words, of freedom as an infallible means to happiness. As for Adams, the search for knowledge led him to similar confusion. The more he learned the less he discovered himself to know, the more he found to be still unknown, and the less certain he became that what he knew or could know was of any use for the control of progress, the less certain that progress could be controlled or indeed existed at all. What both Byron and Henry Adams thus discovered was not new and need not have been discouraging, but it led neither of them to happiness nor to power but only to a mixture of disconsolate moods. Adams, for instance, had his moments of mysticism when, like Byron, he could drop an Ave Mary after and before, had too big lapses into the old yearning when he could play with the illusion that some unattained knowledge such as French or mathematics might have given him what he had missed. Mostly, however, he despaired, and when not mourning, laughed the sardonic laughter of a disillusion which he took pains to make attractive in the perfect idiom of the best New England culture touched with the acridity of an Adams.

Such was the only lesson which this sentimental pilgrim learned in his quest for education. His experience was not unique; indeed, his book's best claim to permanence in literature is probably due to the faithfulness with which it represents the experience of many men, his countrymen not least of all, with that enterprise of which they have made so much and by which they have learned so little. At least two matters at the present moment give striking evidence of this faithfulness. On the one hand, in order to persuade the American public to pay more adequately for such education as it receives from professors, many of us find it necessary to keep up the delusion that education, whatever at the time being we may call by that name, is the universal solvent for all the several and particular ills from which the public in its various parts may suppose the body politic to be suffering. On the other hand, professors, instead of sharing that delusion, are in many cases leaving or wishing to leave their profession in order to escape, poverty perhaps, but more often the sense of failure and bewildered doubt which our romantic hopes of education necessarily entail. Thus even the Atlantic Monthly, itself no inconsiderable part of our educational system, has just published to all the world the confession of a professor who fears that he is not as important sitting in an academic chair as he might be if engaged in some more dramatic form of human vanity.

Now the experience of Henry Adams as professor is in this connection particularly illuminating. When he began teaching, Harvard had for some time ceased operating upon the simple principle that religious salvation was the purpose of higher learning, but was by no means certain as to what should take salvation's place. Culture might be the proper substitute, but possibly culture amounted to little more than a slight spreading out of the provincial dilettantism which may indeed be the best culture we can even yet attain. Culture, moreover, was at an early point unsettled by the intrusion of science purporting to be the unfailing Midas touch that was to turn all thought to truth. Apostles of science would at any time have admitted, to be sure, that we might feel strange to be without culture or, for that matter, religion as well, but science and hence education in science were what chiefly mattered if the world was to progress—progress, and here we are in an age of iron, coal, and petrol, of slums, famine, and pestilence, of self-determination and mutual extermination, from all of which, of course, a good education is at last to deliver us. Such being the current of ideas in the colleges, Henry Adams was supposed to teach at Harvard something called the science of history, and when we consider what his own education had been, we need not wonder that Harvard gave him a particularly acute fit of pessimism. Not that Harvard was particularly at fault, but Adams, though he confesses after the fact to many misgivings, probably began like most professors of our time by wishing at the bottom of his heart to think of himself as a kind of hierophant inducing contact between the mind of youth and the prime motor of the universe. What he experienced instead every honest professor not altogether new to his job knows but too well: vague, preoccupied youths; faculty meetings often dropping to the nadir of futility; an increasing sense of his own ignorance, a haunting fear that he was himself, if not a dry-as-dust, then a do-nothing in a world where there was much doing, that science and progress and education were probably nothing but a wild-goose chase.

What can a professor say in his own soul to defeat such moods as these, for from such moods no teacher altogether escapes? What, now that the public is endowing him with a higher salary, can he do to endow himself with greater faith? Well, it seems to me that he may begin by admitting without necessarily believing all that the Henry Adamses assert, and then without straining a single point of logic say something like this: Despair is not the end of education or of the business of being a professor or of the hope of human progress. Despair is nothing but the end of a sentimental journey, and at the end of a sentimental journey education and progress, if ever, begin. Suppose that Adams had learned to build the steam engine he so much regretted his inability to make. He would have learned chiefly how poor a thing it was, how little he knew about engines, how little it availed to build them, and how little of anything else he had learned in the process. Thus might it have been if he had learned to build anything else under the sun—one hundred per cent. Americans, for instance, or any of the myriad other things that educators are from time to time exhorted to make out of children. "But," says the author of one of the few wise books in the world on education, "methinks I hear the philosophers saying 'tis a miserable thing for a man to be foolish, to err, to mistake, and to know nothing truly. Nay rather, this is to be a man." In other words, human knowledge consists primarily in the discovery of human ignorance and weakness, and unless we can make that discovery with equanimity we can not begin education. For education, though it may not be a cure, is nevertheless a risk like any other enterprise, a risk of our lives, our dreams, our convictions, and all our goods. It may, on the other hand, be a cure as well as a risk, but whether it be so, whether we can learn what we need to know in order truly to progress, this we can not know except by trying, and may never know even thus until all trying is at an end. One thing, however, and perhaps one thing only we can assert with some confidence, and that is that despite despair we do as a matter of fact try and are not satisfied without trying. To try, and then to whine or to scoff at the little we have gained, the much lost, to complain because we can not eat our cake and have it, too, is to be a sentimental child. To try, accepting the risk, is to begin one's education. To try willingly is to be free; to try cheerfully is to be happy. Admit the worst, that it is all a gamble whether with all our trying we can ever know anything truly, and we must admit, too, that this gamble is as good as any other a man may stake his life upon, that one may as well risk his life on being a professor or on getting education as on being a maker of steam engines or of war or of money or of what you will, even though playing the one game rather than any of the others convict one of the kind of folly which Erasmus praises. "For there are two obstacles to the knowledge of things, Modesty that casts a mist before the understanding, and Fear that, having fanci'd a danger, disswades us from the attempt. But from these Folly sufficiently frees us, and few there are that rightly understand of what great advantage it is to blush at nothing and attempt everything."

WILLIAM HALLER

THE question of teachers' salaries has now received considerable attention, even if the obvious steps have not always been taken. Among the many charts and tables in Dr. Evenden's thorough report

(Continued on page 582)

The Largest Wireless Station

The largest wireless station in the world, situated at Honolulu, H.I., is equipped with a 300 K.W. Crocker-Wheeler Radio Generator. The C-W Company manufactures generators for land stations, aeroplanes, dirigibles, submarine chasers and a wide variety of special purposes.

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

New York
Boston
Syracuse
Chicago
Cleveland
Birmingham

Pittsburgh
Newark
New Haven
Philadelphia
Baltimore
San Francisco

Guy Emerson, Vice-President, National Bank of Commerce, New York,

says:

"The steady growth of the Review during the past year has been a fact of distinct importance to the intellectual life of America. Liberal thinking has not had its proper medium of expression. Radical propaganda has been accorded more than adequate treatment. The Review is doing much to make the balance true. Its success must be on its merits, but beyond the increasing literary merit and readability of the paper, there is a vital consideration in which all men of liberal tendencies should be interested, namely, the vigorous and at the same time orderly progress of American democracy."

$5 a year

140 Nassau Street
New York

(Continued from page 580)
(Commission Series, No. 6, N. E. A., 1919) none is more convincing than that which shows, p. 110, that in five populous States even high-school teachers receive less average pay than machinists, lathers, bricklayers, inside wiremen, workers in structural iron, blacksmiths, machine tenders (printing), compositors, glaziers, plumbers, carpenters, hod-carriers, and bakers. It is an imposing list—from the point of view of the underpaid workingman! It is in fact an arraignment of our national judgment of what is worth paying for, when on close examination it reveals that the average for all these workers is more than double the average salary for teachers of the United States. It is no longer worth saying gently that, in all fairness to the teachers and our self-respect, salaries should be raised. The case is one of dire necessity; something must be done at once if our children are to find any teachers behind the desks. For who would fardels bear, who would grunt and sweat under a weary life of class-room toil when he could carry bricks for twice the pay!

AMONG all the pleas for increased pay of teachers one rarely hears a call for a few much larger salaries at the very top. Those pay-rolls which we are constantly told should be increased from fifty to eighty per cent., in some instances from eighty to over one hundred per cent., are nearly always at the bottom of the scale. Teachers in the middle distance may be happy if their salaries are advanced thirty to forty per cent., while those at the top are to be contented with a ten to thirty per cent. increase. There is no doubt some justice in the emphasis. The teacher at the minimum wage simply can not live in comfort without a substantial increase, while the teacher at the top is past the starvation line; a large increase for him means not merely all the bread he needs, but a flivver or a trip abroad or domestic felicity. Yet is not such a condition, and a little more, just what should be held before the successful teacher? As things are it takes something akin to the dedication of a martyr to induce a man to work at any profession when $4,000 or $5,000 is all he will make even if he achieves phenomenal success. Careful distribution would save the total budget from increase beyond the figures suggested by Dr. Evenden and other experts. Fewer teachers, to be sure, would receive the $4,000 or $5,000 held out by the new rates, but if the revision of rates were carried out all along the line, no one salary group could be greatly reduced in number, while many would work eagerly for $3,000 or even $2,000 if they knew that a teacher or two somewhere short of heaven was receiving $10,000 or $15,000.

The Collapse of Japan's After-War Boom

THE collapse of Japan's after-war boom has been impending for months; a glance back over the last quarter-century of her growth explains it. There is a belief current in Japan that every ten years international complications bring the Japanese Empire into collision with some Power standing in the way. Little, however, is said about this producing national dividends in its resulting economic expansion. Yet this is borne out by the Chino-Japanese War in 1894, the Russo-Japanese War in 1904-05, and the entrance of Japan into the European struggle in 1914. One part of the picture may be got by the rise of the per capita of Japan's whole foreign trade from a little over yen 5 a person in 1894 to yen 14 at the time of the Russian struggle, yen 22 at the opening of the Great War, and yen 62 in 1919. The actual figures are worthy of note:

Japan's Foreign Trade
(In 1000's of yen)

Year	Exports	Imports	Total
1894	113,246	117,481	230,728
1904	319,260	371,360	690,621
1914	591,101	595,735	1,186,837
1919	2,098,872	2,173,313	4,272,185

Another angle on this acceleration of Japan's economic development after a war appears in the rise of joint stock enterprises. When one remembers that the first modern corporate undertaking dates from 1873, the growth in the paid-up capital of Japanese business from yen 249,762,000 at the time of the Chinese War to yen 1,114,227,000 in 1904, yen 2,068,786,000 in 1914, and approximately yen 5,720,000,000 to-day seems extraordinary. But the other side of the picture must not be forgotten. That is, the boom days which have always followed Japan's victorious peace bring in their train the economic consequences of over-expansion, the speculative mania, and national mal-adjustment.

The more immediate background reveals 1919 as a turning point of major importance in Japan's development. The balance of trade during the four years succeeding 1914 was heavy on the side of exports from Japan to markets which the war situation made more than inviting—China, the Middle East, the British Empire, Russia, and the United States. This accumulated favorable balance of trade reached the sum of yen 1,408,000,000, but conditions operating towards the end of 1919 produced a drastic change in the trend of commerce with an excess of imports amounting to yen 74,441,000.

Had it not been for the fact that Japan was realizing the fruits of her participation in the Great War from the end of 1914, no such tremendous changes in her trade could have occurred. During this period—as after every war—the Japanese business world extended itself in every direction. In its outstanding developments, it was a carefully controlled expansion not directed by captains of Japanese industry, but finding its inspiration in the nexus existing between Japan's Big Business and the inner Government, which really guides the Mikado's land.

This must be clearly appreciated in the light of what has happened. With Japan, unlike the United States, her economic life is a means to an end. Japan's competitive strength lies neither in her natural resources nor in her business capacity; it is this highly coördinated Government-backed business, giving by political manipulation marginal advantages to the Japanese vested interests at every turn. Economic centralization has made Big Business truly the partner of the Japanese Government in its schemes of state, and nowhere is the business world so responsive to governmental opinion. Ill-founded though it may seem, when the flow of business in 1919 is analyzed, the dominant note in official circles was one of encouragement in every line of enterprise. Stock flotations during the war period, according to official sources, present the following figures:

Japan's Stock Flotations
(In 1000's of yen)

Year	Total
1915	197,091
1916	566,511
1917	1,132,912
1918	1,147,395
1919	1,914,008

While a considerable portion of these sums are nothing more than yen on paper, it is well to remember the bona fide operations are great enough to require most of the funds available in 1920 and 1921 to complete the payment of stock subscriptions unless the enterprises are to fail. Much of this represents the expansion of old concerns, though the trend through last year was highly speculative on the whole. More light on the promotions, from the standpoint of the extensions of credit, appears in the data prepared by the Mitsui Bank.

Relation of Stock Promotions to Loans

Year	Total in 1000's of yen
	Capital Stock	Loans	Total
1917	2,003,601	73,775	2,077,376
1918	2,955,062	224,945	3,180,007
1919	4,137,169	164,370	4,301,539

Although the divergence in the estimates of the total stock flotations may be taken as the maximum and minimum, the contraction of loans is a striking indication of what was expected in 1920.

As a matter of fact, the Bank of Japan advanced its discount rate several times towards the close of 1920. On the other hand, the steps that were taken by the Government to check the pyramiding prices, declining export balance, and speculative wave generally, carried with them the reassurance that it would not "interfere with prevailing tendencies and would rather encourage them." The tightening of the money market, however, was off-set by a calculated resort to the further inflation of the currency; the total for 1919 was in the neighborhood of 33 per cent., mostly in the last part of the year, and increasing the Bank of Japan's notes, as compared with the pre-war situation, about 7,700,000,000 yen.

Men in a position to know what was occurring raised lone voices here and there manifesting full appreciation of the impending crisis. But the Government optimism set the prevailing tone. A decisive factor in the situation is to be found in the raw silk market—accounting for one-fifth of Japan's exports, and as high as six-sevenths of the total raw silk production finding its way to the United States. For the past twelve months Japanese interests have been speculating heavily, pools manipulating the market to sky-rocket prices which had already advanced from a pre-war average of yen 800-900 a bale to yen 1,670 in 1919. By the middle of the year this had risen 40 per cent., capped with a spectacular jump after the July relapse, bringing the price to yen 3,520. Speculating interests began to find themselves saddled with over-stocks after the New Year, the price having outrun the foreign demand, and many were carrying their 1919 hoarding into 1920 in self-protection. The break began in the last of January; prices had climbed about 350 per cent. in twelve months to yen 4,500, doubling between October and January.

This strain on the market came at a critical time. Premier Hara had just warned Japan that retrenchment was in order, observing: "The large number of joint stock concerns of all sorts, which are now being promoted, can hardly be regarded as a healthy economic sign, and judging from what occurred after the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese War, it is not improbable that the crash may come at any moment." A dissection of the months antecedent to the April crisis reveals seven conditions at work to show that the Government and those on the inside were thoroughly cognizant of the situation impending. (1) The balance of trade swung sharply against Japan between January and March, total excess of

(Continued on page 584)

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED

LACKAWANNA

THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street — Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mrs. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell..........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

(Continued from page 583)
imports being yen 260,000,000, or nearly equal to 50 per cent. of Japan's—for the first quarter of 1920. The month of March, with its 135 million yen excess of imports, constituted a record-breaker with the promise of a billion yen on the debit side of the national balance sheet if prevailing tendencies were maintained.

(2) The shipping slump has aggravated the problem of Japan's foreign remittances by the decline in freight charges due her from abroad, and has reduced profits, many of the smaller operators being in difficulties, while the general reaction on the basic industries through the cessation of construction is serious.

(3) Rampant speculation developed in the face of a tightening money market as promoters rushed flotations to get capital pledged before the crash came; thus the funds available through 1920 and 1921 are already hypothecated unless wholesale losses are to be entailed through the failure of partially consummated deals, and there is little likelihood that Japan's billion yen gold reserves held abroad—now liquidating the unfavorable balances—will come to Japan as specie instead of being defrayed in goods.

(4) Investment has been reduced by the inflation of prices and the tendency towards reduced dividends, with the cessation of abnormal war earnings.

(5) Foreign competition, since the armistice, has been increasing in Japan's domestic markets due to the high level of prices and the need of replenishing equipment quickly.

(6) At the same time, the position of Japanese manufacturers in overseas markets is not encouraging, as exchange has turned against them in countries of the East, hitherto a war monopoly virtually of Japan, and prices of production are too high in Japanese industry under existing conditions.

(7) Political complications have hit Japanese business heavily; this is especially true of the economic reaction against Japan's foreign policy in China, expressed in a more effective boycotting of Japanese manufactures than is apparent, and now being duplicated in Asiatic Russia as an outcome of the forward policy pursued by the Japanese War Office diplomacy.

The end of this pyramiding business was definitely in sight when March settlements were made with serious difficulty. The test was the failure of the markets to rally in April from the strain of the previous month's closing. The clapping down of the Government censorship on what is actually taking place shows that Japan is by no means through with her crisis. If deflation can be carried out with no further breaks symptomatic of panic, Japan will have rounded the most critical year in her swing over to an industrialized country. We shall not know what to expect until the mid-year, as a great deal depends on the raw silk situation and foreign purchases—which means the price the United States will pay for the bulk of Japan's production.

Shrewd as are Japanese statesmen and their financiers, the game is out of their hands. During the Great War they kept Japan's export trade financed by the Government backing the assumption of the accumulating foreign credits when the limit of the exchange banks was soon reached. When the deposits to Japan's account in New York and London were used up, the Government resorted to the issuance of paper money secured by the identical credits it was moving to protect. The measures were taken in 1918, manifested themselves in 1919, and must be solved to-day. That depends, however, on the share of trade Japan can secure in a normalizing world. A great deal of the answer rests in American hands, and it is not without irony that Japan's economic difficulties came at the moment when she threatened the "independent financing" of the Chinese Republic.

CHARLES HODGES

Books Received

FICTION

Cabell, James B. The Cream of the Jest. McBride.

Cannan, Gilbert. Time and Eternity. Doran

Ibañez, V. Blasco. Woman Triumphant. Dutton.

Irwin, Wallace. Trimmed with Red. Doran.

Maugham, W. Somerset. The Explorer. Doran.

Merwin, Samuel. Hills of Han. Bobbs-Merrill.

Pryde, Anthony. Marqueray's Duel. McBride.

Thurston, E. Temple. Sheepskins and Grey Russet. Putnam. $2.50.

Waugh, Alec. The Loom of Youth. Doran.

Wells, H. G. Love and Mr. Lewisham. Doran.

ART

Villiers, Frederic. Days of Glory. Introduction by Philip Gibbs. Doran.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Benedict, Bertram. A History of the Great War. Vol. II. New York: Bureau of National Literature.

Cantacuzene, Princess. Russian People. Scribner. $3 net.

Czernin, Count Ottokar. In the World War. Harper.

Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan. A History of the Great War: Vol. VI—The British Campaign in France and Flanders. Doran.

Fisher, Lord. Memories and Records. 2 volumes. Doran.

Gibbs, Philip. Now It Can Be Told. Harpers.

Holme, John G. The Life of Leonard Wood. Doubleday, Page.

O'Shaughnessy, Edith. Alsace, in Rust and Gold. Harper.

THE REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 56 New York, Saturday, June 5, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 585

Editorial Articles:

The Problem at Chicago 588
American Isolation 589
The German Elections 590
From Cow to Consumer 591

The Political Parties in Germany. By Dr. Paul Rohrbach 592
The House of Piotr Ivanovitch. By J. E. Conner 593
Anatole France as Preacher. By Herbert L. Stewart 595
Correspondence 597
The Goncourt Prize. By A. G. H. Spiers 599

Book Reviews:

Indictments Against Two Nations 600
One of the Ablest Members of the Supreme Court 601
Something Different 602
Free International Waterways 603

The Run of the Shelves 604
Impressions de Voyage—III. By Caspar F. Goodrich 606
The Atavus. By Weare Holbrook 606

Drama:

Dramas for the Reader. By O. W. Firkins 607

Problems of Labor and Capital—IV. By Morris L. Ernst 610
The Whitley System in the British Civil Service. By E. S. Roscoe 611

FREDERIC HARRISON'S article in the Fortnightly Review, long extracts from which are given in a cable dispatch to the Sun and New York Herald, brings to the front an aspect of the League of Nations deadlock to which Americans would do well to give more attention than they have done. Especially is this passage in the veteran publicist's article worth pondering:

> It is plain that the league covenant and the President's fourteen points were the American conditions which the republic brought, with the enormous weight of her wealth, her inexhaustible armies and her natural resources, into the war. But for that covenant, Great Britain, France and Italy would have made a quick, plain, direct peace in some form with their enemies.
>
> But the terms of American intervention entirely transformed the whole situation. Civilized nations had been banded into a moral alliance. Peace had been bound up with the American Utopia and fifty nations of Europe and Asia had been fired with a passion for self-assertion at the call of the biggest of the Entente Powers.
>
> Then the domestic quarrel in the American Republic broke out. She withdrew from action in the council, but she did not withdraw from words. Refusing to meet the council, refusing men, money and goods and her own creation, the League of Nations, she does not cease to complain and to interfere, both officially and unofficially, in the doings of her own allies and the execution of her own treaty.

Mr. Wilson of course expected the Covenant to be ratified, but when he found that it could not be ratified, in any reasonable time, unless he made certain concessions, he was in the position of a man who had advised his associates to make profound alterations in their plans, under an engagement on his part to effect certain essential arrangements. Has he ever considered whether it was not his absolute duty to come as near effecting these arrangements as possible? Has he considered that long delay might impose upon the nations that had trusted him evils of unspeakable magnitude and gravity? Has he asked himself whether he had a right to proceed upon his own individual notions of what is best, without consulting the wishes or opinions of those who had placed their trust in his promise?

THE Presidential primary, at its present stage of development, is an ugly, clumsy, expensive, and almost futile piece of political machinery. The feature of it that has been most conspicuous in the public mind during the closing stages of the Republican pre-convention campaign is the expenditure of large sums of money. In the case of General Wood's campaign, the adverse impression is produced not so much by the total—which, considering the extent of his operations, is not greatly out of proportion with others—as the circumstance that so large a part came from, or was guaranteed by, a single wealthy man. The newspapers, as a rule—and the people, too, we believe—are showing a good deal of quiet good sense in recognizing that a primary campaign can not be carried on without spending much money. They are not being stampeded into any hysterical outcry of corruption; and, while General Wood's chances have been injured by the campaign-fund developments, they have by no means been destroyed.

SENATOR JOHNSON'S decision not to bolt may be variously interpreted. His devoted followers have, of course, set him down as a good fellow. Americans with alien hearts are doubtless already casting about for another candidate who will advance their special interests. Meanwhile Republican managers, whose forte is figures, have probably come to the conclusion that Johnson has a feeling for figures, too. This is not to say that the California Senator is no longer to be thought of as a power at the Chicago Convention. But if the point has been reached at which he thinks it indiscreet to adopt the old ruse of expressing supreme confidence now, with the chance of crying fraud later, forecasting the outcome of the Chicago Convention is, by so much at least, simplified.

THE New York Times may be all right editorially, but in its handling of news it shows shocking inefficiency. A paper like that ought to know that when Debs was notified of his nomination for the Presidency, the scene that was enacted, and the words that were spoken, should have received as little prominence as possible, and that the story, even on an inside page, should have been skillfully colored so as to make a damaging impression. Instead of that, we find it presented with large and alluring headlines on the first page, filling a whole column there, and continued on the third. And that is not the worst of it. The scene is described in simple and sympathetic language; the reader gets the impression that Debs is suffering imprisonment in the spirit not of spectacular martyrdom, but of calm and dignified suffering for a great cause. Eloquent and moving passages are given from the speech of notification and from Debs's reply. What does the Times mean by thus betraying the interests which it professes to serve—which, as every soap-box orator in the country knows, all "capitalist" editors have sold their souls to serve? If we can't get this sort of news suppressed, or distorted, or colored, in the Times, what good is there in having a "capitalist press" at all?

"A FREE man may stop work when he pleases, and the consequences are no one's affair but his own." So Mr. Gompers, in the Carnegie Hall debate with Governor Allen, of Kansas. Let us see. If the right to strike is wholly without limitation, except the pleasure of the striker, it would be "no one's affair but his own" in case it should please him to abandon the wheel of a steamer in the St. Lawrence rapids, for example, with the possible loss of life of most or all the passengers on board. Mr. Gompers would have to admit, if pressed, that there are conceivable limits beyond which the possible consequences of a strike are very emphatically the affair of others besides the striker himself. Society has become very sure, and Mr. Gompers is doubtless very sure, that certain practices which formerly pleased many employers of labor could no longer be regarded as no one's affair but their own, and legal requirements are fast making these practices impossible. We may readily grant to Mr. Gompers that the right to strike, in general, rests on a sound basis and can not be swept away, consistently with the fundamental tenets of freedom. It does not follow, however, that there are no possible cases or circumstances which would justify a temporary or partial modification of that right. Whether Kansas has gone too far, in the legislation which sprang from a desire to make impossible a repetition of the suffering caused by the coal strike, is primarily a question of fact and of expediency.

THERE is little more to be said about the two-billion-dollar bonus; the scheme has long appeared moribund, and the House in passing it showed it up for the thing it is. A good deal might be said about the high sense of responsibility, the far-seeing statesmanship, exhibited by the one hundred and seventy-four Republicans and the one hundred and twelve Democrats who with cynical levity did what they could to make representative government a laughing-stock. The time for saying it effectively, however, is next November. In their opinion of the action of the present House sincere advocates of a bonus and its vastly more numerous opponents will be pretty much of one mind.

WHAT Gregory Krassin, by coming to London, and what the Soviet Government, by sending him, hope to achieve is clear enough; the mysterious part in this new act of the Russian tragedy is played by Mr. Lloyd George. Was Bonar Law's denial of British material and moral support of the Polish offensive not exclusively made to dispel suspicions at home, but also with a view to placating the Government at Moscow? If so, why should Lloyd George and his Cabinet Ministers be so anxious to negotiate with a Soviet mission which can not achieve success except at the risk of a fresh rupture between England and France? Besides, if the Soviet régime is on the verge of a collapse, as we are told it is, and can only be saved by a speedy import of rolling stock and machinery for Russia's ruined railroads and industries, why should England go out of her way to help prevent what, until Denikin's defeat, she spent millions in trying to bring about? The only reply that seems to meet these questions is that the Bolshevist activities in Persia and Transcaucasia are causing greater alarm to the Government in London than it would be safe to confess, and, that being so, there is reason to accept with some caution the sanguine predictions of an impending Bolshevist catastrophe. A cessation of Soviet activities in Asia will be demanded from Krassin as the price for which Great Britain will consent to a resumption of trade relations with Russia. However, the French Government will also have a say in the matter, and it is not likely that Paris will consent to this way of safeguarding British interests in Asia without securing the necessary guarantees for the safety of her financial interests in Russia.

IN contrast to Lloyd George's ambiguous policy towards Russia, the attitude of M. Millerand is absolutely clear and consistent. He refused the British Premier's invitation to have M. Cambon be present at the conversations between members of the British Cabinet and the Russian envoy on the ground that France is duly represented on the Allied Economic Council. If it is trade transactions that have to be discussed in London, the French representative on that Council is fully authorized to speak on behalf of the French Government; if political dealings are contemplated, France remains unshaken in her determination not to take part in them. The economic revival of Russia is not the end which Krassin, any more than Lloyd George, has in view. To the Russian it is only a means to an end, the world revolution which the Soviet Government, once firmly established in power by the improvement of economic conditions in Russia, hopes to bring about under the auspices of the Third Internationale. It is a wise and honorable policy which refrains from any action implying recognition of a Government which confessedly aims at the overthrow of that international organization to whose maintenance both France and England, as members of the League of Nations, stand solemnly pledged.

ALIEN minorities in the newly created States of Central Europe have a claim to the protection of the League of Nations, but the security thus gained imposes on them the duty to avoid all provocation in their dealings with the ruling nationalities of the countries they inhabit. The Germans in Czechoslovakia have not yet learned to behave in accordance with this maxim. At the opening meeting of the first elected Parliament at Prague, the seventy German members shouted fierce protests against the use of the Czech language by the Speaker, and when Masaryk, after his election to the Presidency, was presented to the Assembly, the German leader sprang to his feet and led his followers ostentatiously out. This is not the way for the Germans in Bohemia to secure respect either for themselves, their rights, or their nationality. Nor can they increase, by assuming this attitude, the world's confidence in the moral conversion of the German nation as a whole.

THE Freeman, in commenting on the Interchurch World Movement, alleges that "the masses" distrust the church because, more than for any other reason, it gave its active support to the war. It may be remarked that the masses, as such, have no unified attitude towards the church. In any hundred men taken out of "the masses" at random will be found a group of firm adherents to the church, a group in opposition, and others of various shades of indifference. But that the masses distrust the church specifically because of its support of the war is contrary to plain facts within the vision of anyone whose eyes are not wilfully closed. For every man who took the attitude of the Freeman, scores of these same masses were with wholehearted loyalty upholding the cause of the war by every means in their power. For every woman who took that attitude, the knitting-needles of a hundred were cheerfully contributing to the comfort of willing representatives of the masses on the field of battle.

MRS. HENRY FAWCETT, in her life of Molesworth, long ago pointed out how necessary to the pacifist is the war of words; how, renouncing combat on the battlefield, he must needs impart a tenfold virulence to his arguments and denunciations. What persons of a certain sort forswear they must compensate for in some way; what they lack they must make theirs through the imagination. The worship of Bolshevism and other violent forms of social adventure is nowhere so ardent as in the circles of the futile dilettanti. The helpless shut-in takes the wings of morning to pierce Barcan deserts or thread fearsome jungles; the utter failure in the world as it is, exultantly sees himself a Lenin or a Peters in the world as it ought to be. Even men of remarkable powers in one direction, but in other ways hopelessly handicaped, see themselves champions and victors in the fields where they are impotent. Many of the pre-war virilists, says the Manchester Guardian, were of this type. There was Stevenson, the invalid, who "figured himself in voluptuous reveries as master of a privateer or commanding a troop of irregular cavalry"; Henley, the lifelong cripple, whose pages reek with physical combat; Synge, the consumptive, "who scorned everything but the life of violence in the open," and even Andrew Lang, frail and "the most donnish of bookmen," whose mind was often, if not usually, running on raids and slaughters. The list might be greatly extended. And so, thinking it all over, perhaps we ought to be more charitable to the parlor Bolshevists. They have high and plentiful warrant for their exercise when they rave and imagine vain things. Though ridiculous, they serve a purpose in reillustrating an old law.

HOW proletarian sabotage always and everywhere, as one rapt enthusiast has recently phrased it, "moves progressively towards truth, beauty, love," is well illustrated in an episode from South Australia told by the Adelaide correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor. A campaign of "ca' canny," followed by a strike, in the Government Produce Department, fizzled out after a time, and a normal output was resumed. Thereupon, an epidemic of a more serious form of sabotage broke out in the State Engineering Workshops for the construction and repair of rolling stock. Rivets were put in the reverse way, and the tails were so slightly burred that they would have worked loose as soon as the cars began to run. But before any of the cars were taken out to collapse on the tracks and thereby destroy human life, the plot was discovered by the chief mechanical engineer. The somewhat matter-of-fact boilermakers' union, to which these mechanics belonged, was unable to regard the affair transcendentally and to see in it an expression of truth, beauty, and love. On the contrary, the union formally denounced the men, declared that the work "was deliberately bad and dangerous to the travelling public," that it "is a wicked thing to do bad work on rolling stock of any kind" and fined the devotees of the new faith $25 each. The penalty will no doubt be regarded in the coteries of the illuminate as an outrageous and a reactionary one. Evidently the doctrine of the beatification of proletarian sabotage is not making its way without occasional reverses.

AN anonymous writer, using the initials S. E., editorially certified to be a "professor in an American college," has been wrestling in the columns of the Socialist Review with the subject, "The 'Free Speech' Fallacy." The keystone of the liberalist edifice, it seems, is the liberal's faith in "freedom of discussion." But under capitalism, according to the professor, there isn't any such thing. Even where there is legal or formal freedom (which at any time may be restricted), there is no positive freedom in the sense of adequate means or opportunity of discussion. For positive freedom "equally large and constant audiences must be available to rival ideas and programmes." When a small group, in the high and holy name of the proletariat, overturns the capitalist régime, then and not till then can we have "freedom of discussion." That is, all those who approve of the new régime may freely express their approval. As for those who do not approve—well, the thing to do with them is to label them "counter-revolutionaries," and then silence them. The demand for "freedom of discussion" by any one labelled a "counter-revolutionary" is, of course, the height of effrontery.

The Problem at Chicago

IT is not a happy situation that confronts the Republican National Convention which meets at Chicago next Tuesday. The difficulties with which it is beset are of a wholly different character from those that one associates with the history of past Presidential struggles. The contests in the primaries, so far from clarifying, have only further clouded the situation. Such rivalries as those between Conkling and Blaine, between McKinley and Reed, brought out factional animosities more sharply defined, but less difficult to handle, than those with which the coming Convention will have to grapple. Even the Convention of 1912, though confronted with an ominous schism, and one that in fact resulted in disaster, had a comparatively simple question to answer, and had to answer it with a plain Yes or No. At Chicago next week, there is an ill-defined conflict, big with possibilities of harm to the party, which every man realizes, but of which no man can define the exact character.

The difficulty relates both to platform and to candidates; and on the very eve of the Convention no way out of it presents itself clearly in any direction. Of the three most notable men that have been in the public mind as possible nominees not one is in the usual sense a commanding political figure. Senator Johnson, who is the most political figure of the three, has shown himself capable of rallying a big following, but it is a following of nondescript character. Furthermore his candidacy would so obviously fail to be representative of the party as a whole that his selection by the Convention is almost unthinkable; and neither his principles nor his record have the stuff in them that could bear the strain of the Presidential canvass. The other two of the three men we have in mind are, of course, General Wood and Mr. Hoover. Both of these men have behind them a record of distinguished achievement that has received high national recognition; but neither of them has been a political leader. The hostility of the Johnson forces is a great obstacle to the choice of either Wood or Hoover; and there is not behind either of these men that kind of intense political force that makes for the ultimate overcoming of any opposition, however powerful—the kind of force, for example, which caused Woodrow Wilson to triumph over Champ Clark in the long-drawn-out struggle at Baltimore in 1912.

As regards platform, it does not look as though there would be any great difficulty in drawing one up that would be fairly satisfactory to the party and the country, except so far as regards the question of the treaty and the League of Nations. But on the other hand, there seems to be little prospect of the platform containing anything that will awaken enthusiasm or keen interest. The Convention will have the benefit of the careful and systematic work that has been done by the Advisory Committee to the Republican National Committee. This, if availed of, will serve to make the platform rational and respectable, which will be a thing to be thankful for; but whether it will afford a strong basis for effective public appeal is another question. And as regards the treaty and the League, the party is in a most difficult situation. It looks as though the best it could do, in view of the utter disorganization within the party, is to make a declaration that will hold together everybody who is not in favor of accepting the treaty without reservations. A master hand could do better than that; but no master hand is in sight.

A few months ago, it might well have been thought that even with a colorless platform and a commonplace candidate the Republican party could go into the campaign with a certainty of victory. The chances are still strongly in its favor, but the chance of defeat is far from negligible. The danger of widespread disaffection is manifestly indicated in the story of the Johnson movement. And on the Democratic side a distinct possibility of the injection of new life has recently come to the fore. That party has, in the person of Ambassador John W. Davis, a resource which, if availed of, may give to the forthcoming campaign a character quite different from that which it would have under the leadership of any other of the men that have been named for the candidacy. His exceptional fitness, both in ability and character, are recognized with singular unanimity; and he has been just sufficiently identified with the present Administration to commend him to supporters of President Wilson without burdening him with the odium which in so many directions the Administration has incurred. And, whether they nominate Mr. Davis or not, the Democrats have an advantage which, in a situation so plastic as that of to-day, is of incalculable value, in that they will not have to make their decision until several weeks after the Republicans have gone to the country with theirs. It will not take any extraordinary amount of political sagacity to draw important conclusions from the way in which the work of the Chicago Convention will have been received by the country.

The Republican Convention will have before it two conspicuous candidates neither of whom has, like Wood or Hoover, been identified with affairs of national magnitude, but both of whom have political records that afford a substantial claim to the nomination, Governor Lowden and Governor Coolidge. Lowden's claim rests on solid achievement in the fiscal affairs of the State of Illinois, and especially on his introduction of a budget system; and altogether it appears as though he were the kind of a man who, in ordinary times, would make an entirely satisfactory President. Governor Coolidge, without having had, so far as we know, any special fiscal problem to deal with, makes a much more vivid appeal to the imagination. It is not only his conduct in relation to the police strike, but the tone and character of a number of his utterances that make him an outstanding figure. One has, in regard to him, something of the kind of feeling that the country had in regard to Cleveland in the beginning of his career in New York. One feels that with him the fundamental principles of American government and American life are so ingrained a part of his being that he could be trusted to meet any situation with courage and with practical wisdom. And a consideration that is by no means of minor importance is the character that a man like Coolidge would be likely to impart to the campaign. It is not only that his speeches by their vigor and terseness would be good "vote-getters"; something more than the question of the chances of the campaign is involved. His habit is to speak firmly and to the point; and from the present look of things it seems that nothing will be more needful to the country than that its political thought should be clarified—focused upon real issues, instead of being dissipated into all manner of vagueness.

There are other men upon whom the choice of the Convention may fall; the chance of the nomination of a "dark horse" is, in a situation like the present, always considerable. Nor is the mere fact of a man having been a "dark horse" inconsistent with the possibility of his being an inspiring candidate. But the prospect of such an eventuality is very slight. The one man whose selection would carry with it a thrill of high hope is Herbert Hoover. With his name is associated the thought of great things done for the world in that agony through which it passed so recently, an agony in which our hearts were engaged as nothing else could engage them, an agony which, alas, is being prolonged but which finds our country a paralyzed, and apparently almost indifferent, onlooker. With his name, too, is associated the thought of administrative genius and executive efficiency, which would arouse high expectations of help in the economic tangle in which our affairs are involved. The nomination of Hoover would arouse in millions of breasts a kind of hopeful expectancy to which the country has long been a stranger. If the question were solely as to where lay the greatest possibilities of immediate constructive achievement, there could be little doubt as to the answer.

But even from the highest standpoint of patriotic foresight, it can not truthfully be said that this consideration ought to be regarded as conclusive. In a certain sense, and that by no means a remote or unsubstantial one, the turning to Hoover is a sign of political poverty. The Presidency of the United States is an office charged not only with colossal responsibilities and magnificent opportunities in the administrative field, but with a political potency to which there is not, anywhere in the world, even a distant parallel. Whatever crisis may arise in the clash of classes or interests, in the struggle between opposing political, economic, or social ideals, the man who is invested with the power of the Presidency retains it undisturbed for four years. And one may say without gross exaggeration that in the case of a strong man with a mighty hold on the public imagination, that power is, for the time being, almost anything that he may be inclined to make it.

When we elect a President, we put ourselves into his hands in a degree unknown to the parliamentary system that obtains in countries like Great Britain or France. When this is done in the case of a man with a long or well-defined political record, that record, together with his personal character and ability, usually furnishes sufficient assurance of the attitude and conduct which may be expected of him in any new situation that may arise. In the case of Mr. Hoover, character and ability are all that could possibly be desired; but he has not been tested in the field of politics or government. Splendid as is his record, it does not furnish the kind of assurance of safety that a much more ordinary political record would be quite capable of affording. There is no scale by which one can measure the claims of safety on the one hand, and those of high possibilities of extraordinary service on the other. But it is not a mean or pusillanimous thing to attempt to weigh them in the balance against each other. If Hoover should be elected President, we should have reason to look forward to great things; but we should not have as much reason for absolute confidence in the safety of the Republic as if Coolidge were elected. And eight years of a President of unusual gifts, who has pursued high aims in his own extraordinary fashion, has borne in upon many of us a keen appreciation of what may be said in behalf of a President of less extraordinary quality, provided he be known to be of sterling stuff.

American Isolation

THE President could not do otherwise than veto the Knox resolution declaring a state of peace with Germany. It was not a good way of dealing with our relations either with Germany or with our associates in the war. It was not necessary as a means of bringing to an end the operation in our domestic affairs of the war-time laws. This could have been accomplished by direct repeal. It was merely a move in the game of "passing the buck" between President and Senate. Both its passage by the Senate and its rejection by the President were foregone conclusions—almost matters of mechanical routine.

Of far greater interest than the act of rejection is the character of the veto message. Mr. Wilson rests the veto neither on justice nor on practical detail, but on broad grounds of national honor and national policy. And the large issue that he thus once again brings to the front is a real one. We shall have to keep it in mind throughout the approaching Presidential campaign—and after that, until the nation has taken some definite position. The veto message, brief as it is, touches many points, but the heart of it is in this passage:

> The Treaty as signed at Versailles has been rejected by the Senate of the United States, though it has been ratified by Germany. By that rejection and by its methods we had in effect declared that we wish to draw apart and pursue objects and interests of our own, unhampered by any connections of interest or of purpose with other Governments and peoples.

For the situation which he thus describes, the President must himself be held in a preponderant degree responsible. He has never recognizd the duty of maintaining our "connections of interest or of purpose with other Governments and peoples" by gaining for a feasible and moderate compromise the support of those who, while not following him to the letter, were sincerely desirous that the country should bear its rightful part in the reëstablishment of the world's order, the securing of the world's peace, the restoration of the world's prosperity. Month by month, the hopelessness of anything being accomplished has sapped the nation's interest, until at last it almost seems as though the nation itself were ready to declare for that isolation which, when the treaty was first presented to the Senate, was advocated only by a few extremists. Whether Lodge and his followers were right or wrong, is not the question; what has certainly been wrong is the President's unvarying assumption that he alone is entitled to form a judgment, and that if that judgment is not accepted everything must go to smash.

In the recognition of this, in the pondering of it at this moment, much more is involved than the mere allocation of blame. The nation has not, in point of fact, taken its stand on the issue. Between the nation and the issue there has been interposed the impassable obstacle of a political deadlock. It is of the first importance that the public should be keenly aware of this fact; because the surest way to make our position, for good and all, that which the President describes, is to spread abroad the notion that that position has already been actually taken by the nation, or by the majority party in the nation. It has not. Even in their final form—and they might almost certainly have been put through many months ago in much milder form—the reservations left a great deal of the League Covenant effective. Above all, their acceptance would have put us into the League. To prevent us from cutting loose from all connection with our associates in the war, and from all participation in the work of world restoration, that is still the one way, and it is still open. To create the impression that it is not, is to do the greatest disservice that can, at this juncture, be done to the cause of coöperation between America and Europe.

The German Elections

THE decision of the Conference held at Hythe to postpone the meeting at Spa until after the German elections for the Reichstag, should be taken by the German people as a flattering recognition of its increased importance. In the days before the war it mattered little to the non-German world what party sent the greatest number of representatives to Berlin, as the Reichstag under the Imperial régime had only a shadow of control over Germany's international relations. Only the growth of German Social-Democracy under Bebel's eminent leadership attracted attention abroad. A more and more industrialized Germany under Junker rule, adding year after year fresh thousands to her army of wage workers and consequently to the internationally organized army of the Social-Democratic party, was a spectacle worth watching in its developments. A clash between these two forces became more and more imminent, and the lighthearted unconcern with which the men in power at Berlin rushed into the war was partly due to their conviction that only by calling up the danger from abroad could they prevent the German internationalists from bringing the disruptive process within to a head.

It was only natural, then, that the Emperor's defeat and overthrow should bring the Socialists into power who had been the only party to oppose his autocratic régime. But this political success diminished, relatively speaking, their importance as a party, as the same revolution had freed the bourgeois parties from the shackles of "Kaisertreue" and given them a more independent standing. To each of them now falls the task of formulating principles for the guidance of the Government, and it is for the voters to decide which of those principles shall be adhered to. That gives to the coming elections next week a special importance, and we are glad to print, in another column, an illuminating article by Dr. Paul Rohrbach, from which the readers of the Review may gain an estimate of the parties' strength and chances.

The chief interest of his survey centres in the account he gives of the German Democratic party and of its tendencies to reorient itself in two directions, nationally towards the right, socially towards the left, to declare itself, in other words, for a programme virtually identical with that of the Majority Socialists while insisting on the realization of national ideals as against the dream of international brotherhood. Dr. Rohrbach is careful to remind us, in a footnote, of the intrinsic difference in German between the terms "National" and "Nationalistic"; the foreigner's appreciation of the Democratic Party's activity will, indeed, be dependent on the meaning which it will give to its name, not in profession, but in practice. That he describes this two-sided reorientation as the old ideal of Friedrich Naumann offers food for reflection. Naumann was the prophet of a mid-Europe under the German ægis, which was to be the achievement of the war, and in the book in which he developed that conception he praised his friend Rohrbach for being the eloquent preacher of "the German idea in the world." Were the eulogist and his friend, when those words were written, five years ago, the advocates of a "national" or a "nationalistic" policy—were they patriots or chauvinists? The aggressive policy of the Hohenzollern which they supported with their pen supplies a decisive answer to that question. A nationalism which requires for the realization of its ambitions the subjection of other peoples' nationality makes chauvinists of patriots. The country's boundary marks the dividing line between a national and a nationalistic policy. "Am deutschen Wesen soll die Welt genesen" is the slogan of an arrogant chauvinism, of which the world, averse to such a cure, will hear no more.

The enthusiasm over the initial victories of the German arms created the atmosphere in which the nationalistic ambitions of Naumann and Rohrbach could thrive. We should do injustice to the former's memory and our contributor's judgment if we did not deem them capable of realizing their error in the cruel light of subsequent actualities. The present moment demands, from a German patriot's point of view, the cure, first of all, of a Germany sick to death; and the world will not deny her the right to be cured of the disease "am deutschen wesen." The Democratic party, in attempting that German cure by the application of far-reaching social reforms, may justly claim to stand for a national policy, and if it lives up to its claim, forswearing in practice past chauvinistic ambitions, there is some hope of Germany's recovery, both physical and moral, and of her reconciliation with the world.

From Cow to Consumer

FROM the cow to the ultimate consumer was the shortest possible distance for the infant Jupiter, hiding in a cavern from his father Kronos, according to the Cretan legend, and drawing his nourishment from the udders of the goat Amalthea with his own lips. Nor had Romulus and Remus any further to go, though the "cow" in their case was not even a goat, but a motherly-hearted wolf.

In addition to these instances of a milk supply absolutely direct, Mediterranean legend gives us also an example in which the help of the middleman is reduced to the very minimum of cost-increasing interference. When Metabus, the Volscian, as Virgil tells us, fled from his rebellious people into the mountains, carrying his infant daughter Camilla in his arms, he fed her by milking the warm fluid directly into her mouth, from the udders of the wild mares that roamed the forests. There was no unnecessary cost here, surely, unless Metabus had to waste valuable time in persuading the mare to submit.

Even yet, occasionally, the traveler may see an urchin of Naples or Palermo begging for a mouthful of goat's milk alla Camilla; but the milkman is apt to show a spirit of jest, rather than a concern for the child's nourishment, and neck, eyes, hair and mouth share about equally in the donation. In much of Italy and Sicily, however, there is no great loss between goat or cow and the coffee cup. The American traveler in Girgenti, for example, starting for a sunrise ramble among the temple ruins of the plain below, may ask the keeper of some little ristorante for caffè e latte before he has laid in his morning supply. He goes to the door with a little pitcher, looks up and down the street until he spies a bunch of goats, and is back in less than two minutes with just the amount needed. A lone American guest in a little pensione among the ruins of ancient Syracuse saw the goat that furnished the milk for his breakfast driven up in a donkey cart and milked before the door. On some of the public squares of Palermo one may see a donkey cart standing for a large part of the day, with two or three cows attached to it, and a calf tied to the tail of each cow, the owner at hand to milk the required amount for any customer who may appear. If the traveler is curious to know why the calves are brought along, he will be told—or will see, if he watches long enough—that the cow is sometimes stubborn about giving down her milk, and the calf has to be used as a "starter."

The advantage of these more direct modes of supply are evident, such as they are. No ice is needed to keep the milk from souring in your refrigerator, when you can call up a goat and get it fresh from the original package at almost any hour of the day. And you can save materially in the fuel required to boil it, when you have a temperature of about 100 to start from. You may know, also, that it has not been watered; and there is some satisfaction in knowing just where it comes from. If you do not like the milk from Giulio's spotted goat to-day, you can try a pint from Giuseppe's white one to-morrow. But whence comes the milk in the bottle set down at the door of the New Yorker, pasteurized, graded, and sealed, according to the officially imposed formula? No man on earth could tell you. The delivery man knows at what distributing station his wagon was loaded, but back of that all certainty vanishes. No one cow may have been responsible for even a spoonful in the entire quart. No one dairy farm may have supplied any considerable fraction of it. The grass that clothes the hills and valleys of any one of many possible combinations of counties and States may be represented in it. No, the satisfaction of knowing specifically where it came from can never be yours.

You can have fair assurance, however, that it is clean. Doubtless neither the goat Amalthea nor the wolf of the Capitol had her udders washed in any germ-destroying solution before the infant Jupiter, or Romulus and Remus, took their meals; and there is a very striking contrast between the goats and cows and their milkers, wandering unwashed through the dirty streets of a South Italian city, and the cleanliness of milker, cow, and stall of a modern New York dairy farm. Seventy years ago the proposition of an enthusiast that the milk supply should be protected by Government tests and inspection was used by Herbert Spencer as an instance of the absurd length to which Government might go in its encroachment on individual liberty. But to-day the deadly peril that may lurk in unclean milk is too well known to leave any popular support for the liberty of a dairyman to be clean or unclean, according to his own will. In a more complicated civilization, with a more accurate knowledge of dangers heretofore unappreciated, even those of us who believe in as little government interference as possible see more points at which government curtailment of certain liberties seems imperative.

THE REVIEW
A weekly journal of political and general discussion
Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

The Political Parties in Germany

A SUBVERSION of the German party system was the natural consequence of the Revolution. The parties themselves, however, though most of them have changed their names, are not sufficiently aware that the emergence of new political problems necessitates a reorientation of their aims and a restatement of the reasons for their existence.

Social-Democracy has sustained the strongest shock in the upheaval. At the outbreak of the war the party as a whole went hand in hand with the bourgeois parties, which until then had always claimed to be the "National" parties. But from the outset there was among the Socialists an opposition to the war and the war credits, and when, in the course of time, this opposition took visible shape by the secession of the "Independents" from the great Social-Democratic party, the day had arrived on which the German Revolution virtually began. It broke out at a time not of economic prosperity, but of economic depression, which from the German standpoint ended in a catastrophe in consequence of the blockade against the import of foodstuffs and raw materials not being raised after the conclusion of the armistice. The so-called Majority Socialists, the old party, saw clearly that under these circumstances it would be impossible to realize the theoretical ideal of the Marxian system. They restricted themselves to strong theoretical statements and a few moderate attempts at practical nationalization. Even that little proved difficult to carry through. The Majority Socialists, moreover, recognized the democratic principle, that is, the right of decision on matters of legislation, Constitution, government, and administration by the majority of the people. As this majority, at the elections early in 1919 for the National Assembly, voted a bourgeois ticket, the compromise policy appeared unavoidable from the Socialist standpoint, and will remain unavoidable so far as the Majority Socialists are concerned, as a majority of the two Socialist parties over the total bourgeois vote is very improbable for a long time to come. In this way the Majority Socialists, from a revolutionary party, have become a radical reform party, which differs from a Socialism of bourgeois conception chiefly in this, that it still considers itself a Labor party, and in that it subordinates its national aims to the international principle. Its right wing, however, seems to tend towards a revision, in these two points also, of the pre-war attitude of the old Social-Democracy.

The "Independent" Social-Democratic party is feebly represented in the National Assembly, as compared with the Majority Socialists, but it has, doubtless, among the masses, at the present time, a great many more supporters than at the time of the elections early in 1919. The extremists of the party, it is true, have left it again, the most radical to join orthodox Bolshevism, the others to form the Communist party; but the dividing lines between these three groups are vague and fluctuating. The Independents demand, according to the old programme, immediate nationalization and the actual dictatorship of the proletariat through the system of the soviets, in conformity with the Russian example. By the dictatorship the bourgeois will everywhere be ousted from power, and nationalization must be realized at once and without mercy. The democratic principle that the majority shall decide is not recognized by the Independents; they oppose to it the will and the "superior" right of the labor class to reorganize, according to their demands, the state and the social structure, together with the process of production and the division of the proceeds of labor. The rapid growth of the Independents' following is chiefly due to the circumstance that, in spite of the Revolution having extended the political rights of the people and the actual power of the labor class in particular, this increase of right and power was not accompanied by an improvement of their material existence. Foodstuffs, clothing, and all commodities remain scarce and expensive, and although strikes can enforce increasingly higher wages, their purchasing power will never equal that of the much lower wages of pre-war days. Hence the masses are easily persuaded that only the absolute dictatorship and the relentless destruction of all the opposing capitalistic interests of the bourgeoisie can bring them relief. This is, so far as Germany is concerned, an error, but the error is comprehensible, and there are no popular arguments against it. Distrust, unrest, and discontent at the high cost of living are the pacemakers of the Independents in their race for a majority over the old Socialist party at the polls, and it is not unlikely that the Majority Socialists will soon lose their title to that name.

The counterpart of the Social Democracy on the right is the German National People's party (Deutschnationale Volkspartei), formed by the old Conservatives with militaristic, agrarian, and Pan-German leanings, and the German People's party (Deutsche Volkspartei), which had its origin in the right wing of the former National Liberals, and which receives support, as the latter did, from the industrial magnates and a large body of men with university training. The German People's party is the great protagonist of the capitalistic interests and of the capitalistic organization of society. It insists on the necessity of leaving capital as much unimpaired as possible. It sees itself compelled by the force of circumstances to make concessions with regard to economic legislation, the influence of the workers on the management of the shop, etc., and many of its leaders have come forward with good suggestions on these subjects. But they are firmly opposed to the principle of nationalization. The party's internal strength depends on the membership of the bulk of the German intellectuals, and on the use, for agitation purposes, of the fundamentally false, but superficially convincing argument that Germany was great as a monarchy but, as a Republic under the rule of Social-Democracy, has come to grief. An interesting fact, which may prove the beginning of an important development, is the rise of social ideas among the extreme right, in the bosom of the German National People's party. In the field of social progress there is a better chance of an agreement between the democratic Socialism of the Left and the ethical Socialism within the German National party, than of the former with the capitalistic tendencies of the People's party.

A curious organization, destined, perhaps, to play the leading rôle in Germany's political future, is the German Democratic party (Deutsche Democratische Partei). It is true, however, that, constituted as it is at present, it can not exist very much longer. Its development tends, obviously, in two opposite directions: nationally* towards the right, socially towards the left. This is the old ideal of the greatest thinker whom the party ever counted among its members: the late Dr. Friedrich Naumann, who, as long as twenty years ago, tried to found a separate National Social party. Such a development would eliminate from the party, on the one side, the elements of the capitalistic class; on the other, all such elements of lukewarm nationalism as subordinate national to international ideals. The attraction of this movement, as against Social Democracy, is in its appeal to national sentiment, and, as against the right, in so far as this is anti-Socialistic, in its freedom from prejudice in social matters. If this National-Social principle should be made the corner-stone of the Democratic party, the consequence would be, in the bosom of the party, that internationalism and capitalism would lose their hold on it and that the socially minded elements of the right and such Socialists as are susceptible to national sentiment would feel attracted towards it; and for that reason it is not improbable that the development of the German Democratic party will bring about a more clear-cut division in the German party system. Democrats who are convinced adherents of the Republic, and such as, from tradition and sentiment, are in favor of monarchism are fairly well balanced within the party, but both groups are at one in their loyal acceptance of the present German Constitution.

*There is a great difference in German between "national" and "nationalistic," almost analogous to that between "patriotic" and "chauvinistic."

Independent of any organization based on political principles, the Christian People's party (Christliche Volkspartei), still better known by its old name as the Centre, finds its chief strength in the Roman-Catholicism uniting its members and in the authority of the clergy. But the tension within the party is stronger than it ever was. Since the Catholic labor masses saw what power their class had gained, thanks to the Social-Democratic Revolution, it was only natural and unavoidable that class feelings became more and more pronounced among them. It would prove impossible to keep them within the Centre, if the party should turn unsocial and undemocratic. That is the reason for the remarkable coalition of the Centre with Social-Democracy and the German Democrats. The right wing of the Centre, however, has strong leanings towards monarchism, and conservative tendencies. In proportion to the growth of the influence on the party of the social radicalism of its left wing, the temptation will grow stronger for the aristocracy and the intellectuals of Catholic Germany to join the German Nationals, the extreme right in Parliament, where also Protestant orthodoxy has its seats.

All parties in Germany, therefore, are passing through a crisis. None of them has as yet readjusted itself to the new conditions created by the Revolution. The complete and surprisingly quick repression of the counter-revolution has shown, however, that strong reactionary forces are non-existent. To return to the old régime is the sentimental wish of the entire right, but the determination and the will to bring it back are nowhere apparent.

Dr. Paul Rohrbach

Berlin

The House of Piotr Ivanovitch

"Do you see that half-burned house over there on the knoll?" asked Carson.

"Yes, the one with the red-tiled roof. Looks as if it had been the best one in the village."

"It was; it is always the best one that gets burned."

We were driving through a Russian village not far from St. Petersburg in the early summer of 1914. It might just as well have been in any other part of the country, for Carson knew what he was talking about. He had lived in Russia at least fifteen years, had business interests that took him everywhere, and had a more intimate knowledge of rural Russia than any other American I knew. His remark that it is always the best house in the village that gets burned made no impression, however, for I at once set it down to an unsatisfactory breakfast or the vile cigar he was smoking, or to one of his occasional caustic attitudes towards everything Russian. Seeing this, he looked me square in the face and said, "I see you do not believe me, but I mean just what I say. If a Russian peasant builds a much finer house than those of his neighbors they will burn it down for him."

Carson was well started now on his favorite theme, namely, Russian peasant characteristics, and I saw he was about to give me some information gratis that I should have been glad to pump him for. I subsided and let him ramble.

"You see, when I first came to this country in the life insurance business it was a very new business for the Russian peasant. Few of them had heard about it and none of them knew anything about it. I made several exploration trips to Moscow, Kharkov, Kiev, Odessa, then over to the lower Volga region at Astrakhan and up that stream to Tsaritsin, Samara, Kazan, Nijni Novgorod, and then back to St. Petersburg. From each of these cities I made short excursions by droshky through the surrounding villages, prospecting for local agents. Business? I never imagined we should get much more than expenses out of it if we were lucky, not when I first saw those villages. Why man, just imagine it! No fences, no roads, except mere cart tracks that didn't seem to go anywhere in particular; no farmsteads, for the farmers all lived in the villages; no welcoming groves of beckoning trees to show where somebody lived on the soil and loved it and cared for it. And the villages were laid out with but little attention to order and no regard for the compass, the houses were mere cabins of the same color as the soil, with thatched roofs and small cabbage gardens surrounded by a brush fence. Not much prospect for life insurance under such conditions, I thought; for how can you persuade people to take an interest in their estate, their posterity, or even in their own later days when they evidently have so little in their immediate surroundings. The houses or shanties were so much alike that they worried me. I even tried to show them how to build better ones, but they looked at me with suspicion. I have learned a lot about them in fifteen years, and now that I understand their point of view, let me say that I do not altogether condemn it. Strange as it may seem to you, I will even say that I respect it."

Carson glanced at me to enjoy my look of incredulity, seemed satisfied, and went on.

"I had with me an educated young Russian as interpreter and adviser. He is with me yet for that matter, is Ivan Andreivitch Ephimoff, for there is no more faithful and devoted helper anywhere than a Russian when he has become attached to you. With his assistance I selected our local agents from among the most thrifty and ambitious young men in the villages. These we called together in conference in the nearest city, and explained to them the purpose and working of a life insurance company. I was quite unprepared for the interest they took in it, and the rising enthusiasm that seemed to seize upon them as they consulted together, and quizzed my interpreter Ivan Andreivitch for more instructions from the 'barin.' When we were alone I in turn quizzed Ivan Andreivitch, and got very little return for my pains.

"Before long my business was growing astonishingly, and I remembered those forlorn little villages with wonder. Policies were issued, the premiums were paid regularly, and the applicants seemed to come without asking. One peculiarity I noticed was that the payments uniformly came by postal money order and not by bank check. I asked Ivan Andreivitch for an explanation. 'Perhaps,' he replied, 'it is because the peasants have no adequate banking facilities.' 'What, none at all?' 'Generally not; and sometimes they do not trust those that they have.' 'Ah! I think I begin to see.' 'Perhaps the barin sees also,' said Ivan Andreivitch, smiling significantly, 'why this life insurance business became popular immediately.' 'Possibly I do. You mean that because the banking facilities were inadequate the people turned to life insurance as to a bank deposit.' 'Yes, but that is not all. Can you guess the rest?' 'That is enough for my purposes; but if there are other reasons, I have not yet discovered them.' 'Wait till you do. It will mean a great deal more to you,' said Ivan.

"And still my business continued to astonish me with its growth. You would hardly believe it, but it is at this moment larger than all the rest of our European business put together. I often wondered where the peasants got their money, whether they hoarded it in unsuspected places, and whether they were in fact, as they certainly seemed, all equally poor. A flood of light was thrown upon these questions one summer while visiting at the country home of a wealthy landed proprietor, Sergei Alexeivitch Baritzin, who lived in true baronial style minus the castle, but plus wide spreading lawns, ample gardens, and an abundance of buildings suggestive of old plantation days in America. The respect and deference shown him by his tenants and immediate servants, and the genuine human interest he took in all their small concerns was beautiful to see, and I could not refrain from remarking upon it.

"'Yes,' said he, 'I should think you would notice it, and with approval, too, in spite of your American notions of equality. Don't tell me that you have no trace of the feudal relation since slavery was abolished, for you do have it. Outside of agriculture your whole industrial system is built upon it, just as in western and central Europe, and the laborers are merely the retainers of their lordly employers, dependent upon them for their daily bread. You differ not at all from the barons, knights, and hinds of the Middle Ages, and I envy you not your theoretical equality. What you see on my estate is your own industrial system applied to agriculture, but applied with a conscience and human sympathy, and not with the inhuman claim that labor is just like any other commodity, to be bought at the lowest price. The difference between our feudalism and yours is that here we have not lost the personal touch between the upper and the lower classes, while in America you have, hence their mutual antagonism. Then, too, your rule of the majority—call you that freedom? If I am to be ruled by anybody, any kind of government, I prefer the rule of one intelligent head with a brain in it, a Tsar if you please, rather than the unintelligent, many-headed monster you call the majority. On my estate I am respected, beloved, and obeyed, as you have just observed, and likewise is the Tsar by all law-abiding and upright people.'

"'Yes, Sergei Alexeivitch, I have been much delighted with the cordial relations I have witnessed between you and your tenants, and I wonder if it is the same elsewhere. Do you happen to be sufficiently acquainted with other estates to say that yours is typical, or is it exceptional? I do not ask if everybody is satisfied, but if you please to admit a majority opinion, is the majority reasonably well satisfied, either with your excellent management of your estate, or with, for that matter, the Tsar's management of the Empire?'

"My friend halted for a reply, for as we both knew, disregarding the political issue raised, there were too many cases to the contrary. There were the landlords who never lived on their estates, who hired Jewish overseers, and thus contributed to racial enmities. There were the independent communes as in ancient times, the villages owning their own land and farming it as unintelligently as in ancient times, no landlord above them and but little ambition among them. There were also the independent farmers or peasants who had detached themselves from the village and moved out upon their own land—a rapidly increasing class. But not wishing at that time to go to the end of so large a subject, 'By the way,' I said, 'why was yonder house ruined by fire? I am told that such things are likely to occur to the better houses but never to the poorer ones?'

"'Here comes the very owner,' said Sergei Alexeivitch, 'You speak Russian, ask him.'

"The old peasant doffed his cap as he approached and said 'zdravstvuitsye, barin' (health to you, master).

"'Good morning, Piotr Ivanovitch,' said the master, 'aren't you sorry now that you undertook to build a finer house than your neighbors have?' Piotr shook his head slowly and mournfully—'No, barin, the old one leaked badly and was not warm enough in the winter. My son was to be married and we built a larger house to accommodate us all. A thatched roof burns quickly, barin, and so I roofed it with tile. If it was my neighbors that burned it, they surely did me a great wrong; but I suppose they did not understand.'

"'Never mind, Piotr,' said Sergei Alexeivitch, 'we will all turn in and help you build a new one, and I promise that you will never feel the loss. But mind you, what is good enough for your neighbors is good enough for you, and if you go to putting on airs with a fine showy house, why you can't expect it to last long—you know that now.'

"Piotr Ivanovitch acquiesced with a bow and moved away, apparently resigned to the force of the argument, even if unconvinced of its justice.

"And there," said Carson, turning to me again, "you have the whole case in a nutshell. The Russian peasant's idea of progress is that it must not be by individuals but in mass. They accept existing class distinctions without seeking to justify them, but the class at least must move forward together or better not move at all. Injustices spring from inequalities in condition, unless the strong protect the weak. Russia has taught me that much," said Carson with conviction. "America in colonial times was a country of practically uniform social conditions, in which wealth played no conspicuous part, and the misfortunes of individuals were alleviated by the community as a matter of course. This was notably the case under frontier conditions. But now, let a man lose his all in a ruined homestead, or worse still, let him lose his job, the only means he has of gaining a livelihood, even through no fault of his own, and the rule is that he will find no neighbors to steady him from falling till he regains his feet. There is nothing succeeds like success in America, and conversely there is no sin like unsuccess. Don't tell me 'No,' I have been through it all in our own dear country and I am not theorizing. I speak from sad experience when I say that progress by individuals means standing as individuals without community support in the day of adversity. That is the Anglo-Saxon way, but it is not the Russian peasants' way, and let us be fair enough to say that theirs has its merits. To me it seems as the greatest lesson of Russia's history that the solidarity and equality of her peasantry are the sheet-anchor of her hope as a nation."

"But," I interposed, "how far have your Russian peasantry advanced in the same time that we have transformed a wilderness into what America is to-day? Are they not in practically the same condition that they were in when we began?"

"Yes, and what is time to a Russian?" replied Carson. "Besides, he might answer you, 'Boast of your past if you like. We look to the future which shall be ours because we have not laid the foundation of our society in inequality and its resulting injustices!' Mind you this: that when the American thinks of inequalities he thinks of political matters; but the Russian means industrial inequalities also."

"Then a political revolution would involve an industrial revolution?"

"Among the industrialized class, yes; among the peasant farmers, no. Land grabbing there would be, and the despoiling of landed estates, but these, however distressful and unjust, would be isolated and not general phenomena, and in the main not the result of peasant initiative."

"And the individual ownership of land," I continued, "as it breaks up the close community of the village, will it not just as surely break up the community spirit?"

"That," sighed Carson, "is very much to be feared. Still, Russian peasant solidarity has been proof against harder tests than that. It is the result of centuries of pounding and hammering together and it will outlast any other that I know."

"One point more, friend Carson: tell me how industrial progress is at all possible, either by individuals or in communities, when progress is so limited that there are no means of saving or investing—no adequate banking facilities, and no houses or other tangible forms of property safe from destruction by envious neighbors." "Ah, that's where I come in," said Carson, smiling ever so sweetly, "life insurance."

J. E. Conner
U. S. Consul at Petrograd, 1909-1914

Anatole France as Preacher

THE speech delivered some months ago by Anatole France to the Congress of Teachers' Institutes at Tours, and reported apparently verbatim in l'Humanité, must have been read with astonished, though quite genuine, delight by many of the old novelist's admirers. We have long known that he could write in different styles, but we must be forgiven if we did not before think it possible he could preach. Yet it is preaching of a high order that he has now given us. On a somewhat similar occasion, overwhelmed by a like incongruity, certain men of Israel asked, "What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?" His experience of the European tragedy has wrought this change in the gay, debonair Anatole France, even as another—whose very temperament might by itself suggest the comparison—became a new man when Samuel had roused him to a sense of national responsibility, and had poured the oil of anointing upon his head.

It is hard to think of that impassioned address to the teachers on the solemn duties of their office as proceeding from the author of "Penguin Island"or "The Opinions of Jérome Coignard." For it is as an entertainer, a satirist, a skeptic, that Anatole France had so far been chiefly known to us. He had entertained us hugely, and his satire had spared none of our cherished sanctities. But what seemed to forbid still more strongly all thought of him as a guide to progress was the fact that he had been so uniformly skeptical about human advance, and had poured such scorn upon the hopes of world-mending by which others were inspired. A glance at his past in the light of his present may not be without interest and value. It is here offered in no spirit of reproach, for one must be a poor trifler indeed to dwell upon "inconsistencies" in an old man who has seen his world turned upside down. It is more fitting to express one's admiration for those who can make a change in themselves when a changing world demands it.

It was in the year 1870, while the Franco-Prussian war was at its height, and the shells from German guns dropped every few minutes hissing into the Marne, that the writer whom all the world has since come to know as "Anatole France" was doing duty at the front as a conscript. He has told us himself that he carried Vergil's Æneid in his knapsack, and read it as often as he found time. He had no enthusiasm for the business of war, and, when peace was concluded on those terms of desperate humiliation for the French which mankind in general came so slowly to appreciate, he rejoiced to be set free from the burden of his irksome service. The fortunes of Æneas and Dido interested him more than any change in the Europe of his own day.

Forty-four years passed. The unknown youth of twenty-six, who had to attend, against his will, to the first German menace, was a famous man of seventy when that menace appeared again. No one cared much whether he was apathetic in 1869, but not a few were very anxious indeed to know how his immense influence would be exerted in 1914. Nor did his first letter on the subject, counselling a moderation for which his countrymen could see little place, tend to reassure the public mind. But within a few weeks he had wakened up to the grim reality. It caused something like a thrill when we learned that he had ignored the weight of his years, presented himself at the War Office, and requested to be furnished with a rifle. Inconsistency is a poor reproach at best, but it was not even inconsistent to look upon fighting for the Republic in 1914 as quite another matter from fighting for Napoleon III in 1870. Needless to say, the French Government did not agree to enrolling this veteran in the ranks, but declined his spectacular proposal with adequate acknowledgment of his zeal. It was felt that there was another instrument which Anatole France could make mightier than many swords, and he was bidden to return to his pen. His next book, "Sur la Voie Glorieuse," was unlike anything he had ever written before, except in that vividness, pathos, overwhelming power, which he now turned to quite a new purpose. It was a trumpet call to destroy German militarism from top to bottom, a bitter indictment of those who dared to speak of peace until the forces of oppression should have been crushed, an argument to neutral states all over the world that no neutrality was possible in such a crisis, and a moving appeal, such as he knew better than any other man how to write, that Frenchmen should, as of old, be "the champions of their smiling, fertile land, the tombs of their fathers, and the cradles of their children."

Those of us who have long revelled in his books can not help recalling some things he used to say, and wondering to what extent he would now modify them. We knew, indeed, the fervor of his antimilitarism, and were sometimes inclined to suspect him of being a pacifist. Not even Tolstoi himself had been a more mordant critic of the European trend towards war. "Penguin Island" deserves to stand beside "Gulliver's Travels" as a satire upon the society in which its author lived. We remember the statue of "Trinco" in Penguinia, the warrior who had conquered half the known world, planting his flag amid the icebergs of the Pole and on the burning sands of Africa. "At the time of his fall there were left in our country none but the hunchbacks and cripples from whom we are descended . . . But he gave us glory . . . And glory never costs too much." What a lifelike picture we had in "Professor Obnubile," the brilliant economist who taught that wars are no longer possible, because it is an economic axiom that peace without and peace within are essential to the progress of the industrial state! As the professor visited democratic republics, and found to his disgust that they were all busy with armaments, which of us could avoid thinking of Norman Angell, and his book so appropriately named "The Great Illusion"? American readers may have been a little irritated, but they were certainly amused, at the story of New Atlantis, with its legislators sitting on cane chairs and resting their feet upon their desks, passing the accounts for a war with "Third Zealand" to kill two-thirds of the inhabitants that the remaining one-third might be forced to buy Atlantan umbrellas and braces, or decreeing in a few seconds a pig war with "the Emerald Republic which insolently contends with our pigs for the hegemony of hams and sauces in all the markets of the universe." Poor Professor Obnubile was driven to conclude that a wise man would collect enough dynamite to blow up this planet, thus giving satisfaction to the universal conscience. "Moreover," he added, "this universal conscience does not exist."

And, impartial scoffer that he was, Anatole France was no less sarcastic when he wrote of his own countrymen. The "insane Europeans" were plotting to cut one another's throats, though they were united and enfolded by a single civilization. There was no country where the freedom of the individual was less respected than in France. She pretended to be democratic, but was in reality the prey of la haute finance. For the last hundred years she had tried an incoherent succession of insurrectionary governments. In the end all bonds had been loosened, and she had become more corrupt than in the worst days of monarchy. Nor did our novelist build any hope upon advancing education, upon the arousing of the masses by the light of knowledge. His attitude used to remind us of Dr. Johnson's dictum that it was not worth spending half a guinea to live under one form of government rather than under another, for it made no difference to the happiness of the individual. It is risky, of course, to attribute to an author the sentiments which he puts into the mouth of characters in his fiction, but in this case we can scarcely be wrong. Just as Conrad, Lara, Harold, Juan were so many spokesmen of the Byronic temperament, so Bonnard, Coignard, Trubbet, Bergeret were lay figures through whom their creator expounded the Francian theory of life. And however frequently he incarnated himself anew, we meet with the same spirit of genial kindliness rooted in the same profound skepticism about the ideals, the growth, the destiny of the human species. His view often suggested that of a literary Voltairean noble under the ancien régime, with many popular sympathies, but with no delusions about intellectualizing the herd.

Rather did the old Anatole France delight to sketch some roué man of letters, straitened in purse, dividing his time between the cabarets of the Latin Quarter and the book-shops of the Quai Voltaire—someone like the Marquis Trubbet in "Jean Servien," who had often breakfasted on a page of Tacitus and supped on a satire of Juvenal, but for whom such artistic substitutes, though they might take the place of food, could in no wise do duty for drink. In many of his books he makes one think again of that sympathetic touch with which Balzac used to depict revived aristocracy in the Legitimist period of fifteen years between the fall of Napoleon and the rise of Louis Philippe. They suggest the unmistakable friendliness with which the frail and fair successors of Ninon de L'Enclos were painted, and the far coarser workmanship that Balzac gave us when he tried to present the bourgeois semi-Puritanism prevalent at the court of the Citizen King. For Anatole France in other days was no zealot for the Revolution.

How he loved to caricature the old revolutionary enthusiasms! What fun he poked at the pseudo-history of empires from Noah down to Charlemagne, at the long procession of ambitious princes, greedy prelates, virtuous citizens, philosophic poets, "and other personages who had no real existence outside the novels of Marmontel"! How he laughed at the rhetorical tropes about Brutus and Scaevola and Hannibal, or at the new devices for a pack of playing cards that would have no such undemocratic figures as king, queen, knave, but would substitute Liberty of clubs, Equality of spades, Fraternity of diamonds, and Law of hearts! Coignard's ideal for educating mankind had for its first purpose a very singular rule. Men were to be shown that "their weak and silly nature has never constructed nor imagined anything worth the trouble of attacking or defending very briskly." "If they knew the crudity and weakness of their greatest works, such as their laws and their empires, they would only fight in fun or in play, like children building sand-castles by the sea." Coignard himself would never have signed the Declaration of the Rights of Man, "because of the excessive and unfair separation it establishes between man and the gorilla."

Those who love to trace spiritual affinities in literature often insist that Anatole France owes his deepest inspiration to Ernest Renan, and we know that this discipleship has been explicitly acknowledged by himself. But if we are in search less of the teaching which he consciously followed than of the temperament to which his own was unconsciously akin, it is a different name that will occur to us. We shall think of that calm, reflective, half-sympathetic and half-cynical grand seigneur who four hundred and fifty years ago retired from the world's bustle to spend "under the care of the learned maidens" whatever span of life might yet be allotted to him. Constantly as we read the Bergeret books that pensive figure seems to shine through the page, and though the words are the words of Anatole France, it is the spirit of Montaigne that has embodied itself afresh. We see again the placid critic of all things human, heedless alike of the bloodshed in a St. Bartholomew massacre and the cannonading of a Spanish Armada, shut up in the tower of his château with the three bay windows which every tourist knows so well, that he might amass more and more illustrations of the "wonderful, vain, divers, and wavering subjects" presented to scrutiny in the life of mankind, that he might browse with impartial interest among the treasures of literature both sacred and pagan, and that he might amuse his later years by covering beam and rafter with the inscriptions that appealed to his fancy—the aphoristic wit of Martial, the cold skepticism of Lucretius, the glowing poetry of the Psalms, the elegant lyrics of Horace, and the doleful vaticination of Ecclesiastes.

Now if the veteran novelist still has "a book in him," as Lord Morley would say, how many of these old attitudes may we expect him to reconsider, and how far may we expect him to write differently? Will he preserve the mood of "Les Opinions de Jérome Coignard," or will he further expand the message of "Sur la Voie Glorieuse"? He can not well keep to both, or much further experiment with them in turn. For instance, will he show himself as suspicious as ever that French munition makers are raising a scare about the country's peril for no higher purpose than to get business for themselves? Will he still feel sure that there is little to choose between democracies and aristocracies, that the tyranny of the former is on the whole more to be feared, and that the chief merit in a government is to let people alone? Is he as clear as ever that true knowledge can not be widely diffused, that superstitious adherence to custom is best for the proletariat, and that only a select few should be encouraged to try fundamental thinking? Does he continue to think of the French Assembly of 1793 mainly in its ludicrous aspect of excitement about Dumnorix and Vercingetorix and the glories of regicide? When he thinks of America, is his attention drawn to new wars devised for the opening of new markets? Or will he yet make the amende honorable to those whom he treated in the past with far less than justice, to the bourgeois man of business who has revealed a soul far above business profits, to the idealists who meant something now known to be very vital indeed when they talked of liberty and equality and fraternity, to the priests who have shown that other-worldliness at the altar can be united with an heroic zeal upon their country's battlefields? Is Montaigne still his pattern of an intelligent human outlook, or does he perchance feel that a little "enthusiasm" is needed, and that this world can not be saved if we enter upon its work spiritually hamstrung?

Such questions as these had often occurred to me before I chanced to read the speech delivered by Anatole France to the Congress of Teachers' Institutes. Guesses at his present mood are no longer necessary, for he has spoken out with frankness and even with passion. The spirit which inspired his address to the soldiers five years ago is with him still as he speaks to those who must reconstruct his country at peace. He has told the French educators that the future is in their hands, that the old social system has "sunk under the weight of its sins," that only in the awakening of a new humanity can Europe place its hope. He has warned us all against the facile assumption that "man does not change," or that exerting oneself towards social improvement is wasted labor. He has bidden us realize that human nature can still move backward and forward—as it has moved continuously since the days of the cave-dwellers—that it is environment which makes all the difference, that as one sort of education led us to catastrophe another can secure us against the like catastrophe again. His readers will be quick to recognize here, not indeed an absolutely new tone in Anatole France, for he has had fitful impulses like this before, but a new note of enduring resoluteness. Let the feeble folk who have so long imitated his skepticism, though they had no share in his power, take a lesson from the example he has set. One of the things that some of us hope from the new era is that we shall hear a little less about "conventional morality," Nietzschean transvaluations, and the hypocrisy of the "smug middle class"! It used to be all very amusing, but the hour for seriousness has struck.

HERBERT L. STEWART

Correspondence

Mr. Dreiser and the Broadway Magazine

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your issue of May 8, 1920, you publish a letter from one Annie Nathan Meyer, which you label in quotes "Mr. Dreiser's Battle for Truth." Now before dealing with Mrs. Meyer it occurs to me that a journal of the usual beautiful, good, and true standard such as no doubt yours professes to be might find it advisable before giving space to libelous assertions to submit the same to the person accused or at least to make some effort to confirm them. Take the statement by Mrs. Meyer which reads: "It is only a few years since a group of members of the Authors' League asked for contributions for the brave and hounded author to enable him to continue his 'battle for truth.'" Now this is all very well as malice but as a matter of fact I have never heard of any such group. Neither the Authors' League nor any other league or group has ever asked for contributions for anything in connection with me. At the time the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice undertook to suppress "The Genius" the Authors' League did call a meeting of some committee, which by the way I did not request but before which, nevertheless, I was invited to appear, to consider whether it would issue a protest against the suppression of "The Genius." I did so appear but, having done so much, the League took no further action and did not come to my defense in any shape. Now the Authors' League has a telephone and a secretary. Why could not one of the editors of a paper pretending to fairness have called him up and made inquiry as to this before printing a lie?

"I worked with Mr. Dreiser several months as associate editor of the magazine of which he was editor-in-chief."

The lady refers to the Broadway Magazine, of which I was not editor-in-chief but only the managing editor. Mr. Ben B. Hampton was the publisher and editor. (See Who's Who for 1907.) Mrs. Meyer's claim to having been associated with me in the management of that magazine takes its rise from the following circumstances: Either after having been recommended to me or coming to me of her own accord (I can not now recall) Mrs. Meyer undertook to prepare or have prepared for the magazine a series of articles on art and artists. In order to impress those with whom she desired to deal she requested the privilege of signing herself as assistant or associate editor, to which I agreed, but for that work only. That she has or ever had any letter conferring a general associate editorship is not true. You might ask her to produce the letter. The reason why subsequently I severed this arrangement with Mrs. Meyer was this: She had the profound conviction that every word and comma of her not ill-prepared text was not only essential but sacred and that neither she nor anyone else should be called upon or permitted to alter it in any way. As experts in the matter of makeup and space difficulties in connection with a magazine of the illustrated variety perhaps you will appreciate the difficulty of such a stand. I found it insurmountable and was compelled to break with Mrs. Meyer.

Now it may be that subsequently some writer with whom Mrs. Meyer made some arrangement may have sued the Broadway Magazine Corporation or Mr. Ben B. Hampton for non-payment of some bill. I do not remember. And in behalf of the Corporation I may have been compelled to appear. I do not even recall the incident. If so, I must have testified as I am testifying here, but as for denying her any connection with the magazine, I doubt it. I would like the name of the case and the date of the trial. She asserts that I so testified and that on her producing a letter which showed such associate editorship the judge looked at me in disgust and rendered a decision for the plaintiff. Nothing more. But I doubt whether a judge detecting a man in perjury would deal with him so very leniently. And as for my flushing, I think I might well have if such were the case, but I have a fairly retentive memory and I can not recapture even so much as a thought in connection with all this.

Speaking of your heading, "Mr. Dreiser's Battle for Truth," I wish I could persuade mine enemy and all others to drop that overworked and misused word "truth." I might be willing to battle for a fact or many facts, but for "truth," that wondrous, religious, moralic thing, which like a mercenary can be made to do service in any cause—well—no—I do not fight for truth.

THEODORE DREISER

New York, May 16

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

You were good enough to send me Mr. Dreiser's statement to read before publication. I can see no "malice" in my statement concerning Mr. Dreiser's friends, and their effort to help him fight the censor. I never claimed that it was an official movement on the part of the Authors' League, but that I was asked to help by some people who were members of the League.

I am sorry I am unable at the moment to look for the original letters, which I hope later on to consult. My daughter having just undergone a serious nose operation, it is important not to stir up dust in the room adjoining hers, where my old letters are filed away. But I have written to England to the writer who sued the Broadway Magazine and for whom I testified, asking him to send me the exact date of the trial, the name of the judge, etc. Unquestionably the stenographic report of the trial will bear out the entire accuracy of my statement. I am told by my lawyer that even when a judge who is trying a case has reason to believe that a witness is not testifying in accordance with the facts, he very rarely bothers to order the prosecution of the witness.

I understood that Mr. Hampton was the owner of the Broadway Magazine, and it was possible that he may have been down as Editor-in-Chief, but I never saw him, never had any dealing with him whatever, and to all intents and purposes Mr. Dreiser acted as Editor-in-Chief. Mr. Hampton never appeared at the trial, and Mr. Dreiser testified that he was Editor of the magazine, and was the only one who had authority to appoint any Associate Editor, and that no one else could have given me authority to order articles. Mr. Dreiser, in his reply, makes a point of not having conferred upon me any "general associate editorship." It does not matter what kind of editor I was; his answer at the trial was a general denial that I had any power to order articles of any nature whatever for the magazine.

ANNIE NATHAN MEYER

New York, May 27

[Solely on account of space those portions of Mrs. Meyer's letter which set forth in detail her personal relations with Mr. Dreiser and the Broadway Magazine have been omitted. It may be proper to add that Mrs. Meyer is a writer and a public-spirited woman, well-known for the leading part she took in the founding of Barnard College.—EDS. THE REVIEW.]

"America's Duty"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your article, "America's Duty," in the Review of May 22, is refreshing, the more so that one seldom hears of late from press or pulpit a vigorous expression on what the United States ought to do for the peoples in dire distress. The contrast with what we saw and heard a year or two ago is not only mortifying but amazing.

Congress is blamed for heartlessness. Well it may be, but does not Congress reflect a mental attitude prevalent through the country? Senators and members of Congress are not usually blind to what interests their constituents? If a particle of the extraordinary zeal for the Constitutional amendments had been manifested in behalf of wrecked and starving nations, Congress would not have been so lukewarm towards proposed measures of relief.

Probably the past six months have witnessed a greater outpouring of gifts from the American people for ostensibly beneficent causes than ever before in our history, but how trifling the part of mitigating the miseries of those overwhelmed by the calamities of the war! Every one knows what the great "drives" are for. So do our Congressmen. If the vociferous appeals that stir the country are made for accumulating funds to insure the ministry of coming ages, to pile up big endowments for universities and colleges such as never were dreamed of before, and to finance on a vast scale ecclesiastical schemes for visionary enterprises that tax credulity to the utmost, while overlooking millions of people who at this very hour are on the verge of starvation, what is to be expected of politicians in Washington?

May not these aspects of present conditions be properly commended to the serious consideration of all who are engineering the drafts on popular beneficence which are to-day absorbing attention and effort to the exclusion of the actual sufferings of the world?

ALTRUIST

New Haven, Conn., May 24

Survival After Death as Related to Physics

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In your issue of March 6 Professor Jastrow, discussing Sir Oliver Lodge, says:

> The peculiar aggravation of the "case" is the trivial irrelevance of the evidence upon which a professor of physics announces a subversive dispensation which, if true, would contradict every principle of his science and relegate his laboratory to the scrap-heap of an abandoned intellectual habitation.

The precise meaning of the phrase which I have italicised is not clear to me.

The words seem to mean that if "survival after death" were proven to be a fact it would be equivalent to a contradiction of the principles of physical science. As this is manifestly not the case—for physical science has no "principles" which are concerned with the "spirit" side of things—Professor Jastrow must mean something else, and what this something else is is not clear from his words.

Will he be so kind as to tell us what he meant?

The reason why I am anxious to have his meaning clearly stated is that many ill-informed people suppose that the metaphysical dogma which denies the "spirit" side of things rests upon a foundation of physical science, which, of course, it does not. It is pure dogma. Conceivably physical science may disprove it some day, but it can never prove it.

T. F. W.

New York, May 9

[The reference is to the fact that, as Sir Oliver is a physicist, he should be peculiarly alert to any use of physical data for an unscientific hypothesis. Since he has included physical evidence as part of his conviction, and thought that if Palladino got over her temporary moral decline (as people throw off a cold) she would once again show that spirit-agency can affect tables as hoist and tackle would. If that is so, I fail to see any use for a physical laboratory in which one teaches and demonstrates certain laws of behavior during the day, while at evening in a séance room things behave in a totally subversive manner.

I had no intention to imply that a belief in survival after death as a matter of faith or in association with any religious or cosmic position has any relation to physical data. It stands apart on its own terms. So, also, there is nothing in the general conclusions as to the nature of existence which may be derived from physical science that is freer from metaphysical implications than a view largely derived from other sources. I find myself wholly in agreement with the view stated by T. F. W. I should regard it as vain to look for any confirmation of any ultimate views I hold from the revelations of a séance room, whether the manifestations are physical or psychical. The sum total of such revelation is to my mind perfectly and necessarily explicable upon naturalistic grounds which leave science intact and consistent. Beyond this field we are all alike in our limitations of knowledge and have open the remaining sources of mental and spiritual assurance. JOSEPH JASTROW]

Germany the Logical Claimant

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

"The presumptions are in favor of Italy," you say in speaking of the Adriatic east coast, "because of her sacrifices in the war, because of the necessity of securing her active adherence to the League, and because of her established cultural position and prospects. When disposing of an almost undeveloped region, statistics of the scanty population have secondary meaning. What counts greatly is the capacity of the claimants for developing and eventually peopling the territory."

Permit me to suggest that from all these points of view which you so ingeniously suggest, Germany is the logical claimant. Her sacrifices in the war have been greater even than those of Italy; Italy shared in the gestation of the League and is parentally committed to it, while Germany still stands outside the family circle; and as to her cultural position, and to her need for scantily populated territory may I refer you to the works of Messrs. von Bernhardi and Treitschke?

Or was that little editorial paragraph perhaps a slip on the part of the same brilliant student of foreign affairs, who, describing the Communist meeting at Amsterdam, and compiling his information from that expert and impeccable source, the Amsterdam Handelsblad, converted the Brooklyn Jew, S. J. Rutgers,

BERTRAM W. KELLY

New York, May 5

[We are glad to print this telling testimony to Mr. Kelly's brilliancy as a student of foreign affairs, and humbly admit our inferiority of intellect, which made us blind to the fact that Germany, which started the war and ruthlessly sacrificed the world's peace for the sake of her own aggrandizement, has no less a claim to being rewarded for this method of vindicating her cultural position than Italy has for helping in restoring peace. As to Mr. Rutgers, a temporary residence in Brooklyn and active participation in Communist propaganda in the United States can not convert a Dutch engineer into a Brooklyn Jew. Eds. THE REVIEW.]

Gold as Commodity and as Money

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the current discussion of the high cost of living does not Professor Laughlin blink the fact that in both of its functions, in the arts as well as in business, gold is a commodity subject to the same economic laws as any other commodity; in other words, that the quantity theory of money is implicit in the accepted economic relation of supply and demand?

Let us consider what would happen if the quantity of gold coin were suddenly centupled when the antecedent quantity just sufficed for the economic conduct of business. The supposititious mintage, constituting 99 per cent. of new monetary medium, would have as money no function whatever. It would not facilitate business at existing prices and, not being needed in business, it could not be safely put at interest except as it displaced existing loans. Nine per cent., let us say, would be absorbed by the arts but 90 per cent. would still remain in bank vaults idle. Inevitably it would seek investment and, whether economist or not, who can doubt that property values as expressed in gold would soar and continue to soar until finally adjusted to the value of gold in its double capacity of commodity in the arts and in finance? Whoever accepts the conclusion implied by this question must accept also "a," if not 'the," quantity theory of money.

H. A. BRIGGS

Sacramento, Cal., May 6

The Goncourt Prize

AMONG recent literary discussions none is more interesting than that connected with the award of the Goncourt prize for 1919 in France. In some aspects this discussion is amusing; in others it may turn out to be prophetic, for one of the two volumes to which the choice was finally reduced is perhaps indicative of a view upon human life which will distinguish the serious novel of the immediate future.

The winner of the prize was Marcel Proust with his "A l'Ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs"; the "runner-up," Roland Dorgelès with "Les Croix de Bois." The same two books were also considered for the Prix Vie Heureuse, awarded by a women's committee; and this time the result was reversed, Dorgelès getting the prize. Commenting on these results and playing on the titles, as also on the subject matter of the rival novels, the witty critic Rachilde attributes the preference of the women to nothing but the irresistible attraction of "le coq." She may of course be right; and she ought to know, being a woman herself and, as it happened, chairman of the committee. But I am inclined to think that this preference was determined at least in part by something else, a fact which all have observed who have dealt with the mental processes of both men and women, viz., the greater docility of the female mind and its weaker appreciation of that which is untried and original.

"Les Croix de Bois" is, to be sure, a charming volume. Containing stories and sketches of the war, it is as pleasing and well-written as any collection of the kind which I have read, especially to be recommended being the story entitled "le Fanion rouge." Dorgelès is alternately amusing and serious. He has a better control of his material, especially in the matter of perspective, than many recent writers on the same subject; and he is less haunted by the tiring cult of the inconspicuous and the commonplace. Thus his book appeals readily to the general reader whose taste is formed by celebrated storytellers of the past and who demand of a book merely the pleasure afforded by an artistic diversion with which they are already familiar. But for this same reason, "Les Croix de Bois" has little of interest for the intellectually adventurous, for those who, having watched the development of French letters, are eagerly seeking signs of something at the same time new and bearing the ear-marks of at least comparative permanency.

Proust's "A l'Ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs" will better satisfy the inquisitive. It suggests the thought that the novelist's view of man and the world after bobbing up and down for over thirty years under the pressure of the changing densities of the realistic, the rational, the sensational, and the intuitive, is at last coming to rest in a stable mixture of them all. Distasteful to the older generation of critics who, insisting on condensation and artistic choice, very properly object to it on stylistic grounds, and no less uncongenial to certain younger groups who, still convinced of the supreme importance of the lyric urge both in the individual and in society as a whole, dislike it for its merciless insistence upon the hidden principles of human reactions, it has nevertheless found much significant support in France. "Proust," says a reliable observer, "is one of the two authors whom every one must have read"; and his recent book is ardently praised by many critics who, of varying ages, occupy a middle ground and seem to be gaining daily in numbers and influence.

"A l'Ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs" is like Proust's preceding book, "du Côté de chez Swann," part of the series bearing the general title "A la Recherche du temps perdu." It describes events in the life of a young man, presumably the author, during a short period of his adolescence, stressing particularly the thoughts and feelings of the hero (if so gentle a lad may be given such a title)—thoughts and feelings so arranged in the retrospect of the author as to produce a novel and striking effect upon the reader.

To understand this effect, it must first be noted that Proust is a keen observer of his fellow men, with a subtle sense for interpretation. Speaking, for instance, of the fact that a young girl who had refused to let the youth kiss her had immediately afterwards presented him with a gold pencil, Proust remarks upon the perversity of those who seek to show an appreciation of our attentions while refusing to grant the particular favor we ask: "the critic whose article would flatter the novelist, invites him to dinner; and the duchess does not take the social climber to the theatre with her, but sends him tickets for her box on a day when she is busy elsewhere."

"A l'Ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs" is full of such observations and of others on a more developed scale; certain passages, notably a delightful two pages upon the young Mme. Swann, walking among her admirers in the sunshine of a spring afternoon, are remarkable portraits in which the physical and the moral are blended to perfection. In them all we detect the sharp eye and quick sensitiveness of an unusually gifted psychologist. But these observations are only the material out of which Proust has built his book, not its subject. His aim is to reconstitute the past of his youth with all the vitality of real life; and this vitality he obtains by arranging his material in accordance with a method of his own, one might almost say with a certain particular philosophy. It is in this that his essential originality appears.

There is no such thing, once the days of extreme infancy are past, as a virgin mind or virgin sensibilities; what is more, no normal man is exclusively perception, feeling, or mind. At any determined moment, we are all compounds of previously acquired ideas and sentiments, the which determine our approach to this or that person or thing, each succeeding experience of life modifying in its turn the predisposition of mind and feeling with which we face the next experience. The man who has loved once can never, even though he should later meet another woman exactly like the first, love in precisely the same manner again; and he who goes to the theatre to see a much-talked-of actress takes with him to the play a prejudice which that which he sees himself may greatly change but can not obliterate; and it may even happen that even this compound judgment will be further modified, once the performance is over, by the strikingly expressed comment of another spectator.

Such is evidently the theory on which Proust proceeds "à la recherche du temps perdu": he seeks to recapture, exactly as they were at the moment, the states of mind and feeling succeeding one another in the development of his young hero. Commenting on the letters of Mme. de Sévigné, he observes, in one passage of his book, that "she presents things in the order of our perceptions instead of beginning by an explanation of their causes," and elsewhere he shows his painter Elstir painting things "not such as he knows them to be, but in accordance with the optical illusions presented to the eye." Proust has built for himself a method along these lines; only, and it is precisely this point that saves him from the futilities of impressionism, at the very moment of describing each impression, he recognizes the illusion as being nothing but an illusion and thus keeps the reader's mind open with the expectation of new aspects or a further development to come later on. The result of this method is decidedly pleasing. The world unfolds before us as it does to the hero; we seem to discover it ourselves, advancing hand in hand with the author, our consciousness being constantly enriched by facts, rational, realistic, and emotional. A group of summer girls seem to us all alike when first encountered on the beach: they are all characterized by the same pride in their youth and the same exclusive joy in one another's society; "They had for those who were not of their group no affectation of disdain: their sincere disdain itself satisfied them." But a further acquaintance leads us to appreciate differences between them; and in the case of those we learn to know best, the personality of one, whose identity was strongly marked at the outset, grows easily with the contribution of each meeting, whereas it takes more effort to reconcile and make into an harmonious whole the different impressions and facts picked up sporadically concerning another whose identity was not so fixed when we first saw her among her friends. Similarly, to take an example of a different kind, Proust makes us experience once more that sense of sudden enlightenment which is familiar to all persons who take pleasure in making and observing new friends. Through the author we make the acquaintance of certain aristocrats at the hotel; we watch them move, talk, and parade; we form an opinion of their merits, their faults, and their characteristics generally. Then a chance remark shows them to be relatives and intimates of persons we knew well years before in the very different surroundings of provincial social life. This association is a revelation: it explains and it modifies, and both our new acquaintances and our old friends are henceforth seen by us in a new light.

Thus Proust has found a secret for making men and things real to his readers; and it is this sensation of discovering his world for ourselves, as though with our own eyes, thought, and feelings, that is the one great charm of his book. Unfortunately, from the point of view of style and composition, it is deplorable. Proust belongs to that school which the French call "dit-toutist." His book is four times, and his sentences are half a dozen times, too long. He can resist neither a secondary detail nor a subordinate clause, and it often takes an extraordinary effort of the attention to catch the bearing of either. Perhaps it is this, quite as much as his originality or the title of his book, that cost him the favor of the ladies of the Vie Heureuse. Nevertheless I am inclined to agree with the decision of the Académie Goncourt. Proust is a novelist, no longer young, who has patiently worked out and applied with scrupulous fidelity a method of his own; and it would further seem, from the nature of his attitude towards life and the reception given to his book, that he foreshadows a literary philosophy towards which writers have unconsciously been tending. We have come, of late, to feel somewhat out of sympathy with the older novelists, with their exclusions and their over-emphasis. Are we to have at last a new synthesis based on a simultaneous recognition of all or nearly all the forces which the average man, in contrast to the professional philosopher, recognizes as potent in his life—his knowledge, his reason, his imagination, and his intuition?

A. G. H. Spiers

Book Reviews

Indictments Against Two Nations

Before and Now. By Austin Harrison. New York: John Lane Company.
Red Terror and Green, the Sinn Fein-Bolshevist Movement. By Richard Dawson. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

If Mr. Austin Harrison had not long since won his own way to our regard for his vivacious articles as editor of the English Review, all lovers of brilliant journalism would still look with eager expectancy to the work of his father's son. The venerable Frederic Harrison is among those who throughout a long lifetime have taught most to their contemporaries, so that one is tempted to collect from the book called "Before and Now" some trace of family likeness in style or in message. These are quite conspicuous to even the most casual reader. There is a touch of the same apostolic spirit, the same resolve to make literature a medium of instruction rather than mere entertainment, the same caustic criticism of conventions, and the same daring challenge to prejudice. Some of the papers in this collection appeared during the three years immediately before the war, others between 1914 and 1918. They are re-printed now, with footnotes calling attention to the points in which their argument has been confirmed by experience. This is a courageous venture, in itself reminiscent of Frederic Harrison's own literary practice, and the author must not complain if his readers choose to supplement those footnotes which indicate his sagacity with others which draw attention to his mistakes.

The subjects chiefly discussed are the weak points of English life and custom. There is much about the characteristic insularity of British ideas, about the school system which idolizes sport, stereotypes class distinction, and imposes a classical training to the neglect of science and modern languages upon those who have little aptitude for Horace or Homer. Boys, according to Mr. Harrison, leave Eton or Harrow with a certain social prestige, but with almost a contempt for serious thought, reverencing "good form," but poorly equipped for the strenuous tasks of the modern world. "So the system endures, and it is the most conservative, wooden, and antiquated business concern in the country." It is urged upon us that the old motto about Waterloo having been won on the playing-grounds of Eton can not be applied in the changed conditions of our own time, that it inspires "class priggishness and class arrogance," that it is responsible for producing "mental derelicts," and that the thing needed first and foremost is to bring the old traditional high-grade schools under state management and discipline. Mr. Harrison sees the fruit of this obsolete educational heritage in John Bull's aversion to taking his part in European movements, in his sense of security while "marooned upon our right-little, tight-little island," in his scornful dislike of Continental methods, in his adherence to an ideal of personal freedom which divorces itself from all concern with social necessities and projects. He finds in the English temperament a strain of disorder, of rebelliousness against system and control, a belief that it is always possible to "muddle through" by a sort of national rule of thumb against other nations that have appreciated the need for applied science, a willingness to trust private initiative where community effort alone has a chance of success. Thus the same spirit which left British hospitals to be maintained by the charitable made it necessary on the outbreak of war to "advertise for an army." And Mr. Harrison thinks that there might have been no war at all if this mood of aloofness had not prevented Englishmen from realizing long ago the obvious menace in Europe, and from boldly declaring their resolve to take active part with France in the struggle that was bound to come.

There is much truth in all this, as the war has abundantly shown, and it is a chief purpose of Mr. Harrison's book to enforce that changed policy in the era of peace which such hardly learned lessons should suggest. He thinks the party system has become meaningless, and that the men from both political camps whom he calls "re-constructionists" should unite to forget old watch-words of mutual antagonism. Mr. Lloyd-George has been saying the same thing, but one realizes how ambiguous such advice is when one remembers that Mr. Harrison himself contested Mr. Lloyd-George's seat and bestowed very hearty invective upon this typical "re-constructionist" during the last general election. It seems as if there were no escape from party of one sort or another, and a chief complaint against the teaching of "Before and Now" is that old ideals, though they may be faulty because they are old, have a profound value because they are ideals. The Englishman's zeal for personal freedom may have been over-pushed, but so was the German's zeal for state-control, and Mr. Harrison has not given us much help in selecting the happy mean. Some of his papers are very slight performances, crisp, vivid journalese, sometimes descending even to causerie, perhaps worth publishing once, but scarcely deserving to be republished. He has a journalist's gift for the choice of an arresting title. Thus he discusses the dethronement of the landed aristocrat by the man of trade and business under the heading "The Coming of Smith"; he presents the case about the idle, ostentatious rich in a chapter on "The Duke's Buffalo"; he introduces us to the spirit of feminism as "The New Sesame and Lilies." What he has given us is very suggestive, and one is grateful to any man who can stir up general interest in our social problems by the use of such a facile pen. Englishmen will be provoked to see themselves depicted in an essay on "The Country of the Blind." But being provoked may well be a pre-requisite for being made to think, and Mr. Harrison loves the country which he takes so much trouble to satirise into an awakening to its urgent needs. He has the same sort of literary gift as Mr. H. G. Wells, though in a slighter degree. But he has not so far shown anything like the rich literary nutritiousness that belongs to the work of his distinguished father.

Mr. Richard Dawson is a far more alarming writer than Mr. Harrison. The main thesis of "Red Terror and Green" is that we have all been utterly in the dark about the real purpose of Sinn Fein. He recognizes that that movement had in its earliest and quite ineffective beginnings a certain romantic side. But he urges that its driving power has long been no fanatical attachment to "nationhood," nor a wistful sentimentalism about Ireland's past, but rather a fierce, Bolshevistic rage against property and the propertied classes, so that if we would understand the record of the last twenty years we must give far less attention to the politicians, and far more to the stormy petrels of organized Labor. The significant figures for Mr. Dawson are thus not those whom the outside world has learned to know best. The reader will be astonished to find that, in a book which deals with Irish development during the last ten years, there is only the most meagre reference to John Redmond, an incidental mention of Mr. De Valera, almost nothing about Sir Edward Carson, while great space is devoted to James Connolly, James Larkin, and Roger Casement.

Mr. Dawson defines with clearness that traditional view which he means to refute. He finds it generally taken for granted (1) that the Irish insurrectionary movement developed out of constitutional nationalism; (2) that the physical force party exploited the impatience of those whose hope of Home Rule had been persistently disappointed; (3) that the example of Ulster was a potent influence in making the irritated rank and file of nationalism break away from pacific leaders like Redmond, who had constantly failed, and seek out a truculent leader like Sir Edward Carson, who seemed always to succeed. Against this reading of the story it is pointed out to us that it does not "square with the main facts." It does not explain the sudden and enormous access of strength and money to the Sinn Fein cause during the war, the complete overthrow of the parliamentary nationalists, the Dublin rebellion, and the German alliance. Mr. Dawson's own way of accounting for these things is that Sinn Fein was no passionate outgrowth of the old movement, but differed from it in kind. From the very first it was anti-constitutional, with its real roots in a hatred of the existing economic order, and its association with the spirit of nationality was never more than a dexterous disguise by which those quite unsympathetic towards its real purpose might be cajoled into reinforcing it. The German alliance, the flood of money from Bolshevist sources abroad, the touting for help from the followers of Lenin and Trotsky have thus made clear the ends which were all along of Sinn Fein's essence.

This is immensely interesting, and Mr. Dawson is a most lively expounder. As an Indian chief was seldom of much repute until he could show the scalps of some defeated rivals, so a clever journalist, aspiring to the honors of re-writing history, must vindicate his prowess by disproving some traditional view about the past. Nor can anyone deny that there is an element of truth in what Mr. Dawson has urged, though he is by no means so original in its discovery as he seems to suppose. Sinn Fein has always hated the constitutional nationalists, as was well known before Mr. Dawson set this forth, with a great show of revealing to us a secret. He does well to emphasize the Labor side of the rising of 1916, although almost every newspaper at the time was at pains to point out how significant was the part then played by Dublin Syndicalists. Perhaps the freshest point he has to make is Connolly's adroitness in connecting his own communistic schemes with the spirit of the old Irish tribal organization, so that he might avail himself of that national sentiment which better men had been unable to conduct to success. The intrigues of Casement with the Germans make excellent material for building up a theory that Sinn Fein was part of a German plot, and in a world torn by Bolshevism it is plausible to suggest that Sinn Fein emissaries have been seeking to combine the forces of disorder at home with the agencies of disorder in other countries. But Mr. Dawson will not easily convince those who know rural Ireland that its peasantry—now bitterly Sinn Fein—are now or were ever Bolshevistic. Perhaps no other class that could be named has so hated communism as the Roman priesthood, and, unless the Ulster folk whom Mr. Dawson admires are all wrong, it is the Roman priesthood which controls the rest of Ireland. Perhaps the drollest of Mr. Dawson's arguments is that Sinn Fein is now "thrown back perforce upon the urban population," just because those in the country districts are least susceptible to the forces of anarchistic Labor! As Ireland is overwhelmingly agricultural, one would like to think this view was right, for the success of Sinn Fein would then be short-lived. But as its strength is clearly spread over those areas in which his argument would prove it impotent, one must forgo the comfort which he has momentarily encouraged. And a glance will show that those main facts with which, he tells us, the traditional theory can not be made to square, are quite inexplicable on the theory he would substitute. Mass changes in feeling are not wrought in a day even by distributing German gold among leaders. But they are wrought by the prolonged disappointment of mass hopes. Subtracting, however, the due subtrahend, as Carlyle would have put it, one may learn from Mr. Dawson to lay more emphasis upon the passions of insurgent Labor in the cities, and less upon a demoralizing of the quiet rural folk, if one would explain the shocking orgies of crime. Herein lies the grain of hopefulness which the writer has unwittingly sown in our hearts.

HERBERT L. STEWART

One of the Ablest Members of the Supreme Court

JOHN ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF THE UNITED STATES: SUPREME COURT, 1853-1861. By Henry G. Connor. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

TO some lawyers past middle life, and to specialists in the history of this country during the decade from 1855 to 1865, the name of John Archibald Campbell is still familiar. To few others would it now suggest anything. Many more could recall somewhat of such politicians as Lewis Cass, of such merchants as A. T. Stewart, of such pugilists as John C. Heenan, the "Benicia Boy," to say nothing of such a showman as P. T. Barnum, every one of whom was at some period of his life among his contemporaries. Yet we like to think of the Supreme Court as the greatest judicial tribunal that the world has ever known, and Campbell certainly ranked among the ablest half dozen of the more than three score men who have been members of it. When his name is now mentioned at all, it is usually in connection with the very few occasions upon which he had some hand in other than legal matters; as when, in the early spring of 1861, he was intermediary between the Commissioners of South Carolina and Secretary Seward; or when in February, 1865, with Stephens and Hunter, he represented the Confederacy at the conference in Hampton Roads; or when, two months later, he obtained from President Lincoln permission for the Virginia Legislature to convene at Richmond, then in possession of Grant's army. All the greater the debt to Judge Connor for this readable book of scarcely three hundred pages, in which is told the story of Campbell's life, and from which we learn how highly his professional brethren in his own day thought of him as counsellor, advocate, and judge. That is usually the only possible test of the worth of a lawyer. There are no formal measuring rods by which to gauge his true size, a fact which the book before us strikingly illustrates.

Campbell was one of the six Justices whose decision in the Dred Scott case was recalled at the Presidential election of 1860, at Appomattox, and by the Fourteenth Amendment. He was of the dissenting minority in his opposition to the extensions of the Admiralty jurisdiction, since found so useful, and in his objection to the legal fiction by which the Federal Courts have secured for themselves so considerable a part of the litigation to which corporations are parties. He was of counsel in the Slaughter House cases, and there made one of the greatest arguments of his life. He lived to appreciate how unfortunate would have been the consequences had the majority of the Court accepted the construction of the Fourteenth Amendment for which he there contended.

His efforts to postpone the outbreak of the war by bringing about an informal understanding as to Fort Sumter; to end it by accepting the terms offered by Lincoln at Hampton Roads; and to escape from the perils of radical reconstruction by calling together the Legislatures of the several States which had made up the Confederacy, so that they might themselves undertake the necessary readjustments, all failed. Those who did not know him, with such evidence and none other before them, might well question whether after all he was really eminent. In such doubts, those who had heard him at the Bar, or had sat with him in the consultation room, never shared. As Judge Connor shows, they knew him for what he was. They saw and felt the power that was in him.

In fact, if not in intention, there is sometimes not a little irony in the conventional "learned judge." It was not so as to him. He was in the first rank as a common law lawyer, and he was an accomplished civilian as well, something which few English lawyers of his day, or for that matter of any other, were or are. It is a wonder, though, that any love of learning or capacity to acquire it survived his early experiences. We are told that he entered Franklin College, now the University of Georgia, at eleven, and graduated at the head of his class at fourteen. It would profit little now to inquire into what, at that time, were the requirements of his alma mater. Let us be thankful that he was at least apparently none the worse. Then for three years or thereabouts, he was a cadet at West Point. At seventeen, he took up the study of the law, and kept at it for the sixty years he thereafter lived. By grace of a special Act of Legislature, he was admitted to the bar when he was eighteen. Fifty-three years later, in New Hampshire vs. Louisiana, he made an argument before the Supreme Court which Waite, Miller, Field, Grey, and Blatchford united in declaring to be the greatest that anyone of them had ever heard.

The reader of Judge Connor's interesting little study must regret that Campbell went out with his State. He lived in undiminished mental vigor for nearly twenty-eight years afterwards. The Supreme Court might have had him for all that time. Wayne and Catron remained on the Bench throughout the Civil War, although Georgia and Tennessee seceded. Campbell could not see his way clear to do the like. He acted from a calm sense of duty, for he was not carried away by any enthusiasm for secession. He firmly believed in the right of a State to withdraw, whenever it saw fit, but he was strongly opposed to its exercise at that time. When, against his judgment and advice, Alabama seceded, he felt he was in honor bound to follow, for to her, in his view, his allegiance was due. How much water has since gone over the dam!

JOHN C. ROSE

Something Different

THE CREAM OF THE JEST. By James Branch CABELL. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.

INVINCIBLE MINNIE. By Elizabeth Sanxay Holding. New York: George H. Doran Company.

AT the booksellers they are used to a certain type of customer who strolls in at odd hours and asks, rather hopelessly, for "something different." He is usually a confirmed novel-reader. If he can not get his new thing he will go on reading the old one: but there is always the faint hope of change, of the fresh theme or at least the fresh accent. To a few such "The Cream of the Jest," by James Branch Cabell, first printed in 1917, may have come as a boon. The not altogether happy reception of "Jurgen" very likely justifies the publisher in issuing a new edition of this earlier fable. The book labors under the disadvantage (for this period, at least,) of a studied and bookish manner which only in "Jurgen" has attained real freedom and beauty. Like its successor, it is fantasy rather than novel. The hero, Kennaston, in the flesh "an inadequate, kickworthy creature" is, nevertheless, "not merely human; he is humanity." His gross and dull physical presence shelters a prince of romantic dreaming. As Horvendile, poet and lover, he makes unearthly tryst with his mistress Ettarre. A little study discovers the author's commentary on his work in the inscription upon the mystic "sigil of Scoteia," symbol of the lovers' relation. "James Branch Cabell made this book so that he who wills may read the story of man's eternally unsatisfied hunger in search of beauty. Ettarre stays inaccessible always and her loveliness is his to look on only in his dreams. All men she must evade at the last and many are the ways of her elusion." Ancient and inexhaustible theme, which Mr. Cabell has expounded more richly if less discreetly in the unfortunately discussed "Jurgen." . . . Here, I say, he is less successful in making us forget his literary masters: has less certainly become master of his own medium. Here also insurgency of the now quite conventional anti-Victorian stamp almost overbalances the basic idealism of the book.

Contempt for yesterday is an unsafe altar for the worship of to-day and forever. Poor Kennaston makes himself ridiculous by "dwindling into" family man, vestryman, and "responsible citizen." He is the potentially free spirit enslaved by the flesh and ground to pattern by the social machine. Conformity stultifies him—and in him, humanity. "All I advanced for or against him, equally, was true of all men that have ever lived. . . . For it is in this inadequate flesh that each of us must serve his dream; and so, must fail in the dream's service, and must parody that which he holds dearest." And yet of this Kennastonian humanity mockery is not to have the last word. Dreams are more real than the flesh that in some feeble sense harbors them: "It is only by preserving faith in human dreams," the fabulist gravely concludes, "that we may, after all, perhaps some day make them come true." . . . Kennaston of Lichfield, dilettante author, pampered husband, stodgy citizen, sensitive dreamer, is American enough. Mr. Cabell makes skilful contrast between his inner romance and the dull realism of his everyday: notably in the note to the little scene where Ettarre looks at him out of his wife Kathleen's eyes, and he signals recognition—in vain: "So they dined alone together, sharing a taciturn meal, and duly witnessed the drolleries of 'The Gutta-Percha Girl.' Kennaston's sleep afterward was sound and dreamless."

"Invincible Minnie" is another American book of uncommon substance and savor. Its author says in her word of preface that it is "not intended to be a romantic story, or a realistic story," but only a tale of something which might happen, given a person of the Minnie type. Fairer to the book and its writer would be its description as a reduction to the extreme (if not, towards the end, to the absurd) of what a Minnie would do if invincible intention did not here and there meet an impenetrable obstacle. In conduct and detail, it is "real" enough. Most of us, as the author surmises, "know a Minnie." A Minnie is a single-track egotist, a domestic "vamp," who without verifiable charm or recognizable authority or conscious system, somehow gets what she wants when she wants it. This particular Minnie, when we first meet her, is "a rather short, full-bosomed young woman of perhaps twenty, with a dark, freckled face and an expression very pleasant and friendly." She has the air (it is hardly a pose) of the faithful housewife, the self-effacing servitor. She is anxiously busy always, avid of duty; and covers her shiftlessness and ineffectiveness even from herself, with the camouflage of ceaseless activity. And by sheer pressure of primitive force she imposes her will, to their ruin, on all who come too close to the centre of her web. She is incapable of perceiving her own outrageousness. She can deliberately rob her sister of her lover, become a bigamist in order to support him, and introduce him as her brother into the household of the good man to whom she is about to bear a son: and all without compunction in her heart or shame when she is found out. Nor is this all. When sister Frankie takes up with Minnie's leavings in the person of the hoodwinked Petersen and Minnie's deserted children, she is capable of returning to snatch them away; not because she has any deep feeling for them but because they are hers. And the curtain falls on the bitter laughter of Frankie, who has planned to rescue some sort of happiness out of her love and care of Minnie's children:

"She thought of the house in the suburbs, with the nursery and playroom; even the new toys.

She thought of herself and Mr. Petersen married, for the sake of her children.

She thought of Minnie, who had carried off Lionel, and Lionel's child, and Mr. Petersen's child, and was now securing a supply of Mr. Petersen's money.

She began to laugh heartily."

The curtain lifts ironically for an instant, once more, for a glimpse of Mr. Petersen, years later, visiting the half-grown children and finding them—what Minnie was bound to have made them. Only then does his old illusion about her vanish altogether. A bitter book, remorselessly written, and quite against the current stream of tolerance for all human creatures. Evidently this story-teller does not believe (with Mr. Cabell) that one person is about as good as another. Perhaps it is wholesome for us to turn now and then from the genial process of admiring the best of us in the worst of us, and to behold how a Minnie looks, pinned fairly on the slide and set under a ruthless lens.

H. W. BOYNTON

Free International Waterways

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS. By Paul Morgan Ogilvie. New York: The Macmillan Co.

PROBLEMS of transportation, both at home and abroad, with all their involved factors, social and political as well as commercial, were never more pressing than they are to-day. Mr. Ogilvie's thoughtful treatise is therefore very timely. The treatise proper, which deals with the evolution of the principle of the freedom of international waterways, runs to only some one hundred and seventy pages, the rest of the book being devoted to an elaborate and carefully-arranged reference manual to the treaties, conventions, laws, and other fundamental acts governing the international use of inland waterways. This, with a bibliography and index, both sufficiently full to serve the student as well as the casual reader, fills two hundred and fifty additional pages.

Mr. Ogilvie sketches the history of maritime enterprise in the Mediterranean, and its gradual expansion throughout the Seven Seas; the institution and development of maritime law, from the ancient sea-code of the Rhodians to the recognized usage of modern times; the sovereignty of the seas, as exercised in succession by the Phœnicians, Greece, Carthage, Rome, Venice, Portugal and Spain, Holland, and England; the long controversy as between Mare Clausum and Mare Liberum, ending in the acceptance by all maritime nations of the principle of the freedom of the seas; and the final extension of the same principle to inland waterways. Freedom of navigation on inland waterways thus appears the logical extension of the older principle of freedom of the seas.

To most of us the genesis of the principle of unrestricted navigation of inland waterways, however important as a matter of history, will have less real interest than its application to present-day problems. In the recent treaties with Germany, Austria, and Poland, the Allied and Associated Powers at the Peace Conference at Paris have provided for the international navigation of certain European waterways. These provisions, taken in conjunction with the changed boundaries of many of the old and new states of Central Europe, will have a far-reaching effect on the development of international commerce. As Mr. Ogilvie points out, the commerce of Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Hungary, which formerly passed through the Adriatic ports of Fiume and Trieste, may now be diverted down the Danube. Switzerland is engaged in extensive improvements to the upper course of the Rhine which, when completed, will give the Republic access to the sea. The projected canal to connect the Rhine and the Danube will give through-navigation from the North Sea to the Black. Under the Treaty of Versailles, special rights are accorded Czecho-Slovakia in the navigation of the Elbe and of the Oder. Poland similarly has access to the Baltic by way of the Vistula. The projected Rhine-Meuse canal will give through-navigation from points on the Rhine up to Verdun on the Meuse. These and other projected improvements will before long give to most of the principal inland cities of Europe the practical status of ocean ports. The resulting movement of commerce in every direction across the continent, to and from the North Sea, the Baltic, the Black Sea, the Mediterranean, and the Atlantic, must have a profound influence not merely upon the economic but also upon the social and political relations of the various nations.

Obviously, most of the conditions of inland navigation, and the advantages of internationalization of inland waterways, apply as distinctly to North America as to Europe. This continent is peculiarly rich in inland water communications. It is literally true that, starting from such a great central reservoir as Lake Winnipeg, a man could travel by boat or canoe, with only a few portages, eastward to the Gulf of St. Lawrence or the harbor of New York, westward to the mouth of the Columbia, northward to the Arctic, north-eastward to Hudson Bay, or southward to the Gulf of Mexico. In fact a hundred years ago, in the palmy days of the fur trade, men did actually follow these water routes in canoes. To-day many of the same waterways are traveled more expeditiously and in greater comfort by steamer. Something over sixteen thousand miles of the Mississippi and its greater tributaries are navigated by steam craft. The Columbia is navigated, although not continuously, for five hundred miles. The Hudson Bay Company maintains steamers on both the Athabasca and the Mackenzie rivers, in the far northwest. It is possible, and even probable, that within a generation steam navigation will be opened from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson Bay by way of the Nelson river. But it is the eastern route from the heart of the continent that offers the points of greatest interest. The unrivalled system of waterways that extends from the head of Lake Superior to the Atlantic forms also, throughout the greater part of its course, the international boundary between the United States and Canada. It is therefore one of the inland waterways covered by Mr. Ogilvie's survey. From 1794 to 1909, successive treaties between Great Britain and the United States have secured the free navigation of these boundary waters. The treaty of 1909 not only provides that the navigation of all boundary waterways shall remain perpetually free, but it also extends the same right to canals connecting boundary waters, now existing or which may hereafter be constructed.

The International Joint Commission, created by the Treaty of 1909, is now engaged in an investigation, at the request of the Governments of the United States and Canada, to determine the practicability of a deep waterway between Lake Ontario and Montreal, and incidentally, the practicability of a water route for ocean-going vessels from the head of the Great Lakes to the sea. It is said, by those who are opposing this project, that it is impracticable for the same vessels to navigate both the open sea and these inland waters. Mr. Ogilvie throws some interesting light on this problem.

> Vessels equipped with the screw propeller may be employed advantageously either on the high seas or for inland navigation. Cargoes may be embarked at the sea-ports or inland ports of one country and transported by inland waterways and the high seas to interior points on distant continents without the necessity of transshipment. A ship may take cargo at New York, Chicago, Montreal, or Duluth and may voyage continuously until arrival at the proposed destination, whether three thousand miles up the Amazon at the port of Iquitos, Peru; or Matadi on the Congo; or Asuncion, Paraguay, more than a thousand miles inland on the Rio de la Plata; or Hankow on the Yang-tse-kiang, six hundred miles from the sea; or in Europe at one of the many river ports of the Danube.

He points out that a serviceable type of steamer has developed, capable of plying between various river ports on the Rhine and the sea-ports of the Azores, Portugal, Spain, and of the countries bordering on the North Sea and the Mediterranean. "Varying in tonnage from 342-1770 tons, these skilfully designed vessels carry an extensive commerce from inland ports without necessitating the transference of cargo." This service was instituted in 1888, and although it declined after 1903, owing to the shallow channel between Cologne and Rotterdam, it still amounted in 1907 to some 347,000 tons. If the "Rhine-Sea" traffic could be successfully operated under the unfavorable conditions of the shallow Rhine, there can be little doubt that a similar traffic would be economically practicable between the sea and the Great Lakes. Mr. Ogilvie points out that "on larger rivers such as the Amazon, the Columbia, and the Rio de la Plata, sea-going vessels suffer no serious limitation when employed in inland navigation." The probability is that the opening of the St. Lawrence route will lead to the evolution of a composite type of vessel, built along somewhat similar lines to the Rhine-Sea craft on a larger scale, and combining the advantages of the ocean tramps and the lake freighters.

L. J. B.

The Run of the Shelves

Three Books of the Week

[Selected by Edmund Lester Pearson, Editor of Publications, New York Public Library.]

MRS. WARREN'S DAUGHTER, by Sir Harry Johnston. (Macmillan.)

The further adventures of Vivie Warren, heroine of Shaw's "Mrs. Warren's Profession." Like the author's "The Gay-Dombeys," which it hardly surpasses in interest, it is less a novel and more a gallery of characters, real and fictitious. Amusing comment upon English life and politics, with a sympathetic history of the militant suffragettes, and of life in Brussels during the German occupation, 1914-1918.

TALKS WITH T. R., from the Diaries of John J. Leary, Jr. (Houghton.)

A reporter's notes of Colonel Roosevelt's conversations, especially interesting for the frank comments upon President Wilson, Mr. Hughes, and the 1916 campaign. An astonishingly correct prophecy of the outcome of the President's trips to Paris is the subject of one of the conversations.

LABOR'S CHALLENGE TO THE SOCIAL ORDER, by John Graham Brooks. (Macmillan.)

A survey of the industrial situation for the past thirty or forty years, with frank criticism upon the attitude and actions of both sides of the controversy. Attractive to the average reader because it includes comment upon such minor but universally appealing topics as the servant question.

THE thorny path of martyrdom seems to be the path of the "intent" reader of Joseph Conrad. From the comments and criticisms provoked by his new book, "The Rescue," it appears that the devout Conradian approaches his novels in some agony of spirit. Mr. Wilson Follett, writing in the New York Evening Post, mentions the "tantalizing, almost torturing, regrets" endured by the faithful; no simple and shallow enjoyment may be theirs, but on the contrary they must ponder upon every step in the psychological development of their author. Long nights of suffering are to be filled with thoughts of what "The Nigger of the Narcissus" would have been had it been written after, instead of before, "Chance"; they must writhe under the efforts of imagining "precisely wherein 'Heart of Darkness' would have undergone a subtle modification if 'Victory' had preceded it." Other comment upon "The Rescue" recalls the old gibe about Henry James: "What's his new novel about?" asked one man. "He hates to tell," said the one who was struggling with it. One Conradian read one or two hundred pages, and announced—his devotion clearly wavering—that it contained a fine description of a thunder-storm! Plainly, the time is not far away when the Conrad Societies will be listening to "papers" written to fix the exact date when his "third manner" imperceptibly melted into his "fourth manner," and bitter debates will occur as to the relative merits of both manners compared with a fifth and perhaps a sixth.

How did Chaucer's Knight come to ride a-chivachieing with Guy de Lusignan to Lyeys in Armenia "whan it was wonne"? What brought the Armenians from the mountains of Ararat to the plains of Cilicia and tangled them up with the crusading kingdoms of Jerusalem and Syria, thus to tie another knot in the problems of their national fate? Who was Gregory the Illuminator and how does their ecclesiastical capital come to be at Etzmiadzin in the Russia that once was? Of what blood and kindred are they and where does their language call cousin? What has been their part in the world of Islam, and what in that of the Christian Church, national, Greek, Roman, and now, in this last half century, in certain dealings with descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers? What were the relations of the Russian Armenians to the Russian Government and thus to the future revolution and the Bolshevist current in which they are now caught and adrift?

All these questions precede and condition their present situation, with its many and most complicated elements, of past and present, of memory, of hope, and of ambition. Old things live on in Asia Minor, the Caucasus, and Syria, in a fashion hardly thinkable to us with a popular memory vivid only for a century or two. For even the pan-Turanian vision of the Young Turks which rises so menacingly above these lands is in essence an evocation of Mongols and Tartars, the ghosts of Chingiz Khan, Hulagu, and Timurlang. And at the Konia of to-day there still survives among the descendants of the Seljuks the spirit of revenge for their fourteenth century overthrow by the Ottoman Turks. All this the Armenians in their long history have seen and suffered, and to the questions thus raised answers will fairly be found in "Armenia and the Armenians from the Earliest Times Until the Great War," by Kevark Aslan; translated from the French by Pierre Crabitès (Macmillan). The answers might sometimes be clearer; the latter part of the book is much more lucid than the earlier; but that is of the nature of the case. There are signs, too, in the names and phrasing, of its Armeno-French origin, and there is grievous need of a map and almost equally of an index. But the book is good and solid, sober with historical sense and conscience, and can be recommended to all but the historical specialist. He will, of course, turn to the same author's "Etudes historiques sur le Peuple Arménien," for the earlier part of this history. Of it the present book is a condensation extended by three additional chapters to the present day.

Drama comes to us finally from the pampas. Duffield and Company have just published "Three Plays from the Argentine," which Mr. Jacob S. Fassett translates, and Mr. Edward Hale Bierstadt edits and skillfully introduces. The three plays belong generally to the dramas criollos, creole or gaucho dramas, which, centrally placed between earlier imitations and later orthodoxies, in Argentine dramatic history, became, for a time, a conduit of the life-stream of an animated people. The gaucho, the protagonist, is, according to Mr. Bierstadt, a combination of Daniel Boone, Buffalo Bill, and Robin Hood.

Of the three plays, the first, the "Juan Moreira" of Silverio Manco and the "Santos Vega" of Luis Bayon Herrera, are valuable only as sidelights on the national spirit or as documents in what may be called the biology—or embryology—of literature. "Juan Moreira," formless, in six brief scenes, tattered and bloody like the remnant of a cloak which the passage of a sword has torn and reddened, with blunt, brief strokes which have almost the effect of scratches, does not lack interest of a rude kind. "Santos Vega" is more showy and less interesting. It is plotless, and its plotlessness has the weight of three acts to carry. It must stand or fall as a picture of manners, and it is difficult to believe that manners so decorative have not been submitted to the hands of a decorator. On the other hand, the third play, the "Witches' Mountain" by Julio Sanchez Gardel, is a strong play, a family tragedy, at once deadly and vital, with chasms between brother and brother, between father and son, which reach downward into moral abysses. Strong passions are finely imagined—a fact still notable in the dramatic world.

Mr. Floyd Dell in a playfully serious article in the April Liberator, which he calls a "Psycho-Analytic Confession," contends that our great mechanical discoveries, our locomotives and subways and telephones, are only mundane toys, the great world's substitutes for kites and marbles. He pleads, half in jest, for a "moderately advanced savagery." The word "savagery" may be taken as a wilful defiance of the commonplace, but, viewing the contention in its breadth and pith, there is meat as well as salt in his analogy. The inventions which dazzle and deafen both our senses and our minds are largely amusements in the guise of utilities; they are goods, they are necessities, only through their contributions to an order which may itself be an evil or a superfluity. The order here referred to is mechanical, not political or social; an individualist society might discard this apparatus, and a socialistic policy might retain them. They are not, however, easy to discard. A child may tear up its kite or throw its rocking-horse into the pond, without harm to its prospects of a good dinner and a warm bed. The naughtiness of the locomotive and the telegraph lies in the craft with which they have inserted themselves into the circuit of which the good dinner and the warm bed are parts.

There follows a second question: just what shall we renounce? Mr. Floyd Dell would drop the telephone, but keep the typewriter. His neighbor, indifferent to typewriters, would keep the telephone at all costs. It is to be feared that many telephones and typewriters would be consumed and thrown into the dust-heap in the progress of the debate that settled these contentions. Still, with every allowance for difficulty, one can not but dwell with pleasure on Mr. Dell's idea that complexity may be the middle term between an early and an eventual simplicity, that our apparatus may resemble the alloy in the ring in Browning's "Ring and the Book," which served the workmanship no less by its removal at the end than by its insertion in the process. (One may wish, in a parenthesis, that the "Book" had been as successful as the "Ring" in the discharge of its alloys before completion). In this hope one is heartened not a little by the analogy of language and of letters. Languages are simple at the outset. They improve by the adoption of a complex system of inflections, in which voice, mood, tense, case, gender, and number are laboriously discriminated. They improve still further by the repudiation of this system. Style, in the same way, tends to pass from an enforced simplicity in the immaturity of literature through a voluntary elaboration to a voluntary simplicity. Perhaps the material complexities of what Carlyle long since named the Mechanical Age may be the epoch of Johnsonese interposed between the primitive simplicity of Chaucer and the ripened simplicity of Kipling or Galsworthy.

In the text and translation of Marcus Cornelius Fronto, the first volume of which has just been added to the Loeb Library (Putnam), Mr. C. R. Haines has accomplished a task different in kind from that ordinarily set before the contributors to this series. In general the text has been already established, and it was only necessary to give an accurate and fluent translation and to subjoin an occasional note of explanation. That, indeed, is no light task, as any one knows who has attempted to render a Greek or Latin author into English; but in the present case the editor has been obliged to create his own text and to arrange chronologically a series of letters which have come to us in fragmentary shape and haphazard order. We can not enter into a discussion of details; enough to say that Mr. Haines has come through the ordeal in exemplary manner. For the first time Fronto can be read with ease, and belongs to literature. Much of the correspondence between him and Appian and Marcus Aurelius and others is concerned with questions of rhetoric which may seem anything but exhilarating to the modern reader; but not all. The affairs of the empire are touched on as well as the school exercises of the emperors. And even where rhetoric is the theme, the discussion often passes from the small proprieties of diction to the larger matters of literary criticism.

Two other volumes of the Loeb Library need to be recorded. Professor A. T. Murray publishes the second volume of his Odyssey, and Professor Bernadotte Perrin has progressed to the eighth volume in his masterly rendering of Plutarch's Lives. The present issue of the Plutarch contains the Life of Cato the Younger, which has left so many echoes in the literature of the world.

"Chill Hours" (Duffield), by Mrs. Helen Mackay, is the latest of this author's books, all of which—"Houses of Glass" (stories of Paris), "Half Loaves" (a novel dealing indirectly with France), and "Accidents" and "Journal of Small Things" (both made up of little French sketches written during the war)—have to do with "the City of Light." Mrs. Mackay has lived for many years in the French capital, and during the war she labored in the Hospital Saint Louis, Paris, until her health broke down. The present volume has to do chiefly with her experiences in the wards among the wounded French soldiers, where "courage, sacrifice and glory are come to be just the average, anonymous, like the uncounted little wooden crosses in the fields and at the road edges."

Impressions de Voyage—III

THE air here is full of gossip about individuals; of rumors diplomatic and political. The place, therefore, apart from its wonderful monuments of art and its checkered history, is extraordinarily interesting just now. Whether the situation is normal or no, I can not pretend to say, but I fancy such as I find it, such, in a measure, it has always been. At this moment the aggressive attitude of the Japanese appears to hold first place in every discussion. They are evidently in deadly earnest; they mean to hold all they have and to reach out for more. Crossing Shantung by rail the other day I wondered why they should covet it. So meticulously is the soil cultivated that it seems incapable of supporting a larger population; it is surely not wanted for Japan's surplus millions. Inquiry reveals the true cause of this land greed in three facts; first, the existence of valuable coal deposits; second, the former German railway, from Tsingtao to Tsinanfu, giving access to this coal, and being withal a trunk line from deep water to Pekin; third, the port of Tsingtao itself, where heavy vessels may discharge their cargoes direct into railway cars which can reach all parts of China adjacent to the capital, while Tientsin, hard by Pekin, is only accessible to light draught vessels, thence a double shift of freight is required—from barge to small steamers at the mouth of the Pai Ho River, then again by lighters at Tientsin to the railway. The Japanese have been shrewd enough to realize that in industry he who controls transportation is king. Moreover, they have bought up practically all the waterfront at Tsingtao, thus assuring to themselves a monopoly of shipping facilities. No wonder one American line of steamers has abandoned it as a port of call, so annoying were the unnecessary delays to which the Japanese subjected it.

While this policy, repeated wherever they have penetrated in China, may be immediately profitable to the Japanese, it is certainly costing them friendship and good-will which would doubtless in the end prove quite as valuable. Symptoms of this result were apparent even to as casual a traveler as I am. The notices in Canton—"Boycott the Japanese goods"; those in shops in Shanghai: "Japanese bank notes will not be accepted"; the glee with which the natives and others pointed out the emptiness of Japanese steamers on the Yangtze as contrasted with those of Chinese or European nationality loaded to the guard; the prompt negative invariably received to the question, "Do you like the Japanese?" all bespeak a frame of mind which bodes ill for pleasant relations between China and Japan. It is a great pity, for, pulling together, the former might achieve her independence of the foreign domination she experiences at every turn. Can a nation denied the right to frame its own tariff laws be considered sovereign?

I refrain from repeating the many stories which come to my ears illustrating the close resemblance, at least to their teller's mind, between Japanese and German methods. Let us hope that the Japanese will realize how shortsighted is this Hun policy and, realizing, abandon it.

The number of Chinese soldiers visible everywhere is astonishing and—disconcerting. They are not needed against foreigners, else would the Shantung question be settled promptly by the ejection of the Japanese trespassers; can it be that they are part of a great political machine? Every province has its own army under a "Military Governor." Are these coolies in uniform but pawns on the chess board of personal ambitions? To the ignorant tourist this seems the most likely solution of the riddle. Moreover, his suspicions are confirmed by statements from people long resident in China. Instead of borrowing money why should she not economize by returning to the soil hosts of these unnecessary consumers?

CASPAR F. GOODRICH

The Atavus

THE Merrills are very modern. This is natural because they have lived in the twentieth century for fully twenty years, as against less than ten in the nineteenth. It is also forced to some extent by the apartment in which they live. This apartment is ultra-modern, and they have aged perceptibly in trying to keep up with it. It is in an efficient, grown-up building; one hurdles no kiddie-cars in approaching it. Within, there are no childish whoops and wails, but only a series of mechanical clicks and electric hums.

Though I am welcomed most cordially when I call upon the Merrills, I always have a devil of a time getting in. I enter a tight little vestibule, turn a knob, open a box that is often the wrong box, press a button . . . and wait. As I wait I can hear vague, disturbing noises inside, a moan of resentment, a clatter as if someone were throwing up a defense against me, an irritable rat-a-tat, and though I be arrayed in all the glory of the late Ward McAllister, my tile becomes a slouch cap, my cravat a knotted bandana, and I am the person who was found loitering near the scene of the crime.

Suddenly the grilled door in front of me slides back, permitting me to walk into the hall. I am no longer a neophyte. Steeled for the second degree I present myself to the elevator-boy, a tall, gray-haired man with the dignity that a senator is supposed to have. He looks at me dubiously.

"Merrill's, please." I give the password a jauntiness which should convince him of my familiarity with the home whose sanctity he is guarding.

"Mr. Merrill's?" he asks with an accent of reproach.

"Yes—and Mrs. Merrill's," I add, just to assure him that my welcome will be unanimous.

He hesitates and then asks hopefully, "Are they expecting you?"

"They are." I confess it.

I can almost hear the Merrills sliding down his estimation. They had seemed like nice people, too. He admits me to the glittering cage. He has given up. If I proceed to mock the family portraits, or wipe my nose on my sleeve, or warble at my consommé, let none blame him! He has done his little best, but de gustibus non est disputandum.

At the eighth floor I step out of the car with carefully disguised relief; all the way up Charon has been staring at my ear-lobes, and I feel that the Juke is on me. There is more abracadabra about getting into the Merrill apartment proper—mainly matters of vestibules. First there is a vestibule and then there is a sub-vestibule, and the door of the vestibule must be closed before the door of the sub-vestibule can be opened. This is somewhat on the principle of the turnstile, and is a great help in keeping processions out of the home.

The apartment is small and very new. It is, as Mrs. Merrill has more than once remarked, "ducky"—but the remark throws more light upon herself than upon the apartment. Ducky or not, it is too complex for a simple soul like me. There are labor-saving devices on all sides—one can't make a move without saving a lot of labor—and the living-room is bedecked with space-saving devices until, like the Salteena of motor-cars, it seems dwarfed by its accessories. There is a table that is actually a multiplication-table in mahogany. It can, on "bridge" afternoons, turn itself into a host of little tables, or it can play the rôle of the long and festive board; test of all, it can telescope into almost nothing. The electric-light cords are on spring reels, and your light will go with you as far as you wish, but is apt to flash away when you least expect it.

The pride of the house is in the kitchen. It is an ironing-board that folds into the wall. True, Mrs. Merrill has all the laundry-work done outside, but the board is undeniably ducky. The way it slips into its niche is a tribute to the mind of man, and when it is not in use—which is all of the time—it is as ornamental as a spinning-wheel.

The modernity of the Merrills received a setback with the arrival of Peter. Babies are so old-fashioned. And Peter was a regular baby; the very first time I saw him I realized that. He was painfully pink, and proficient in the vulgar art of blowing bubbles.

"So this is Peter!" I said, in lieu of something clever and complimentary. "That was his grandfather's name, wasn't it?"

I thought they must have harked back at least a couple of generations for a name like that, but to my surprise I found that they hadn't harked at all.

"He isn't named for anyone," Mrs. Merrill informed me. "We just selected 'Peter' because it's so quaint."

I looked at Peter with new interest and not a little pity. There he lay in his crib—unfortunate child!—doomed to spend the rest of his days living up to a quaint name. What a future!

Though his ears are neither pointed nor furry, if he develops any conscience in infancy he will feel bound to behave like an odd, elfin creature. In childhood he will have to go away by himself and talk to fairies and flowers when he would rather converse with Dirtyneck McGrew. In youth he will have to cultivate an aversion to civilization, and practice his whimsicalities while the other lads are shooting pool. As for love, who ever heard of anyone named Peter breaking a woman's heart? Heartbreaking is not a laudable pursuit, I admit, but we all like to feel that we could go out and break a few if we weren't so decent. Probably when he gets older he will have to wear grotesque burnsides, waste a lot of time doddering, and be whimsical twenty-four hours a day; in his declining years he will have to build bird-houses when he's not writing for The Contributors' Club, and when he dies he will get a pun for an epitaph and be remembered as a delightful old bore.

All this goes with the name; the Fates seem to have ordained it. But I hope the three sisters—or two out of three, anyhow—may be wrong for once. I hope that Peter will look like his father, that he will vote the same ticket and sleep in the same church. I hope that he will drink coffee three times a day, chew gum at the office, marry the third girl he falls in love with, read the Saturday Evening Post, laugh at vaudeville, spell through "thru," boast of wearing B. V. D.'s all winter, and smoke Camel cigarettes.

But—who knows?—perhaps these very things will be the quaintnesses of Peter's day. In time, he may be pointed out as the eccentric old body who has vowed never to fly, though the planes pass his chimney every day. He will be thought a trifle "queer" because he uses the old-fashioned Gillette instead of having his whiskers removed by electricity. And it will be whispered that it is Peter who, under the name of "Old Subscriber," writes those letters to the New Republic sighing for the good old days when there was something wrong with the world every week.

WEARE HOLBROOK

Drama

Dramas for the Reader

REPRESENTATIVE ONE-ACT PLAYS BY AMERICAN AUTHORS. By Margaret Gardner Mayorga. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.

LITTLE THEATRE CLASSICS, VOL. II. By Samuel A. Eliot, Jr. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.

THE SOOTHSAYER. By Verner von Heidenstam, Translated by Karoline Knudsen. Boston: The Four Seas Company.

THE BIRTH OF GOD. By Verner von Heidenstam. Translated by Karoline Knudsen. Boston: The Four Seas Company.

THE SEVEN WHO SLEPT. By A. Kingsley Porter. Boston: Marshall Jones Company.

MISS MAYORGA has done well to bring together twenty-four one-act American plays. If the American one-act play has not flourished in obscurity, at least it has blossomed in the shade, and so recent has been its note that, without actually counting, I should suppose that about half the authors in this volume were under thirty-five. The book

(Continued on page 608)

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Studies in Language and Literature

LUCILIUS AND HORACE

A Study in the Classical Theory of Imitation

By GEORGE CONVERSE FISKE
Associate Professor of Latin

Professor Fiske sets forth the point of view with which the literary artist of antiquity approached his work, as a craftsman consciously accepting a well defined style, appropriate to his purpose, and manifesting his originality within the limits thus set for him. The book applies these conceptions first to Lucilius, and then to Horace. The conclusion brings the classical conceptions into relation with the modern romantic theory of composition.

The foregoing outline makes plain the importance of Professor Fiske's work, not only as a contribution to classical scholarship, but as a timely discussion of fundamental critical questions.

Price, $2.50
Orders should be sent to
The Secretary of the Board of Regents
The University of Wisconsin
Madison, Wisconsin

BOOKS To Live With

IT is no simple problem—the choice of the books that are to be our friends. Day after day we must see them upon our shelves; must make them the intimates of our lives. Of course there are books—casual acquaintances—that will meet the mood of the moment. They are the books that, once read, are cast aside. But for the tried and true friend there must be something more. Substance, thought, style—these qualities we must find ere a volume is placed on the shelf, just within reach, to be read and re-read. The following books, chosen from an extensive list, meet these requirements. They are preeminently books to live with.

My Neighbor, The Working Man
By James Roscoe Day
Chancellor of Syracuse University
A strong and trenchant discussion of present-day social and industrial unrest.
12mo. Cloth. Net $2.50, postpaid.

The Balkans. A Laboratory of History
By William M. Sloane
New Edition. Revised and Enlarged
The author has enlarged his text by something more than a quarter. The pages of the earlier editions have been revised, corrected and changed to correspond in the form of expression with the additional pages. The volume is a careful, lucid, and scholarly review of the whole Balkan question. A very valuable book for both students and general readers.
8vo. Three Maps. Cloth. In Press.

Pantheistic Dilemmas
And Other Essays in Philosophy and Religion
By Henry C. Sheldon
Essays dealing with important issues in the intellectual and religious world to-day. An invaluable volume for the student of current philosophical and religious trends. Professor Sheldon's sanity of thought and clarity of statement were never more evident than in these essays.
12mo. Cloth. Net $2.50, postpaid.

Public Opinion and Theology
Earl Lectures of the Pacific School of Religion
By Bishop Francis J. McConnell
All thoughtful readers will want to follow the Bishop through these illuminating and informative pages.
12mo. Cloth. Net $1.50, postpaid.

The Eyes of Faith
By Lynn Harold Hough
President of Northwestern University
A keen and critical putting of the relation of experience to present-day problems of philosophy and religion.
12mo. Cloth. Net $1.50, postpaid.

Some Aspects of International Christianity
The Mendenhall Lectures, Fifth Series, Delivered at DePauw University
By John Kelman
"There are questions of the most vital importance on which every man must form an opinion. The bearings of these questions are not confined to the regions of expert knowledge; and there is a place for impressions of the man on the street—his general sense of moral values, his commonsense view of relative importances, and the free play of his conscience upon the questions of the hour as he understands them. It is in his name and from his point of view that I have prepared these lectures."—From Author's Preface.
12mo. Cloth. Net $1.00, postpaid.

Prices are subject to change without notice

New York THE ABINGDON PRESS Cincinnati

(Continued from page 607)
is duly and competently supplied with preface, introduction, biographical notes, bibliographies, and other concomitants of anthologies. Miss Mayorga classes her twenty-four plays under eleven heads. She has just one more category than Polonius in that tragical-comical-historical-pastoral passage in which Shakespeare seems, even in those artless times, to find a theme for mirth in the nicety of classifiers. At a moment when he was himself wildly capering in the gloomiest of tragedies, he felt the value of defensive satire.

It is natural that the one-act play should be marked by diversity of kinds. If one collected into two groups the people with whom one could comfortably spend a half hour and those one could put up with for two hours and a half, it is clear that the first assembly would be not only larger but more diversified than the second. Miss Mayorga classifies, not by dividing the whole like a logician, but by adding the particulars like a collector. But there is no good method of sorting dramas; logic is irrelevant and collectorship is lax. Even with eleven heads it is hard to give each play its proper billet. "Suppressed Desires" may be satire, as the editor thinks, but surely it is also farce; and a "Good Woman" is no more a "play of ideas" than a "Question of Morality," which is debited to "comedy." For myself I have no affection for classifications of dramas; they were too dear to Polonius.

Miss Mayorga has chosen well. She tells us in her preface that she has sometimes preferred the representative to the excellent—a preference to which, after a moment's hesitation, one assents. The average merit, however, is considerable. There is no ground as yet for national exultation, but Americans may well be soberly and humbly glad in the showing made by their compatriots in this volume. On the whole, the pattern is much better than the goods. The ideas, the motives, are strong. But the execution wants steadiness. The hand shakes a little; there is no assurance in the stroke. Even this defect is hardly marked enough to be felt in the theatre, and one is glad that form rather than matter should be the seat of the defect. It is easier for substance to annex style than for style to annex substance; neither annexation is child's play.

Envy is sometimes a good touchstone, and I am moved to confess that I should like to have written Miss Esther Galbraith's "Brink of Silence," Mr. Oscar M. Wolff's "Where But in America," and, but for its slanting or sloping morals, Mr. George Middleton's "Good Woman." I should like to have been bright enough to think out the motive of Mr. Percival Wilde's "Question of Morality," though I do not warm to the gelid subtlety of the result. The volume should serve the one-act play as furtherance and as incentive.

In Mr. Eliot's "Little Theater Classics," "Little" and "Classics" should be strongly underscored. The book adapts standard plays of other centuries to intimate, artistic, solicitous presentation. There are some intrepidities in Mr. Eliot which rather stagger me, though whether the protest comes from real disapprobation or simply from that unusedness which whimpers at the approach of novelty it is hard for me to say. For instance, I stand agape, if not aghast, at Mr. Eliot's consolidation of the Chester play and the Brome play on Abraham and Isaac into one drama. Surely the divinely pathetic Townley version of this still enjoyable theme might have served his purpose better than this adulterous conjunction.

The "Loathed Lover," the third play, is a greatly shortened and somewhat softened adaptation of Thomas Middleton's powerful and formidable "Changeling." I doubt if an expurgation so cautious as Mr. Eliot's has really improved the decorum of the play. Middleton's "Changeling" is, in agreement with its name, an unwashed and unkempt brat, and I think its hairiness and blotchiness become more rather than less conspicuous after it has been washed, combed, and wrapped in comely linen. I rather wonder that Mr. Eliot, whose restorative hand is omnipresent, has not troubled himself to iron out the creases in Middleton's (or Rowley's) insupportable blank verse.

Mr. Eliot is quite justified in including in his book the excellent old farce of "Pathelin." He has to travel far back in time to reach it, but "Pathelin" is worth a journey. I do not quite see, however, why he should stop on the return trip to pick up Molière's "Sganarelle," a smart, saucy, bustling one-act play, whose deserts, I should suppose, had been paid in full by the merriment of its contemporaries. The present text, which is Mr. Eliot's revision of the rhymed version prepared by Mr. Philip Moeller for the Washington Square players, is of an admirable pithiness, zest, and elasticity. Of Mr. Eliot's four curiously different plays, one approves "Pathelin," and "Abraham and Isaac," at least in the ground work, tolerates "Sganarelle," and looks askance at the "Loathed Lover." But of their fitness to their audience it is hard to judge. Mr. Eliot expressly dedicates "Sganarelle" to "lovers of the new, the whimsical, the picturesque and style-struck." He would be a bold critic who would undertake to say what would not please lovers of the new, the whimsical, the picturesque, and the style-struck in the modern theatre.

In the "Soothsayer" and the "Birth of

Sterling and French Franc Travelers Cheques

All travelers to Europe this summer should carry our new form of Travelers Cheques, issued in Pounds Sterling or French Francs.

These Cheques will be good for the amount of pounds or francs printed on their face, less the usual stamp tax, thus protecting the carrier from receiving an unfair exchange rate when cashing them.

They can be bought in this country at prices in dollars based on the exchange rate of the day, so that travelers providing themselves with these cheques will thereafter have no occasion to worry about exchange rates.

Sterling and franc cheques can be cashed anywhere, and if lost or stolen can be replaced on signing certain protective agreements. They enjoy all the currency protection, and convenience of our familiar dollar cheques and at the same time protect the holder against exchange losses.

Procurable at banks and express offices.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY

God," short plays by Verner von Heidenstam, I find a dramatic void. Their merits consist in serious purpose, powerful settings, and a diction—happily reproduced in Miss Knudsen's picturesque and gliding English—which has both shape and color, both complexion and profile. In the "Soothsayer" a man flees from hearth to temple and from temple to hearth in alternate faithlessness to each. The play, on its tiny scale, is like "Peer Gynt" in its detestation of the uncommitted or half-committed man, and it is like "Brand" in its presentation of the conflict between religion and domesticity for the mastery of a struggling soul. Unfortunately it adduces no reason for its dictum that love and priesthood are incompatible, and its mere word, in the absence of a reason, will not greatly impress a world in which Socrates, St. Peter, St. Louis, and Ralph Waldo Emerson were husbands.

The "Birth of God" is less prettily wrought, but is somewhat richer in substance. Two strangers, meeting at night in our own time in Karnak, hold a solemn dialogue to which the images of forsaken gods serve as framework and in which from time to time the lamentations of these gods augustly mingle. God is dead; God is unborn. His birth is foreseen, and the foresight of his birth is already the beginning of his presence. All this is dimly cheerful; it loses its cheer and it does not acquire clearness when one of the strangers actually obtains his God by a voluntary leap into sacrificial flames.

Mr. Porter's preface to the "Seven Who Slept" is a defense of illusion. It is a dashing, sprightly, condescending preface, and much of what it says is incontestable. At times, however, its points, like crossing sword-blades, blunt each other. We are told at the outset that "the only power which can—or at least commonly does—dispel an illusion is another illusion." We are told at the end that "the modern age has been misguided in its exclusive search after truth." How can illusion be impaired or impeded by our search for truth, when, in the search for truth, we get illusion?

The legendary play, in four brief episodes, presents illusion as an encouragement to virtue in a pointed and clean-cut anecdote of the transitory revival of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus. With his lesson Mr. Porter has hardly succeeded; the moral is at once importunate and elusive; the reader can not get hold of it nor get free of it. But the play, in its informal fashion, shows a measure of dramatic faculty. Mr. Porter manages his surprise cunningly, and he has a good dialogue of the plain, crisp sort in which all the speeches are erect and solitary, as insulated in their proximity as the dwellers in New York apartment houses.

O. W. FIRKINS

THE HUDSON COAL CO.

CELEBRATED
LACKAWANNA
THE ARISTOCRAT OF ANTHRACITE

1823

1920

HAS NATURAL QUALITIES AND MAN-MADE REFINEMENT

D. F. WILLIAMS
Vice-President and General Sales Agent

W. F. SHURTLEFF
Assistant General Sales Agent

SCRANTON, PA.

Problems of Labor and Capital

IV. Chartering vs. Incorporating Employers' Associations and Trade Unions

THE usual excuse put forth by employers who refuse to enter into collective bargaining agreements with labor unions is the alleged irresponsibility of the unions. Employers, that is, very seldom succeed in recovering pecuniary damages from unions for breach of contract. In the belief that compulsory incorporation of unions would make it a simple matter for an employer successfully to sue for damages arising out of a breach of contract, employers throughout the country are in favor of compulsory incorporation. This movement is, of course, bitterly opposed by organized labor. The reason for this opposition usually alleged by organized labor is unwillingness to submit to any public control. There is no valid reason to suppose that the opposition arises from a belief that through incorporation the treasuries of the unions would be more subject to attack. An ingrained desire to be free from public scrutiny and inspection explains itself in the light of the fact that the trade union movement was an outgrowth of secret societies, somewhat resembling the Masonic orders.

But in all the discussions it has been but seldom suggested that it would be equally wise and fair to compel the incorporation of employers' associations. For many years employers' associations dealing with labor were incorporated under State laws. In this they followed the practices of employers' associations organized for purposes other than dealing with labor. Within the last decade, however, there has been a marked tendency among lawyers to advise employers' associations to remain unincorporated. The reason for this advice is obvious. Under the laws of many States, such as New York, the statutes covering membership corporations vest in the courts a so-called power of visitation, in effect a power of inspection. To prevent the possibility of any inspection whatsoever, employers' associations generally remain unincorporated, the members being held together merely by formal or informal by-laws and constitutions.

Though both labor and capital are fearful of public supervision, the unions, as a rule, print in their bulletins, which are distributed to their members and to the public, audited monthly statements of their financial condition. Knowledge of this fact comes as a great surprise to most employers. Hardly a single case can be mentioned where an employers' association, organized solely to deal with labor, has ventured to publish an income and disbursement statement, though they willingly make public their records of votes on important matters, and distribute such information not only to their members, but to their particular trade through their trade press, matters which the unions jealously keep secret.

Lack of general publicity on both sides is the basis for much of the lack of confidence existing between employers and organized labor. The unions, with considerable justice, allege the existence of large "strike funds" to crush labor organizations. That high-priced detectives are engaged to act as spies at union meetings is so commonly assumed that at many union meetings special remarks are made for the benefit of such spies. Where such sums exist they are in part called forth by the failure of the courts to give such protection to the employers as they think they are entitled to.

When employers argue that the incorporation of the unions would result in responsibility, they argue from a false premise and without knowledge of the facts. It can not be denied that in business dealings generally credit is established on statements showing assets subject to attack in the event that the credit is abused. However, it is most improbable that employers would ever be able to reach the funds of the unions, even if such funds were subject to legal attack. In the first place, if mandatory incorporation were to be adopted, the attorneys for the trade unions would speedily pursue the methods of corporate financing, which have been so successfully carried on by capital during the past decades. Subsidiary corporations would be organized to which would be transferred the larger part of the union funds. A local union in the City of New York decided some years ago to go into business on its own account; it bought a plant worth several thousand dollars and actually engaged in the line of business in which its members were qualified. In order to safeguard the funds so invested, a separate corporation was organized, each member of the union holding a share of the stock. It is plain that the legal difficulties involved in following the union's funds would prove so expensive and difficult as to make the relief impracticable. Assuming, however, that upon a breach of contract funds of the union could be easily levied upon, it must nevertheless be apparent to anyone familiar with the temper of the labor movement in this country that the mere risk arising to the funds in the treasury would not deter the average has earned for itself a permanent place in the universal language of trade marks. Wherever it is seen, at home or in the remote corners of the world, it stands for sound banking principles and the accumulated experience gained in serving more than three generations of merchants and manufacturers.

The Shawmut Indian Head

THE NATIONAL SHAWMUT BANK OF BOSTON

40 Water Street Boston — Established 1837

Resources over $250,000,000

labor union from any course previously determined upon. Probably every day in the year some labor union without funds receives assistance from other unions in the same or other trades in other parts of the country. The seizure of the union's treasury would only further embitter the workers and prolong the strike. Is it not also true that most strikes would come to an end long before a decision could be reached in our courts on an action for damages?

What the employers and the workers really need is not the subjecting of funds to attack. All that is hoped for from mandatory incorporation could be accomplished through compulsory licensing or chartering. Legislation should be enacted to make mandatory the governmental chartering of trade unions and employers' associations. Such legislation should expressly provide that the financial responsibility of the parties is unaffected thereby. With this sound and fair provision, and with a further declaration of the benefits to trade unions of the compulsory chartering of employers' associations, it may be that the present opposition of organized labor to any form of public interference might be overcome.

Such chartering of the parties to the present industrial warfare would mean little more than the public filing of the constitution, and by-laws and amendments thereto, the periodic filing of detailed financial statements showing not only assets and liabilities, but income and disbursements, and the recording of the names and addresses of all members and officers of the respective chartered associations. A further requirement of some value would be the compulsory filing of certificates setting forth the result of all votes on election of officers or committees and proposed demands or strikes on the part of the workers, or lockouts on the part of the employers. Through the medium of chartering, the Government could obtain power of regulation over the manner of taking and counting of votes. The common cry of employers that they would be willing to deal with organized labor if the leadership were the leadership actually desired by the workers would in part be answered, if, in addition to the public filing of the result of the votes taken in such matters, the Government would also have power to surround these industrial ballots with safeguards similar to those now protecting the political ballot. Publicity of somewhat this sort has been successfully tried in isolated cases by the more progressive employers and unions. Neither side would revert to the former "star chamber" proceedings. Unfortunately, the introduction of similar practices in all labor unions and employers' associations will take decades of education in the absence of mandatory legislation.

MORRIS L. ERNST

The Whitley System in the British Civil Service

IN March, 1917, was issued the Whitley Report, so called from the name of the Chairman of a committee appointed by the Ministry of Labor. It has introduced into the industrial life of England a remarkable change. This committee recommended that employers and employed, in each trade, should form a Joint Standing Industrial Council and select representatives for the purpose of consultation and advice on subjects connected with the interests of the two parties. Employees thus secured a voice in the regulation of the labor engaged. This principle has now been applied to the Civil Service of the Crown.

Constitutional changes in England have for centuries occurred with so little friction and in so quiet a way that their importance is often unappreciated. It will be seen, when described, how large is the change effected by this application of the Whitley Report, which primarily was intended to affect only "the main industries of the country." It came about in this way. On March 7, 1919, there was issued a report of a sub-committee of an inter-departmental committee on the application of the Whitley Report to Government establishments. This was followed in April by a conference at which it was resolved that a National Joint Committee should be appointed to consider a Whitley scheme and make a report on the same. Accordingly a Provisional National Joint Committee was formed, consisting of fifteen official representatives and fifteen representatives of the employees in the English Civil Service. The report of this body, issued on May 28, 1919, formulated a scheme which was approved by the Cabinet in June, 1919, and subsequently accepted by a Joint Official and Staff Conference presided over by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It will be seen by reference to some of the more important details how vitally it changes the position of the English Civil Servants of the Crown. The new principle, that the employees are entitled to a voice in the organization of the service, is distinctly formulated:

> The main objects of establishing a system of joint Whitley bodies for the administrative Departments are to secure a greater measure of coöperation between the State, in its capacity of employer, and the general body of Civil Servants, in matters affecting the Civil Service, with a view to increase efficiency in the public service combined with the well-being of those employed; to provide machinery for dealing with grievances, and generally to bring together experience and different points of view of representatives of the administrative, clerical and manipulative Civil Service.

Complete Banking Service in Convenient Localities

55 Cedar Street
Broadway at 73rd St.
Madison Av. at 75th St.
125th St. at Eighth Av.

Customers of one office have at their disposal the facilities of all offices.

DEPARTMENTS

BANKING — TRUST
MORTGAGE — COUPON
CREDIT — TRANSFER & REGISTRAR
FOREIGN — MUNICIPAL BOND
REORGANIZATION — SAFE DEPOSIT
SAFEKEEPING OF SECURITIES

UNITED STATES MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY

Capital and Surplus, $6,000,000
NEW YORK

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street — Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y

H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
CHARLES E. HAYDOCK, Vice-President and Manager
MAS. KEY CAMMACK..........Assistant Secretary
RUSSELL V. WORSTELL.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES

Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Frederic B. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

Therefore we find a representative body of employers and employed, for the heads of departments may be regarded as employers, set up to regulate the Civil Service system. Accordingly three sets of bodies are established—a National Council, Departmental Committees, and District and Office (or Works) Committees, the first named body consisting of fifty-four members, half to be appointed by the Government and the other half by groups of Staff Associations.

The object of the Council is to carry out the principles already described. The most startling point, and one which in any country in Europe would be regarded as subversive of existing institutions, is that "the decisions of the Council shall be arrived at by agreement between the two sides," and then "they shall be reported to the Cabinet and thereupon shall become operative." Startling does not seem too strong an adjective to use in reference to this recommendation, because it appears to take away Cabinet responsibility, and the National Joint Council becomes the real governing body in regard to the organization of the Civil Service.

The Departmental Committees will, however, probably be of greater practical utility than the National Council, because they will deal with the affairs of each department. The dividing line between the jurisdiction of the National Council and of the Departmental Committees is very vague, for "the precise line of demarcation between the scope of the National Council and Departmental Committees must be left largely to the test of experience." District Joint Committees and Sectional Committees are simply special committees necessitated by the existence of special sections or grades in some departments, and do no more than carry the system of Departmental Committees into greater detail. The main interest of the new system is not in the details, but in the adoption of the principle of staff intervention in the organization of the Civil Service.

It is clearly an extraordinary change, for if there has been one branch of civil employment in which the employed has been entirely subordinate to the employer, it is the Civil Service. The employee has entered it knowing its terms, its restrictions, its pay, and its duration of employment. He made up his mind from the moment of entrance that he was a mere unit in a huge Governmental machine. Now things are changed—how changed it will be for the immediate future to show. One may hope that the status and work of the English Civil Service have been such that extreme changes will not be required. But the application of the Whitley system to the British Civil Service makes one consider when and to what extent the same principle will be applied in other countries. So far as Great Britain is concerned, the extension is of quite extraordinary interest because nothing is clearer than that the original Whitley Report contemplated only war conditions and the problems which were likely to arise immediately after the war in relation to industrial undertakings. Its application to the Civil Service shows that its principles will be permanently applied, sooner or later, in every kind of employment. For if it is applicable to the Civil Service of the Crown, it is applicable universally.

E. S. Roscoe

London, May 10

RADICAL propagandists in the present period of world changes are striking at the very foundation of American institutions.

The most enterprising of these are the intellectual radical journals. They are making dangerous headway, even among loyal Americans.

THE REVIEW was founded to dispute the teachings of such journals and is making real progress in its work of keeping alive the principles of American liberty.

$5 A Year

140 Nassau St.
New York

Books Received

DRAMA AND MUSIC

Gorki, Maxim. A Night's Lodging. Four Seas Co.

Heidenstam, Verner von. The Birth of God. Four Seas Co. $1.25 net.

Leslie, Noel. Three Plays. Four Seas. $1.50 net.

Steiner, Rudolph. Four Mystery Plays. 2 volumes. Putnam.

Three Plays of the Argentine. Edited with Introduction by Edward H. Bierstadt. Duffield. $1.75 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

The Letters of Henry James. Selected and Edited by Percy Lubbock. 2 volumes. Scribner.

Hobson, J. A. Taxation in the New State. Harcourt, Brace and Howe.

Jastrow, Morris, Jr. The Eastern Question and Its Solution. Lippincott.

Kimball, Everett. The National Government of the United States. Ginn.

Lyman, George H. Story of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety. Mass. Committee on Public Safety.

MacMurchy, Dr. Helen. The Almosts: A Study of the Feeble-Minded. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50.

Morrison, A. J. East by West. Four Seas.

Ogilvie, Paul M. International Waterways. Macmillian

Pollock, Sir Frederick. League of Nations. Macmillan. $4.

JUVENILE

Skinner, Ada and Eleanor. The Garnet Story Book.

LITERATURE

Amos, Flora R. Early Theories of Translation. Columbia University Press. $2 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Kleiser, Grenville. Pocket Guides to Public Speaking. Ten volumes. Funk & Wagnalls.

POETRY

Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1919. Edited by William S. Braithwaite. Small, Maynard. $2.25 net.

Barney, Danford. Chords from Albireo. Lane. $1.50 net.

Barrett, Wilton A. Songs from the Journey. Doran.

Crowell, Joshua F. Outdoors and In. Four Seas Co. $1.50 net.

Georgian Poetry. 1918-19. Putnam.

Poems of John R. Thompson. Scribner. $2.

Sarett, Lew. Many, Many Moons. Holt. $1.50 net.

Still, John. Poems in Captivity. Lane.

Walsh, Thomas. Don Folquet and Other Poems. Lane. $1.50 net.

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 57 | New York, Wednesday, June 16, 1920 | FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 613

Editorial Articles:
- The Voice of America 616
- Federal Prohibition a Fact 616
- The Law or the Cadi? 617
- A Rock-Bottom Prophet 619

Worries of the Young Nations. By Thomas H. Dickinson 620

A "Gold Brick" from North Dakota. By Eye-Witness 621

Poetry:
- Stormbound. By William N. Bates 623

Iris in Kansas City. By Maytime 624

"Batter Up!" 624

Correspondence 625

Book Reviews:
- The War—The Last Phase 627
- Achievement and Hope 628
- Conrad the Great 629
- Winwood Reade 629
- From Couperin to Debussy 630

The Run of the Shelves 631

Drama:
- Barrie, Galsworthy, and Others. By William Archer 633

Educational Section 634

The Reconstruction of France through Agriculture. By André Rostand 637

LEADERLESS—that is the one adjective which, by unanimous consent, was assigned to the Republican Convention as it assembled at Chicago. To take hold of the amorphous mass there gathered together and produce something like genuine crystallization—that was the problem with which the wise heads in and around the Coliseum had to grapple. By the time this paper reaches the majority of our readers, the final outcome of their efforts will in all probability be known. But, whatever the decision, either as to platform or as to candidates, the one thing certain is that the coming campaign will be one of the most important in the history of the country. Issues have been more sharply defined at other critical junctures in our country's history; but not more than once or twice—in 1860 and possibly in 1896—has the actual result of the election had a more crucial bearing on the country's future than that of this forthcoming election is likely to have. And the less distinctly the issues are defined, the more essential will it be to keep in view the momentous character of the consequences which our choice will almost certainly carry with it. Never was there a time when it was more necessary to keep our heads level.

WHEN an immovable object—an irreconcilable—is met by a political convention, which is the first to budge? Hiram W. Johnson's final position will soon be known; but even now it is evident that here is no question of firm convictions which a chance to be President can not modify. Old Dr. Johnson in a pinch clearly believes in calling in others for consultation—which is about the only comfort one could derive from the thought of him in the White House.

IN Utopia there is no place for such a spectacle as that presented by the Chicago Convention, for Utopia is ruled solely by reason, and the sprawling democracies of this world by—conventions. The American people are not at the moment choosing a President, they are choosing a champion who shall engage in a trial by combat with another champion similarly chosen. As a method of accomplishing this result scrutiny of the omens or the tight-rope tests of Lilliput might be expected to work as well as our way of putting a thousand citizens into a big auditorium and under the chemistry of oratory, cheers, bands, buttons, whispers, waggings of the head, four per cent. beer, and whatever else may have escaped the revived vigilance of the authorities, expecting them perfectly to interpret the people's will. It is highly ridiculous, of course—part circus and part race meet—but, and also because, it is deeply human. Those who refuse to be interested in such a spectacle because it does not nicely conform to every postulate of reason are themselves the slaves of fundamental unreason. Bossed or unbossed, pledged or unpledged, stampeded or traded, the delegates to the Conventions do succeed in hitting upon men who prove capable of discharging the duties laid upon them.

THAT the betting odds against the unfavored candidate in an election are habitually less than the actual indications warrant is a familiar fact. When, for example, in a Presidential campaign in which there are practically only two candidates the odds against one of them are steadily as bad as 3 to 1, the actual feeling among judicial observers is that his defeat is almost certain. Whatever the explanation of this phenomenon —and there is more than one reason that tends to account for it—the fact itself will hardly be disputed. An interesting confirmation of it, however, is furnished by the odds on the Republican aspirants for the Republican nomination as posted by the firm handling most of the bets in Wall Street on Saturday, June 5, just before the gathering of the hosts at Chicago. The odds against the candidates named were as follows:

Johnson	1 to 1	Allen	6 to 1
Wood	7 to 5	Coolidge	8 to 1
Lowden	8 to 5	Harding	8 to 1
Hoover	4 to 1	Butler	10 to 1
Hughes	5 to 1	Knox	10 to 1

Now if we add up the fractions which represent the probabilities thus assigned to the several candidates—½ to Johnson, 5/12 to Wood, etc.—the total is nearly 2¼, instead of 1; and this allows nothing for the whole brood of dark horses! Thus it is safe to say that, on an average, the chance assigned to these several candidates is three times as great as a cold calculation would make it—which is quite in keeping with the experience above referred to, in election-betting odds.

SIXTY-SIX members of the Yale Faculty have signed the following protest to the Senate and House of Representatives:

> We, the undersigned, members of the Faculty of Yale University, are unalterably opposed to any interference by an outside nation with our domestic affairs, and we are equally opposed to any attempt on the part of our own government to interfere with the domestic affairs of any other nation. We protest, in particular, against any Congressional resolutions, or items in political platforms, touching upon the relations of Great Britain and Ireland. We ourselves deeply resented proposals of foreign interference in our domestic affairs during the Civil War from 1861 to 1865, and we should not fail to act in the present instance with the propriety that we then required of other nations.

It is a shocking absurdity that such protests should be necessary, but they are necessary, and it is the clear duty of thinking men and women everywhere to do what they can to make it plain to our representatives at Washington that the country is heartily sick of their cheap and dangerous political tricks. "If I were a citizen of the United States," says Mr. Philip Gibbs, the war correspondent, in Harper's Magazine, "I should be afraid—afraid lest my country should by passion, or by ignorance, or by sheer carelessness take the wrong way." Greater than all these is the danger arising from the behavior of politicians scavenging for votes.

GENERALITIES often sound so well as almost to conceal the fact that they do nothing else than sound. Mr. Gompers, for example, harking back to his Carnegie Hall debate with Governor Allen, asserts with great emphasis that "the public has no rights which are superior to the toiler's right to live, and his right to defend himself against oppression." As these words roll forth, one might imagine, for a moment, that the opposition had been knocked over the ropes never to recover. A moment's genuine thought reveals the fact that there really is no opposition. Nobody has questioned the toiler's right to live, or to defend himself against oppression. The resounding thump administered by Mr. Gompers was only against a man of straw of his own construction. Meanwhile, the right of the public to insist that the toiler shall defend his rights by legal and orderly methods remains unscathed.

THE wording of that passage in the Papal Encyclical on Christian Peace and Reconciliation which proclaims His Holiness to be "not averse to mitigating to some degree the rigor of those conditions which, after the overthrow of the civil principality of the Holy See, were justly established by our predecessors to prevent the coming of Catholic Princes to Rome in their official character," makes it absolutely clear that this decision does not embody a new principle, but constitutes merely a measure of expediency. "The dangerous turn of events," and no turn in the attitude of the Vatican, is given as a reason for the lifting of the ban on visits to Rome of Catholic Princes and heads of States and this "remission, counselled, or rather wished for, by the gravity of the times, must by no means be interpreted as a tacit renunciation of our sacrosanct rights." In other words, the Sovereign Pontiff does not renounce his claim to the temporal power withheld from him by the King of Italy; he only waives a particular form of protest against the latter's encroachment on his rights, without ceasing to protest against it.

THE returns of the elections for the German Reichstag are the reflection of a centrifugal force at work among the electorate. The left wing of Social-Democracy, the so-called Independents, and the German People's party, the stronghold of the capitalistic interests, have scored the chief victories at the polls. The former especially have cause for satisfaction. They have verified Dr. Rohrbach's forecast by robbing the Majority Socialists of their title to that name. The latter party's responsibility for the Government under conditions unprecedented in German history has proved fatal to their popularity with the masses. The formation of a new Government on the basis of this new party alignment will be fraught with difficulties. A combination of Independents, Majority Socialists, and Communists would find a strong block of all the other parties in opposition to it. A Government of the right is out of the question, as the People's party and the Nationalists together do not constitute a majority over the united Socialist groups. A continuance of the present coalition of Majority Socialists, Democrats, and the Centre is very unlikely, since the Socialist leaders have paid for their compromise with the bourgeoisie by a heavy loss in adherents. If the Centre leaders, in spite of their strong labor following, could be persuaded to join a coalition of the right, a Government thus constituted would have to face opposition from closed ranks of the working classes, Catholic labor included.

EXPLOITATION of the American Indian is no longer an easy game. The vigilance of the Indian Rights Association has recently scored another triumph in a long series by compelling the suspension of a contract seriously inimical to the rights and financial interests of the Pima Indians, on the Gila River Reservation. The terms of this contract are analyzed in a pamphlet published by the Association (No. 119, Second Series), and it is made very clear that its execution would have been a gross injustice. It involved 50,000 acres of excellent cotton-growing soil, all capable of irrigation, which would have gone into private hands for ten years, with possibility of renewal, and with no real approach to a fair compensation. The Association reports that one Pima Indian, having access to waste water from a canal, last year broke twelve acres of land in this same district and made a profit of $6,000 on his first crop. There are funds now available for a diversion dam across the Gila River, a few miles above the Pima Agency. Under the circumstances, the humane and sensible policy of the Government would be to complete this dam with all possible speed, and then, through the Department of Agriculture, to provide the Pimas with the expert advice which would enable them to develop their own lands.

SO the gentle, merciful, and loving Bolsheviki finally killed Madame Ponafidine, after killing all the rest of the family they could lay hands on. Only one son survives, and at last accounts he was with the volunteer army. Readers of Madame Ponafidine's letters in the Atlantic a year or so ago will recall the vivid picture of a family who, hemmed in from all channels of escape, and gradually deprived of everything which made life possible, saw day by day the closer approach of the final tragedy. A friend tells the rest of the tale. The Bolsheviki returned and killed two of the sons. They came back again and removed Mr. and Mrs. Ponafidine to a little plot of ground. The husband and father being too old and helpless to perform physical labor, they compelled the wife and mother to "work the ground for a living." Very likely no living could be wrested from the ground. So again they came back and simplified the problem by killing the useless old man. But the problem was still unsolved, and therefore they came back for a final visit and slew Mrs. Ponafidine. Were the Ponafidines inoffensive folk, who asked only to be left alone? Ah, yes, no doubt; but "you can't wage a revolution with rosewater." These little sacrifices of the individual life are necessary oblations on the altar of the holy cause of Fraternity. None but reactionaries will protest against them.

SOMEWHAT "bluggy" is the social outlook in America, unless we have a care; and we are unlikely to exercise the proper care unless we maintain the right temper. So we learn from a sort of valedictory address given in Boston by Professor Harold J. Laski, late of Harvard University, but now returning to London for a post in the School of Economics. Industrial democracy, otherwise self-government in industry, he says, "may be slow in coming, but it is inevitable, and it is the business of those who think for the welfare of the United States to remember that it will come, if necessary, with blood, but can be secured without blood, and can only be secured without it according to the temper which you maintain." The warning sounds portentous, but its sophomoric quality quickly reveals itself and allays fear. Assuredly if we (meaning everybody) cultivate a temper that inevitably makes for bloodshed, why then inevitably we shall get what our temper calls for. Contrariwise, if we don't, we shan't, and there's an end on't. Speaking strictly for ourselves, we affirm our preference for forecasts expressed in more positive terms. We resent the attempt to harrow up our feelings by forebodings which do not forebode. A prediction bounded by "unless" on one side and by "if" on the other, even though it carry the suggestibility of the most dire and catastrophic events, is no prediction at all. It is too Laskian, so to speak, for a world of stern realities. It is a Brummagem substitute for the real thing.

NO exercise, we are fain to believe, is so easy as that of clapperclaw. The increasing amount of it is surely proof of the readiness with which the trick is learned. Given the mood, nothing seems necessary but a vocabulary—and even a little of that will go a long way, for of course one can always repeat. No information is necessary—indeed, sound information would, as a rule, only obstruct the railing impulse. No particular social theory is required; the Anarchist who wants no government, the bureaucratic Socialist who wants much government, and the Pluralist who wants a multitude of fractional governments, all join voices in railing at exactly the same things. There is but one rule—to rail and to keep on railing until exhausted, and then to take a fresh breath and start all over again. Of course, a basic assumption or two will help. One may assume that 90 per cent. of everything in the world (outside of Soviet Russia) is wrong, or that everyone anywhere intrusted with political power (Soviet Russia of course excepted) is a charlatan chiefly concerned with his own interests. Either or both of these assumptions serves to concentrate one's railing towards more or less definite objectives. Still, one can be economical and get along without either. There is such a thing as railing on "general principles," and a survey of the field will incline the observer to the belief that a considerable part of the output comes under this category. Perhaps it is idle to call attention to the problem unless one can suggest a remedy. But no remedy, except Time, occurs to us. Our stout ancestors, on much slenderer provocation, tried various drastic remedies, including the ducking-stool; but there is grave doubt as to the resultant benefits. For ourselves, we can counsel only a stoical patience to endure the terrific din while it lasts, confident that some day it will wear itself down to a more tolerable murmur.

LINCOLN'S saying that you can fool some of the people all of the time applies with particular force to the radical press and its avid following. This following, taken by and large, has a love of bamboozlement which is intensive, continuous, and cumulative. The victim always comes up hungry for more; and the supply of what he is looking for, great as it may be, is ever less than the demand. The radical paper with the largest circulation in the United States has one simple rule: to keep its following in the tensest possible state of excitement and apprehension. With mankind as a whole it may be said that the bamboozler plays a futile sort of game. But this does not apply to the gudgeons of revolutionism. Each fresh bamboozlement is but a whet to the appetite, which grows by what it feeds on. Maybe Lincoln, with his keen prophetic vision, had this element in mind.

The Voice of America

ENGLAND has had the habit—she freely admits it—of muddling through her crises. But English muddling has never amounted to huggermugger. Englishmen have had, and still have, a solid common sense to keep them within bounds. The confusion of American thought and feeling to-day is something so different that we can get little comfort from England's past examples. We are approaching the Presidential campaign at a time when the wishes and best instincts of the country are still inarticulate. It is not merely our foreign policy which is undetermined. The elements of our domestic life are warring among themselves, and the stream of traditional feelings and convictions upon which England in a pinch has been able to rely to carry her along is, in our case, badly clogged. Will it, in the next few months, make itself strongly felt?

Ours is the difficulty which European statesmen long ago foresaw for a young powerful democracy. "A democracy," said Metternich, "is a perpetual tour de force." We are now undergoing the extremely awkward experience of turning from a nation of doers to a nation of thinkers. Business can not resume its normal activity until many questions precipitated by the war, and more especially by our facile agitators, are settled; and business men are of a sudden asked to be metaphysicians. Problems of abstract justice are up for decision. Is the right to strike inalienable? Should work by hand be better paid than brain work? What can be said for interest on capital? In the present state of agitation what institution of the country is sacred to the popular mind? Exploring the first principles of justice is a dangerous experiment for a nation unless common sense also is used as a guide.

And common sense should tell us that, whatever the evils of our present system, American civilization is something altogether too precious to revolutionize. This year we celebrate the three-hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. One might think by the talk of the feverish radicals who are working for change, change, and more change that the life which has sprung up from that momentous event contained no health and no wisdom; that the freedom bred into our bones had entirely dried up; that this country had not been, and was not still capable of being, a land of marvellous opportunity for persons with pluck and ambition. At a time like this it is well to recall that the American who did most during the war to keep Europe from starving, started life as a poor boy, and that not only has he achieved great material success, but his name is signally honored the world over.

It may well be that our best way to get on as a nation, now that we have dipped copiously into the abstractions of panaceas, is to draw inspiration from the practical success of our history of three hundred years. For it is inspiring for one with any memory to call up the cases upon cases of persons who began humbly, and who by thrift and hard work and the ambition to provide for their children opportunities such as they never had, gradually made for themselves positions of security and genuine respect in their various communities. Are these opportunities so few to-day that we must think of making the life of this nation entirely over? Labor is in great demand, wages are high, and though costs of living are dear, they require a degree of saving far less than that practiced by many who achieved success in the not distant past.

There is such a thing as being reactionary, the turning of deaf ears to the call of the present and the future; and there is such a thing as being so progressive as to foster discontent leading to chaos. We need not be ashamed at this moment to hearken to the voice of America calling down the ages. The new machines of industry, the overturn of Governments, the searchings of heart and mind can not, unless we will it so, blur that American message; for it issued from truth and magnanimity and is just as urgent for us to-day as when it first came into being. What is it? Our ancestors understood it as freedom, and if such freedom as they meant has left this land, we may join hands with radicals and ask for a new deal. Have we yet made of the humblest workman a slave? If he is dissatisfied with his job, can he not still snap his fingers in the face of his boss and look for other work? Is his suffrage of less value than a millionaire's? Has he less rights in the courts? Have there been no cases of workingmen becoming wealthy in the past ten years? Twenty-five years ago Americans boasted of their country; in the present state of confusion they have grown over-apologetic. They can best serve by vividly remembering America's solid achievements as they approach the many problems that confront them now. For attachment to the past is like loyalty among old friends; it furnishes an excellent touchstone in the forming of new allegiances.

Federal Prohibition a Fact

THE Supreme Court of the United States, without a dissenting voice, has established the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment, and has also affirmed the power of Congress effectively to enforce it. Nor does there seem to us to be any sound reason of large principle why this result should ever have been in serious doubt. On questions of procedure—like that relating to the restriction of a Legislature's power by referendum requirements in a State Constitution, or like that relating to what constitutes "two-thirds of both houses" of Congress—there was room for theoretical doubt; but as to the large principles, it has never seemed to us that there was.

The large principles which we have in mind are two. First, that relating to the contention that the Eighteenth Amendment was beyond the scope of the amending power defined by Article V of the Constitution; a contention that has sometimes been buttressed by the provision in the Tenth Amendment (part of the "Bill of Rights") that the "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Concerning this whole contention, we said half a year ago in the Review:

It is safe to say that the amendment will not be pronounced invalid on the ground that it is in its nature beyond the scope of Article V of the Constitution. . . . If the Tenth Amendment had been designed to prevent any future delegation of power to the United States, it would have so declared in plain terms. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution" means powers not delegated by the Constitution, either as originally made or as subsequently amended; such a power was granted, for instance, in the Sixteenth Amendment, authorizing a Federal income tax. Nor is there any weight in arguments based on the general notion of a "republican form of government"; for a judicial body to declare the prohibition amendment void because it is destructive of a republican form of government would be an assumption of authority too fantastic to be seriously considered.

The second question of principle is that relating to the "concurrent power" of Congress and the several States to enforce the prohibition amendment. Whatever juristic or technical arguments may be brought up in criticism of this feature of the Eighteenth Amendment, the common-sense view of it seems to us to be perfectly simple, and to coincide with the view that is taken by the Supreme Court:

The power confided to Congress by that section, while not exclusive, is territorially coextensive with the prohibition of the first section, embraces manufacture and other intrastate transactions as well as importation, exportation and interstate traffic, and is in no wise dependent on or affected by action or inaction on the part of the several States or any of them.

In other words, any prohibition enforcement act passed by Congress must be obeyed; if a State passes a prohibition enforcement act, that, too, must be obeyed; and the consequence is that whichever of the two is most prohibitory is the effective one. This evidently involves no clash; it is simply that whatever is prohibited by either law is illegal. Complications may, of course, arise in the matter of the administration of two laws, where both cover the same subject-matter and apply to the same persons; but that is a problem ulterior to the question of the validity of the laws themselves. One practical consequence is that if some future Congress should pass a law making five per cent., or ten per cent., the permissible alcoholic content, then only those States would be "bone-dry" that wished; those that imposed no more severe prohibition than Congress did would be as "wet" as the legislation of Congress permitted them to be.

But it is one thing to say that the Eighteenth Amendment is a valid part of the Constitution, and quite another to say that it is a proper part of the Constitution. An Amendment of the Constitution may be valid, and yet be revolutionary; it may be valid, and yet be utterly out of place; it may be valid, and yet lower the whole standing of the great instrument of which it has become a part. All these things the Eighteenth Amendment is and does. Our protection against it should have been found in a prompt manifestation of the political virility of our people, instead of being left to the eleventh hour possibility of a rescuing decision by an overruling court.

It is not the violation of any merely juristic concept of "State rights" that makes the Eighteenth Amendment revolutionary; the blow it strikes goes to the very heart of the idea upon which our union of States rests, an idea embodied not in mere legal distinctions but in the intimate and habitual thoughts of the people. Any attack upon the individuality of the States, upon their right to manage their home affairs in their own way, which may be launched on a wave of popular sentiment will hereafter have plain sailing; the assertion that it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions will hereafter have but little force. And into the Constitution, which has hitherto embodied simply the framework of our Government and the guarantee of fundamental liberties and rights, there has now been imbedded a police regulation which belongs on a wholly different plane, and which will serve as a precedent for other like intrusions. The presence of this single one is enough distinctly to lower the place of the whole instrument in the people's mind; and surely it would not take many more to degrade it altogether from the place that it has proudly held during a hundred and thirty years of national achievement and national trial.

The Law or the Cadi?

ONE of the distinctive features of our system of government, as the Constitution of Massachusetts says, and as many other State constitutions provide, is that it is a government of laws and not of men. What this means is that our citizens are to be responsible to a standard of conduct and of duty fixed in definite form by law, and not to the mere caprice or judgment, good or bad, of any individual exercising the powers of the Oriental Cadi. In Oriental law, the Cadi is the centre of justice. He determines at one and the same time what the law is and whether it has been violated. If we were to have this system of law, we should need nothing in the way of statute, perhaps, beyond the Golden Rule.

The Federal Constitution in its Sixth Amendment provides that a person accused shall "be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation." Under a long series of cases, the rule had been established before the war that the citizen is entitled to be informed by the law, as well as by the complaint, what acts or conduct are prohibited and made punishable; in other words, to know in advance of any prosecution what the law requires him to do. The citizen must live up to the standard set by the law and not by the varying standards of public officials in the absence of law.

The Lever law, passed under war conditions, provides in paragraph four:

It is hereby made unlawful for any person . . . to make any unjust or unreasonable charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries.

The section also provides a penalty of $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both, for the violation of this section, adding immediately that the section does not apply to any farmer, dairyman, or other agriculturalist, with respect to produce or products raised or produced by him. But the Lever law does not set up any standard whatever by which any man can know in advance what rates or charges are deemed unjust or unreasonable. All over the country, Federal officials, acting under the Lever law, have been arresting citizens, berating them in the public press, and subjecting them to criminal prosecution, for alleged unjust or unreasonable charges in handling or dealing with necessaries. However irritated we may feel at excessive prices, as the expression of selfishness and rapacity, we have here the question of whether the method of prevention is not worse than the disease. We have to consider whether or not, by laws of which this Lever Act is a good example, the old rule under which a government of law has been here established, and under which our country has grown, is not being insidiously supplanted by an Oriental system, enforced by official Cadis, and subjecting citizens to a purely bureaucratic control hitherto unknown in this country. It is for our citizens to take thought whether they believe that such a transformation should be allowed to occur.

Let us consider briefly some of the cases in which the old principle requiring that the citizen should know in advance have been considered by the courts. Here, for example, is a decision on an ordinance in the District of Columbia which provides that every street railway company shall both supply and operate "a sufficient number of cars, clean and sanitary, in good repair, to all persons desirous of using said cars without crowding such cars." The railroad was charged with unlawful failure to operate such cars without crowding. The Court declared the law unconstitutional. It said, among other things:

> The Sixth Amendment provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation. In other words, when the accused is led to the bar of justice, the information or indictment must contain the elements of the offense with which he is charged with sufficient clearness to fully advise him of the exact crime which he is alleged to have committed. . . . What shall be the guide for the court or jury in ascertaining what constitutes a crowded car? What may be regarded as a crowded car by one jury may not be by another. What may constitute a sufficient number of cars in the opinion of one Judge may be considered insufficient by another. What may be regarded as grounds for acquittal by one court may be held sufficient to sustain the conviction by another. There is a total absence of any definition of what constitutes a crowded car. This important element cannot be left to conjecture to be supplied by either court or jury. It is of the very essence of the law itself and without it the statute is too indefinite and uncertain to support an information or indictment.

Here is another case in which a Federal Court passed upon the validity of an act providing that railroad companies shall not charge "unreasonable" or "unjust" rates of fare for the transportation of passengers. The act did not say what should be the rate, but simply that it should be just and reasonable. The Court held:

> There is no standard whatever fixed by the statute, or attempted to be fixed, by which the carrier may regulate its conduct, and it seems clearly to us to be utterly repugnant to our system of laws to punish a person for an act, the criminality of which depends not on any standard erected by the law, which may be known in advance, but one created by the jury. And especially so, as that standard must be so variable and uncertain as the views of different juries may suggest and as to which nothing can be known until after the commission of the crime.

As Judge Brewer says in another case, where a similar statute was involved:

> In order to constitute a crime, the act must be one of which the party is able to know in advance whether it is criminal or not. The criminality of an act cannot depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable. There must be some definiteness and certainty.

As the Supreme Court has held in a case arising long before these war laws were enacted: "Laws which create a crime ought to be so explicit that all men subject to their penalties may know what act it is their duty to avoid."

Time and again decisions of this sort have been made. We are dealing here, not with legal technicality, but with fundamental principle. We are considering whether or not the basis of bureaucracy shall be laid under war conditions and continued after the war is over. Old principles, fundamental in our law, are violated by the quoted section of the Lever law. No man can tell in advance what standard of prices is fixed, what rate of profit is allowed. Whether the storekeeper or purveyor of necessaries would be subject to criminal prosecution is left a matter of discretion to prosecuting officers and juries, and no standard in one case sets the rule or standard in another. From the standpoint of business, it is a wholly intolerable situation. Is it also an illegal encroachment upon the rights of citizens? Conflicting decisions have been rendered in the lower Federal Courts and the matter is now on its way to the Supreme Court for final determination.

While the ultimate outcome of this particular statute as to its constitutionality is of course a judicial question, it is not inappropriate at this time for the public to consider the perplexities which this law creates, to note the extent to which the shadow of criminal prosecution falls upon all merchants and traders engaged in the supplying of necessaries to the people. It is entirely appropriate to observe and comment upon the opportunities for favoritism and graft which are created by this extraordinary law. What is a reasonable rate or charge? How can a merchant determine that which is unjust or unreasonable? Under a recent ruling of one of the Federal District Courts, the same article sold at the same price by two different dealers may result in one merchant being a criminal and the other not, since one may have bought the goods he sold at a lower price than the other. Suppose we have a small store in which numerous articles are sold, some sold under competitive conditions and substantially without profit, others at a very low profit, and a third class sold at a high profit, but the whole volume of the business being sufficient only to produce a modest income for the storekeeper. Is he subject to criminal prosecution and imprisonment, if the goods showing the highest profit, considered by the price examiners, are unreasonably high?

Let us get clearly in our minds what concerns us all. We are at the end of a war period, in which vast bureaucracies have been built up, at enormous public expense, for supposed public purposes. Thousands of men in these bureaucracies have exercised authority, have expended and often grossly wasted public money and drawn large salaries. Are these bureaucracies to continue in times of peace? The Lever law is a startling instance of the bureaucratic extension of the idea of the public prosecutor as a director general of industry. The sober sense of the American people will sometime require the return of its government to the form and substance of Anglo-Saxon freedom, to a government of laws and not of men.

A Rock-Bottom Prophet

Of prophecies of disaster there is such an abundance, in these days of world-wide trouble, as to furnish satisfaction to every variety of taste in pessimism. And it must be confessed that there is no need of pessimist bias to give to forebodings of evil ample warrant. At no time in the memory of living men have so many elements of danger conspired to envelop in doubt the prospects of the civilized world. When, therefore, a writer comes forward with a fresh survey of the situation, from a standpoint of his own, and finds that European civilization is face to face with utter collapse, he is pretty sure to have a large and attentive audience.

In the North American Review for June, Major Charles Lacey Hall, an officer in the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, presents us with such a survey and such a conclusion. His article is not a mere recapitulation of existing troubles and menaces. It is "an attempt to arrive, by historical analysis, at the reasons for the impending collapse." The reasons are rooted in the history of modern capitalism, which is characterized in a few bold, strong strokes. Thus the true inwardness of the policy of colonial expansion is exposed in this simple and clean-cut fashion:

> Ever since 1848 the preservation of capitalism has depended on the progressive amelioration of the condition of the lower classes. In order to accomplish this amelioration the excess profits of capital can no longer be taken from the home state, but must be obtained from subject or backward countries. Hence, a strong colonial policy was an absolute necessity to the proletariat, as well as to the bourgeoisie; a fact rather well appreciated by the former.

Again, as to the condition to which capitalism has been reduced by the war:

> From the day war was declared the Western Powers began to use up their accumulated overseas capital and thus dissipate their sources for further commercial exploitation. They also proceeded to capitalize their credit for all it was worth. By this means wealth was transferred out of the hands of the holders of fixed capital, the most naturally conservative forces of the state, either into economically useless goods or labor (munitions of war and pay of the army) or into the hands of entrepreneur capitalists. These latter held their wealth in paper money, and this money could only be converted into real wealth at the expense of somebody. The three possible "somebodies" were:
>
> (a) The inhabitants of the state itself, that is, the general public.
>
> (b) The enemy.
>
> (c) The inhabitants of the semi-civilized states and of the colonies. Another alternative was not to convert it at all, but to repudiate. The probability of repudiation is the existing menace to capitalism.

The peace of Versailles, "dictated by the Entente capitalists, is their scheme for converting their paper wealth into real wealth at the expense partly of the enemy and partly of the inhabitants of semi-civilized states"; but Major Hall points out categorically why neither of these things can actually be done, and proceeds to tell us what Europe is really up against:

> The only other solution is repudiation, either direct or by a further inflation of credit. This latter means is the one now actually being followed and is apparently destined to continue. By it money is being reduced in value gradually until it no longer pays to print. This reduction naturally unsettles international exchange, and with it international trade. The raw material producer in Polynesia has been accustomed to get money for his cocoanuts with which to buy red cloth. When he discovers that, for his cocoanuts, he no longer gets a reasonable amount of red cloth, he stops producing; unless he can get another source of supply for his red cloth. Also the soldiery who have kept him in order stop soldiering when their pay comes in perfectly useless paper. The raw material market is thereby cut off; and the home state, "not having of its own whereof to live," starves. At this point, in pure desperation, the people turn Bolshevist. To this exact spot all European states are travelling with varying speed, and when they reach it, capitalism will have collapsed and Europeans will have to starve until they become few enough to live off the land. During this period of starvation it is reasonable to expect that every institution of society we know, every rule of morality we are accustomed to, and every motto we hold dear, will utterly disappear from the European continent.

Before such a combination of remorseless logic and picturesque presentation, what can one do but bow one's head in submission? Yet there is a lurking feeling that the thing is a little too clean-cut—that history is not compressible into quite so simple a formula; one suspects that no man can be quite so wise as Major Hall sounds. And suddenly there appears a gleam of genuine hope that he may be mistaken about some of his grand conclusions. For, coming down to the comparatively simple problem of the advancing of American credit for the restoration of European industry, Major Hall has this to say about the difficulty Europe will experience in meeting the obligation:

> Since the adoption of prohibition there are practically no European goods needed in the United States, except a few articles of luxury, and the interest can be paid only in
>
> (a) Raw materials from tropical and oriental markets, shipped from them in exchange for European manufactured goods.
>
> (b) Expenditures of American tourists abroad.
>
> (c) Transfers of credits of immigrants to their homes. The first class will always be limited, as America still exports raw materials on its own account. The second class is unlikely to grow for some years; and the less we have of the third the better. Altogether the outlook is not promising.

When we came upon this passage, we breathed a deep sigh of relief. If Major Hall had turned to no more elaborate a work than the World Almanac, he would have found that our total imports of wines, malt liquors, and distilled spirits, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, were $20,300,000, while our entire imports from Europe amounted to $896,000,000. If he was satisfied to draw upon his inner consciousness for an estimate of the effect of prohibition upon the volume of Europe's trade with this country, it seems not impossible that his selective imagination had something to do also with his account of larger matters, and with the cocksureness of his conclusions upon them. Which, by the way, would not be worth all this notice but for the fact that it is typical of a large class. The woods are full of Cassandras. It would be foolish to shut our ears to their warnings; but it is well to remember, too, that for the one Cassandra whose story has been preserved there have been ninety and nine who have been every whit as solemn, but whose names have been swallowed up in oblivion along with their unfulfilled prophecies.

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Worries of the Young Nations

THE United States is now one hundred and forty-three years old, which is a tolerably mature age as nations go. While we consider ourselves youngsters, it is a fact that only the Governments of Great Britain and Japan are older than the Government of the United States, and that there is no Government, great or small, on the face of the globe which has not suffered radical constitutional changes during the period of our unbroken constitutional existence. The peoples of the old world recognize this more clearly than we have done. Americans went to Europe feeling like spoiled darlings; they found that they were looked upon as rich uncles. They had a plenitude of resources; more than this, they were known to have had longer experience in running a democracy than any other nation. Paderewski of Poland and Masaryk of Czechoslovakia had studied our institutions on the ground. It has taken the aftermath of the Great War to teach us some of the opportunities as well as the penalties of national maturity.

Between the Baltic and the Adriatic Seas there are now eleven states, not including Greece and Turkey, where before the war there were five. The largest of these, Poland, has a population of about 27,000,000; Czechoslovakia, in round numbers, has a population of 12,000,000; Greater Serbia, 11,000,000; Rumania, 8,000,000, and Austria, 6,000,000. By the scratch of a pen a large part of the government of these countries has been transferred from the field of internal administration to the domain of foreign affairs. Without questioning the propriety of this transfer there is left for the statesmen of the countries themselves who were responsible for the change, and for the statesmen of the great nations who underwrote it in the treaty of peace, the problem of handling these affairs at least as well as they were formerly handled under the old régime. Upon their ability to do so depends the security of the new nation and the peace of the world. No one of these nations can supply all or nearly all the subsistence needed for its own economic life. Three have no seacoast whatever; the rivers and railroads upon which they depend for transport traverse from one to three states before reaching a world port. One has coal, another has oil, another has a sufficiency of wheat. None has a sufficiency of all three, and some have little or none of any of them.

Can the New States Survive?

Can the states themselves within a year after liberation provide that internal stability and that external foresight which are necessary to build up their own prosperity and to guarantee peace with their neighbors? It is not surprising that the first answer is a dubious one. Never had rulers of new states such burdens as haunt the pillows of their statesmen. History may smile, but not they, at the worries caused them by their own people. Everywhere there is childlike faith in the law and the prophets, dependence on the aphorisms of freedom and the efficacy of politics to accomplish all ends, from digging coal to running a railroad and solving a tangle in international finance. But the number of men who can give to harassed administrators the benefit of expert counsel on food supply, train dispatching, the increase of coal production, and the mysteries of international exchange, is very small indeed. From some experience in riding in the trains of Europe I should say that the average worker thinks to manage these by the caucus system. And I am credibly informed that he thinks banking problems can be handled in the same way. The Government's use of such experts as it can find is seriously handicapped by the party system as it exists in Europe. The United States worries along with two parties; Great Britain turns to coalitions only under the stress of major necessity. Our new pupils have a dozen parties apiece. Aside from the fact that mutual jealousies limit the government to the use of mediocre men, there is the further disadvantage that the coalition government cannot act quickly nor with true foresight, and in external affairs it is too likely to have to face half a dozen ways.

The Case of Czechoslovakia

Czechoslovakia provides an excellent illustration of the condition in which a new state may find itself, quite apart from its own merits or failings. In some respects Czechoslovakia is the most favored of all the new states of Central Europe. And its perplexities are the direct outgrowth of its abundant endowment. Czechoslovakia is in the position of a dog which has cornered a supply of bones and is surrounded by other dogs ravenous for meat. Bohemia, which is the commercial part of the new republic, contains the best farming lands and three-quarters of the mines of the old Austrian Empire. It has several large industrial cities, it manufactures much of the steel, and has in normal times excellent railroads. Tendencies are already manifest which will isolate Czechoslovakia by encircling it with dissatisfied and needy neighbors. There are three million Germans on the western front of Bohemia who have set their hearts on being joined to Germany, now that their ties with Austria are broken. On the northern border Polish labor is in the majority in Teschen. The problem of the Silesian coal fields is the most confused boundary tangle in Europe. In the little Duchy of Teschen three languages are spoken. Just outside of Mährisch-Ostrau there is a point at which, in 1913, the three empires of Russia, Germany, and Austria joined. Now envious eyes are turned to this very spot by Poland and Czechoslovakia and Germany. Below the ground are rich veins of a gas coal which is indispensable to the economic life of all Central Europe. Not only Poland and Czechoslovakia, but Germany and Austria and Hungary are more or less painfully interested in the distribution of this coal. Without it their cities cannot be lighted, their traction lines cannot run. It is axiomatic that under present confused conditions no single country should be burdened with the responsibility for the control of the distribution of this commodity. Whatever way the problem is solved, the possession of this coal is bound to be the source of anxiety on the score of international relationships as its loss would be the source of economic anxiety. Just at present the Czechoslovaks are in possession. Production is cut to about seventy per cent. of normal; transportation facilities are far below the demand, and deliveries to foreign countries are held up by diplomatic misunderstandings.

On the south the Magyars are an interrogation point to-day, but only yesterday they were strong enough to push a wedge between the Czechs and the Slovaks. Will the marriage between the Slovaks, who are agrarians, and their industrial fellow-citizens, the Czechs, endure? The answer depends upon many contingencies, not the least of which lie outside of Czechoslovakia in the domain of international affairs. If the Great Powers can find a world programme, Czechoslovakia and the other young nations can endure. But if they are to be left alone to seek their own salvation, confusion is as certain as cobwebs in dusty corners. Czechoslovakia has no sea-coast. She can get and give only by railroads and rivers that traverse the domains of her watchful neighbors. Already there are signs of an approaching understanding among these. German-Austria is making advances for an "economic entente" with the other members of the former Austrian Empire and is reaching across Czechoslovakia for a military alliance with Poland.

What of Austria?

It is true that at the present time little is to be feared from any military action of Austria, but Austria is not to be ignored as a source of influence in the Greater Balkans. Austria is worse off than Bohemia for coal and lands; she is economically better off than Bohemia in the sense that, while the one country has lost its limbs, the other has lost its directing head. The city of Vienna, of two million inhabitants, which formerly commanded a wide empire of industry and mines, is now the capital of an area in which the industry is negligible and the agriculture second-rate, in which the railroad systems are truncated, and in which there are no mines. A population of seven million cannot long support a capital of two million people, nor can it indefinitely live under the conditions of hunger and impoverishment. A practical solution might be that Vienna shrink to an appropriate size to serve the country. Such a solution argues without those economic and creative factors which made Vienna the chief commercial city of Eastern Europe before the war. It may be so arranged that ownership of the Czech and Slav industries pass out of German-Austrian hands. This would not, however, solve the problem involved in the fact that it was Vienna which before supplied the direction of these industries and the machinery for international commerce. If the world wishes to transfer that machinery to other cities it must aid in the transfer. Otherwise there will be every tendency for procedure to seek its old channels.

Mutual jealousies between the new countries of Central Europe are hampering the development of that industry and self-reliance which are essential to their prosperity. It is still too difficult to get a proper and equitable distribution of export materials, coal, oil, and agricultural products. Expert labor sits on one side of a line ready to do work which is sorely needed on the other side of the line, and a narrow and selfish "national interest" denies its use. There is still needed the friendly and neutral coöperation of the older brothers among the nations to assist the young nations through their trying stage. The question whether this shall be accorded is rapidly passing out of the domain of abstract discussion.

THOMAS H. DICKINSON

A "Gold Brick" From North Dakota

It is often said to be easier to sell a gold brick on Broadway or in Wall Street than to the American farmer of to-day. There were many smiles among those familiar with the situation, when they read in the New York Times of Sunday, May 16, 1920, "Governor Frazier's Own Story of the Nonpartisan League," written by Governor Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota. Knowing ones saw at a glance that the Times had been "gold-bricked."

The Governor attempts to give the reader the impression that the Nonpartisan League is a coöperative, economic movement. On the contrary, it is distinctly political, designed to give political power to its leaders, most of whom have been proved to be closely allied with the radical movements of the country. These leaders, from the first, have been members of the Socialist party; some of them have been affiliated with the I. W. W., and Governor Frazier himself was in a working alliance with John Fitzpatrick, radical labor leader of Chicago, principal promoter of the new Labor party, and has now aligned himself, as well as the organization, with the Committee of 48.

Governor Frazier showed himself to be one of the "smooth" kind in his account of the Fargo Bank case:

> One of the erroneous reports about the Nonpartisan League is the story of the so-called failure of the Scandinavian-American Bank at Fargo. Many publications received the impression that it was the Bank of North Dakota that had been closed. The Scandinavian-American Bank is an ordinary farmers' state bank, which had been friendly to the farmers' movement and which had helped to finance various farmers' organizations. The opposition to the Nonpartisan League movement, including the Attorney General of the state, who had turned traitor to our organization, tried to discredit and put out of business this farmers' bank. It was illegally closed, as was shown by the supreme court decision, which finally re-opened the bank. It is still doing business and should never have been closed.

The Scandinavian-American Bank was not "an ordinary farmers' State bank." A. C. Townley, the president and founder of the Nonpartisan League, had secured control of the machinery of this bank and used it to finance the Nonpartisan League, and subsidiary organizations of the League, to a total of $432,000, on collateral that would never have been accepted by any properly managed institution.

These loans were in direct violation of the State banking law, which provides that a bank may not lend more than 15 per cent. of its capital stock and surplus to one account. The capital of the Scandinavian-American Bank was $50,000 and the surplus $10,000, a total of $60,000. This would make the highest loan permissable to any one account $9,000. In violation of the law, the bank lent to four Townley accounts $432,000. Furthermore, the "collateral," supposed to be deposited with the bank, was left in control of the borrower and in the custody of the borrower's agents, without having been checked by the bank officials, whose only record of the "collateral" was that reported by the agents of the borrower.

The bank was closed and a temporary receiver appointed by action of the State Banking Board, on the direct and definite recommendation of the Assistant Attorney General and two deputy State examiners, who acted under orders of the State Banking Board, and who reported the bank in a state of insolvency as a result of the large loans to the Townley organizations. These examiners also reported that the bank had absolutely no cash legal reserve, but was maintaining a "book reserve" through "book credit" with a Duluth bank, based on a deposit of discounted paper for the definite, specific, and understood purpose of enabling the Scandinavian-American bank to show a "book reserve" only.

Governor Frazier says that the bank was illegally closed, yet the president and cashier were later arrested, charged with violation of the State Banking act, and the president was convicted by a farmer jury, in a court presided over by a special district judge appointed by Governor Frazier, instead of the judge then sitting regularly in that district.

It is true "the bank was re-opened by order of the Supreme Court of the State." The deputy bank examiner who had been installed as temporary receiver was removed, and the bank was ordered to resume business, without its resources having been rehabilitated. The Supreme Court of North Dakota comprises five members, four of them elected by the Nonpartisan League. Notwithstanding the fact that the bank case was already in the District Court, and would have come to the Supreme Court under due procedure, the majority of the Supreme Court, at the request of the leaders of the Nonpartisan League, arbitrarily assumed jurisdiction, gave a swift "once-over" hearing on affidavits filed by the Nonpartisan League attorneys, and refused to hear witnesses on behalf of the State Banking board, which was made the defendant.

Three of the five justices rendered a decision that the bank was solvent, principally on the affidavits of the president and cashier. The question of jurisdiction, proper and legal procedure, and all other points raised by the defense were practically ignored and no witnesses were given a hearing.

This was too much for one of the Supreme Court judges elected by the Nonpartisan League, who filed a dissenting opinion declaring the majority decision to be a fundamental and far-reaching error.

> It strikes at the very foundation of judicial due process of law . . . Compared to a denial of judicial due process, all other questions are as chaff to the wheat. It seems to me that this proceeding is most extraordinary; I have searched in vain for any precedent for such action . . . If considerations of this character are once made controlling to the extent of precluding trials, then government by injunction will become the accepted rule instead of the odious exception.

It is true "the bank has been reopened and is still doing business," but new stockholders have bought in, new capital has been added, and a complete change in the management effected. Possibly the best reply to Governor Frazier's reference to the bank is found in the statement issued by the new directors, who say:

> Our aim is to rebuild the bank, getting it back to its former position as a safe and sane banking institution. . . . That the bank ever got into politics was not the fault of the stockholders now in charge, except that they did not realize the course that was being taken by the officers then in charge. . . . We directors are very much interested in bringing the bank out of the mud.

Governor Frazier's reference to his action in the coal strike crisis, last November, just as carefully and completely hides the true facts in that case. Every action of the Governor in that crisis indicated his desire to bring about a condition that would give him an excuse for seizing the mines and operating them under the State Socialism programme of the League leaders, just as it was the purpose of the leaders of the nation-wide strike to bring about a condition that would serve as an excuse for nationalization of mines.

As a matter of fact, the Twenty-seventh district of the United Mine Workers of America was not included in the call for the strike of coal miners, and John L. Lewis, acting president of the United Mine Workers, did not expect a strike in North Dakota. Mr. Lewis told Governor Frazier this when the Governor wired to the acting president of the United Mine Workers appealing for permission to operate the mines under some sort of State supervision. Mr. Lewis informed the Governor that the lignite miners of North Dakota had a contract with the operators until September 20, 1920, and referred him to Henry Drennan of Butte, Montana, president of the twenty-seventh district.

Governor Frazier and Drennan held several conferences, which were followed by Drennan's making an abitrary demand of the operators for a 60 per cent. flat increase in the pay of the miners. This increase was not to go to the miners themselves; it was to be paid into the treasuries of the miners' locals in other States. This would have meant that the lignite coal industry in North Dakota would have been required to pay nearly $50,000 per week into the strike funds of an organization whose members in other States were then defying the Government of the United States.

Naturally the operators of North Dakota refused to accede to these demands. Drennan ordered a strike, and then, on November 11, in the face of acting President Lewis's withdrawal of the national strike order, Governor Frazier issued a proclamation of martial law, suspending all civil rights, and seized the mines in the name of the State, and proceeded to operate them under conditions demanded by President Drennan, even to the point of expelling non-union workers from some of the mines.

The mine owners appealed to the courts, and the executive came back with the dictum that, martial law having been declared by the Governor's proclamation, the civil courts had no power to intervene. Nevertheless, District Judge Nuessle promptly issued an order that the mines should be restored to their owners. At the same time he expressed consciousness that resistance of the judiciary department to the executive department might plunge the State into civil war, but declared even that condition preferable to despotism. "It seems to me that it amounts on the one hand to confiscation, and on the other to involuntary servitude," was the court's comment on the action Governor Frazier had taken. "I realize that any mandate this court may issue, unless the Government chooses to recognize it, cannot be carried out without civil war. But are we," asked the court, "to permit the executive to go ahead and exert the powers of the judicial and legislative departments to make laws, to construe them, and to decree how they shall be enforced? That would be despotism."

The Governor's next step was an application to the Supreme Court for an injunction restraining the District Court from putting into effect its order for the return of the mines to the owners. The Supreme Court refused, and Associate Justice James E. Robinson, one of the Nonpartisan League members of the Court, wrote a scathing denunciation of the Governor's action, which was pronounced from the bench, in which he said:

Pandering to the labor vote, we have passed laws to permit and encourage strikes, picketing, and idleness; a law to permit any person to quit work in disregard of his contract, and to persuade others to do likewise; a law to prevent coal miners from working more than 8 hours a day, and a law to subject mine owners to a tax of nearly five per cent on their payroll. We have a statute of 27 printed pages subjecting mine owners to fearfully expensive, onerous and drastic rules and regulations. The result is that the pleasant summer days have passed with only a limited production of coal. We have sown to the wind and we are reaping the whirlwind. The long, cold winter is upon us, and without any grievance, our well-paid miners have quit work and struck pursuant to orders from some labor agitators. The miners were willing to continue work for the same wages, with an advance of 60 per cent to be paid to the agitators and idlers. To this the mine owners did not accede, and the result is that, with the military, the Governor has undertaken to operate the mines.

An injunctional order has been issued restraining such operation. The Governor applies to this court for a writ to forbid the district court and the mine owners from interfering with his operation of the mines. His position is that the courts have no jurisdiction to interfere with him when he acts as a commander of the militia, but that the courts have jurisdiction to aid him by enjoining all parties from obstructing him; in other words, that the courts have only such jurisdiction as the Governor may permit them to exercise; that the courts may aid him, but if they thwart his wishes he may use military force to defy them and to turn them out of their offices.

In every civilized government the courts are the bulwarks of freedom and civil liberty, the refuge of the citizens for protection of life, liberty and property. The military power is for military purposes only. It may be used to suppress insurrection and to repel invasion. It may not be used to take from him that has and to give to him that has not.

The shortage of fuel is in no way different from a shortage of bread and butter, flour and feed and other necessities of life, and who will say that such shortage does authorize the military to take bread or grain from one and to give it to another. It follows that the Governor has no jurisdiction to declare martial law for the purpose of taking over the mines, or to cause anyone to do it, and any order to that effect is wholly void. Motion denied.

Governor Frazier refers with pride, apparently, to the fact that Mr. Townley owns and controls two daily newspapers and fifty weeklies for the purpose of "informing the people of the facts of the political and economic situation in our State." He does not relate, however, how Mr. Townley forced through the last Legislature a bill making these papers in which he is interested, and in which a number of the members of the Legislature are interested, the "legal papers" of the State in their respective counties and requiring all public notices of every kind and nature to be printed in them. Thus there have been transferred to these Townley-owned and controlled publications more than $300,000 worth of patronage taken from other newspapers; as a result, at least sixty weekly publications in various parts of the State have been killed off.

The Governor also fails to tell the readers of the New York Times that the members of the Nonpartisan League are urged, and all but commanded, to read no papers save those owned and controlled by the League leaders; and it is in that manner that they "inform the people of the facts of the political and economic situation in our State."

But for naïve suggestions and delightful climax, it would be difficult to find anything better than the concluding thought of the Governor's story. He says, "If this industrial programme is not a success, it will die a natural death. . . . Then why is it necessary for the opposition to spend thousands upon thousands of dollars trying to discredit a movement which cannot possibly survive if it is not a benefit to the rank and file of the people?"

To this, of course, the people of North Dakota reply that they are expending the thousands with the hope of preventing Governor Frazier and his associates from involving their State in a programme that will cost the people of North Dakota millions upon millions.

EYE-WITNESS

Poetry

Stormbound

"BEYOND my ken the winds their combat wage,
The dashing waves roll in on every side,
And we, the victims of the surging tide,
Lie impotent their fury to assuage.

Its black sides straining with the tempest's rage,
Our ship is borne along without a guide,
The tattered sails are rent and cast aside,
The hold is flooded, and no anchorage."

So wrote Alcaeus in the distant past
When civil strife in Lesbos held full sway
And petty tyrants sought to rule the land.

We, too, sail on by wind and sea harassed,
And through the mists we blindly grope our way;
God grant we find a pilot to command.

WILLIAM N. BATES

Iris in Kansas City

HERE in the West the iris is blooming. Blooming in little yards, by farm houses on unfrequented roads, and in big gardens; white, white veined with lavender, lavender, mauve, violet, purple, blue purple, pink, cream yellow, yellow, and velvet red, smoke purple, every one beautiful, some almost too beautiful. It is growing everywhere that any one will plant it. Drop a piece and it will root itself on clay banks or in the garden loam. The only thing that keeps the world from being smothered in iris is that if left alone it grows so exuberantly that it finally smothers itself.

If that were all the world offered in beauty now it would be enough to satisfy one's soul, but that is just the foreground of the picture. With the iris blooms the dainty columbine, as delicate on their stems as fairies poised between flights. And lower down the spice pinks are sweetening the air. While out in the great farming world emerald green vies with purple earth, and as the cloud shadows sail across the fields the greens change to blues and back to fresh shades of green.

It is useless at this season to talk to gardeners of anything but gardens. We wander among the iris like worshippers hypnotized by the play of sunlight upon colors; we remembered them as beautiful last year but nothing ever could have been like this!

Moths work their will in our houses, and spring cleaning is for the drudges of the earth. This is the hour of the gardener's rejoicing. Frosts are over and done. His seedlings, which have to risk a late frost if they are to grow large enough before the heat seizes them, are safely set out. Each week we have been told that the peach crop has failed, plums and cherries were going, and little was to be looked for in the way of apples and strawberries. But somehow these doleful predictions have not been fulfilled, and the world gives back the hopeful smile of the once agitated gardener.

One must, indeed, garden with gratitude and philosophy. Anything that my garden produces I receive with gratitude and anything that fails I feel sure can somehow be replaced. I give it credit for having tried its best to grow, but there are some things no self-respecting plant can stand; I can at any rate admire its courage. One of my neighbora who had put out a row of flowers one morning to have them blown nearly out of the ground by a spring gale told me that she could hear those plants shriek at her, "Why on earth did you plant us here? Don't you know this is no place for flowers in a gale like this?" Yet if for one instant heaven smiles they grow like our friend Jack's famous lentil. One can see the difference between morning and evening. This year we had very little rain or snow all winter. One morning in March it began to rain. By night the grass looked green. It rained the next day too. In a week my jonquils had grown out of the ground and were in bloom, and the leaves had come out on the early shrubs and rose bushes. I wonder if I must tell what happened on Easter Sunday to teach those ambitious leaves where they belonged? No, I am not going to tell, because it had never happened in ten years of gardening, and I do not feel that it really is typical, but it was awful.

But I do not care, because now the iris blooms and it is glorious. Some love to struggle and toil over their plants and love them more for the labor expended, but not so I. Give me the iris that just blooms for the planting. No bugs attack it, rarely does anything injure it; one plants and one receives a thousand fold. Peonies may be poor for lack of rain at the proper moment, chrysanthemums may multiply, but so sometimes do the attacking aphis; the iris, however, blooms whether the season is late or early, whether there was too little rain last summer or too much snow in January.

MAYTIME

"Batter Up!"

THE times are singularly deficient in great men. War produces great men; the people wills them into existence, for the people in time of war knows exactly what it wants. But it grows harder and harder for great men to carry over into the troubled times that follow upon wars; the people is no longer of one mind, nor are its many minds clearly and cleanly made up. Those who try of their own strength to be great quickly discover that their roots do not reach down to the life-giving waters. But a people must have its heroes none the less —a people always ready to barter happiness for history; and great men, we were long ago assured, are "the quintessence of history."

It is only on some such view of things as this that a great people, having pretty thoroughly muddled its relations with most of the other peoples of earth, and about to subject itself to an agony, quite unparalleled anywhere else, that is designed to discover him who for its sins is to hang the next four years upon the cross of the Presidency, should nevertheless be moved to its inmost depths at the possibility, grown less and less remote, that Babe Ruth will actually and indubitably, once and for all surpassing the might of men hitherto, swat the ball into the centre-field bleachers. Even if he does not achieve this ultimate feat, he has already done enough to entitle him to greatness. Fifteen home runs, a quinzaine of perfect, unanswerable wallops, no less than three in a single game, and all within a season still so young that the summer sun has hardly yet warmed him to his work, where else can one point to human effort so skillfully, so triumphantly, in short, so heroically disposed?

There is this other characteristic of greatness about it, too, that others are doing well what at the moment he does superlatively. His giant stick rises from an underwood which not meanly challenges its towering top. The renaissance of batting upon which the ancient and critical scarp of Coogan's Bluff looks down approvingly is not the work of one man. But none must complain if the applause of the world centres itself on Babe Ruth. It is a case of Shakespeare—and the rest. The world must have its hero.

Let no one suppose that baseball is a game. It is a symbol; and the home run is its perfect expression, its pearl, whole, unique, finished. No such katharsis anywhere as your home run; it clears the passions as it clears the bases. Purged and refreshed, life is for the moment radiantly conscious of itself. In a world of tentatives, of frustrations, of misdirections, it is the one thing complete and satisfying, transmuting the raw materials of life into the perfect product and leaving nothing at loose ends; that, at any rate, is that.

There should be no cloud in one's satisfaction over great deeds nobly done because of the possibility that the recent resurgence of human prowess at the bat may owe something to the hampered state of pitchers. One likes, of course, to think of the batter as bravely standing to whatever life offers him, refusing, to his profit, the bad if he is wise enough to recognize it, and finding the good to his advantage only if he can make use of it. Now, however, that the pitcher is estopped from putting his blackest magic on the ball, may no longer employ sand or emery, or, most potently magical agency of all, saliva, to make the ball gyre and rocket like a woodcock, the chances of the batter seem measurably improved. But that slight conventionalization of the game does not at all detract from its value as a symbol. Here, again symbolically, is represented the progress of civilization, consciously removing from life some of its wilder and more erratic hazards. No game is good if it is not playable, and life, if it is to be well lived, must at least be livable. The rules are the proof of greatness—at once its test and its demonstration.

There is another side to the matter. If Mr. Ruth, by reason of his unquestioned position as hero, is allowed to stampede the Republican convention, if he consents in accepting the Democratic nomination, if, assuming his batting average shows no falling off, he is earnestly consulted about the high cost of living and the desirability of trading with the Russian Coöperatives, if his opinion is sought as to the possibilities of communicating with Mars, then will come the real test of his greatness. Matters need go but a little further and no less than this will happen. No public error is so common as to confuse the symbol with the thing, an error which the symbols themselves are only too prone to share. It is a wise nation and a rare that knows it own heroes—and their limitations. To be wise and a hero is granted to but few among the gods. But to have had a Babe Ruth at all, whatever fortune hold for him (and us) is cause for present thankfulness.

Correspondence

Prince Feisal on Zionism

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

I quite agree with Professor Reed's statement that Prince Feisal is thoroughly qualified to speak for the Arabs touching Palestine. And this is what Prince Feisal had to say about the Zionist programme as submitted to the Peace Conference and now written into the public law of Nations, at San Remo:

Paris, March 3rd, 1919.

DEAR MR. FRANKFURTER:

I want to take this opportunity of my first contact with American Zionists, to tell you what I have often been able to say to Dr. Weizmann in Arabia and Europe; we feel that the Arabs and Jews are cousins in race, have suffered similar oppressions at the hands of the Powers stronger than themselves, and by a happy coincidence have been able to take the first step towards the attainment of our national ideals together. We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with the deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement. Our Deputation here in Paris is fully acquainted with the proposals submitted yesterday by the Zionist Organization to the Peace Conference and we regard them as moderate and proper. We will do our best in so far as we are concerned to help them through. We will wish the Jews a most hearty welcome home. With the chiefs of your movement, especially with Dr. Weizmann, we have had and continue to have the closest relations. He has been a great helper of our cause and I hope the Arabs may soon be in a position to make the Jews some return for their kindness. We are working together for a reformed and revised Near East and our two movements complete one another. The Jewish movement is national and not imperialist. Our movement is national and not imperialist and there is room in Syria for both of us. Indeed, I think that neither can be a real success without the other. People less informed and less responsible than our leaders and yours, ignoring the need for coöperation of the Arabs and Zionists, have been trying to exploit the local difficulties that must necessarily arise in Palestine in the early stages of our movement. Some of them have, I am afraid, misrepresented your aims to the Arab peasantry and our aims to the Jewish peasantry, with the result that interested parties have been able to make capital out of what they call our differences. I wish to give you my firm conviction that these differences are not on questions of principle, but on matters of detail, such as must inevitably arise in every contact of neighboring peoples and are easily adjusted by mutual good will. Indeed, nearly all of them will disappear with further knowledge. I look forward and my people with me look forward to a future in which we will help you and you will help us, so that the countries in which we are mutually interested may once again take their place in the comity of civilized peoples of the world.

Believe me,

FEISAL,
Délégation Hedjazienne, Paris

FELIX FRANKFURTER

Cambridge, Mass., June 7

The "Intellectuals"

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

What is taking place in America now—something with which Europe has long been familiar —is the formation of an intellectual class, revolutionary in tendency and bound together by a common antipathy for the present order of things. Although not organized, it has coherence; and it exercises power through a number of brilliantly edited journals, which, though recently established, have rapidly gained wide circulation and influence. It may be stated that the weekly which, unlike the daily and the monthly, is primarily an organ of opinion, is now largely in the hands of radicals, who are thus in a position to mobilize a large and influential section of public opinion in favor of their ideals.

A reader of Tolstoi, Marx, Ibsen, Shaw and Sorel, no matter how young and superficial, is an intellectual, if his views of life are radical. I use these contrasts in order to emphasize the new meaning of the word, not to disparage the intellectuals, for among them there are to be found scholars and thinkers and scientists of a high order of ability.

Matthew Arnold, John Stuart Mill, Huxley, Lowell, Emerson, Hugo, Taine were put into handsome bookcases with closed doors. On the open shelves appeared Shaw, Wells, Nietzsche, Marx, Anatole France, Ibsen, Tolstoi, Dostoievsky.

From "Revolutionary Intellectuals" in the June Atlantic Monthly.

Comment is needless, but it might serve a good purpose if your sound and conservative weekly would put these so-called intellectuals in the class where they belong. Probably most college men, for example, will be rather amused to find themselves, according to Mr. Shapiro's definition, in his "intellectual class." They have been talking prose all the time, it seems, without knowing it.

W. F. BISSING

New York, May 27

The Kaiser's Case

[The author of the following letter was for several years Professor of International Law at the University of Berne and is now a member of the bar of that city. He is one of the leading authorities in Switzerland on jurisprudence.]

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

It is clear that the expiation under consideration can have, and as a matter of fact, probably is intended to have, an additional and higher objective. The present war has been one of the greatest occurrences in the existence of mankind. It is in the interests of history and of humanity in general that the blame for its origin be fixed for all time. The tenets of international law were so often violated that some observers have asked if there has not been a complete breakdown of the system. It is a public duty that these violations and their causes be determined. History and international law, truth, and justice, demand this; international morality demands it no less.

The havoc that the war has caused in the soul of peoples is so vast that it can not yet be fully comprehended. If those responsible for the war had not at its beginning intentionally brought about a moral confusion by representing themselves before the world as the innocent victims of aggression, this moral disaster could have been avoided. But as it was, they succeeded in violently disturbing the moral equilibrium throughout the neutral countries, and this equilibrium can now be restored only through expiation and through the determination of the whole truth.

This might have been accomplished without asking for the Kaiser's extradition if the German people had acknowledged the truth, if they had candidly admitted their culpability, if they had resolutely repudiated the guilty old régime and brought the criminals to justice. But the expected and much desired change in the mental attitude of the Germans unfortunately has not occurred. The German people are as blind as before. They do not see the injustice done the world by Germany. On the contrary, they consider as unjust the merited punishment that has overtaken them. Instead of acknowledging their own culpability and repenting, the new Germany endeavors to obscure this culpability and to vindicate the old régime. The truth, even in the Germany of to-day, is not proclaimed unadorned. The German people, instead of doing penance, indulge their self-admiration in the rôle of the victims of injustice, of injured innocence. This mental attitude makes it imperative to fix the blame once and for all, because only thus can be found the moral basis for the co-existence of the nations.

Thus the problem of expiation for the responsibility for the world war, the question of the extradition of the guilty, has become a moral problem. Will it not be much more effective if the former Kaiser, when the facts have been determined through judicial procedure, suffers for his moral guilt a moral punishment, and instead of being a martyr, be simply delivered over to the verdict of history? It seems to me such a moral sanction would be the best and more obvious solution for the punishment of crimes that stand outside of the positive sphere of the law.

OTTFRIED NIPPOLD

Berne, Switzerland, April 15

Business and the Tax Burden

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

We are, most of us, agreed that increased production is necessary in order to reduce the high cost of living. But we must reckon with the fact that the manufacturer considers his business with a view to returns, and that our present system of taxation, instead of offering a premium for increased production, puts a fine on the manufacturer who earns more than a stated amount—increasing the size of the fine (or tax) as the profit increases.

Personally, I see no hope for increased production on a large scale so long as the present system remains in force; by way of illustration I offer an instance which occurred in Alabama: Some time ago a mill man purchased a small tract of timber, estimating that he had approximately a ten-year cut. He continued to operate until about June 2, 1919, and then closed down. Eventually an auditor called to go over his books for the year, and asked why he had shut down at that time of the year, to which the operator replied that he had made about all the Government seemed to think he was entitled to, and, if he continued running for the balance of the year, it merely meant giving the Government approximately forty logs out of every hundred. As the Government paid him nothing in return for depreciation of his teams and for the wear and tear on his machinery, he could not see the wisdom of continuing operation. In addition to this he also figures, since the Government seems to think that he is entitled to make only so much per year, that it would be to his best interest to operate six months out of every year, whereby he would have a twenty-year cut.

I believe that in many industries of fundamental importance men are reasoning in exactly the same way as the Alabama saw-mill man. On such men the cry for increased production will have little effect so long as they labor under the present heavy burden of taxation.

GEO. CALHOUN

Tampa, Fla., March 6

"The Jest"

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

Now that "The Jest" has passed from the stage it so conspicuously adorned, and the distinguished actors are reaping less exotic laurels in other fields, it may not be impertinent to inquire whose was the edict which so harshly vulgarized certain episodes of so beautiful a play. Was it, one wonders, translator or stage manager, that assumed the responsibility, for example, of altering the third act where the fettered Neri is confronted with his victims—a scene rancorous to be sure, but dignified in its rancors—so that, rather than the electric air of tragedy, we breathe in the fetid mental atmosphere of a reformatory for morbid incorrigibles. The despots of the Renaissance, it may be argued, were for the most part incorrigibles, but it evidently pleased Signor Benelli, as it pleases us, to believe that beautiful decoration, lovely garments, and the imminent presence of il Magnifico might impart, even to an environment of crime, a picturesqueness and a conduct of evil far removed from the ravings of the defectives of a city slum.

"Mad, indeed, he is, poor sufferer!" says Laldomine, as she approaches the arch-criminal she has loved to her own undoing, and then cries to him "Neri! Neri!" while the bitterer Fiammetta cries "Sir Traitor!"

"He answers not," says Laldomine again, "and I—I pity him!"

Fiammetta
A traitor moves me not to ruth but wrath!
Laldomine
Me too, he has deceived . . . What would you have!
Why look for reason where no reason is!

Later on, Fiammetta says

"I would not trust him."

and the more subtle Laldomine responds

"And I would long to dare
To trust . . . that I might trust him more!
For when I see him not, then I detest—
And when I see him, then, again, adore!—
Yes, I am at thy feet again, again!"
Fiammetta
The brute! he promised me that he would wed,
Give me a house as he has given Ginevra:—
She, the astute, has got both house and gear.
Would Fiammetta had but loved thee less!"
Laldomine
For me, there's nothing—nothing—I repent!
Fiammetta (drawing nearer to Neri)
How grim he is!
And fettered well—and cannot sin again!
. . . Dullard!!
Laldomine
You have no mercy!
Fiammetta
I am a woman—and where love has led
Now hatred urges.
(To Neri)
I offer votive prayer
That you may never know again
The light of reason! thus you shall never more
Betray fond women!
Laldomine
Alas! you are a viper, Fiammetta!
Does nothing move you? See how he suffers!
How his poor eyes are darkened—
His cheeks aflame!

and later, when Fiammetta has reached the climax of her rage, she exclaims:

I am too honest not to know I hate!
Laldomine
Cruel is honesty!
Fiammetta
Best that I leave you then!
(To Neri)
Yes, yes, I go—and go
Without tearing your eyes! Traitor and knave!
I go!

This is a somewhat free but quite unchastened translation of part of this act and of that part of it in which the two ladies are most uncompromising in expression, with their former lover and with each other. Now, however modern opinion may lament Laldomine's lack of proper resentment, or feel that Fiammetta nurses too intolerant a grudge, at least they both yield to the restraints of a plane of emotion tense but not frenzied. In the recent adaptation, these victims of seduction look and behave like the Furies of a red-light district and "clinch and roll over" in an access of hysterical and physical abasement, as far from the probable as from the limits of an exacting dramatic taste. Can not an American audience believe in the verities of a grand passion unless they are sustained by a strangle-hold? And as for the tremendous catastrophe of the fourth act, so superbly represented, so triumphant in situation, where, in that unforgetable pose of a satisfied, but still apprehensive vengeance, in incomparable grace of color and outline, Giannetto stands against the curtain waiting the entrance of the murderer, why must Neri, to the dismay of the sensitive, trail in a bloody nightshirt—or did the overexcited Neri pick up a pillow-sham or a bureau-cover upon which to wipe his weapon? Why, rather, should he not bring with him the dagger—blood-stained, if you will, but still the dagger of the text. Modern audiences are too inured to bedroom scenes to balk even at pajamas, if necessary to the action, and of course Gabriello's blood had to go somewhere, but when it was a question of the Renaissance and Lorenzo, the grand manner would seem to be better maintained by the blood-stained dagger and the flame-colored mantle of the author's choice.

And again, what is the theological or other warrant for that sensational prayer offered at the last, by Mr. John Barrymore, admirable as it is in grace and pictorial effectiveness, but very confusing to one's apprehension of Giannetto's religious affiliations? We find no other than that of a single exclamation.

"Nature!" cries Giannetto, in the tumult of his curiously contradictory impulses,

Let me weep at least, in order not to know
The torture of the evil I have wrought.

And thus, this Hamlet of the Renaissance:

To slay myself—or not to slay—I do not dare.

It is not only regret at the defacement of a great play—a defacement apparently uncalled for by any necessity of cutting off the superfluous or suppressing the unintelligible, to bring it within the limits of performance—that shadows the pleasure in a striking rendering lovely to the eyes; it is, likewise, the fear that the retort to all criticism will be that the public demands the concessions.

A. E. T.

Hartford, Conn., March 11

Book Reviews

The War—The Last Phase

THE LAST FOUR MONTHS OF THE WAR. By Major-General Sir F. Maurice. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.
OUR GREATEST BATTLE. By Frederick Palmer. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

WHOEVER wishes to get a clear idea of the greatest of battles should read both these books together, for they supplement each other nicely. General Maurice writes military history, concerns himself only with operations, his unit is the army. Mr. Palmer's unit is the American division. He adds to his account of operations in the Meuse-Argonne an elaborate commentary on the entire effort, from the point of view of all ranks.

In its larger aspect the last battle is a miraculous feat of recuperation. In the late spring of 1918 the Germans had driven nearly to Amiens in the west and to Château-Thierry in the south. The Kaiser had prepared his observation tower on the Marne to witness the assault on Paris. In about six weeks after the Germans had been checked by our 2nd and 3rd divisions, on the Marne, late in July, they were smashed back to approximately their positions of 1914. It should be noted that this victory was won by those British and French armies which had lately been thoroughly thrashed. Our American aid in this preparatory stage was confined to casual reinforcements and to the flattening of the salient at St. Mihiel. But our participation had proved that the American divisions were highly efficient, and ready to be made into corps and armies. It was this demonstration that justified in the autumn of 1918 that final blow which had been timed for the following spring. In six weeks from the last days of September the German armies were thrust back fifty miles eastward along the entire front, their communications were cut, their morale deeply impaired, the Kaiser had fled, and Germany was a republic.

General Maurice discusses briefly the disaster of early 1918. It was due to dispersion of the British effort on several fronts, and the illusion of an inexpensive decision in the east. Haig was 180,000 men short, and driven to the desperate course of breaking up two cavalry divisions and one hundred trained infantry battalions for replacements. In the face of this, he had to take over twenty-eight more miles of front. Gough's Fifth Army, at the juncture of the French and British, consisted of fourteen depleted and battle-worn divisions, holding forty-two miles of front. It can not be said that they yielded. They were overwhelmed by a three-to-one superiority consisting of reorganized divisions from the Russian front. General Gough was in an impossible position, and, as is usual in such cases, was made a scapegoat for the War Office.

Their sacrifice and the whole disastrous battle of Flanders were needless. There were troops in England, awaiting a hypothetical invasion, surplus troops also in Palestine. Lloyd George had come to the conclusion that only a stalemate was possible in the west, meanwhile he would wait for the Americans. We may add that if Jellicoe had attacked resolutely instead of weakly at Jutland, the Germans would have had small fighting edge for the Friedenssturm of 1918.

At least the collapse of the British defense brought about unity of command. On April 14 Marshal Foch assumed supreme command of the Allied forces. The pages which General Maurice devotes to Foch are most instructive. Foch, in distinction from the Germans who regarded war as a science, considered it as an art. Where the Germans held to long-prepared and highly elaborated plans, he believed in large principles and simple plans based on the divination of the moment. Thus the Germans were constantly wearing themselves out in unlimited offensives which were badly timed and articulated. Even in the victories of early 1918, they gave respites between battles. They lacked the sense of occasion and opportunity which Foch had in the highest degree. Two days after he took command, April 16, he quietly declared that the Battle of Flanders was over, and that Haig would need no reinforcements. This was a few days before Mount Kemmel fell to the Germans—a serene and correct estimate made in the face of confusing and apparently discouraging facts.

When Foch got ready to strike, he smote relentlessly and without pause. "He makes his counter-attack on July 18, and the second battle of the Marne ends with the Germans behind the Aisne and the Vesle on August 6. On August 8 Haig opens the Battle of Amiens, and on the twelfth it ends with the Germans in their lines about Chaulnes. Meanwhile, on the ninth, Humbert has already begun the battle of Lassigny, which comes to an end on the sixteenth, and from the seventeenth to the twentieth Mangin is driving the Germans from the Aisne heights. As soon as he stops, on August 21, begins the battle of Bapaume." It lasted till August 31. Six days earlier Horne struck from Arras, completing by September 19 the recapture of Kemmel, and the occupation of the Drocourt-Quéant switch. From September 6, the French advanced rapidly on the Somme, and on September 12 and 13 two American corps cleaned up the salient of St. Mihiel. In less than two months Foch had launched eight major attacks every one of which had succeeded, and there had never been time between battles to rest or reorganize the shattered German divisions.

From the moment on August 14 when Ludendorff advised Berlin to make peace the war was won. Their forces had shrunk from 207 divisions with 66 in reserve in May to 185, with 19 in reserve in early September. Meanwhile the British, who were supposed to be crushed, had come back in irresistible force, and the fighting mettle of the green American divisions had been abundantly demonstrated.

At this point the British war Cabinet wished to halt. They feared the Americans were not fully ready. They still hoped for an inexpensive decision from Saloniki. Even Foch hesitated to ask greater sacrifices of the English and was willing to wait till the American organization should have been perfected. Pershing believed his new armies would make up in spirit for what they lacked in finish and experience. Thus it was due to the insight and confidence of Haig and Pershing that the push for victory was timed not in the spring of 1919 but in the autumn of 1918. General Maurice finds that the decision, though immediately costly in lives, was strategically sound and as compared with the alternative plan economical in every way.

We leave the reader to follow the essentially simple strategy of the final battle in General Maurice's lucid pages. The German line now lay nearly straight from Nieuport to Verdun. The task was for the English and French to swing back a great door while the Americans attempted to shatter the hinges in the Argonne-Meuse. The English had the longest walk, the Americans the toughest mechanical problem. If either failed in the mission, the French at the centre could have done little. How the two nations accomplished their task is familiar. The climax had its sensational features. To see the Americans emerge at Sedan must have satisfied the spirit of Lafayette, while certain units and individuals of the "Old Contemptibles" heard the command "cease firing," on November 11, 1918, in the precise positions on the field of Mons from which they had retreated in August, 1914.

On the much debated point whether the armistice was premature General Maurice has no doubts. The Germans were soundly beaten, and no commander was justified in sacrificing further lives. In any event the Allied Armies had outrun their supply and were incapable of a decisive general advance before spring. To be sure, an American offensive in Lorraine was fully prepared, but it offered no military advantage comparable to the cost.

General Maurice does not dwell upon the unnecessary waste of the early stages of the war, before unity of command was attained. Such, however, will be the inevitable reflection of every reader as he closes this book. Barring shakiness in woulds and shoulds, most venial in a soldier and a Scot, the book is admirably written. The just proportion between narrative, comment, and personalia is preserved. It should remain among the rather few military classics. To present a work of this importance without an index is unpardonable.

Mr. Palmer undertakes to give an account of the final American operations, division by division, and also to convey the picturesqueness and color of our entire overseas effort. In this blending process operations come off badly. Everything is in the book, but it is only a disciplined reader who can keep the course of events clearly in mind. Comment obstructs narrative. The author is naturally oppressed by the greatness of his theme, and keeps the stylistic pressure uniformly too high. Indeed, his account of administration is more valuable than that of field operations. He makes one feel the shock of adjustment. The new officers appalled by their novel responsibilities and the off chance of orders to Blois present an appealing picture. One feels the somewhat sinister imminence of the Fort Leavenworth men, nameless potentates, who, from the general staff or the dreaded Vehmgericht at Blois, disposed of the reputations and even of the lives of our young crusaders. One feels as pathetically the fates of the old regulars, shaped all their lives to little things, and suddenly faced with the dilemma of avowing or concealing incompetence. One feels even more the grim endurance of men in the ranks cynically yet cheerfully observing the rise and fall of their temporary princes. One senses the ruthless, intelligent will of the Commander-in-Chief making the human sacrifices required by speed and the emergency. One sees the confusion emerge into a kind of rough order inspired by an indomitable will to win.

Here and in the admirable portraits of the commanding generals lies Mr. Palmer's success. He has lived into his matter, and whether he describes army cooks or air men, "Y. M." secretaries, or Salvationers, engineers, or truck drivers, you feel that he has campaigned with them and understood them. Hence his book is indispensable for those who will share in imagination the misery, confusion, and glory of those great days in France. The account of American operations remains to be written, and it is likely to come in its definitive form not from any member of the A. E. F. but from some calm person in shell glasses who will study the orders, reports, and war diaries with glacial detachment. Mr. Palmer is no monster of this sort. His book abounds in heart, perhaps somewhat to the detriment of its permanency.

Mr. Palmer confirms General Maurice's low opinion of the German service of intelligence. On all main issues it was wrong. In particular its calculations of morale were grotesquely amiss. Even in the smaller field they failed to anticipate the American offensive in the Meuse-Argonne. In this as elsewhere the scientific conception of warfare undid them. Foch, in all the operations, and Pershing, whether in generously expending his new divisions along the straining line in July or in insisting on fighting with his half ready armies in the last stage, alike showed that quality of artistic imagination without which there is no great military leader.

Achievement and Hope

The Century of Hope: A Sketch of Western Progress from 1815 to the Great War. By F. S. Marvin. New York: Oxford University Press.

It is good to be cheerful—especially good, physicians tell us, for the digestion—and to any victim of dyspepsia we heartily recommend this book. Its method is clear, its conclusion simple. As for method, in a succession of chapters dealing with the various fields of human activity, Mr. Marvin points out the great achievements of the nineteenth century, culminating in these glorious years of the twentieth. In government he shows the steady advance of democracy, nourished on the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity announced by the French Revolution. Education has been deepened and broadened (as every teacher knows). Science has slowly become more certain of herself, and with her development has blessed the world with a succession of miraculous inventions which have made existence easier and larger for all men. Literature has kept pace with the expansion and purification of practical life, enriching the age with such prodigies of the imagination as Victor Hugo, to name only one of the stars of the galaxy. In his heart man has been growing more religious year by year, or at least has been growing religious in a better sense of the word.

We condense necessarily; those who desire the full breath of flattery must read the book—they will feel themselves mighty tall fellows. This is not said in irony. Granted that some of Mr. Marvin's statements are questionable, and some of his judgments a bit queer (e. g., that Carlyle "was the strongest influence towards Socialism, in the wide sense of the word, among English writers of the nineteenth century"), nevertheless, the details of genuine progress here heaped together make an imposing array. So much for the method of the book.

When we come to consider Mr. Marvin's conclusion we are not so sure. What that conclusion is may be guessed from the title of the book. Much as has been accomplished, still all is but preparation: "Come grow young with me, The best is yet to be." Or, to quote Mr. Marvin instead of perverting Browning: "In the world a wider consciousness, though nascent, has still to come. That we believe in its coming, even in the midst of the greatest war, is of all symptoms the most striking of an Age of Hope." Now we— the reviewer of this book, not Mr. Marvin's world-we—make no prophecy regarding the future. Of the sweetness of hope we have knowledge:

> Truth justifies herself, and as she dwells
> With Hope, who would not follow where she leads?

But there is still that "unconcerning thing," the matter of fact. Is this really an age of hope? Somehow an acquaintance with the radical press as well as the conservative leaves one, against one's will, with an impression that these days of ours are not so hopeful as they ought to be. The paradox is even a vexation. Why, after a period of such stupendous achievement is there so little lightheartedness, so little spontaneous hope among men? The discouragement, such as it is, does not seem to be a result of the war itself; though it may have arisen from a sudden return to reflection brought about by the shattering of illusions begotten during the war.

Mr. Marvin offers no answer to such a question—naturally, since he feels no discouragement. But perhaps the suggestion of an answer might be wrung from him despite his cheerfulness. One observes, for instance, that social progress seems to be identified by Mr. Marvin with socialistic progress, and that for him Karl Marx is the man who "saw things whole." Is it possible that an age of accomplishment has not ended in an age of hope—speaking always of the present mood, not of things far off—just because it has been suffering from this confusion all the while? Again, one observes that in the evolution of religion, as Mr. Marvin sees it, "the growth of scientific thought and the increasing hold of practical activities must take first place." He is emphatic about this:

> It remains, however, profoundly true—the most important fact in our whole discussion—that the spiritual forces, of which we may trace the workings in the same period, are the supreme factors, both in building the individual soul and in giving a common soul to all humanity. This common spirit is best exhibited, and most powerfully enlarged, in the two channels of the growth of science and the application of science.

Science is well, very well, and practical activities are well; but is it possible that an age of enlightenment has not ended in an age of hope just because it has too often failed to distinguish between the spirit of science and the spirituality of religion? We ask these questions without attempting to answer them.

Conrad the Great

THE RESCUE: A Romance of the Shallows. By Joseph Conrad. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

WE who have had a sense of groping for the old magic amongst the later tales of Joseph Conrad may find it in this book. Here are the salt and spicy atmosphere, the haunted beauty, the strangely woven texture, with its pattern revealed as if casually by gleams and cross-lights so that only when the web is completed do we really perceive its pattern. And here is the spirit, not simply the body or dress, of adventure and romance. It is all, to be sure, as far as possible from the reality of facts, an elaborate invention. But it is an invention in the older sense—the discovery of a scene and an action which might have been, might be at any time, in the world of creative dreaming which embodies the inward nature of man.

"The shallow sea that foams and murmurs on the shores of the thousand islands, big and little, which make up the Malay Archipelago, has been for centuries the scene of adventurous undertakings": with this quiet gesture the enchanter begins the weaving of his spell. A Chaucerian motto in the title-page has already warned us frankly that we are to give not sober belief but a willing temper to the imaginative enterprise in hand:

> For wende I never, by possibilitee,
> That swich a monstre or merveille mighte be!

This is the older Conradian world of "Nostromo" and "The Nigger of the Narcissus," of exotic seas and far-flung shores and strange yet not contemptible peoples among whom the white man moves, here and there, either feebly as one who has succumbed to the enervating lure of the tropics, or triumphantly as the exemplar of the British seaman's code: duty, loyalty, endurance, honor. Triumphantly as exemplar, but never happily as individual; since in Conrad's melancholy Slavic eyes to be good (that is, faithful, steadfast, a gentleman) is not more certainly to "acquire merit" than to be unhappy. . . . This also is the eloquent Conrad of old time, with the golden and at times voluptuous voice, not British, nor Polish, nor French, but trebly nourished and enriched for our enchantment. At the very least, what melody, what imagery!

"On the unruffled surface of the straits the brig floated tranquil and upright as if bolted solidly, keel to keel, with its own image reflected in the unframed and immense mirror of the sea. To the south and east the double islands watched silently the double ship that seemed fixed among them forever, a hopeless captive of the calm, a helpless prisoner of the shallow sea."

But linked and blended with the verbal and emotional splendor of the earlier romances are the sharper ironic vision and, at times, the more restrained manner of the later Conrad. An announcement by the American publisher explains this oddly composite effect. "The Rescue" was begun twenty years ago (the period of "Lord Jim"), partly written at that time, and then laid aside, not to be completed till this year. It interprets an early episode in the life of Captain Tom Lingard, who figures in Conrad's first two novels, "Almayer's Folly" and "An Outcast of the Islands." His strong, primitive virtue finds in youth escape from the crooked bonds of "civilized" life and a field of exultant activity in the Malayan seas. There he becomes "King Tom," a rough paladin of honorable adventure. Chance or fate leads him to become the savior and champion of a Malayan prince and princess, robbed of their island kingdom. They are a pair worthy of devotion; but only King Tom would have made them a dominant obligation. On the eve of its discharge, when time is ripe for the decisive blow against the usurpers, Fate takes a hand. A yacht full of sophisticated Europeans is stranded in the very mouth of his adventure. His first impulse is to get rid of them anyhow, to let them be wiped out by the Malayans; by any means to have them out of his way; for he can see nothing but his sworn duty to his protegés. But of course this will not do. A new set of obligations to men of his race, and especially to the woman among them, force themselves upon him. Thenceforth he must struggle and be torn between friendship, and honor, and love; and on every side in this supreme crisis his boasted luck forsakes him. His passion for the woman, his love for his ship, his faith in the old human derelict he has set afloat once more, all work against the fulfillment of his sworn resolve. The end is failure, the end of his love, the destruction of his noble young pair, the ruin, as he feels it, of his honor. The closing scene in which he wordlessly renounces the woman who has set his safety before that honor, and sets the Lightning's course towards no port, but simply away from that of the yacht which bears the symbol of his defeat, stops short of tragedy only as it leaves us feeling that the hero who has escaped the final defeat will live to fight again, with however sad heart, and under a flag, however dimmed and torn.

A story of sombre magic, enforcing once again the old Conradian struggle between on the one hand the apparent chances of incident and complications of circumstance summed up in the word Fate, and on the other, the primary valor and fidelity of the human soul. In this conflict Conrad beholds humanity losing and losing again; yet not quite to the point of despair, so long as the worship of valor and fidelity endure. Conrad's skepticism, deepen and broaden though it may as the years go by, may, rightly marching under this double standard, be of more inspiration to his kind than the chameleon banners of the all-believers. These, at all events, are "Anglo-Saxon" virtues in which the romancer discerns, as it were, a last hope for the world; and if that hope seems dim, we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that after all the fellow is only a Slav!

H. W. BOYNTON

Winwood Reade

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By Winwood Reade. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

AMONG those books which have led a subterranean existence and yet have managed to live and even flourish without the sunshine of popularity or the oxygen of public discussion, Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man" furnishes a curious example. Ignored by critical opinion at the time of its publication, unmentioned in most histories of literature, it has, nevertheless, continued to live on and go through many reissues. Radical journals frequently quote it (though Reade was politically a conservative or, at most, a Whig), industrious compilers of lists of books which have influenced them not seldom include it, and lovers of the bypaths of thought and of the curios of literature, like Mr. Philip Hale, still honor it with an occasional reference. The anomaly is worth a brief investigation.

Winwood Reade was a self-reliant, self-willed man, reminding one in his eccentricity and stubbornness of his uncle, the famous novelist, Charles Reade. His first ambition was to be a writer, but, upon the failure of his abortive novels, he decided rather impulsively to become an African explorer and succeeded so well in his enterprises that he was able to boast: "Henceforth no man can say that I am only a writer; for I have proved myself a man of action as well as a man of thought."

But it was as a writer after all that Winwood Reade was destined to keep his name alive. While his work in Africa is now all but forgotten, his sombre, but stimulating, "Martyrdom of Man" continues its semi-clandestine existence. The book was published in 1872. Its author's first intention was to write on the part which Africa had played in the world's story. But the conception grew under his hands until it became a full-fledged philosophy of history. His guiding principle of explanation is given in the last pages of the book: "I give to universal history a strange but true title —The Martyrdom of Man. In each generation the human race has been tortured that their children might profit by their woes." The successive stages in this painful upward struggle he designates as war, religion, liberty, and intellect, and to each of them he devotes a section of his book. But another stage is yet to be traversed: we must in the interests of right thinking rid ourselves forever of anthropomorphic religion. For Winwood Reade was a thorough-paced rationalist, believing, like Buckle, that progress lies through the clarification of the intellect.

It was mainly owing to Reade's attack on Christianity that his book was passed over in disdainful silence by so many. He speaks like a dogmatic atheist when he sums up his attitude in these words: "Supernatural Christianity is false. God-worship is idolatry. Prayer is useless. The soul is not immortal. There are no rewards and no punishments in a future state." At other times his tone is that of the agnosticism current in his day: man will never be "nearer than he is at present to the First Cause, the Inscrutable Mystery, the God"; the "Supreme Power is not a Mind, but something higher than a Mind; not a Being, but something higher than a Being; something for which we have no words; something for which we have no ideas." Reade does not hesitate to call Jesus a dervish; he suggests that he was, like other prophets, uncouth in appearance and uncleanly in garb; he regards him as simpleminded and subject to hallucinations; he thinks that he did not move consistently on the highest moral plane, since he appealed to the self-interest of his hearers and displayed in his words the spirit of a persecutor. The God-worship which Jesus taught must be classed with those provisional expedients—famine, war, slavery, inequalities of conditions—which nature employs for the development of man and which she throws aside when they have served her turn.

But though Reade regards the past life of the human race as one long tragedy, he is unquenchably optimistic about the future. "Our religion, therefore, is Virtue, our Hope is placed in the happiness of our posterity, our Faith is the Perfectibility of Man." If he seems to echo the eighteenth century in those words, on the other hand, he sounds very like Mr. Bernard Shaw when he says: "All men indeed can not be poets, inventors or philanthropists; but all men can join in that gigantic and God-like work, the progress of creation." The seductiveness of his work for so many readers comes, one may conjecture, largely from the combined appeal which he makes to our grim sense of the tragedy of the past and to our innate hopefulness for the future. His facile generalizations, which give the experts pause, have a potent attraction for the lay reader. Greek and Roman culture is seen, not as the very fount and origin of all civilization, but as a mere episode in the cause of universal history. Everything is made simple and clear with a few bold strokes, and the multiplicity of the trees never obscures the woods. The lively style is an added stimulus to the reader, for the author possessed an undeniable talent for direct and forcible statement. When he becomes enthusiastic in his narrative he can revivify the past as tellingly as Macaulay, whom he resembles also in the crispness of his sentences. All of which may help explain why "The Martyrdom of Man" has now reached its twenty-first edition.

W. K. STEWART

From Couperin to Debussy

FRENCH MUSIC OF TO-DAY. By G. Jean-Aubry. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.

IT is the fashion at the Metropolitan Opera House, and in other places, to belittle the importance of French music. But it is none the less admitted by musicians of high rank and standing that the most notable advances made in music since the death of Wagner have occurred, not as some seem to think, in Germany, but in France and Russia.

When the Metropolitan, some fifteen years ago, denied that there were French operas worth performing here, Mr. Hammerstein (the manager of the Manhattan) proved the absurdity of the contention. What Mr. Hammerstein began has been continued by the management of the Chicago Opera Company, and, rather grudgingly, by the Metropolitan management. Yet even now we have hardly an idea of the wide range and varied interest of French opera.

In the concert room, again, within the past ten years, Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Stransky, and some others have proved the value of French modern music. They have allowed us opportunities of enjoying the symphonic works of masters like Debussy, Dukas, Florent Schmett, and d'Indy, to say nothing of the Belgian, César Franck, who, to a great extent, was the inspiration of his French successors.

But there are still vast treasures waiting for explorers in French music, not only in the scores of modern masters, but also in the achievements of their forerunners. Before Gluck, the Austrian, gave us "Orfeo ed Euridice," Rameau had written operas of impressive dignity. His "Indes Galantes," his "Hippolyte et Aricie," had established him in France. His "Castor et Pollux" (which was revived in Paris recently) was in its day perhaps the most popular of all then current operas.

Before Rameau, the amazing Couperin family (all organists and writers for the harpsichord and clavecin, in turn) had really founded the French school which later on sought full expression in so many ways. To the Couperins, and more particularly to the second François Couperin, known as "le Grand," we owe a whole musical literature, including songs of rare beauty, lovely and enchanting works for clavecin, simple yet often wonderful organ music. The style of Couperin, to us, may seem archaic. But to musicians of his time it was as modern as Debussy's is to ours. It was distinguished by melodic grace and clearness. Without the resources of the modern orchestra—and in most cases for a single instrument—the "great" Couperin produced small, delicate masterpieces. Not "Tristans" or "Messiahs," to be sure, but very precious; for they were pioneer examples of an art which was destined to take shape at last in the opéra-comiques of Grétry, Hérold, Boiëldieu and Auber; in the operas and lyric dramas of Rameau, Massenet, and Chabrier; in the tone-poems, songs, and ballets of Ravel, and Gabriel Fauré, and Debussy.

It may seem fanciful to link some of the modernists just named with François Couperin. Yet, from the essays of Jean-Aubry, collected and translated into English by Edwin Evans, which make up the volume whose title stands at the head of this review, it appears quite plainly that in considerable measure, François Couperin inspired some of the most complex works of Claude Debussy. The Russians, and especially Moussorgsky, no doubt also largely influenced Debussy in his "Pelléas." And so did Wagner. But, in his piano pieces and his exquisite songs, one sees the influence of Couperin and Rameau. Mr. Jean-Aubry tells us, in an essay on Debussy, that the creator of "La Mer" and "Pelléas" was once an interested listener at the revivals by the St. Gervais singers of the older French composers who preceded Couperin. The very title of his "Hommage à Rameau" is an avowal of the debt he owed that master.

The truth is that, for something like five centuries, there has been a French tradition in the art of music. Couperin and Rameau clung to that tradition. Hérold and Grétry and a dozen more were true to it. While Fauré and Massenet, in different ways, helped to perpetuate it.

To quote a passage from Mr. Jean-Aubry's "The French Foundations of Present Day Keyboard Music," the characteristics of Rameau were the "plasticity of his rhythms, a sense of orderly life, delicacy and care in maintaining the balance of expression." Like Coup-erin before him, and most later French composers, his aim was to attain a musical maximum of expression with a minimum of effort. As the author of "French Music of To-day" with no little justice says, the chief features of French music bear a remarkable correspondence with those of the French mind and temperament.

"First, clearness. Not the external clearness of works which are devoid of thought, like some Italian compositions, but the clearness of the mind that has reflected, and that puts forth in good order the results of its mediation." Next, "the avoidance of all that is redundant; knowledge, without the desire to display it; a horror of pedantry; a taste for pleasantry and for wit."

The French composers of all periods have intuitively shrunk from the German way of mixing up music with metaphysics, philosophy, and literary theories. In the present century they seek variety of expression, atmosphere, picturesqueness, rhythmic beauty. They are sensuous, and on occasion sentimental, vivacious, sweet or ironic, very delicate. They have subtility to a fault, and grace, and piquancy. But above all they have charm, charm, charm.

They could not, if they would, have Wagner's power, or the sensational extravagance of Richard Strauss. Their art is light and fine, discreet, alert, and rarely vulgar. And, as Mr. Jean-Aubry gleefully reminds us in his opening essay, Romain Rolland, after attending a musical festival in Alsace-Lorraine some fifteen years ago, declared that "French art was . . . taking the place of German art." In Germany, since Wagner's day, there has been a tendency to confound grandeur in music with immensity, to prefer quantity in instrumentation to quality, volume of sound to eloquence.

In the great temple of the art divine there is room for many schools. It is mere snobbery to proclaim that we must always thirst for Wagner, Bach, and Beethoven. All who have hearts and ears respect and love those giants. But why should they not also love Debussy, Rameau, d'Indy, Berlioz, Couperin, Bizet, Hérold, and Charpentier?

The French composers of our time may not have touched the heights. Yet they have far outdone their rivals in their own fields. Only Strauss compares (perhaps favorably) with them in ingenuity. None equal them in variety or—though that does not mean much, of course—in art—in zeal and industry. If the Germans and Italians have traditions, which go back to Father Bach, the French have theirs, to which they cling devotedly. And, while the glory of the German school seems to be fading, the future of French music is aglow with hope.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

The Run of the Shelves

Books of the Week

[Selected by Edmund Lester Pearson, Editor of Publications, New York Public Library.]

LETTERS OF TRAVEL. By Rudyard Kipling. Doubleday.

Letters from America and other lands in 1892; from Canada in 1907; from Egypt and the East in 1913.

ALL AND SUNDRY. By E. T. Raymond, author of "Uncensored Celebrities." Holt.

Witty and ironical little essays about Foch, Kipling, the Prince of Wales, Conan Doyle, President Wilson, Chesterton, and others.

THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE. By Colonel S. C. Vestal. Putnam.

Too extensive for casual reading; a careful research by a military writer into the causes that have interrupted peace, how wars have been and may be prevented. The writer thinks that peace is too precious to be sought in vague optimism, too difficult of attainment to be won by pretty phrasemaking.

THE PORT OF NEW YORK. By Thomas E. Rush, Surveyor of the Port. Doubleday.

The romance of the past and the business of to-day in New York Harbor.

AS journalist, critic, and novelist, ex-Premier Clemenceau has had much to say about the Jews. He shows the specialist's knowledge of their habitats and habits from America to Asia, and though his presentation of them is never flattering, the same may be said of his estimate of every other sect or class of humanity concerning which he has emitted his caustic dicta. His "Au Pied du Sinai" (Paris: Georges Cres), though it bears the imprint of this year, is composed of stories and sketches of which all, or the majority, were evidently written long ago. In one of these he speaks of having reached the age of fifty some three years before, and as M. Clemenceau was born in 1841, this bit of work thus appears to date back at least a quarter of a century. The new book is only a belated fellow to the two or three similar volumes which he published a generation ago. But the Tiger always writes well, though always severely, and there is both profit and amusement in the new arrival. The conclusion is keen and just, though perhaps pitched a little high for American readers, who do not think of Semitism as a serious menace. "Reform the Christians who are still masters of the world, and it will not be necessary to exterminate the Jews . . . "

There is sombre power in the sketch of Baron Moses of Goldschlammbach, who went mad with grief because men hated him for gold-grabbing, an instinctive process which he could no more restrain than a bird can help singing, and who wandered the streets begging, promising himself that he would give his millions for the feeding of the hungry if one charitable passer-by would drop a copper into his wretched outstretched hand. There is still more in the rancor of the poor Galician Jew tailor who is forced into the army by the trickery of his wealthy co-religionists, and who comes home to reap a terrible vengeance. There is droll and almost cheerful humor in the tribute to the enterprising son of Jacob who sold the Tiger a two-dollar pair of spectacles for ten dollars, and there is a grotesque abandon, which is not without precedent in the earlier books, in the irreverent anecdote of the old Israelite whose enjoyment of Paradise was spoiled by the apostasy of his son. The Tiger's American admirers who read French will be interested in this whimsical setting forth of certain of his vigorous opinions.

Gossip has been saying for some time that M. Clemenceau was on the point of writing his memoirs. But now that he has returned to Paris from his Egyptian tour and can speak for himself, we learn from a private and most reliable source "qu'il n'est pas dans ses intentions actuelles d'écrire."

The "Open Vision" by Dr. Horatio W. Dresser (Thomas Y. Crowell Company) is a book about relations with the dead. It is also a book about the life of God in the human spirit. Its art lies in the combination of these elements. The occupancy of the human soul by the divine spirit is the highest conception of the highest religions, a conception that may almost be said to attain the grandeur of the superhuman without falling into the cheapness of the miraculous. Spiritism rests on a far lower plane. Communication with the dead merely as the dead is neither high nor low; it is neutral with the same neutrality that attaches to communication with the living. But historically the instrumentalities, human and mechanical, which have furthered the alleged communication have been sordid. Dr. Dresser's object is to clear spiritism of its dross, and to raise it to a level where it can act on equal terms and in close conjunction with the life in God. Accordingly, he throws away the mediums, and what we may call for brevity the media. He has no interest in tables, no faith in experiments. In his scheme for exchanges between the two worlds, spirit is to act upon spirit without the intervention of a medium, and mind is to influence mind without the intervention of the senses.

If these are tactics, they are admirable tactics. In robbing spiritism of half the charms which make it interesting to its disciples, they strip it of half the objections which alienate and irritate its opponents. The question is whether the shift of base is possible. To the vast majority of seekers the agency of mediums seems more effectual than their personal efforts in producing a sense, authentic or illusory, of communication with departed spirits. Moreover, disenchantments await the reader who pauses over the examples of mystic intimations supplied by Dr. Dresser from the storehouse of his personal experience. He is informed of the perilous nearness of a train, of the whereabouts of a missing diamond. It is strange that a divine being who prefers the uniformity of his operations to the safety of Pompeii, San Francisco, or Messina, should think the life of Dr. Dresser or the recovery of a lost jewel a sufficient reason for a breach in that routine. Dr. Dresser's reasoning is systematic, but not powerful, his piety refined but not robust; his style expands discreetly in the calm of a featureless level.

Mr. Theodore Stanton and Mrs. Stanton-Blatch are finishing for Messrs. Harper and Brothers a biography on which they have been engaged for some years—that of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who died in 1902, leaving a mass of documents, letters, and notes bearing on the reform movements which characterized the middle of the last century. This work will be especially interesting for the light which it throws on the whole woman suffrage struggle, for Mrs. Stanton was first in America to make the formal and public demand for "the political enfranchisement of women," as the phrase went in 1848. The history of the long effort, now on the verge of accomplishment, for the securing of woman suffrage by Federal amendment, is given here in a manner in which it has never been presented before.

Mr. George Middleton has published six new one-act plays under the title "Masks" (Holt). That Mr. Middleton is somebody anybody can perceive. The paper jacket, always so affectionate to its own contents, does not strain the truth when it praises the dexterity, the frugality, of his unbending and imperious technique. His art is akin to mathematics. Apart from the soundness of the fabric, his strength lies largely in the hardness, the firmness, the insistence of the individual stroke. Unfortunately for Mr. Middleton, this hardness strikes inward, and the virtue of the technician becomes the limitation and incumbrance of the man. In his plays, every sentence, every phrase, works, but it works under a kind of duress, and the best service is not obtainable from characters and situations in a state of helotage. Donne's famous line, "A bracelet of bright hair about the bone," might suggest the glittering surface and hard core of every one of the half-dozen plays in "Masks."

In "Masks" itself, where Mr. Middleton brings into his own play two imaginary characters from his hero's play, he hardens and cheapens these spectra to the injury of a really good conception. In the "House," he attempts sentiment, and, adroit as he is, gets no closer to real feeling than celluloid gets to ivory. "Jim's Beast" has a novel and happy setting in a museum of palaeontology, but, when the husband reclaims the faltering wife by contrasting her forgetfulness of her children with the maternal tenderness of the fossil brontosaurus, Mr. Middleton lets us see that human beings for him are very close to petrifactions. The "Reason," the sixth play, is strong and vile. As drama it is excellent, but there are a few exceptional infamies in life the recital of which amounts to collusion. Such is Tom Sabine's conduct in this play.

"The attempt to escape from an enemy country," says Mr. Eric A. Keith in "My Escape from Germany" (Century Co.), "viewed as a sport, though its devotees are naturally few and hope to become fewer, has a technique of its own." Mr. Keith ought to know. He got away three times; the first time he was taken by a ruse after he had crossed the border without knowing it; the second try did not take him so far; the third was successful. He is not even a novice at writing of his experience, since before the peace he published an account veiled as to many details for the protection of those he left behind. He is a Briton and a sportsman. His preface discusses the technique of the game, equipment and the like, as if it were like climbing the Matterhorn; a matter of life and death, but not of business. Temperament or schooling enabled him to keep cool throughout the prolonged emergency of his three attempts; the habit made his attempt successful, but it does not make for the success of the book except as a convincing document, for it leaves the tone unemotional, and dulls effects which might legitimately show more color. For this the author's prison life would amply account, and perhaps it is hardly fair to mention it, since the book has thrill enough in its mere situation to satisfy any ordinary reader, so much, in fact, that it is hard to comment on it except in terms of the art of fiction. "The Spy" of Cooper stands as the archetype of situation for sustained thrill, for from the nature of his mission the hero is in danger at every turn of his devious way. His success is to make his friends think him a foe that his foes may believe him a friend; his friends may shoot him if he succeeds, and his foes will surely do so if he fails. Second only to this situation is that of the escaping prisoner in an enemy country. A moment's peace is not so much as a breathing space, for you never know till it is over that it is anything more than a deceptive calm. Not even the assurance of the title that the end shall crown the work can rob any page of its ticklish suspense. You read it in ravenous haste, draw a breath, and go back over the details. Then you lay it aside and think of the flight through the heather in "Kidnapped," Gerard's escape from the tower in "The Cloister and the Hearth," the prison delivery in "St. Ives," and you ponder on the mysterious nature of the true romance.

"Text criticism" has done much for modern scholarship, but the security of its results must evidently rest upon the most scrupulous care in its processes. To base some revolutionary thesis as to authorship or date of a certain text upon the presence in it of a certain number of specific peculiarities, and then to have some more accurate observer prove that your figures are radically wrong, and thus that your thesis is bereft of the very basis on which you chose to set it, is disconcerting, to say the least. This is just what an American Homeric scholar, Professor John A. Scott, of Northwestern University, has been doing with the text critics who have been seeking, since the days of Friedrich August Wolf, to disprove the unity of the Homeric poems, on the ground of irreconcilable differences in their various parts. While it might be unsafe to say that he has finally put the separatist theory out of court, there can be no reasonable denial that he has made wreck of the great mass of alleged textual discrepancies upon which the denial of unity has been so confidently based, and that he has left little ground for claim to authoritative scholarship to a good many who have busied themselves in accumulating such "discrepancies." In the March number of the Classical Journal, Professor Scott tells in a very interesting way how years of study of the Homeric text have brought him over from his early acceptance of the destructive theory to a firm belief that the Iliad and Odyssey are the work of one great poetic genius, Homer, and that we have them essentially as he left them, without expansion, contraction, or expurgation. "Schliemann defied the authority of higher criticism and found Troy; the scholars of to-day are again defying that authority and are finding Homer."

Drama

Barrie, Galsworthy, and Others

IN my last letter I complained of the dearth of plays worth writing about; to-day I have more material than I know what to do with. In the last few weeks we have had a sudden rise in the quality of the work presented, synchronizing with a rather less sudden fall in the popularity of the theatre as a whole. I do not think that there is any relation of cause and effect between these phenomena. It was pure chance that led Mr. Galsworthy and Sir James Barrie to break their long silence on two consecutive evenings; and the slump in receipts, far from resulting from this rise in literary values, had set in weeks, if not months, before it. The truth simply is that the war fever which kept the theatres full whatever rubbish they presented, if only it was rubbishy enough, has at last subsided, and that its subsidence has encouraged serious playwrights to creep out of their shells. Perhaps they may suffer temporarily from the general cooling-off of the public craze for the theatre; but the ultimate effect of the slackening of an unhealthy and uncritical craving for "shows" of every class can not but be good in the main. If this state of things continues, the demand for theatres will decline, rents will fall to a reasonable level, and good plays will no longer have to be taken off merely because they do not absolutely fill the house every night in the week.

Sir James Barrie's "Mary Rose" is not a play which gives me, personally, very much pleasure. When we wander beyond the confines of reality, I think it should be in search either of sheer delightfulness (as in "A Midsummer Night's Dream"), or of some symbolic or phantasmagoric message (as in "Faust" or "Peer Gynt"). Now there are many delightful details in "Mary Rose," but its fable is in essence profoundly pessimistic, with a pessimism which is not serious, but, so to speak, capricious. If Sir James Barrie really meant to tell us that life was at the mercy of occult malevolences, such as those which shape the destiny of his heroine, I should hear him with respect, if not with agreement. But I do not think he means the only message which can rationally be extracted from his story. He tells it simply to give us pleasure of a pathetic, a semi-tragic, order; and somehow or other I can not take pleasure in such a fantasy. If people in general like to exercise their imagination on these lines, then Sir James is right and I am wrong; for there is certainly nothing unworthy or unbeautiful about the play.

What we are asked to conceive is this: An ordinary couple of well-to-do English people, resident in Sussex, and differing from their neighbors only in a little extra amiability, go to the Hebrides one summer with their thirteen-year-old daughter, Mary Rose. The father, an enthusiastic fisherman, is in the habit of taking the girl to an islet, only a stone's throw from the coast; and one day, while his back is turned for a moment, she vanishes away. After searching every possible nook and cranny of the islet, the heartbroken parents naturally give her up for lost; but behold! after a month, she turns up again on the very spot where she disappeared, and without the smallest knowledge that anything unusual has happened to her. Then she grows up into a marriageable maiden, rather child-like for her years, but otherwise apparently normal. The uncanny incident in her past has been sedulously concealed from her; but when a young naval officer proposes for her hand, her parents quite honorably tell him the story. With the intrepidity of his caste, he marries her, and they have a son; and then, carrying intrepidity to the point of foolhardiness, he must needs take her to the Hebrides, and picnic on the mystic islet. He turns his back for a moment, to stamp out the fire they have lit, when suddenly a burst of wild music is heard (inaudible to the lieutenant) and Mary Rose walks off as if in a state of somnambulism, and is lost to mortal ken. This time her eclipse lasts for twenty-five years, at the end of which she returns to her Sussex home, as young as ever, and very much pained to find her parents quite old and her husband middle-aged. Her son she does not find, for the young scapegrace has run away from home and gone to Australia. Apparently —for details are denied us—she dies of chronic anachronism, a distressing, but fortunately rare, disease. But her woeful weird pursues her beyond the grave. She disappears only too easily in life, but she can not disappear in death. Her ghost haunts the Sussex manor-house, sadly depreciating its value; until at last her runaway son arrives, in the person of an Australian soldier. Then one would have thought that her perturbed spirit might have found rest; but Sir James Barrie will have nothing to do with such facile optimism. She is as incurably anachronistic in the spirit as in the flesh, and declines to recognize her child in this strapping Anzac. What occurs at the very end is not quite clear, but I hope, and almost venture to believe, that she permanently disappears into the Celtic Twilight from which she originally emerged. But how she came to be born of ordinary English parents in the County of the South Saxons remains a harassing mystery. If her forbears had been second-sighted Gaels we could have understood it better.

Turning to Mr. Galsworthy's play, "The Skin Game," we find ourselves on solid English earth again. There are no "harps in the air," no vanishing ladies, no semi-malignant ghosts. (I forgot to mention that, if I rightly understood the matter, the ghost of Mary Rose came within an ace of doing grievous bodily injury to her son.) "The Skin Game," an inelegant expression wholly unfamiliar to me, is understood to be roughly equivalent to "War to the Knife." The combatants are representatives of two classes, the static squirearchy and the dynamic plutocracy or mechanarchy. Mr. Hornblower, a rather aggressive member of the latter class, comes to settle in the immediate neighborhood of the ancestral "place" of the Hillcrist family. Their relations might have been amicable enough but for the fact that Mrs. Hillcrist is of a masterful, opinionated, and decidedly "stuck-up" character. She offensively closes her doors against the Hornblower family, with the result that Mr. Hornblower threatens to buy a piece of land within three hundred yards of the Hillcrist mansion, and to erect a factory upon it. The land is put up to auction, the Hillcrists strain every nerve to secure it, but Hornblower defeats them by a rather mean trick. Meanwhile Mrs. Hillcrist has learnt a secret about Hornblower's daughter-in-law (his wife is dead) which, if revealed, will not only destroy the happiness of the Hornblower household, but drive them from the district. Against the will of her rather ineffectual husband, she uses this knowledge to terrorize Hornblower into re-selling the plot of land. It is intended that the secret shall be disclosed to Hornblower alone; but it inevitably leaks out and becomes common property, to the total discomfiture and misery of the Hornblower clan. The squirearchy is thus victorious, but at the cost of its self-respect; and the moral seems to be that class warfare is embittered by a deficiency on both sides of what Matthew Arnold used to call "epieikeia or sweet-reasonableness."

Moral or no moral, the drama is a very strong one. Many of the scenes—notably that of the auction—are breathless in their tension. Some critics disparage it as melodramatic, but they are surely wrong. The play represents the clash of character with character, and the fact that the clash happens to be a violent one does not detract from its artistic quality. I have been a little afraid of late years that Mr. Galsworthy was losing his grip of the stage; but it has never been stronger than in "The Skin Game."

The same week which brought Mr. Galsworthy and Sir James Barrie to the front witnessed the production of another noteworthy play, "The Grain of Mustard-Seed," by Mr. H. M. Harwood. This is a really thoughtful and witty political comedy, the best thing of its kind since Mr. Granville Barker's "Waste." We see how a self-made man and a political idealist, who has elaborated a very important housing scheme, is at first welcomed by the Government, and then summarily "turned down" when he declines to emasculate his scheme out of respect to inveterate prejudices and vested interests. The portrait of Lord Henry Markham, M.P., the cynical party wire-puller, is admirable and apposite. Indeed the play, though it wore the colors of no party, abounded in lines which were intimately applicable to the present situation. It was much less satisfactory on its sentimental than on its political side. The middle-aged idealist, the millionaire proprietor of a patent food, was made to fall in love with a wisp of a girl, a daughter of the governing classes, supposed to be a representative of post-war pessimism, cynicism, and moral laxity—in fact, a thoroughly bad lot. I feared at one time that the ennobling influence of "Pongo" (the patent food) was going to effect a change of heart in this worthless young person, and that all was going to end happily. Mr. Harwood, however, spared us this extreme of conventional optimism. He left his hero speechlessly flabbergasted by the revelation of his lady-love's moral obliquity. But the whole idea of this love-interest was merely theatrical. The pure-hearted man of the people marries in his own class and does not go a-gadding after corrupt slips of aristocracy.

That Mr. Harwood's heroine is not really, or at any rate not characteristically, a post-war type, may be gathered from the fact that she is very nearly duplicated by the heroine of a comedy by Mr. H. V. Esmond, "Birds of a Feather," which was written several years ago, though produced only the other day. This is a play of really high dramatic quality; but its intellectual and moral standpoint is that of about twenty years ago—whence, no doubt, its lack of success.

Miss Gertrude Jennings, authoress of the very successful "Young Person in Pink," has followed it up with another three-act play, "Husbands for All," which is much less happily inspired. Miss Jennings takes us forward to the year 1925, and imagines that an autocratic Director of Reconstruction has hit upon the plan of correcting the shortage of males by legalizing "lateral marriages," or, in plain language, bigamy. Not only are such marriages declared legal, but every husband who has fewer than seven children is compelled, on pain of imprisonment in Dartmoor as a conscientious objector, to contract a "lateral" union. Miss Jennings' gift of bright dialogue enables her to make this skit fairly entertaining; but her inventive and constructive powers are, unfortunately, by no means on a level with her wit.

The Shakespeare Festival at Stratford this year has been noteworthy, not so much for exceptionally good acting, as for the success with which the producer, Mr. Bridges Adams, has solved the problem of combining the advantages of the non-scenic Elizabethan platform with those of the modern pictorial stage. By the skillful employment of movable columns, Mr. Adams secures what is practically an expanding and contracting proscenium, by aid of which he can change his scenery, or perhaps one should say indicate changes of scene, without any appreciable loss of time. He suggests the environment of the action without building up realistic stage-pictures; and that this is the true principle of Shakespearean mounting there can be little doubt. Successful experiments in the same direction have been made at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre, and (with a touch of regrettable eccentricity) by Mr. Nigel Playfair at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith. The abolition of the long waits necessitated by the changing of heavy "sets" of the old Lyceum school is a most valuable reform. Much more questionable is the use that is being made of this new facility. The craze of the moment is for what I have ventured to call "holus-bolus Shakespeare"—revivals in which no single word, however obsolete, however incomprehensible, however manifestly corrupt, shall on any account be omitted. That, at all events, is the ideal; but some of the longer plays, such as "Hamlet," "Richard III," "Cymbeline" and "Coriolanus," can not even be galloped through within the limits of a modern theatrical evening. Mr. Bridges Adams gave us three hours and three-quarters of "Hamlet"—far too much for the endurance of any ordinary audience—yet even to this end he had to make considerable cuts. His "Cymbeline," from which he cut something like 500 lines, lasted three hours and fifteen minutes. At Birmingham they raced through "Othello," minus some 60 lines, in three hours; but the play was recited rather than acted, and, furthermore, recited with extreme verbal inaccuracy. It need scarcely be said that our latter-day purists will not spare us any of the obscene and otherwise obsolete expressions which are far less offensive in Shakespeare than in his contemporaries, but are nevertheless disagreeably frequent in some of his plays. The whole movement is one of extravagant re-action from Irving-Tree-Daly methods of reckless mutilation. Common sense will presently re-assert itself, and it will be recognized that Shakespeare is to be honored in the spirit and not in the letter. Since we know that Elizabethan performances seldom exceeded two hours and a half, we are bound to conclude that in his longer plays he wrote a good deal that he did not intend to be spoken. But even if all his plays could, without gabbling, be performed within a reasonable limit of time, it would remain mere folly to speak passages which the lapse of centuries has deprived of all their savor, and even rendered absolutely incomprehensible. It is not only inartistic and absurd, but positively immoral, to force actors to speak and pretend to understand lines which, even if not corrupt, are the battle-ground of the commentators, and have no vital meaning for any human creature.

William Archer

London, May 6

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

University Training for Business

ALTHOUGH nearly all the universities of the United States now have departments, schools or colleges of commerce or business administration, there still seems to be something incongruous in this alliance of the university with the business world. Possibly this is because the movement is so recent—the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania was founded in 1880 and the School of Commerce of New York University in 1900—but more probably it is because of the mediæval origin of the university as a corporation or guild of masters and scholars chiefly interested in theological studies and organized for mutual protection against unfriendly townsmen. Of course, they were always willing, as now, to receive doles from charitable citizens, but the thought of making other than spiritual return never entered their mind.

But it was not long until the scope of university activities widened to include medical and legal studies, as well as philosophy or the liberal arts, until in most universities the four traditional faculties were established for the training of clerics, physicians, lawyers, and teachers. After this the universities ceased to give birth to new faculties; and even the universities of America, which were built on European models, long held aloof from a number of occupations which were becoming learned professions in all but the name.

Truly sensible people, who are, to be sure, few in number, do not care a fig whether their occupation be called a trade or a profession, but in point of fact a learned profession has certain marks or characteristics which distinguish it rather clearly from a typical trade, and give it a claim to special consideration from the university. The chief of these is the scientific basis of the occupation—an organized body of knowledge of sufficient volume to justify a mature person's spending some years in the study of it before entering fully into the activities of his career. From this point of view the list of learned professions should probably be extended to include literature and the fine arts, military and naval science, engineering, scientific agriculture, dentistry, pharmacy, journalism—and business. Of course, it is possible to write without literary training, to fight without military science, to farm without being an agriculturist, to pull teeth without being a dentist, to sell goods without being a business man. Genius and folly know no rules, but ordinary men require years of study and experience for the mastery of any really learned profession.

Some successful business men question the validity of this argument, and insist that cadets should enter business at an early age and grow up with it, gaining experience and picking up what theory they may need as they go along. Do not such conservatives overlook, among other important considerations, their own unusual ability, the fact that pioneer days are almost over, the rapid changes that are going on in business, and the new type of business man that is coming into the field? Apprenticeship, it is true, is the old and tried method of training—tried and found wanting. Formerly all the learned professions were recruited in this way; the aspirant to holy orders began as a novice, servant to the elder clerics; the budding lawyer swept the floor in a law office; the young medico mixed pills for some physician or was apprenticed to a surgeon. After a time, as the volume of knowledge increased, it was found that broader and sounder instruction could be obtained in the schools, and to them the most enterprising students flocked, leaving their belated brethren to learn a weird mixture of truth and error in the service of quacks and pettifoggers.

For all that, we still find a few physicians, lawyers, clergymen, and teachers who dislike the schools, and some business men who hold that nothing worth while about business can be taught in the university. Such distrust of learning reminds one of the quaint Greek skeptic whose philosophy was summed up in the formula "Nothing is; if anything is it can not be known; if it can be known it can not be taught." Pos-

(Continued on page 636)

To understand and discuss intelligently this vital question you, as an American citizen and voter, should read

THE

PEACE CONFERENCE DAY-BY-DAY

A Presidential Pilgrimage
Leading to the Discovery of Europe

By CHARLES T. THOMPSON
Superintendent of the Associated Press Foreign Service

With an Introductory Letter By
COL. E. M. HOUSE

It is a day-by-day chronicle of just what occurred, with all the sidelights; what the leading figures in that memorable assemblage said and did; the fine play of intrigue and statesmanship; the dramatic incidents; the secret conclaves and understandings; the rise and fall of the Fourteen Points; the shattering of high ideals; the battle of Covenant versus Alliance; the struggle for the Spoils of War; the matching of wits between Europe and America in the greatest diplomatic game of all time. It is the truth at last.

At all bookstores $2.50, postage extra

Publishers BRENTANO'S 5th Ave. & 27th St. NEW YORK

is unaffected by superheated steam and cannot rust. These qualities alone give it a wide use in all industries. Besides this it resists alkalies and most acids and is tough and ductile.

The name Monel is given to a line of metal products produced by The International Nickel Company from a natural alloy 67% nickel, 28% copper and 5% other metals. These products include Monel blocks, Monel rods, Monel castings, Monel sheet, Monel wire, Monel strip stock, etc.

Our Technical Department is at your service.

THE INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY
43 Exchange Place, New York

The International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited
Toronto, Ontario

(Continued from page 635)
sibly we should complete the chain of sophistry by adding a fourth proposition to the effect that, if anything can be taught, it can not be applied in actual practice.

The fact is that the stock of knowledge that has been accumulated by generations of business men has not died with them, but has been recorded in books, magazines, reports, and other forms, and is now so great that no business man can keep up with it. Indeed, the demands of business are so exacting that many business men, immersed in affairs, can scarcely find time to read the daily papers and glance through the trade journals, while the economic and financial periodicals are quite neglected, and of the numerous books and reports treating of important phases of business economics they do not even know the names. Apart from the disheartening lack of time, one trouble is that they do not know what to read; another, that they have not formed habits of study; a third, that they lack the stimulus of class discussion and the guidance of competent teachers. No doubt, capable and determined men can overcome all these obstacles, but the way of self-education is hard, and those who have not had preliminary professional schooling are severely handicapped. The school-trained men may have more theory than practice; but the theorist will soon gain practical experience, while the mere practitioner can seldom, if ever, pick up all the theory that he needs.

The logic of the situation has, in fact, forced the universities to make provision for the new disciplines, and has compelled all but the most conservative business man to admit that the coming generation of business executives—if not those in subordinate positions—should have a schooling in business principles and methods such as they themselves did not and could not obtain. The only serious obstacle in the way of carrying out plans for the higher education of business men is the difficulty of obtaining competent teachers. But this obstacle is by no means insuperable. The trouble is due to the poverty of the university rather than to any inherent impossibility of teaching the mysteries of business. All professional schools have been confronted with the same problem, but the best of them have long since solved it, partly by finding practitioners who can give a portion of their time to the schools, partly by inducing experienced men to retire from practice and give the whole of their time to the work of teaching. Besides, the best universities already have competent teachers of commercial geography, economics, money and banking, corporation finance, transportation, accounting, business law, statistics, insurance, and other standard courses, and it is only for the more practical subjects, such as business organization and management, that it is difficult to arrange.

Educational movements such as this are of the greatest significance as indicating a spirit of co-operation and mutual appreciation between the universities and business men that should result in great good for both parties. The standards of business efficiency and ethics should be raised by the influence of university ideals, and academic ways of thought and action should derive benefit from contact with the practical affairs of business life. The one danger to be feared is the growth of a tendency to regard the practical and tangible results at which the business education so largely aims as setting a standard to which university study as a whole should conform. But the right way to guard against that danger is not to refuse recognition of the part the university may play in business education, but to maintain in full vigor and authority those higher intellectual functions which must, in the future as in the past, be the heart and centre of the university's life.

THERE is a kind of squinting optimism in the "talks to students and graduates" which President Hadley has brought together under the title of "The Moral Basis of Democracy" (Yale University Press). "I wish I could think," he says, "that the world to-day is as sound of head as it is right of heart." No doubt, he adds, people are more ready to-day than ever before to think about their conduct and its consequences; but still the complexity of life has outstript the growth of thought, so that the need is to raise our intelligence up to an equality with our goodness of heart. So it is that all through these talks President Hadley stresses the need of taking thought in the political and social problems that must confront the college man when he goes out into the world. That, he believes, is the true messages of the Gospel, that men should not only desire to do right but should reflect more earnestly upon what is right. Ah, well-a-day! It is pleasant to know that our hearts are in the right place, that we are no longer greedy and selfish and overbearing and belligerent by nature; it is wholesome doctrine to tell us to take better heed of our acts in our universal desire to serve the world. Yet two things we seem to miss in these eminently useful and uplifting discourses. We should like now and then to hear a word addressed to those who still are conscious of the old Adam of unrighteousness in the heart, and we should like also a plain statement now and then that education is a good thing in itself, in the joys and consolations it may bring, with no thought of serving the world. This "service," it is a noble idea. But somehow, hearing it so frequently, we can not forget the idle story of that land where everybody prospered by taking in everybody else's washing. Something like this must have occurred to Epictetus when, in his humble school at Nicopolis, he had this conversation with a student anxious to forget himself in service:

> "But my country," says he, "will lack assistance, so far as lies in me."
>
> Once more I ask, What assistance do you mean? It will not owe colonnades or baths to you. What of that? It does not owe shoes to the blacksmith or arms to the shoemaker; it is sufficient if each man fulfills his own function. Would you do it no good if you secured to it another faithful and self-respecting citizen?
>
> "Yes."
>
> Well, then, you would not be useless to it.
>
> "What place then shall I have in the city?"
>
> Whatever place you can hold while you keep your character for honor and self-respect. But if you are going to lose these qualities in trying to benefit your city, what benefit, I ask, would you have done her when you attain to the perfection of being lost to shame and honor?

LATIN scholarship was caught by the war in the middle stage of one of its most laborious and important modern enterprises, the preparation and publication of the "Thesaurus Linguæ Latinæ." The material had been assorted and arranged in due order, many scholars were at work upon their assigned portions, and publication had reached about the middle of the fifth volume. As the work was being done in Germany, under the auspices of the five learned Academies of Berlin, Göttingen, Leipsic, Munich, and Vienna, the stress of war soon brought it virtually to a standstill, through inroads on its editorial staff, scarcity of printing materials, and disarrangement of its finances. One fascicle, the sixth of Volume V, was printed in 1915, and has just reached American subscribers. At the same time comes word that the undertaking is in serious financial distress, and an effort is now in progress among American philologists to raise a fund sufficient to avoid immediate disaster. Is it not possible to find in America a more radical and profitable method of relief? The work is of importance not merely to a small group of Latinists, but to every

THE BRICK ROW BOOK SHOP, INC. of New Haven
Announces the opening of its NEW YORK BOOK ROOMS at 19 EAST 47th STREET
Opposite the Ritz-Carlton
Visitors will find here good books, old and new, in unusually attractive surroundings.

branch of learning connected with Latin, either directly or indirectly. Some speedy means of carrying it to completion ought to be found—speedy, of course, as is consistent with its own standard of thoroughness and scholarship. We have in this country, at Washington, an institution which, according to the declared purpose of its founder, "shall in the broadest and most liberal manner encourage investigation, research, and discovery." It would be an admirable illustration of that breadth and liberality which stands at the head of their donor's deed of trust for the Trustees of the Carnegie Institution to tender to the management of the "Thesaurus" a grant sufficient to permit a complete reorganization of their editorial staff, and assure publication as rapidly as the matter can be put in shape. A number of American scholars were engaged in this work at the outbreak of the war, and a still greater number could easily be enlisted, if funds were available.

The Reconstruction of France through Agriculture

FRANCE has always been essentially an agricultural country. At the present time, about half her population is rural. She has few great industrial or commercial cities, but many villages. From this point of view, the appearance of France has changed but little since the Middle Ages. The great alterations of the nineteenth century, which transformed the conditions of economic life, did not affect our country to a degree comparable to that seen elsewhere. Yet few countries have undergone, in the course of ages, crises so grave as those through which France has passed. And few have known how more rapidly to heal their wounds; this is owing especially to the richness of her soil, the evenness of her climate, and the persistent industry of her peasant population. A class destined by its very nature to feel most disagreeably the weight of wars, foreign or civil, the class from which are recruited the hardiest soldiers, the rural population has paid a heavy tribute in the recent war. Statistics show that of our 1,500,000 dead, the peasants have furnished 55 per cent., industrial laborers 18 per cent., clerks, merchants, and professional men 27 per cent. And if the war has ruined certain of our most prosperous industrial cities, it has likewise devastated those of our provinces most advanced in agriculture and furnishing our finest harvests of cereals and sugar beets.

Our supply of cattle has been reduced

(Continued on page 638)

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY
THE IDEA OF MR. JAMES LOEB

A Modern Library of Classical Greek and Latin Texts, with Parallel English Translations

Edited by E. Capps, Ph. D., LL. D.; T. E. Page, Litt. D., and W. H. D. Rouse, Litt. D.

The Publishers of this Notable Undertaking Announce the completion of the

One Hundredth Volume

in the series.

The Loeb Classical Library brings the beauty, learning, philosophy and wit of the great writers of ancient Greece and Rome within the understanding of the average reader. These translations are real pieces of literature—not dull, uninteresting echoes of ideas that suggest in every line the existence of a finer original.

Masterpieces of Latin and Greek Literature Translated into Vivid and Inspiring English by Noted English and American Authorities Chosen Especially for this Work. The Original Greek and Latin Texts Accompany the Translations.

- Will cover the literature of Five Centuries.
- Every important Public Library must have this set.
- Every University and College Library must possess it.
- It should be on the shelves of every person of education and cultivation who pretends to have a library.
- Sold either in separate volumes or as a set.
- Subscriptions received for forthcoming volumes.
- Full descriptive circular or any other information on application to the publisher or to any bookseller.

The following authors are now either entirely or in part ready:

Latin Authors

Apuleius: The Golden Ass.
Augustine: Confessions of St. Augustine. 2 vols.
Ausonius. 2 vols.
Boethius: Tracts and De Consolatione Philosophiae.
Caesar: Civil Wars.
Caesar: The Gallic War.
Catullus, Tibullus, and Pervigilium Veneris.
Cicero: De Finibus.
Cicero: De Officiis.
Cicero: Letters to Atticus. 3 vols.
Cronto. 2 vols.
Horace: Odes and Epodes.
Juvenal and Persius.
Livy. 13 vols.
Martial. 2 vols.
Ovid: Heroides and Amores.
Ovid: Metamorphoses. 2 vols.
Petronius. Seneca: Apocolocyntosis.
Plautus. 4 vols.
Pliny: Letters. 2 vols.
Propertius.
Seneca: Tragedies. 2 vols.
Seneca: Epistulae Morales. 3 Vols.
Suetonius. 2 vols.
Tacitus: Dialogus. Agricola and Germania.
Terence. 2 vols.
Virgil. 2 vols.

Greek Authors

Achilles Tatius.
Aeschines.
Apollonius Rhodius.
The Apostolic Fathers. 2 vols
Appian's Roman History. 4 vols.
Clement of Alexandria.
Daphnis and Chloe. Parthenius.
Dio Cassius: Roman History. 9 vols.
Euripides. 4 vols.
Galen: On the Natural Faculties.
The Greek Anthology. 5 vols.
The Greek Bucolic Poets: Theocritus, Bion and Moschus.
Hesiod and the Homeric Hymns.
Homer: Odyssey. 2 vols.
Julian. 3 vols.
Lucian. 8 vols.
Marcus Aurelius.
Pausanias: Description of Greece. 5 vols.
Philostratus: The Life of Apollonius of Tyana. 2 vols.
Pindar.
Plato.
Plutarch: The Parallel Lives. 11 vols.
Procopius: History of the Wars. 6 vols.
Quintus Smyrnaeus.
Sophocles. 2 vols.
St. John Damascene: Barlaam and Ioasaph.
Strabo: Geography. 8 vols.
Theophrastus. 2 vols.
Thucydides. 4 vols.
Xenophon: Cyropaedia. 2 vols.
Xenophon: Hellenica, Anabasis and Symposium. 3 vols.

Cloth, $2.25 per volume. Leather, $3.00 per volume.

New York, 2 West 45th Street, Just West of 5th Ave.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
London, 24 Bedford Street, Strand

(Continued from page 637)
no less by requisitions, by destruction due to the invader, and by the necessity of feeding immense armies. Finally, the threat of failure in the bread supply, the basis of French alimentation, led the Government to adopt a wheat policy the fatal consequences of which we now appreciate. The principle having been asserted that it was necessary, by every means, to avoid increasing the price of bread, this price has been kept far below the cost of production, the state making good the difference. The fixing of the price of wheat has been managed in such a way that a paradoxical situation has been reached in which the raising of wheat is less profitable than that of oats, rye, or barley. Hence, there is a decrease in acreage sown to wheat, the peasant finding it more advantageous to devote himself to other crops.

To so many causes of impoverishment may be added the devastation of our forests, sacrificed to the demands of the national defense, or scientifically destroyed by the enemy, or, finally, annihilated by the rage of battle.

In consequence of the war, then, French agriculture finds itself obliged to face a crisis of unprecedented gravity. With a greatly reduced supply of manual labor, with ten departments ruined for long years to come, its problem is to produce at least as much as before 1914—even more, if the country would free itself in some degree from the heavy tribute which it must pay to the outsider in consequence of the importation of commodities indispensable to its life.

Still further, the entire year 1919 was marked by evidences of anxiety, on the part both of the Government and of individuals, concerning the farmers. This was rather unusual, the foremost thought being, heretofore, to satisfy the demands of the laborers, strongly organized in their unions, rather than those of the peasants, isolated on their farms. Nor were political considerations foreign to this granting of attention to the Socialistic proletariat, rather than to the conservative mass of the rural districts.

And yet, immediately after the victory, everyone turned to him whom journalists and politicians emulously proclaimed to be the savior of the country—doubly its savior through the blood shed in such abundance, and the labor carried on at the rear by that part of the rural population which was left, the women, old men, and children. The battle for the peasant, one writer has called it. Political parties, the sacred union once broken, have turned towards this great force, which does not know its own power, to win it to them. Economists and historians have recalled that on the morrow of our worst disasters, it was agriculture that restored a condition of equilibrium. It would be difficult to construct a bibliography of all that has been written on this subject during the past fifteen months, articles in the newspapers and reviews, and books of scientific or sentimental trend.

At so much praise, more or less disinterested, the peasant was at first amazed; but with his practical spirit, he took advantage of the situation on occasion of the legislative elections of November, 1919. It was especially the rural vote that brought into the Chamber of Deputies so many new men, of moderate tendencies, who gave to the Assembly a conservative tone which it had not manifested since the National Assembly elected at the close of the war of 1870-1871. This, however, is only one side of the question, the political. The economic side is less easily resolved. It is an easy matter to say, Produce, produce in abundance! But there must be the means with which to produce. The soil, kept in order as well as possible during the war, needs to be fertilized in order to get back its productive capacity. Worn out agricultural machinery must be replaced. But the crisis in the transportation system impedes all efforts. Even if the factories of France and of foreign lands could supply the demand (and such is far from being the case), the railways are not in condition to assure the arrival of the fertilizers, the machinery, and the necessary fuel for the motors. Phosphates, for example, are found in abundance in the North of France, in Belgium, and especially in Tunisia. There are few or no cars from the first, few or no vessels from the second. Potash, of which recovered Alsace could furnish us a considerable quantity, remains in heaps at the mouth of the mines. On the first of April, 1920, the Minister of Agriculture said, in reply to a question put by a deputy, that 250,000 tons of potash fertilizers were ready for shipment, but that the difficulty of transportation would permit of the delivery of only 1,000 tons per day. And so the mines are accepting no more orders.

As for agricultural machinery, an effort has been made to produce it in quantity, both by factories long specialized for that purpose, and by transformed munitions factories; here again, the lack of coal, and strikes, have delayed production. As to foreign-made machinery, English, Canadian, or American, the cost of carriage raises the price to a point almost out of reach, and that which comes to our crowded ports remains upon the docks, for lack of cars to take it away.

But in spite of so many unfavorable conditions, no one thinks of giving up in despair, and the work in the fields goes on, the French peasant having an incalculable fund of "stick-to-itiveness," and of attachment to the soil. It is, indeed, one of the characteristic traits of his temperament, noted by all observers. He loves the soil, and ardently devotes himself to its conquest. After each great social upheaval, he is the beneficiary of the troubled situation in which the nation finds itself. Thus, after the religious wars of the sixteenth century, and the liquidation of a part of the property belonging to the abbeys, the peasant had his share. His share was still more important, we may believe, on occasion of the sale of national properties at the time of the Revolution. Finally, the army just mustered out has seen the small holding almost entirely cleared of mortgage indebtedness, and still further, the purchase by the peasant of lands given up by their owners, desirous of realizing money with which to meet the increasing cost of living.

The farmer has acquired, then, in small purchases, that which in other times constituted vast domains; the reverse of the medal is that the property is cut up into very small bits, and that this division is further increased by our legislation, and by the necessity of partitionings after the death of owners. This constitutes an obstacle, and not among the least, to putting the soil in condition to yield a reasonable economic return. Some think of remedying the situation by a reversal of this process

(Continued on page 640)

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street
Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.

NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President
F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
H. W. Shaw
J. A. Flynn
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten
Assistant Secretaries
E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mrs. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell..........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

A National Investment Service

THROUGH the aid and co-operation of our correspondents we are enabled to offer an investment service national in scope.

We have the privilege of being connected by private wires with the following well known firms having offices in various cities:

Adams, Merrill & Co. Hartford, Conn.
Alden, Bernie & Co., Inc. Springfield, Mass.
Lorenzo E. Anderson & Co. St. Louis, Mo.
Anderson & Powell Cincinnati, Ohio
Allen Arnold & Co. Boston, Mass.
Ball & Co. New London, Conn.
Beazell & Chatfield Cincinnati, Ohio; Dayton, Ohio
Cassatt & Co. Philadelphia, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; New York, N. Y.
Clark, Griffith & McWain Boston, Mass.
Hugh J. Dimond & Co. Boston, Mass.
Downer & Co. Boston, Mass.
John L. Edwards & Co. Washington, D. C.
T. F. Gagen & Co. Boston, Mass.
R. Glendinning & Co. Philadelphia, Pa.
Goodwin-Beach & Co. Hartford, Conn.; New Britain, Conn.
E. M. Hamlin & Co. Boston, Mass.
Hincks Bros. & Co. Bridgeport, Conn.
Chandler Hovey & Co. Boston, Mass.
Hulburd, Warren & Chandler Chicago, Ill.; Battle Creek, Mich.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Kalamazoo, Mich.; Lansing, Mich.
W. W. Lanahan & Co. Baltimore, Md.
Learoyd, Foster & Co. Boston, Mass.
Long & Nash Boston, Mass.
N. A. MacDonald & Co., Inc. Buffalo, N. Y.
A. E. Masten & Co. Pittsburgh, Pa.; Wheeling, W. Va.
Moorhead & Elmore Washington, D. C.
Morris, Brown & Co. Pittsburgh, Pa.
Naphen & Co. Boston, Mass.; New York, N. Y.
O'Brien & Williams Montreal, Canada; Ottawa, Canada
Otis & Co. Cleveland, Ohio; Cincinnati, Ohio; Akron, Ohio; Columbus, Ohio; Youngstown, Ohio; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Denver, Colo.; Boston, Mass.; Detroit, Mich.
S. B. Pearmain Boston, Mass.
Chas. A. Phelan & Co. Boston, Mass.
Proctor, Cook & Co. Boston, Mass.
F. A. Schirmer & Co. Boston, Mass.
Secor, Bell & Beckwith Toledo, Ohio
J. W. Sparks & Co. Philadelphia, Pa.; New York, N. Y.
Stevenson & Co. New Haven, Conn.
H. C. Wainwright & Co. Boston, Mass.
Whitney & Elwell Boston, Mass.

Through this association, clients receive prompt and accurate investment service in the securities of governments, municipalities, railroads, public utilities and industrial corporations.

HORNBLOWER & WEEKS

Investment Securities

Founded in 1888

BOSTON, PORTLAND, PROVIDENCE — NEW YORK, CHICAGO, DETROIT

Members of the New York, Boston and Chicago Stock Exchanges

(Continued from page 638)

of dismemberment, that is to say, by a series of exchanges and compromises which would reëstablish, upon a more logical basis, the division of the totality of our land. But a reform of this nature, even if it appeared theoretically attractive, would surely arouse a resistance which sociologists or legislators do not suspect.

This minute division of landed property is a hindrance, also, to the development of cultivation by the use of the motor, which, to tell the truth, has not yet fulfilled the hopes founded upon it. The motor-driven machines in agricultural use, of French or foreign make, do not give complete satisfaction. Built in general with a view to cultivation on a large scale, which is exceptional in our country, expensive and too complicated to be easily kept in repair, they have not yet really gained their right of citizenship. It is incontestable, however, that in them is to be found the solution for the crisis in the labor supply. Furthermore, there are serious efforts to construct models better adapted to the specific conditions of our country, more economical of fuel than the American models, and also more durable; for in France one does not like to change too often a utensil with which one is familiar. Along with this feeling, a propaganda is taking form in the rural districts, distrustful of novelties in general, and attached to traditional methods. Yet in 1919 and 1920, expositions of motor cultivation have been numerous, and have been followed attentively by the most progressive element among our farmers.

But there is another movement, preeminently social, which has manifested itself with such spontaneity, and so generally over the entire territory of France, that it is important to set it forth in clear relief. It is the extension of agricultural syndicates. These have had a legal existence since 1884, and in some regions have been considerably developed. The lessons of the war have here brought forth their fruit. The vital necessity of coöperation has been apparent to all, especially to those who have been in the armies. The successes secured by the revolutionary workingmen's syndicates have led the peasants, essentially enemies of revolution, since it threatens the right of property, to group themselves together, in turn. Where syndicates were already in existence, they have seen new adherents coming to them en masse; where there was none, they have been created.

The agricultural syndicate has this peculiarity, that it is neither exclusively of workmen, nor exclusively of employers, but a mixture of the two. It is generally non-political. It exerts itself to put its members in direct connection with producers, for the purchase of supplies, or farming utensils. Again, it fills an educational function in diffusing modern methods and in studying technical questions too difficult for the mass of farmers. It creates mutual credit companies, and mutual insurance companies to protect its members against losses by the death of cattle, and by fire. A network of this kind is beginning to spread itself over all France. If these attempts were to remain isolated, their future would be hazardous. These groupings by professions strike at too many interests not to encounter opposition. It was necessary, therefore, to federate these syndicates. In 1919, two great organisms appeared, the General Confederation of Farmers, and the National Confederation of Agricultural Associations. It is to be desired that the future may see the union of these two organizations with a common end.

Finally, a reform which may attain great importance has been voted by Parliament—the creation of Chambers of Agriculture. These will be exclusively professional, and will function within the framework of the Department of Agriculture. While commerce has long had its chambers, agriculture has always been without them. The error is now going to be repaired, and the farmers, in order to solve the problems which interest them, are going to have competent representatives, chosen among themselves, disposing of an important budget and endowed with sufficient means to initiate useful projects.

In conclusion, we may say that French agriculture is going to be in position to collaborate effectively in the work of national reconstruction. Professionally organized, defended in Parliament by many of its most authoritative representatives, who, until the last elections, had held aloof from political struggles, the rural class has become conscious of itself. Thanks to our possession of North Africa, and to the return to the mother country of the provinces lost in 1870, we have at our disposal beds of chemical fertilizers of great value; and thanks to our reconquest of the Briey basin, and of Lorraine, we have the scoriae, or refuse, from the process of dephosphorization. Above all else, we have the peasant of France, who, if a little sleepy upon the soft pillow of an easy life before the war, has taken a new vigor, in spite of the blows which have thinned his ranks. He knows that many years will pass before the world's affairs have regained their normal course; but years do not frighten men trained by their rugged life to long calculations, and to submission to the laws of Nature.

André Rostand

Flamanville, Manche, France,
May 15

Vacation
and
The Weekly Review

Subscribers intending to spend the 1920 Summer season at European, Canadian or American resorts, upon request, may have THE WEEKLY REVIEW forwarded to reach them at any given address. Notify

Circulation Department
THE WEEKLY REVIEW
140 Nassau St. New York

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 58 New York, Wednesday, June 23, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 641
Editorial Articles:
The Result at Chicago 644
"Greek for the Greek-minded" 645
Is There a Public? 646
Chéradame on Lloyd George 647
The Republican National Convention. By Jerome Landfield 649
The Problem of Palestine—A Rejoinder. By Elisha M. Friedman 650
The Laodiceans. By Marion Couthouy Smith 651
Correspondence 652
Book Reviews:
A New History of the French Revolution 653
Study and Fable 654
Admiral Fisher Speaks His Mind 654
Suggestions for a Far Eastern Policy 655
The Run of the Shelves 656
Drama:
On the Verge of Literature. By O. W. Firkins 658
Export Credits and European Rehabilitation. By Guy Emerson 659

THE democratic ideal, which America inherits from the classical world, hastens forward to introduce the new candidates to their country. Mr. Coolidge is at pains to explain that the rent of his part of the two-family house in which he lives is thirty-two dollars a month and not thirty-five, as erroneously, perhaps maliciously, reported. We wonder how the other family would feel if he chose to carry on a front-porch campaign this summer. Mighty pleased, is our guess. And as for "Doc" Harding—the old "doc," that is, for it is well known that the son of the village doctor always bears the courtesy title of "doc," too—he is discovered to the country washing the buggy that has succeeded to the old jenny mule of earlier days. "Warren G. always was a good boy." Of course he was; everybody knows what that means. It isn't in the least incompatible with having belonged to a beefsteak club that wasn't just an eating club, or with having chewed tobacco with an efficiency that inspired the awe of his fellows, or with having swiped melons as the leader of the Stunners. The country is suddenly invited to take an interest in some very plain and very sturdy Americans. It doesn't find this prospect very thrilling at first glance. The country has been having a pretty big time of it lately and has outgrown, or thinks it has outgrown, some of the things it used to admire. Quite apart from the question of who will be elected and who ought to be elected, it will do the country good seriously to ponder the lives of these two men. It will do it good to realize afresh that living in a small town, winning one's way in a small town and holding the liking and the respect of one's fellow citizens the while, is not a dull business, but one that is both exciting and satisfying to those who have character sufficient to respond to it. It will do the country good to remind itself again that the qualities engendered by success in such a life are qualities which form no mean part of the equipment of one who aspires to the highest honor in the gift of his fellow-citizens.

COMMENTS in the English and French press on the Republican nomination indicate a feeling of satisfaction which has been reached by a process of elimination. The thought of Johnson in the White House was naturally a nightmare to Europeans, and by comparison with him the picture of Harding as President appears roseate. That the latter is a friend of Myron T. Herrick is a sufficient guarantee to the French that Mr. Harding, if successful in November, will work for pleasant and helpful relations with their country It must also be a source of gratification to them to remember that Senator Harding was numbered among those Americans who earnestly believed that the United States should have found an earlier opportunity to enter the war.

THERE is an old story about a recipe for a highly complicated salad, which, after giving minute instructions as to how the concoction should be effected, winds up with the direction, "then throw it out of the window." That about fits the case of the Presidential primaries, in the present stage of their development. Whether there is any way of making them a better instrument for their purpose is another question. But enough is known already to show that the mere creation of machinery for the registration of popular preferences, even if that machinery were uniform throughout the country, would furnish no assurance of the direct Presidential primary being a good way to make choice of a candidate for President. There are times, indeed, when such a poll would give a significant result. When, for example, there are two outstanding figures to whom the choice is practically limited from the start, the vote may really be entitled to the weight of a public decision. But in a free-for-all race, or anything like it, the result turns on a hundred factitious elements, and carries little moral authority. To overcome this deficiency by a cast-iron legal regulation may be a way of settling things, but whether it is a good way is open to most serious doubt.

NOBODY in the State of New York, and few intelligent citizens anywhere, will fail to understand just what the platform makers at Chicago have in mind when they "demand that every American citizen shall enjoy the ancient and constitutional right of free speech, free press, and free assembly, and the no less sacred right of the qualified voter to be represented by his duly chosen representatives." This is the epilogue to the sorry play that was enacted at Albany by Speaker Sweet and his misguided followers, and pronounces the verdict of the party on the performance. Upon this outcome the Republican party and the nation are to be congratulated. What threatened for a time to be an immense help to the cause of revolutionary agitation has been relegated to the position of a mere passing escapade. Those Republican leaders, like Mr. Hughes, and those Republican newspapers, like the New York Tribune, that came out in vigorous protest against the attempted proscription of radical opinion and the attempted disfranchisement of radical constituencies, did an invaluable service to their party and to the country. It was the promptness and energy of that protest that prevented the affair from attaining dangerous dimensions at once; and there can now no longer be any doubt that the protest was not only sound in itself, but represented the true attitude of Americans generally, whatever momentary impulse there may have been to give way to passion or prejudice.

MR. HOOVER will not be our next President, but it is quite possible that he is destined to play a rôle no less important. We do not refer to the possibility of his service in the Cabinet of the next President. Besides the opportunities of extraordinary helpfulness which are open in this direction, there is another field in which his transcendent organizing ability may be of even greater importance to the world. The appalling conditions in Central and Eastern Europe, to which Mr. Davison recently directed public attention, show no signs of passing; and the longer they continue the more desperate is the need of something really effective being done to cope with them. If an international arrangement could be made whereby the direction of all remedial efforts in that great area of human distress and economic paralysis was centred in a single head, something might be accomplished that was commensurate with the need. And Herbert Hoover is the one man in all the world to whom the working of such a plan could be entrusted with confident expectation of success.

JUST where the "progressively-minded" are headed for is becoming more and more of a mystery. Mr. Villard tells us, in the Nation, "Indeed, I no longer believe that any President elected under the existing political conditions could give satisfaction to progressively-minded men and women, though a man of Cleveland's type might go far towards so doing." If this be true, one is forced to the conclusion that the "progressively-minded" have been woefully misrepresented by each and all of the "journals of opinion" which have assumed to speak in their behalf. Mr. Villard's memory may be poor, but there is a man down at Atlanta, just now running for the Presidency, who doubtless recalls without difficulty the Chicago railway strike of 1894, the injunction secured by President Cleveland's Attorney General, and the sending of United States troops to Chicago to see that the order of the court should not be disobeyed. There were many men of progressive mind who applauded the President for this vigorous assertion of national authority against disorderly interference with the functions of the Government in the carrying of the mails; but such applause is not exactly what one expects from those who would pass muster as "progressives," on inspection by the editorial experts of present-day "Progressivism."

WE note with pain the increasing evidences of odium sociologicum among the brethren who are striving to bring in the ideal society. There are many roads to Utopia, and the travelers thereon are not at peace. Their opinions of one another are unflattering. They say hard things, and they mean them, too. The acquisitive, reactionary, hypocritical bourgeoisie are bad enough, but they would appear to be glorified angels when compared with the members of the rival sects of revolutionists. "The class-conscious workers of America," reads a recent document of the Communist party, "are through with the stinking carcass that calls itself the Socialist party of America. . . . [It] is the most dangerous enemy of the working class, and as such we shall wage a bitter struggle against it." The old Socialist Labor party has always had a decidedly unfavorable opinion of its upstart rival, the Socialist party, and its language of denunciation has not mellowed with the flux of time. "The Socialist party," says the letter of acceptance of the S. L. P.'s Presidential candidate, "is essentially nothing but a petty tax-reducing concern, an aggregation of the cheapest of cheap politicians, hoping to ride into political jobs on the present wave of 'radicalism.'" But the other extremist factions are almost as bad, and must be treated accordingly. "With the other wings and feathers, the rags and tatters of the labor movement, the I. W. W., the Communists, Communist Laborites, and what not, we must deal unflinchingly." Each of these factions, we must regretfully say, views its rivals in much the same uncharitable light. One exception is to be noted in the fact that recent circumstances have swung the Communist Laborites into a more favorable attitude toward the Socialist party. But otherwise all is discord and recrimination. The outlook is disquieting; for how shall we attain to the earthly heaven when its consecrated exponents spend most of their time in damning one another to perdition?

OF the three proposals put forward by the Mayor's Committee charged with forming plans for New York's permanent war memorial—a bridge across the Hudson, a public building on the site of Madison Square Garden, and a triumphal arch —the bridge was rightly given first place. On grounds both of utility and of sentiment it seems to be by far the most appropriate. A Hudson River bridge is desperately needed. It would be a daily blessing to more people, and a greater blessing, than a public building, and it could easily be combined with the essential features of a triumphal arch. The building of a bridge has from of old been regarded as a work of especial piety. Flung across waters which the foot of man may not walk, it is a link between two worlds. Who of the millions who shall move upon its stately span but would come to think with poignant and reverent affection of those dead in whose name it sprung into being?

IN Italy the political situation is very much like the one which the late elections for the Reichstag have created in Germany. No party is strong enough to form, unsupported, a dependable majority for any Government. Coalitions are the necessary evil by which the worse evil of domestic anarchy must be cured. But the parties to these makeshift compromises are too ill assorted to be relied upon in the solution of crucial questions involving a sacrifice of one or the other's principles. An illustrative instance of the inconstancy of such alliances is the attitude of the Popular party, the political organization of the Catholic voters, at the first and at the second resignation of Signor Nitti. The earlier crisis was brought on by the Popular party's joining the Socialists in defeating the Government; on the eve of his second resignation Signor Nitti found himself forsaken by all but the Catholics. The latter reproach him with too much indulgence towards agrarian Communism and the exactions of labor. That is why they ousted him a month ago with the help of the very element which they accused him of treating too gently. This hair-of-the-dog-that-bit-you policy could not cure the country of its anarchy. Its only result was a strengthening of the Catholic element in Nitti's reconstructed Cabinet, and, by so much, more bitter opposition from the Socialists as a consequence.

THE three Allied Commissioners in Budapest have agreed to make joint representations to the Hungarian Government for restoration of order and avoidance of mistreatment of minorities in Hungary, according to a report to the State Department from the United States Commissioner, U. Grant Smith. Our radical weeklies will hail this news as a confirmation of the rumors they helped to circulate concerning the White terror in Hungary. A White Paper published by the British Government about a month ago, containing the results of an investigation made, at the request of Lord Curzon, by Admiral Troubridge and General Gorton, disposes of the assumption that this step of the Commissioners is proof of the existence of a White terror. The conclusion arrived at by the two investigators, and fully shared by the other Allied representatives at Budapest, was an absolute denial of the allegations. "In the opinion of my colleagues and myself," wrote General Gorton, "there exists no White terror in Hungary," and Admiral Troubridge concluded one of his letters from Budapest with the statement, "Life here is just as safe as in England." The representations of the Commissioners must have been called for by recent disorders which Horthy's Government may have been slack in repelling; they do not refer to any systematic persecution under Government auspices.

MR. BENJAMIN TURNER, a member of the British Labor delegation to Russia which has just returned to England, is credited with the statement that "the Soviet Government has the acceptance of the bulk of the people, the good-will of many, and fierce opposition from the Social Democrats, who say individual liberty has been destroyed." This affords an interesting counterpart to the picture of public opinion in this country, where the Soviet Government remains unrecognized with the approval of the bulk of the nation, where many are not unfavorably disposed towards it, and where the Social Democrats hail it as the only form of Government worthy of adoption by the American nation.

GENERAL GOURAUD, the French High Commissioner in Syria, concluded an armistice with Mustapha Kemal Pasha on May 30. A few days later M. Millerand caused great emotion in Paris by a grave statement to the foreign affairs commission of the Senate with regard to the policy of France in the Orient. He declared that General Gouraud's army, in spite of reinforcements, had to engage in a strategic retreat, a term whose euphemism did not conceal the dark reality. The exact conditions of the agreement with the Nationalist leader have not yet been published, but so much is known, that they include the withdrawal of French forces from "certain" towns in Cilicia. Apart from the critical situation of the French forces revealed by this transaction, it can not fail to have a serious effect on the peace negotiations with Turkey, as any success scored by Kemal will strengthen the opposition in Constantinople against the Sultan and his British-approved Cabinet. And what success is better calculated to heighten his prestige in the Turkish world than the conclusion of an agreement with one of the Great Powers constituting his official recognition as the actual ruler of Anatolia?

"CONTEMPTIBLE is the nation which does not stake its all on honor!" With these words Schiller, in "Wilhelm Tell," justified the Swiss struggle for liberty, and with these words from Schiller Prince Joachim Albrecht of Hohenzollern justified in court his attack with bottle and glass on members of the French Mission in the Hotel Adlon at Berlin. This Prussian avatar of William Tell, punctiliously addressed by the presiding judge as "Your Royal Highness," gave flight also, in the course of the trial, to a winged word of his own creation: "A German man must be able not only to live and die for his country, but also to suffer for it." As the Berliner Tageblatt comments, Joachim Albrecht has certainly not died for his country; it is a question if he has lived for it; and "suffer"? Perhaps at the Hotel Adlon. However, German liberals find some balm in the fact that in this trial, for the first time in Prussian history, a Hohenzollern was tried openly in a civil court, and fined 500 marks, a small amount, in truth, but all the state's attorney asked for.

The Result at Chicago

THE Republican party goes before the country with an uninspiring candidate and an uninspiring platform. So much as this will be widely conceded by Republicans, as well as generally asserted by Democrats. At a time when the nation is faced with problems of the utmost gravity, and when its relations with the outside world are of an importance never before equalled, the party that has for two years been in possession of a majority in both houses of Congress has chosen as its leader a man of no peculiar distinction, who has never played a leading part in public affairs; and has presented a declaration of principles which, consisting in the main of long arguments in arraignment of the opposing party and in commendation of itself, fails to define its own position on the leading issue of political controversy. Whatever else may be claimed for this result, it is clear that inspiration is not to be found in it. If the campaign is to have appealing quality, it will be because of the heart that may be put into it by subsequent developments.

Concerning the question of the League, however, while the Convention might have done somewhat better, it was practically out of its power to do much better. The time for doing much better was months ago. Long before the Convention met, it was clear that a kind of disorganization of opinion had obtained in the party which made the assertion of a clear-cut position on the treaty impossible. When a party is divided into two opposing camps, it is sometimes quite possible to strengthen it by a clear decision in favor of one faction. Thus in the campaign of 1896 the Republican party took a firm stand for the gold standard, and let the silver men in it bolt or not as they pleased. But the peculiarity of the present situation was that only one of the two principal factions on the treaty was thoroughly in earnest. The delegates who stood with the Johnson-Borah irreconcilables were heart and soul against the League; but there was no great body of delegates that was heart and soul for the League. You can rally men that are heartily for one position to stand up for that position and defy the men that are against it; but what can you do with people who hardly know what their own position is? And that was the situation in which the Republican party, after a year of manœuvring, found itself at Chicago in regard to the treaty.

It is too early to say what that situation will be when the campaign develops. Much will depend, of course, upon the action of the Democratic Convention at San Francisco. Whether Mr. Harding will undertake to add anything to the platform declaration remains to be seen. In the meantime, it is important to take exact note of the position in which that declaration itself leaves the party. The treaty plank is of precisely the character which has seemed to us inevitable. It was designed for the purpose of holding together everybody who is not in favor of accepting the treaty without reservations. It says many things that sound inimical to the treaty, and carefully refrains from promising acceptance of the League, even with the Lodge reservations; so much as this was done to keep the Johnson-Borah people from revolting. But it is equally careful to say nothing that promises rejection of the League; and it winds up as follows:

> We pledge the coming Republican Administration to such agreement with the other nations of the world as shall meet the full duty of America to civilization and humanity, in accordance with American ideals and without surrendering the right of the American people to exercise its judgment and its power in favor of justice and peace.

Obviously, ratification of the treaty with the Lodge reservations, or with any others, milder or stronger, that might seem at the time expedient, would be in no way inconsistent with this "pledge." If the various sections of the party should, throughout the campaign, jog along together without any further definition of its position on the subject, and if the party should carry the election, the whole question will be an open one for the new President and the new Congress to settle. Whether the Democrats will be able to smoke the Republicans out of this peculiar, but on the whole not uncomfortable, position on the treaty, is one of the interesting questions of the forthcoming campaign.

That the platform takes no stand on the subject of prohibition, and that its declaration in regard to Mexico is inconclusive, we do not find to be good ground for censure. The question of prohibition, so far as regards the near future, has become, since the Supreme Court rendered its decision, essentially a question of Congressional determination of the degree of rigor with which the prohibition of "intoxicating" drinks is to be carried out. That is a question of great social, and even political, importance; but no obligation rests upon national parties to divide on the lines of that issue. The question of Mexico is in a different category; but there is ample reason why a gathering like that at a national nominating Convention should hesitate to commit a party to a definite stand in so difficult a subject. We ourselves would regard intervention in Mexico, except under the most absolutely unmistakable necessity, as a national calamity; and if the Convention had adopted a plank that meant probable intervention we should have regarded it as a misfortune. But to find fault because the platform declares an intention to assert American claims more vigorously, and yet carefully avoids the implication of an interventionist policy, seems to us hypercritical.

High credit must be given to the Convention for the clearness with which it has stated its position on labor, and on the closely related issue of railroad ownership and operation. Here are real questions, questions upon which the attitude of the incoming Congress and the incoming President will be of crucial importance. The Republicans declare, without ifs or buts, that they are "opposed to Government ownership and operation or employee operation of the railroads." On the general question of the relations between capital and labor—or rather between employers and employed—the position of the party is stated with a degree of precision unusual in political platforms. The declaration is in accurate agreement with the recommendations of the second of the Industrial Conferences held at Washington, upon the President's call, in which Mr. Hoover is understood to have been the leading influence. It recognizes "the justice of collective bargaining." It denies "the right to strike against the Government." In the case of public utilities, it favors "the establishment of an impartial tribunal" to decide disputes, the decisions of the tribunal "to be relied on to secure their acceptance," and the tribunal to "refuse to accept jurisdiction, except for the purpose of investigation, so long as the public service is interrupted." In private industries, it does "not advocate the principle of compulsory arbitration," but favors "impartial commissions and better facilities for voluntary mediation, conciliation and arbitration, supplemented by the full publicity which will enlist the influence of an aroused public opinion."

The position thus laid down, both on railroad operation and ownership and on industrial relations generally, has already aroused the antagonism of prominent labor leaders. In the course of the campaign it will doubtless be branded with that cheap and handy epithet "reactionary"; but it is reactionary only on the assumption that everything that does not contemplate a radical change in the economic order is reactionary. To sober American liberals it will appeal as a straightforward statement of a programme of intelligent progress towards a bettering of industrial conditions. It is a question of acute interest whether the Democrats will make a bid for the labor vote by writing into their platform a declaration contrasting with this. Such a move is quite within the possibilities, even the probabilities, of the situation. And if the San Francisco convention should put forward a plank designed to satisfy the demands of labor-union extremists, and to appeal to the predilections of the semi-socialist "intellectuals," it is by no means impossible that the issue thus drawn will become the leading issue of the campaign.

Upon the nomination of Governor Coolidge for the Vice-Presidency the Convention is to be heartily congratulated. The spontaneity with which this nomination was made is itself matter for hearty satisfaction, and is in contrast with the spinelessness of the rest of the proceedings. There can be no doubt that the presence of Mr. Coolidge's name on the ticket will add materially to its standing with the people. And it is to be hoped that his occupancy of the second place on it will not preclude the injection into the campaign, upon more than one occasion, of that kind of savor which, if he had been nominated for President, his speeches might have been counted on to contribute abundantly. However, the curtain has barely risen on the play, the first actors have not yet made their bow, the identity of others is still to be disclosed, and the character of the plot is open to a great deal of conjecture. In times so unusual as these, it is the part of wisdom to possess one's soul in patience while events are unfolding to a point where an accurate perception of what is at stake shall be possible.

"Greek for the Greek-minded"

THE discussion over the study of Greek has led some of its opponents to propose—a generous concession, apparently, in their own estimation—that it be left to "the Greek-minded," as an elective branch entirely in keeping with their mental aptitude and disposition. And now and then we find some sincere, though not Hellenically clear-sighted, friend of Greek expressing a similar opinion. The former class are interested in any plan that will leave the largest possible percentage of students the utmost freedom to take the kind of studies in which they are particularly interested. The latter are charmed with the conception of a scholarly élite, a saving remnant, pursuing the study into the very sanctum sanctorum of Greek art, literature, and philosophy.

If the two classes were skillfully cross-questioned, their ideas as to what a "Greek-minded" student is would be found to disagree. With the former, the term would hardly connote more than a scholarly habit of mind, and predominantly literary tastes, with no particular interest in the natural sciences, or the newer group of "social sciences"—poor grist for their particular mills, and indeed not standing very high in their respect, yet capable of being educated after some fashion, and possibly useful in keeping the Greek teachers busy, so that they will not be trying to tempt the "scientifically minded" into their classes. To the other class, Greek-mindedness would consist in that quickness of mental perception, that keenness of intellectual insight, that discriminative appreciation of varying beauties and harmonies, that instinctive preference for the delicate rather than the clumsy, the accurate rather than the careless and slouchy, that joy in searching and finding out, in many fields of truth, which entered characteristically into the makeup of the "lively Greek."

Now as a matter of fact, while the man of this type is sure to enjoy the study of Greek, sure to draw rich profit out of it, and to impart that profit generously to others, he is at the same time the one man who is best able to give a fairly satisfactory account of the use of his intellectual talents without it. To set Greek to one side as a virtually hedged-in preserve for this type of student would be no more appropriate than to limit the physical-training facilities of the schools and colleges to the small group whose physical endowment and athletic disposition were most nearly perfect at the outset.

There is no field to-day more in need of a liberal infusion of this life-giving Greek element than that of scientific investigation; for there is no field in which the temptation to intellectual narrowness is greater. The task of research into the secrets of the physical universe is worthy of the best and most complete mental equipment imaginable; and yet we find the banks of the great sea of nature-knowledge lined with would-be "scientists," angling for its tarpon and tuna with intellectual tackle not finely enough tempered to hold even blue-gills and "goggle-eyes." It is wrong to set up the alternative of "science or classics," as did a recent participant in the discussion over compulsory Greek at Oxford. The proper ideal to hold up is as large an infusion of the subtly penetrating Greek spirit as possible into the field of modern scientific research. And just as far as possible, that infusion should come by the normal and most effective method of direct contact with the Greek language, literature, and art.

No effort should be made to force Greek into educational curricula as a positive requirement. What is feasible is that Greek should be offered, by well-equipped teachers and with a liberal supply of illustrative material, in at least one high school of every large city. Such provision is wholly in harmony with the most advanced ideas of the elective system of study; and when all that is asked is the mere possibility to elect the study of Greek, for those who desire it, opposition to it smacks of a narrowness unbecoming genuine educators, and inimical to sound education.

Is there a Public?

IN their recent debate Mr. Gompers had no answer to Governor Allen's inquiry whether the public had any rights in a strike which interferes with the production and distribution of necessities. Consequently he could not say what steps he would take to protect rights concerning whose existence his silence showed him to be in doubt. That he did not, in a good-natured way, say "the public be damned" may be due to a belief that there ain't no such animal as the public. Everybody is either a laborer, and as such, in hearty sympathy with every effort of labor to improve its condition, or else he is a capitalist, and, as such, opposed on principle to all strikes of whatever character.

It is not likely that anybody could be got consciously to assent to a position so extreme as this. It is a theory which has all the facts against it. Again and again, especially of late, the public has risen in its might and unanswerably asserted that, be differences what they may, life meanwhile must go on. In England and in Sweden the public has successfully met something resembling a general strike. Nothing like a general strike has arisen in America, but if one may judge by the behavior of the public in the face of a police strike or a railway strike, there is a public which at any rate believes that it exists, and which believes it has rights that can, under sufficient provocation, be enforced.

It is due to the essentially foreign character of the more radical thinking in this country that there should be any tendency to identify the "public" with a "bourgeoisie," or middle class. Even the American laborer is not particularly conscious of himself as the member of a class. He is a man who every now and then feels that he has a grievance, a "raw deal," and in those circumstances he sets about using such means as he has of getting the trouble corrected. This means is usually the strike, and it is generally the case that if the grievance can be at all made plain to the overwhelming majority who have no immediate concern with the matter their sympathy—the public's sympathy—immediately goes out to the strikers. No doubt the American laborer is a very poor-spirited fellow not to be continually agitating for some big overturn of the social structure, not merely little things like better wages and better conditions; but these are the things he is interested in.

In this respect laborers are at one with the public; they are not merely as good as the so-called middle-class, and even better able to exert their power: their attitude is essentially the same as that of the great mass of people who make up the public. It ought not to be so, on any theory of class conflict, but in America at any rate it is so. If the sense of class identity is weak, or at least of brief duration, even among organized labor, it is still slower to declare itself among the millions who are either unorganized laborers or merely technically capitalists. But in their degree they respond in exactly the same way. Given a sufficient grievance and they—the public—will act to correct it. And on their side will be found many who in other circumstances would themselves use the strike for their own immediate ends. When a strike brings to a halt the production and distribution of necessities, there is very little difference in its effect on "bourgeois" and on laborers. Apart from the few whose interests are immediately bound up in the strike, and the still fewer who console themselves for present hardship with the hope that the far-off divine event of revolution is moving nearer, both "laborer" and "bourgeois" become indistinguishably members of a public which recognizes that there are limits to what it can afford to put up with.

The decision recently rendered by a New York court that common carriers shall not consent in a strike of the handlers of produce, making it impossible for goods to be moved except on terms dictated by the unions, is an important landmark in the slowly defining status of the public. If the longshoremen are not so well off as they might be, it is too bad; if they can not agree with the carriers or the carriers with them, again too bad. Settle it if possible, and let each side get what it deserves, and, if possible, what it thinks it wants. But meanwhile, gentlemen, don't expect the rest of the country to sit by and starve while you are arranging your little difficulties. The decision rebukes the carriers—who are presumably capitalists—quite as much as the longshoremen. And it rebukes both in the name of everybody else who is not a direct party to the quarrel—in the potent name, that is, of the public.

THE WEEKLY REVIEW
Published by
The National Weekly Corporation
140 Nassau Street, New York
Fabian Franklin, President
Harold de Wolf Fuller, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD de WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
Harry Morgan Ayres O. W. Firkins
A. J. Barnouw W. H. Johnson
Jerome Landfield

Chéradame on Lloyd George

[M. Chéradame has dealt so long with the uncertain march of future events, and his writings have excited so much interest on both sides of the Atlantic, that anything coming from his pen is worth attention. The article by him which follows is, at any rate, an interesting historical document, not because of the light it throws upon Mr. Lloyd George's alleged pro-Germanism, but for what it reveals of French fears and suspicions as to Great Britain's foreign policy. History is the record of human errors, and the idea now possessing certain statesmen in Paris as to the perfidy of the British Premier is of no less historical value for being, as we firmly believe, a sad delusion. Lloyd George's leniency towards Germany is not dictated by the German elements of international high finance, but rather by the influence of British liberal opinion and the pressure of labor. He is not such a fool as to be working, after the immense sacrifice to which he stimulated his country in the war, for an end which would make that sacrifice a needless waste. Not the financial and political ruin of France is his aim, but the economic revival of Germany. To consider the latter incompatible with the welfare and safety of France is forgivable in a nation still suffering from the wounds inflicted by a prosperous Germany. But the world would pay the French an ill service by encouraging their anti-British bias tending to substitute for the Entente Cordiale, which stood the test of the war, an alliance of France with her young protégés of West and East Europe, whose chief desert in Frenchmen's eyes is their hostility towards Germany and Hungary. The old continent can not be pacified by rebuilding its political framework on foundations of enmity and hatred.]

THE moral and material failure of the Peace Conference has naturally made many Americans averse to taking any interest in the affairs of the Old World. Still, in spite of the Atlantic, the moral, political, and economic ties connecting the two Continents are so many and so close that the United States could not ignore what is happening in Europe without serious damage to purely American interests.

The situation I have now to expose is so strange that even such readers as have lost their interest in Europe will thank me for bringing it to their notice. It will seem improbable only to those who did not read my former previsions which, at the time, seemed singularly audacious but have now been justified by the events.

The general German manœuvre which is actually developing is virtually the same as denounced by me under the title "Le Coup de l'Armistice," in my book "The Pan-German Plot Unmasked," which was published early in 1916. The dangers and deceptions of the armistice which are now facing the Allies were exposed in "The Essentials of an Enduring Victory" (Scribner, December, 1918). Those readers who followed my articles in the New York Tribune at the end of 1918 and the beginning of 1919 can now verify the accuracy of my statements.

The origin of the present situation consists in the fact that the armistice was signed between the Allies and Germany under conditions which appear more and more amazing. The Allied army in Hungary, which could, without any risk, have marched across Bohemia upon Berlin, was forced to give up this plan by the armistice of November 6, 1918, with the Dual Monarchy, and its unity was later broken up in obedience to orders whose origin has remained mysterious. Official German documents throw a vivid light upon the strange circumstances which preceded the conclusion of the armistice with Germany.

In the first months of 1919, a sharp conflict arose in Berlin between the President of the Council of Ministers and General Ludendorff. The polemic that ensued was so violent that the Government was induced to publish, under the title "The Origin of the Armistice," a long series of official German documents which together form a big volume. A certain number of these documents concern the rôle played by Mr. Wilson in the period preceding the armistice, and reveal the existence of secret informants in German employ through whom the German Government knew at almost every hour during those decisive days the intimate thoughts of the President. Americans will be deeply interested in the perusal of these documents of indubitable authenticity. A German edition of them has appeared in Berlin. A French edition, by Captain Koeltz of the French General Staff, has been published by the Renaissance du Livre, 78 Boulevard St. Michel, Paris, under the title, "L'Aveu de la Défaite Allemande. Les Origines de l'Armistice." Americans who will take the trouble to read the documents attentively will soon become convinced that hostilities ceased under very surprising conditions. A similar conclusion is to be drawn from a declaration made by M. Poincaré, then President of the Republic, in an address at Givet early in December, 1919: "The day when the German armies," he said, "signed their capitulation before the victorious troops of Marshal Foch they were incapable of carrying on the war, and three or four days of continued fighting would have forced them to absolute surrender. It was in order to escape that disaster that Germany signed the armistice."

As a matter of fact, it was the captains of international finance, many of whom are of German origin, that, pulling the wires behind the scene, made an end to the war before a decisive victory was achieved. As, since the armistice, the Germans have ceded large shares in their industrial concerns, at very advantageous conditions under the present rate of exchange, to certain Americans and, especially, to a number of Englishmen, these are now so deeply interested in German business that they are doing their utmost to rescue the Germans from the economic consequences of the Peace Treaty and, especially, from those involved in the reparations.

The influence exerted by these financiers on Mr. Lloyd George is so powerful that the latter has abandoned the formula of his peace programme: guarantees, sanctions, reparations. In fact, the affairs of Europe are being settled in such a way as to make it seem that Mr. Lloyd George wished to divide between Great Britain and Germany the hegemony over Europe and Asia. That is why Mr. Lloyd George is doing his utmost to prevent France from applying the Treaty and to save Germany from the consequences of the war. The full weight of these moves must gradually devolve upon France, which under those conditions can not fail to succumb. As a result of this policy France will be brought under the Anglo-German yoke. Central and North Russia and more than half of Siberia will become a German colony exploited on behalf of Anglo-German syndicates. This is the explanation of Mr. Lloyd George's favorable attitude towards the Russian Bolsheviki, whose principal leaders are German agents. Poland will be subjugated, and Hungary will serve as a base for the Anglo-German interests against Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Jugoslavia. As to Turkey, the Caucasus, Persia, South Russia, they will form the exclusive share of British imperialism.

Such is, in rough outlines, the political plan to which Mr. Lloyd George has been won over, and whose realization is obviously already being attempted, as appears more and more clearly from recent occurrences. The Germans see an immense advantage in this combination of their own invention. By it, they have practically succeeded in destroying the Entente. They have, thanks to Mr. Lloyd George's interference, evaded the real guarantees which they ought to have furnished and the judicial sanctions for the crimes committed during the war. The Germans are now working to elude the imposed reparations, and Mr. Lloyd George goes out of his way to help them find the supple formula which, while seemingly leaving the rights of France intact, will nevertheless furnish to the Germans the means of evading somehow their execution.

In this entire transaction with the English the Germans have, naturally, their own particular aim in mind. They know perfectly well that the financial ruin of France is bound to involve her political ruin. They also know that England will lack the power to maintain her hegemony over the Balkans, Turkish Asia, and South Russia. The Germans are quite right in this respect. The social situation of England does not allow her, confronted as she is by the growing difficulties in Ireland, in Egypt, and in India, to realize for good the imperialistic plans on a gigantic scale of Mr. Lloyd George.

It follows, therefore, that, ultimately, the Anglo-German combination, if it developed unimpeded, would result in the establishment of the Pan-Germany which the Ludendorffs, the Helfferichs, the Bernstorffs, who are still the wirepullers behind the scene, have not ceased to imagine as a possible reality.

Fortunately, the extremely dangerous character of Mr. Lloyd George's foreign combinations is becoming so prominent that the consummation of this particular one is far from certain. Part of his project is based on Germany's hold on Central and Northern Russia, and her exploitation of that area on behalf of Anglo-German syndicates. This plan, however, involves the crushing of Poland. During the last months, Mr. Lloyd George has done all he could to bring this about by the combined action of the Germans in the West and the Bolshevik army in the East, an army, by the by, which is in reality a German force consisting of Russian mercenaries.

But here commences a new miracle capable of upsetting all Mr. Lloyd George's combinations. Poland is governed by a man of great capacities, Marshal Pilsudski. He has wisely not waited for the German-Bolshevik forces to crush the nascent Poland. The Polish army, which has made enormous progress in the last few months, has inflicted a serious defeat on the Russian Bolsheviki. If, as is to be hoped, the Polish troops, which will perhaps be joined by the Rumanians, follow up their successes, it is not impossible that these will lead to the overthrow of the abominable régime of Lenin and Trotsky, which has reduced the Russian people to enforced labor. As to the Czechoslovaks, the Jugoslavs, and the Rumanians, they are ready to prevent Hungary from becoming a bastion for the Anglo-German schemes against them. If, finally, Marshal Pilsudski has the wisdom to render to the Russians the truly Russian territories, and to conclude with them a cordial peace, after freeing them from the Bolshevist yoke, the immense consequences of such a course would be that the project of Berlin and Mr. Lloyd George would be frustrated and Europe could again look forward to a régime of liberty. But we have not yet advanced so far.

In view of this general situation the interest of the United States seems clearly defined. America must see her interest in the establishment of a state of affairs which will free her forever from the nightmare of having again to interfere with military force in the quarrels of the Old Continent, and which will enable her to carry on a stable and profitable commerce with the nations of Europe, once for all freed from the oppression of Germany.

The European combination which would most surely enable the Americans to obtain these results is the consistent elaboration of the programme which eminent American statesmen are said to have approved for the reconstruction of Europe—an "Entente Cordiale" between France, Belgium, Poland, Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Greece.

Not until that alliance is fully realized will Americans be perfectly free from the fear of having again to intervene in the affairs of Europe, for it will possess sufficient power to prevent a renewal of the Pan-German peril. That combination will also furnish the means of readjusting the financial situation by ending the crisis of the exchange. That obstacle once surmounted, the Americans will be able to do profitable business with about 130 million Continental Europeans anxious to welcome them.

What is the immediate requirement to produce this desired result? It is desirable that American opinion should express its sympathy with the cause of Poland, of Rumania, of Czechoslovakia, of Jugoslavia, and that American business men should not hesitate to procure for these countries the means of vindicating their independence. Poland especially has need of arms and ammunitions. It were to be wished that Americans favored these operations, which are more likely than any others to put an end to the Bolshevist pestilence. No action of Americans at the present hour can be more conducive to provoking subsequently, by reaction, a beneficial effect for the United States.

ANDRÉ CHÉRADAME

The Republican National Convention

AFTER five sweltering days in the Chicago Coliseum, to say nothing of the days and nights in candidates' headquarters, hotel lobbies, and clubs, the Republicans have chosen their standard-bearers for the election in November. Nine ballots were required to bring this about, and up to the seventh ballot the delegates seemed all at sea and a dead-lock apparently impended. Then came the quick swing to Harding which relieved the tense situation, and the weary delegates heaved a sigh of relief rather than of satisfaction. To nominate Coolidge as Harding's running-mate was a matter quickly disposed of.

The judgment passed upon the nomination by many of the representatives of the press was that it was a triumph of the so-called "Old Guard" and the Senate group, and it must be admitted frankly that the nomination must have afforded the stand-patters considerable satisfaction; but to attribute the nomination to their direct manipulation is to give them too much credit and to ignore the outstanding characteristic of the Convention, which was its absence of leadership. The causes underlying the nomination of Harding were, in fact, quite different.

The key-note of the work of Mr. Will H. Hays as Chairman of the Republican National Committee has been harmony, and by the word "harmony" Mr. Hays meant the bringing together into the fold of the Republican party all possible factions, and especially reuniting with it the Progressives, even those of the left wing. This involved a dangerous degree of compromise with the traditional principles of the Republican party and led to a situation of which certain political adventurers were not slow to take advantage.

It was this that gave to Hiram W. Johnson and his associates, Senator Borah and Senator McCormick, an importance in the Convention out of all proportion to their actual strength. Johnson came to Chicago prepared, with the assistance of Hearst and William Hale Thompson, to stage a great popular demonstration that should stampede the Convention. Had there been real leadership, this manœuvre would have been evaluated at its proper worth. Owing to the lack of it, Johnson was able to make a display of strength that was not without its effect upon the Resolutions Committee in their work upon the platform. In other words, the whole policy of harmony at any cost enabled this group to hold up the Convention and prevent the nomination of either General Wood or Governor Lowden. If, therefore, the delegates were obliged to select a somewhat neutral candidate rather than a more forceful and positive leader, they have the Johnson group to thank for it. It was the selfish and opportunist policy of the Senator from California that made such a selection a logical necessity.

The opening of the Convention was somewhat dull and listless. Little enthusiasm was displayed either on the floor or in the galleries. The key-note speech of Senator Lodge was well received, though frequent remarks were heard to the effect that in his effort to justify the position of the Republican Senators he laid far too much emphasis on the struggle between President and Senate rather than upon the chasm between President and people. With its statements, however, the delegates showed themselves in accord.

As for the delegates themselves, they were essentially regulars. A majority of them had been delegates in the 1916 Convention, and in reply to a question as to whether there was any likelihood that they would be stampeded, an old Republican war-horse remarked that the Convention was "a basket of hard-boiled eggs."

The first real struggle of the Convention came in the sub-committee of the Committee on Resolutions, which labored all night to formulate a plank on the Treaty and League of Nations that would satisfy the demands of Johnson and Borah. The plank finally adopted was practically that written by Senator Root just before his departure for Europe, and while it was generally felt that Johnson had succeeded in blocking a statement more in harmony with the position of the mild reservationists, such as Murray Crane desired, it was in reality a Pyrrhic victory and did not tend to strengthen Johnson's position in the Convention. Another long delay took place when the sub-committee report came before the Resolutions Committee, a delay which caused the perspiring delegates to become very restless.

It was not until late in the afternoon of Thursday that the report was finally brought before the Convention and the platform read in extenso by Senator Watson. On the completion of his reading occurred an incident at once amusing and instructive. A fresh and self-assertive young man from Milwaukee named Gross, for some unexplained reason a member of the Resolutions Committee, presented a minority report—the report of a minority of one. It was a long, rambling screed, couched in the customary patter of the Socialists, and might have emanated either from LaFollette or from Victor Berger. The hour was late and the delegates tired and impatient, and at first they showed their displeasure and impatience vigorously. But at the request of the Chairman the young man was given a hearing to the bitter end with derisive tolerance, and was not permitted to make a martyr of himself, as was evidently his intention.

Friday witnessed the whole series of nominating and seconding speeches, with accompanying demonstrations. These time-wasting demonstrations have grown to be a great nuisance in Conventions and bear unmistakable signs of artificial organization. The one exception to this was the spontaneous outburst from the audience that greeted the nomination of Hoover. He was easily the most popular candidate with the audience of all those brought forward; the only thing he lacked was delegates. The best of the addresses was made by Mrs. Douglas Robinson, Colonel Roosevelt's sister, in seconding the nomination of General Wood. It stood out as a gem amidst a welter of platitudinous and commonplace speeches. The worst address was the speech of Charles S. Wheeler of San Francisco, placing in nomination the name of Hiram W. Johnson. If Johnson at any time had any chance of becoming the Republican candidate, this address effectually killed it. Allusions to the power of the press and the fact that his candidate was divinely chosen brought forth a cry of "Hearst," which was taken up with derisive cheers by the whole audience, while an insinuating allusion to the campaign expenditures of the two leading candidates called forth a chorus of boos from the floor. When Mr. Wheeler sat down, Johnson's candidacy had been punctured beyond repair.

Throughout Friday night numerous conferences took place in the effort to break the dead-lock, and when the Convention met on Saturday, the feeling was general that Harding would be chosen, though the names of Sproul and Knox were also heard as alternatives. It was said that Johnson was willing to release his delegates from their pledges provided he were given assurance that neither Wood nor Lowden would be nominated, and that his preference was for Knox. When the recess was taken Saturday afternoon, the nomination of Harding was a foregone conclusion; but two more ballots were required to bring this about. Harding's name did not arouse superlative enthusiasm, but there was a general feeling among the delegates that they had selected a candidate against whom nothing could be said, and that in so doing they had averted the threatened break in the Republican party and had got off lightly from the Johnson chantage. Joined with this was an undercurrent of uneasy feeling that, under Harding's leadership, the Republican party would by no means have a walk-over in November and a nervous interest in the prospective proceedings of the Democratic Convention at San Francisco.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Problem of Palestine—A Rejoinder

"THE Problem of Palestine," by Edward Bliss Reed, printed in a recent number of the Weekly Review, asks American public opinion to "support the enforcement of the clause in the Balfour Declaration that promises security to the great majority of Palestinians who are not Zionists." It may seem a gratuitous insult to a friendly power for Mr. Reed to urge "that America has a great responsibility" to tell Britain how she is to carry out the terms of her mandate over Palestine, a mandate given under a treaty which we have yet failed to ratify, and under which we, therefore, have neither obligations nor rights. Mr. Reed makes his appeal in spite of the fact that a statement in another part of his article renders such an appeal superfluous and irrelevant. For he quotes the just and sober official statement of General Bols, Chief Administrator for Palestine, ending in the words "the inhabitants may be assured that the Government is well intentioned towards them and holds only the scales of justice in its hands." Mr. Reed makes his appeal to America at a time when her interest in Near Eastern affairs is registered in the decisive defeat of the resolution in favor of an American mandate over stricken and suffering Armenia.

Why does Mr. Reed come to a conclusion diametrically opposed to that held and advocated in the United States since 1891? In that year the Reverend William E. Blackstone and Henry Clay Trumbull, late editor of the Sunday School Times, sent a memorial to President Harrison, signed by hundreds of prominent Americans, favoring the restoration of Palestine to the Jewish people. The Zionist cause has been consistently supported in America since then. It has been recently espoused not only by President Wilson, Secretaries Baker and Daniels, and Senator Lodge, but by the leaders of American intellectual and spiritual life, Charles W. Eliot, G. Stanley Hall, Henry van Dyke, Right Reverends Charles S. Burch and Luther B. Wilson, and James Cardinal Gibbons, among others.

Mr. Reed opposes Zionist aims in Palestine because of a mistaken point of view. He talks in terms of territories and thinks in terms of theology. But Zionism is concerned only incidentally with the former and not at all with the latter. Zionism is an attempt to solve a social problem, the Jewish problem. This is not a problem of Palestine, it affects countries outside of Palestine. It is a world problem. It is not an Arab problem; it affects all of Christendom. For in Eastern Europe there are seven million Jews who can not all remain there. The disorganization of Europe, the breakdown of the industrial mechanism, has created a surplus population.

And even before the war, the Jew had an uncomfortable berth on the edge of the volcano. In Poland there had been developing a crushing anti-Jewish boycott. Since the war, Dmowski has said quite frankly that the boycott was part of "a war of extermination." In Rumania the native-born Jew, whose ancestors settled there hundreds of years ago and who may have served his country in war time, was an alien in the eyes of the law, in spite of the treaty of Berlin in 1878. Rumania's signature to the recent Treaty of Peace with Austria will not bring this discrimination to an end. The stroke of a pen does not suddenly alter national psychology, nor will it promptly change the relation of illiterate and fanatic people towards others of different ethnic stock. The signing of the armistice brought an end to hostilities among the belligerents but did not stop massacre and pillage of the Jew in Eastern Europe.

All the old superlatives of the history of martyrdom have been exceeded. The massacres in the Middle Ages have been outdone in the past three years. In Eastern Europe tens of thousands of Jews have been murdered and hundreds of thousands made destitute. And that is why "they are waiting at Odessa, Constantinople, Constanza, and Vladivostok for passage to their new home." That is why, as Mr. Reed calls them, "aliens, chiefly Russians, Poles, and Rumanians are to come in and possess the land" of Palestine.

What are the charges against Zionism, set forth by Mr. Reed? The burden of his attack is, not what Zionists have done, but what they may do. And what are the fearful plans of the Zionists? "It is of utmost importance to understand that Zionism desires in Palestine more than a mere place of refuge for oppressed Jews," asserts Mr. Reed. The Jews who as a minority people have suffered for untold centuries now seek a place where they may be guaranteed freedom. A people that has been driven out of its homeland, and has wandered weary and worn, now seeks a resting place from which no majority can turn them out at will, a homeland in which their fathers dwelt for a period that exceeds the history of any nation of Europe on its soil, a homeland in which they developed a culture which, through its daughter religion, constitutes the cornerstone of modern civilization. Truly the Jews do not seek a mere refuge in Palestine as a minority. History has taught them the futility of such a quest. For, in the Middle Ages, liberal Poland invited the Jews to take shelter within her borders, and to-day they are under the painful necessity of seeking homes elsewhere.

Mr. Reed contends further that "the Jews that emigrate there will not go in the same spirit in which thousands of Europeans have sought our shores." Hardly could he have found a broken reed less suitable to lean on. Not in the same spirit, indeed, will the Jews go to Palestine as the Europeans came to our shores. What was the motive of all but the earliest immigration into the United States? Economic opportunity in a rich land, self-interest, the desire to participate in an industrial bonanza. The spirit that is urging Jews to go to Palestine is not this spirit. For the land is now barren and desolate. Its economic attractions are nil. The spirit that moves them is the spirit of the Puritans, of the Quakers, of the Huguenots, and of the other colonial non-conformists, who, in an age of individualism, sought freedom of conscience. And in the present social era, the Jew seeks freedom for his people, and an opportunity to express himself unhindered by physical force or by more subtle, though not less painful, social stigma. The group of Russian Jews who went to the waste lands of Palestine in 1881 suffered the fate of our early settlers in Massachusetts and Virginia. Like them the "sons of Moses" and the "lovers of Zion" perished from starvation and fever. The immortal monument they left behind is the eucalyptus tree, the Jew tree, the Arab calls it—that drained the malarial marshes for the later colonists.

What are the other wicked plans of the Zionists for Palestine? They brought from Scotland a town planner of international fame, Sir Patrick Geddes, "to draw plans for the reconstruction of Jerusalem * * * and for the development of Jaffa, Haifa, and other places." Worse still, they are planning to develop the industrial resources of the land, which have remained neglected for centuries. They are planning to increase production at a time when the world sorely needs goods. They are planning to relieve Poland and Rumania of their "surplus" population. The Zionists aim to bring to Palestine the mechanics of civilization, sanitation, transportation, and education. The Zionists, under British auspices, are guilty of applying the methods that developed North America and Australia.

Mr. Reed bases a long list of grievances against Zionists on the personal opinion of an unnamed writer of a letter to the Manchester Guardian, reprinted in Palestine, an unofficial paper, and unrelated to the Zionist organization. This presumably irresponsible letter-writer states that "the Zionists require a preference in the settlement of the waste and dead lands * * * and a priority in any concessions for public works on the development of the natural resources of Palestine." Aside from the very relevant and practical fact that the British Government is in control of Palestine, and that what "Zionism requires" counts for naught except insofar as, in the opinion of the British authorities, the best interests of Palestine may be advanced, Mr. Reed quite naïvely cites in destruction of his own argument the official statement of General Bols, assuring even-handed justice to all the inhabitants.

To refute the other charges, one need but quote Mr. Reed's own statements made in another article. In the Weekly Review he says, "Zionists do not wish equality of privilege for Christian, Arab, and Jew." Elsewhere, however, he wrote "the Zionist organization has founded orphanages and hospitals that minister not to the Jew alone, but to Christian and Moslem alike, and it has brought to maintain them many women highly qualified for their work both by their spirit of devotion and their technical training."* Again, he contends in this article that "organized Jewish labor in Palestine has declared that only Hebrews shall be employed on public works." And the irresponsible writer of the letter "reprinted in Palestine would require 'adequate employment of Jews in constructing and operating any public works.'" What are the facts? Have the Jewish colonists at any time in the past thirty years actually conducted a "boycott on Arab labor"? Let Mr. Reed himself speak. In another article he stated that the Arabs have found employment in the Jewish colonies to the extent of about one-third of the total population of the colonies.

As evidence of the Arab opposition to Zionism, Mr. Reed cites the fact that in some cities there have been Arabs who paraded and demonstrated. These were instigated by political propagandists that opposed a British mandate and that became particularly vigorous immediately prior to the confirmation of the Balfour Declaration by the Prime Ministers at San Remo. And as a climax to these efforts of months to incite the Arabs against the Jews, Mr. Reed mentions a riot in which five Jews and four Arabs were killed. Through a sinister propaganda, the Arabs are being taught the methods of the Black Hundreds of Russia. Ten thousand times five have been slaughtered in Europe since the signing of the armistice. Wholesale massacres of Jews to drive them out of Eastern Europe furnish a powerful motive to emigrate which can not be stemmed by a few retail killings in Palestine. The tremendous pressure driving Jews out of Europe can not be met by the petty resistance to their immigration into Palestine.

These excesses in Palestine are deplorable, but they do not reflect the sentiment of the masses. What is the true voice of the Arab? Does the absentee landlord, the effendi, the non-Palestinian Arab, who fears the deprivation of the privilege of exploiting the ignorant peasant, of the right to farm taxes and to thrive on bakshish, speak for the large majority of Arabs in Palestine? The latter sent a protest against the anti-Jewish riots in Jerusalem to General Bols. The representatives of eighty-two Arab villages sent this petition:

> We have the honor to express to you our protest and our demands be forwarded to the Peace Conference and to the British Government.
>
> First to cancel the declaration and demonstration of a few men in the cities of Palestine, especially Jerusalem and Jaffa. We, the undersigned, are the majority, in numbers seventy per cent. and in land and holdings (tenantry), ninety per cent. * * *
>
> We state further that there is no danger to public or private interests in Zionist immigration and that our mutual relations will be those of justice.

The generous soul that vibrates with sympathy may with profit turn his attention from the few hundred thousand Arabs in Palestine who are being raised to higher Western standards of living by the operations of the Zionist organization. Let him look to the millions of Jews in benighted lands, repressed and thwarted, and of potential service to the world which enjoys the fruits of the labors of a Bergson, an Ehrlich, a Flexner, and a Jacques Loeb. Let his righteous indignation be directed to secure for the Jews in Eastern Europe what the Balfour Declaration guarantees the Arabs in Palestine. Perhaps an altruist may find that it profits the Arabs more if he devotes his time, not to inciting them to riot in Palestine, but to developing them in the Hedjaz, Syria, and other Arab lands, many times as large as Palestine in area and in population, and richer in resources.

It is a penny-wise social policy which attempts to allay the imaginary ills of a small group and to ignore the physical suffering of a greater group. Mr. Reed may with profit ponder the closing verses of the book of Jonah, "Thou hast pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored nor madest it grow. And should I not spare that great city wherein are more than six score thousand persons?"

ELISHA M. FRIEDMAN

* Yale Review, April, 1920.

The Laodiceans

"To the Angel of the Church of the Laodiceans write . . . I know thy works, that thou art neither hot nor cold. I would thou wert cold or hot."

WE are the Laodiceans: we know not the ice nor the fire;
We have never sprung to the edge of doom at the call of a brave desire;
We have basked in the tepid noon-tides; we have drawn an even breath;
We have never felt between our lips the savors of life or death.

We are the Laodiceans, loved not by God nor man;
We boast in our ease or riches, and take what praise we can;
No love shall sear us with longing, no grief shall turn us to stone;
We shall not dance to the pipes of Spring, nor answer to joy or moan.

We are the Laodiceans: when God's great summons came,
Cleaving the hosts of living men, as with a line of flame,
We were tossed aside like vagrant leaves at an idle wind's behest,
For we knew not the ways of battle, and we found not the ways of rest.

We are the Laodiceans: we have slight fear of Hell,
For even its master can not say, "Ye have done my bidding well."
And what for us would Heaven be, with its endless lift and range?
We are doomed to a passionless limbo, that knows not life nor change.

We are the Laodiceans: we care not for wrong nor right;
We have no part in a world's defense, no cause for which to fight;
The fruits of the ground are sweet; we would rest in our garden-places,
But God Himself shall drive us out, between the black star-spaces.

We are the Laodiceans: our fight is with only those Who would send us to burning deserts, or whelm us in alien snows;
We feel no lure of march nor flight; we taste not hope nor shame;
And we die, in our visionless Eden, of a curse without a name.

MARION COUTHOUY SMITH

Correspondence

Retroactive Income Taxes

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

I have read with interest your very lucid editorial entitled "Stock Dividends Again." More than two months ago I sought to point out what you now show in your editorial—that a second tax on past incomes is, in reality, either a tax on property or on that which has ceased to exist. Those incomes either have been spent or have become capital. It is inconceivable that the Supreme Court would uphold a new tax on what no longer exists; and in so far as the past incomes have become capital, the tax would be a direct tax and void, because not apportioned among the States. The iniquity of the proposed tax is obvious for other reasons—its retroactiveness among them—but it has been a surprise to me that the very first conception of it was not killed by criticism as to its constitutionality. Instead of this I am informed by Mr. Rainey, its first proponent in Congress, that practically his entire committee considers it legal; and I learn that the legal advisers of the Treasury Department, in the beginning at least, were of this opinion too.

Some doubts, however, must have crept into Congressional minds on the subject, for another proponent of the same idea, Mr. Johnson of South Dakota, in his bill of April 27 for raising the bonus for soldiers, proposes a subterfuge to turn the Constitutional difficulty. He proposes to call his tax a tax on 1920 current income only, but to take up to 80 per cent. of it, or of what he defines as its "war income," using as a basis for his definition of "war income" the income, not of that year, but of the past years of 1917 to 1920. You had evidently not noticed this feature of our latest economic thought in Congress when you wrote your editorial, and I enclose correspondence that I have had with the Solicitor of Internal Revenue on that subject, which may be of interest to you. And Mr. Rainey has proposed a new bill in nearly identical terms with Mr. Johnson's. To my mind, while these new bills purport to tax this year's income, inasmuch as the rate of tax is based on the incomes of past years it is really another form of taxing a second time those past incomes. I believe such a tax as Mr. Johnson's is not only void because as a tax on past incomes it is a tax on capital, but also because it violates the uniformity clause of the Constitution. If Mr. Johnson's tax can be sustained, then by that same reasoning two persons, each having a hundred thousand dollars income in 1920, could be taxed on such incomes—the one just nothing at all because he happened to have no income in past years, and the other 80 per cent. solely because he did happen to have a large income in those other years.

Surely this is not an income tax for 1920 that complies with any reasonable view of the uniformity in taxation required by the Constitution. Nor is it an income tax at all, since it is not really based on current income but on something else. As well enact a tax on 1920 incomes so-called and base the rate on people's holdings of real estate. Would that be an income tax? I can not help thinking that these new measures are as obnoxious to the Constitution as Mr. Rainey's original measure, and that both are so, notwithstanding the opinions of the legal advisers of the Treasury or Mr. Rainey's committeemen.

The whole bonus proposal looks at this time less likely to become law than it did—but it will not do to relax our vigilance in any respect, when a bonus bill has just passed the House by a large majority and with a retroactive provision for taxing the corporate right to declare stock dividends.

CHARLES ROBINSON SMITH

Glendale, Mass., June 4

The Housing Problem

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

In your editorial "A Cost-of-Living Exhibit" on May 8, you fail to bring out what seems to me the most significant reason for the striking contrast between the relatively small increase in house rents and the great increase in clothing costs, etc.

Houses differ in one fundamental particular from the great majority of commodities which enter into commerce with sufficient freedom to establish ascertainable market prices. In the case of clothing and food and fuel, for example, the total stock on hand at any given time (actually or potentially on the market subject to sale and delivery for immediate use) is a fraction of the total annual production. In the case of houses, as in the case of diamonds and gold, the stock in existence, and potentially salable for immediate use to any buyer who offers an advance on the current market price, is enormously greater than the normal annual production, or even of any possible annual production under any conceivable stimulus.

A rising cost of production with any commodity of course tends to check additions to the stock on hand until the demand so outruns the supply as to raise the market price to meet the production cost. But while the effect is relatively prompt on the market price of those articles of which the stock on hand is quickly exhausted by actual consumption when the rate of production falls off, the readjustment is inevitably slow in the case of such things as houses, of which the quantity in existence and potentially on the market enormously exceeds the annual production. The market price commanded by new houses can not greatly outrun the market price of similar houses already existing, and to produce a given percentage of increase in the average market price of all existing marketable houses—the accumulated production of many years—the shortage must be much longer continued, or more acute, or both, than in the case of ordinary commodities.

Except in so far as the increased cost of production is very temporary, there appears to be no escape from the economic necessity of acquiescing in the accrual of a stupendously large "unearned increment" for the owners of the existing houses, until the market price and rental value of houses, old and new, shall have risen to the point where it catches up with the cost of production. The unfairness, the "profiteering," of such a process rankles, and this helps to retard the reluctant raising of purchase price and rentals even under the stimulus of acute and increasing shortage.

The human hardships and social damage which are wrought by such a shortage of housing, long continued, are for the community far more serious than the mere fact of the economic injustice of the "unearned increment" received by those who happen to be house owners. The housing shortage is one of the worst of all the evil results of inflation, because it combines slowness of price adjustment, on account of the relatively great stock potentially on the market, with great hardship while the shortage lasts.

In case of commodities whose market price responds violently to relative changes in supply and demand, making for spasmodic fluctuations in price, the interests of the community are served by devices which promptly apply the brakes to soaring or to plunging prices. In the case of houses the adjustment of price is naturally so slow that any deliberate efforts of the community should be in the direction of accelerating the required adjustment, whether on a rising or a falling market. To retard the process of adjusting house values to the cost of production by "anti-profiteering" efforts on the part of a community suffering from acute housing shortage is to play the part of those conservatives who were once defined as "they who remain in hot water lest they be scalded."

FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED

Brookline, Mass., June 1

[Mr. Olmsted treats the supply side of the housing problem; the editorial related to the demand side, "the way in which an increasing volume of money operates to raise prices." Eds. THE WEEKLY REVIEW.]

Book Reviews

A New History of the French Revolution

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION: A STUDY IN DEMOCRACY. By Nesta H. Webster. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

MOST histories of the French Revolution inspire either enthusiasm or indignation, or, it may be, a mixture of both. Mrs. Webster's new history inspires rather, and is intended to inspire, a sort of cool disgust. The odd circumstance is that she gets this effect not as an enemy but as a champion of the popular cause. Her argument is, in brief, as follows: The King knew what the people wanted and was prepared to give it to them; but at the critical moment various groups of conspirators interfered violently and thwarted both the royal and the popular will. Mrs. Webster divides the conspirators into four main groups: (1) those who sought to change the dynasty of France and put the Duc d'Orléans (Philippe Egalité) on the throne; (2) the Subversives, affiliated with Spartacus-Weishaupt and the Illuminati of Bavaria, who attacked all religion and government, fomented class hatred, and held out the promise of unlimited loot; (3) those who worked in the interests of Prussia; (4) the English revolutionaries who aimed to overthrow the Governments both of France and England. Only the fourth of these intrigues may be said to have failed outright. Prussia succeeded in breaking the Franco-Austrian alliance and this became the point of departure for her increasing domination. The Orléanists triumphed in the Revolution of 1830. As for the Subversives with their dangerous secrets for imposing the will of a fanatical and highly organized minority upon a passive and unorganized majority, one can trace their activities without any change in the underlying theory—and it is a chief merit of Mrs. Webster that she brings out clearly this connection—from Jacobins of the eighteenth century to Bolshevists of the twentieth.

There were the instigators (who remained in the background), the agitators, the instruments. Mrs. Webster admits popular participation in the taking of the Bastille and in the Tenth of August, but in general, as in the September Massacres, the people were either mere instruments or passive spectators. "I am convinced," she says, "that the day will come when the world, enlightened by the principles of true democracy, will recognize that the French Revolution was not an advance towards democracy but a directly antidemocratic and reactionary movement, that it was not a struggle for liberty but an attempt to strangle liberty at its birth; the leaders will then be seen in their true colors as the cruelest enemies of the people, and the people, no longer condemned for their ferocity, will be pitied as the victims of a gigantic conspiracy."

Mrs. Webster's justification of the heart of the people is, one can not help reflecting, more or less at the expense of its head. Had it not been for the prodigious gullibility of great masses of persons, the formidable secrets that she describes for inciting tumults in the interests of a few conspirators would have been of no avail. She herself speaks in one place of "the amazing credulity of the Parisians" and in another of "the amazing credulity of the country people."

The truth is that neither the good nor the evil of a movement like the French Revolution emanates spontaneously from the people. It is all a question of leadership; and the one serious doubt about democracy is whether it can show sufficient critical discrimination in the choice of its leaders. Now, the Revolution was, on the whole, singularly unlucky in its leaders. Mirabeau and Danton, who had practical sagacity, were venal voluptuaries. Those who were upright, like Louis XVI himself and many of his counsellors, and who yet allowed the Revolution to drift into anarchy, suffered from something even graver than the lack of practical sagacity. They were made ineffective by their acceptance of some of the very principles that led to this anarchy and which, in the earlier stages of their application, seem to Mrs. Webster so admirable. Croker speaks of "the King's unfortunate monomania that no blow should be struck in his defense." This monomania is not unrelated to the growing belief not only that the will of the people is sovereign but is identical with its shifting caprice, for example, with the will of a Parisian mob. If the King and his counsellors had not been thus touched by the new philosophy, the "whiff of grapeshot" would not have come before 1790 at the latest and there would have been no reign of Terror.

In general, Mrs. Webster does not put sufficient emphasis on the philosophic aspect of the Revolution. She has written an interesting and ingenious survey from her own special angle, but one can not help feeling that the angle is a somewhat narrow one. At times she seems almost to reduce the Revolution to the proportions of a dynastic intrigue. She does not make us feel sufficiently that, more than any previous revolution, it must be judged as a movement of ideas —nay more, as the dawn of a new religion or sham religion. She is quite right in seeing one continuous movement from Spartacus-Weishaupt to Lenin; but we shall never understand the power of these men if we regard them simply as "subversives." In their own eyes and those of their followers they are, as she herself points out, "idealists." The enthusiasm they inspire is due, above all, to their appeal to the type of imagination that one may call, in opposition to the "moral imagination" of which Burke speaks, Arcadian. One should make large allowance for the idyllic element in the psychology of the terrorist. It seems incredible that Robespierre and St. Just should have hoped by wholesale massacre to bring the real France, which was too rich and populous, into line with the Sparta of their dreams. Unfortunately scarcely anything is incredible in those who, in pursuit of some "ideal" conjured up by the Arcadian imagination, have once allowed their logic and emotions to part company with common sense. In spite of the accumulated experience of a century as to the upshot of revolutionary Utopias, Mr. Bertrand Russell has just been setting forth, in the columns of the Liberator, an "ideal" that is as absurd in theory and would prove at least as sanguinary in practice as that of Robespierre and St. Just.

The Revolution abolished innumerable partial evils and accomplished innumerable partial goods. It is still possible, however, to doubt, not merely on tradition but on purely psychological grounds, whether this movement was right at the very centre. Carlyle, whom Mrs. Webster, like most other recent writers on the subject, disparages, puts the issue squarely: "Alas, no, M. Roux! A Gospel of Brotherhood, not according to any of the Four old Evangelists, and calling on men to repent, and amend each his own wicked existence, that they might be saved; but a Gospel rather, as we often hint, according to a new Fifth Evangelist, Jean-Jacques, calling on men to amend each the whole world's wicked existence, and be saved by making the Constitution."

According to Mrs. Webster, England was preserved from the French anarchy and ruin not only by the statesmanship of Pitt and eloquence of Burke but by the sound common sense of the English people. She might have added by the influence of religion, especially by the Methodist and Evangelical movements. These movements were marked by plenty of the new emotionalism, but at all events they did not encourage the individual to shift the burden of moral responsibility, to make "Society his glittering bride, and airy hopes his children." At present, if we are to judge from the article by the Bishop of Hereford in the Edinburgh Review of last January, the drift of an important section of the Anglican clergy is towards Socialism.

Study and Fable

AN IMPERFECT MOTHER. By J. D. Beresford. New York: The Macmillan Company.

TAMARISK TOWN. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE deadly limitation of the kind of realism that tries to record fact without interpreting it is that it so soon runs short of facts. The only story a man knows with literal knowledge is his own. Or there may be some single person or type outside himself who is so intimate a part of his consciousness and his experience as to belong to his story almost as he himself belongs to it. Mr. Theodore Dreiser knows Mr. Dreiser, esse and posse (no great range); and he knows a woman of whom Sister Carrie is the earliest and best embodiment. When he has set forth the beings and surroundings and doings of those two (as he did long ago), he is done. Thereafter he can only deal in variation and caricature. That is his sad fate, and we oughtn't to keep twitting him on it. So it is with a number of his English contemporaries, J. D. Beresford, for example. He wrote three novels about one Jacob Stahl—an amazingly intimate and absorbing chronicle of a fellow-being who, we never doubted for a moment, was in everything that mattered the author himself. Jacob pleased us, or held us, primarily, I think, because while he was not a noble hero of the antiquated Victorian strain, he was not, either, the feeble wordy æsthetic drifter of a later model. He had a preference for decency and even an instinct for conduct. So has the son of "An Imperfect Mother." Stephen Kirkwood is a Jacob Stahl mutatis mutandis, a good solid youth of lower middle class who after a touch of public school training chooses to go in for the solid unpretentious career of building contractor.

But this is the record of "a life unfolding under a definite influence." In fact, we are here observing a Jacob, or a Stephen, in a frankly psychoanalytical light, especially in relation to the influence of his mother. And in order to give saliency to this study, Stephen is provided with a mother extraordinary, a mother modern and temperamental. We are to suppose that she married Stephen's good little father out of cussedness; that she bore marriage and motherhood with tolerably good grace for twenty years; and that she then fell madly in love with one Threlfall, cathedral organist and ravager of hearts. After coolly discussing this with Stephen, now a boy of seventeen, she leaves him and her poor little devoted husband, and her two grown prigs of daughters, and goes off with her Threlfall to "live her own life." Years later, long after the death of the poor little husband, Stephen finds his mother in London, a successful minor figure of the theatre; married to her Threlfall, who has also succeeded; and ornament of a gay little upper-Bohemian society. Something of the old spell of almost passionate affection is rewoven between them. But another influence which at its birth has had much to do with their first parting is now deepened and confirmed. The imperfect mother at last transcends her nature by yielding Stephen to his predestined mate. It is an easy enough book to read; but there is nothing much to carry away from it, except the impression of an experienced chronicler rehandling his materials in the light of an "idea." Stephen's self-expressive mother is the new figure; but only new as a subject for Mr. Beresford; and, on the whole, rather outside his special realistic scene.

The "new novel" of England (aside from its public-school and country-house department) deals almost exclusively with the British middle-class provincial, either at home or in London—the Clayhangers and the Jacob Stahls. Monypenny of "Tamarisk Town" is a Clayhanger robed in romance. His maker belongs to a group later and less standardized than Mr. Beresford's. In this book, as in "The Challenge to Sirius," Sheila Kaye-Smith strikes a richer imaginative note than Mr. Beresford, or any of his contemporaries except Hugh Walpole, has been capable of. Veracity is of no consequence to this writer except as a means of interpretation. Nor is she content with the dry conversational cleverness of the pseudo-recorders. She uses language not as a set of counters but as a plastic medium. She has a power of description not less eloquent than that of Eden Phillpotts, and free from his tendency to lapse into a sort of hypnotic drone.

> In the hollow of the hills that, to the North, melted into the Sussex Weald and, to the South, broke and crumbled into the sea, Marlingate lay with the green of the tamarisks hazing its streets. The town itself was a tumble of blacks and reds, a mass of broken colors flung between the hills, into the little scoop between the woods and the sea. It lay there like a thing flung down, heaped and broken, rolling to the very edge of the waves, and held from falling into them only by its thick, battered Town Wall.
>
> A mist usually hung over it, the webbing and clotting of its sea breezes as their spindrift met the homely things of its atmosphere—the grey hearth-smoke, the stewing heat of the town's crooked ways, the dews that refreshed the tamarisks at night. There was nearly always this fog of smoke and spray over Marlingate, melting its reds through purple into the deep, dancing blue of the sea; only now and then the colors came out clearly, blocks of blacks and red, with slashes and slices of white, and the old grey mouldings of church and Town Hall with their battlemented windows. Then the weather-wise spoke of rain, and those wise in other ways than the weather's, saw in the town a queer, changeling beauty, as if it lay between the hills a fairy's town. A wind would rise and shake in the woods, and blow down Fish Street and High Street to the sea; and the sighing waves would answer the sighing trees, and roar and cry to each other over the little red town that divided them, deep calling to deep, eternity calling to eternity across time.

So runs the prelude, with Monypenny, the solitary, watching from his window in Gun Garden House, feeling the menace of nature, of the woods and sea about to regain their own, of himself and Marlingate already "pledged to a divine destruction."

Monypenny of Marlingate, in his grave and white-haired youth, imposes himself as a personal force upon his fellow-townsmen. He plans and achieves prosperity for the little fishing town through transformation into a fashionable resort, carefully protected from trippers and all cheap lures for cheap people. Then love comes to him and cheats him; and to avenge himself against fate he sets about the slow destruction of that which he has created. As mayor he is able insidiously to effect the vulgarization of the place; and in the end he perishes, by a frankly poetic justice, at the hands of the mob he has turned loose to the ruin of his once beloved town. The tale has something of the magic of style and of mood which belonged to Stevenson's fragmentary "Weir of Hermiston"; and as it is a work of imagination we need have relatively small fear of later and paler imitations or variants of the same product by the same hand. I can think of rereading this book; for me it has the glamour of true story-telling, the creative reality which is so dismally absent from most studies of fact.

H. W. BOYNTON

Admiral Fisher Speaks His Mind

MEMORIES AND RECORDS. By the Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Fisher, in two volumes, with portraits and illustrations. Vol. I, MEMORIES. Vol II, RECORDS. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THESE are books, as the author admits, "without plan or sequence"—so many lightning flashes of wit, scorn, indignation, admiration, and ambition. One imagines a hale and hearty old man walking up and down the floor, thundering and sputtering, while the rapt stenographer works—from time to time shying letters and documents at her, partly to ballast the recitation, partly to see her duck her pretty head. Anecdote, official report, character sketch, apt quotation, hint of literary and religious preferences are a glittering woof woven into the warp of solid naval history. And the gaudy fabric has coherence and charm of its own sort. One feels the great personality behind an often fantastic rhetoric.

When Admiral Fisher became First Sea Lord in 1904, he celebrated his advent by scrapping 160 obsolete ships, and discharging 6,000 unnecessary mechanics. Long an advocate of speed and the big gun, he reorganized the fleet on the basis of dreadnoughts and battle cruisers. He stopped the dispersion of the fleet, assembling most of it in home waters, and keeping it in constant readiness for action. In 1902 he had democratized the training of officers through the establishment of the College at Osborne. In 1907 he completed this work by making promotion open throughout the naval ranks. He foresaw the submarine menace, predicted the war with Germany to the year, advocated in vain a proper provision of sea mines, introduced the turbine engine and fuel oil. He reduced the time of building battleships from three years to one. With volcanic energy he combined adroitness. He not merely discharged the 6,000 workmen made superfluous by scrapping useless ships, but also found them jobs. With the keenest sense for matériel, he never lost touch with the greater issues of strategy. When he retired in 1910, he left as his monument the modern British Navy.

He had become an enfant terrible. The office admirals hated him. The pacifists shuddered at him. Had he not advocated "boiling oil" at a Hague Conference, and advised "Copenhagening" the German fleet? Yet the people knew his worth, and so did the young navy. October 30, 1914, two months after war broke out, he was recalled to his old post of First Sea Lord. Three days after his appointment came news of the disaster off Coronel. Fisher launched the only Nelsonic stroke of the war. He sent Sturdee's battle cruisers to sea with the repair gangs aboard, and on December 8, Von Spee's squadron was annihilated off the Falklands. Nothing less than the control of the seas was involved in the decision. A prolonged chase of Von Spee would have seriously weakened the North Sea fleet, while by the simple process of dispersing his cruisers as commerce destroyers, England's sea traffic might have been crippled. On this single conclusive fight of the war the Oxford Professor of Poetry, Sir Herbert Warren, fairly beat the punning record, and in Latin, as follows, Merserat Ex-Spe Spem, rediit spes, mergitur ex-spes, which congratulatory verse may be rendered: "Von Spee sunk the Good Hope. Hope revived. Von Spee is sunk hopelessly."

In his six months of control, Lord Fisher planned a great armada of 612 vessels to seize the Baltic and effect a Russian landing in Pomerania, laid down the gigantic, lightly armored battle cruisers—the so-called "Irish ships," made good the deficiency in submarines, and prepared gunboats for the Mesopotamian campaign. He resigned in May, 1915, when he found the navy was to be seriously expended in the futile campaign at the Dardanelles, but continued to do great work as Chairman of the Board of Invention and Research.

He would himself be the first to admit that his loss to the Admiralty was irreparable. Small defensive ideas, theories of attrition dominated by the naval strategy of England, and the fiasco of Jutland were a necessary consequence of lack of energy and imagination. And the only man in England who could have supplied that imagination and energy was the septuagenarian Admiral Fisher. Again, we have his word for it, and the joke of it is that he is perfectly right. "Passive pressure" to be sure brought the German fleet ignominiously to Scapa, but it also prolonged the war by two or three unnecessary years. And what if the German fleet had been "Copenhagened" in 1910?

John Arbuthnot Fisher's prodigious energy and zest for life were lucky in finding early opportunity. At 13, in 1854, the last living Captain of Nelson joined with Nelson's niece to get him a midshipman's appointment. From 15 to 19 he shared in the China War, at 19 he was in acting command of a small vessel. "I entered the navy penniless, friendless, and forlorn. While my messmates were having jam, I had to go without. While their stomachs were full, mine was often empty. I have always had to fight like hell, and fighting like hell has made me what I am."

One keeps going in such a life only through abundant toughness and humor and sentiment. Admiral Fisher has these qualities super-abundantly. In the sixties he would vary the responsibility for the British Navy by dancing all night. He openly yearns for America because the land of the Summer Girl which may be secured in Midwinter at Palm Beach need not be relinquished till Midsummer at Bar Harbor. He rejoices in the American ship's barber who propitiated an impatient client by asking him if he were leaving the ship. Admiral Fisher's gift for comradeship makes him an admirable portraitist. King Edward is drawn to the life, in his beautiful considerateness, slightly tinged with fussiness. "He had the Heavenly gift of Proportion and Perspective." Even more vivid are the sketches of seamen. Absent-minded Lord Kelvin, entering immaculately dressed with his trousers neatly carried on his arm, is unforgettable. One loves the unnamed admiral who because torpedoes were not known in his youth declined to bother about them in his old age. He was probably the same one who being torpedoed thrice in manœuvres by a submarine and requested by the young commander to withdraw, simply signalled in return "You be damned." But the obscure portraits are even better, and an anthologist could make a handsome gleaning. There is no dull moment in the two volumes. As epilogue we may choose a letter to a friend which has bearings on navy matters both sides of the water.

March 27, 1918.

My dear Blank,

It has been a most disastrous war for one simple reason—that our navy, with a sea supremacy quite unexampled in the history of the world (we are five times stronger than the enemy) has been relegated into being a "subsidiary service". What crashes we have had!

Tirpitz—Sunk
Joffre—Stranded
Kitchener—Drowned
Lord French—
Lord Jellicoe— } Made Viscounts
Lord Devenport—
Fisher—Marooned

* * *

Heaven bless you! I am here walking 10 miles a day! and eating my heart out!

And a host of minor prophets promoted. (We don't shoot now! we promote!)

Yours, etc.,
FISHER.

Suggestions for a Far Eastern Policy

HAVE WE A FAR EASTERN POLICY? By Charles H. Sherrill. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

ONE-HALF of Mr. Sherrill's book is not suggested by its title, and deals with matters which have no political implications—with the flora of the Hawaiian Islands, with Japanese umbrellas, footwear, lanterns, street games, chrysanthemum shows, and private gardens. Upon these topics Mr. Sherrill writes entertainingly and with artistic appreciation, but without adding much of substantial value to what is already common knowledge.

As to whether the United States has a definite Far Eastern policy, a negative is not distinctly asserted but is clearly implied. At any rate our author presents us with one of his own which he considers worthy of adoption by our Government. Shortly stated, it is as follows: That the United States should refrain from all opposition to Japan's expansion north and west upon the continent of Asia, that is, in the regions of Manchuria, Mongolia, and Siberia; that, in return, Japan should agree to abandon her southeasterly development and transfer the Caroline and Marshall Islands to international control or to administration by Australia; and, thirdly, that Japan, Australia, and the United States should jointly guarantee the independence of the Philippines. This plan, he says, "ought to satisfy all four parties concerned, assure peace in the Pacific, progress for American trade in coöperation with Japan, and add another star of altruistic achievement to the American escutcheon." At what point the American altruism enters it is a little difficult to see, unless it is deemed a laudable philanthropy that Japan be permitted to secure an increase of her political and commercial interests at the expense, or, at any rate, without regard to the wishes of, China and Russia. The belief that, from such a policy, progress for American trade in the Far East would be promoted is evidently founded upon a confidence that Japan will reverse all her former practices and permit the nationals of other Powers to trade upon equal terms with her own subjects in regions over which she has dominant political influence or control.

Mr. Sherrill also refers to another Far Eastern policy for the United States, first put forward by him in 1915, according to which the Philippine Islands should be exchanged for European possessions in the Caribbean Sea. He says that he has received many expressions of approval of this plan, but he does not dwell upon it to the extent of explaining whether or not this would mean the abandonment by the United States of all efforts to exercise an influence, political or commercial, in the Orient.

Without stopping further to consider these attempts at constructive statesmanship, we may turn to some of the other points made by Mr. Sherrill. The strategical importance to the United States of the Hawaiian Islands is properly emphasized. By the possession of Jaluit, on one of the Marshall Islands, attention is called to the fact that Japan obtains a naval base some fourteen hundred miles nearer to Hawaii, and therefore to California, than she had previously possessed. Of Japan's determination to control Shantung, Mr. Sherrill says:

> It means an eleventh-hour decision to prevent the passage into white hands of that last remnant of Asia which fronted on the Japan dominated waters, the waters so vital to the island race living in their midst. . . . If I were Japanese, I would loosen my hold on Shantung at the same time that the French, English, and Russians relinquish their acquisitions of Chinese territory, and not a minute sooner . . . If Japan had not taken over Germany's rights in Shantung . . . then one of the usual European annexers would surely have stepped in just as England did into Wei-hai-wei, or Russia into Manchuria after the Japanese defeat of China, and annexed it. At the date of this writing I firmly believe that China will receive back far more of Shantung from the Japanese than she would have gotten had the English or French occupied the German holdings there.

Mr. Sherrill is of course entitled to hold such personal opinions as these, but they surely must have been formed in ignorance or disregard of occurrences in China and Korea since 1905. How little Mr. Sherrill appreciates Chinese national sentiment is shown by his description of the recent "student movement" in China as "a pettish outburst against a stronger race by one whose childish behavior confesses its helplessness to employ more manly methods of national protest."

Mr. Sherrill is convinced that the Filipinos are not yet qualified for full self-government, and that an independent Philippine republic, unprotected by some strong Power, would not long endure, and might, indeed, prove a serious menace to a peaceful Pacific.

Japan's record in Korea he reviews with complaisance and even commendation.

W. W. Willoughby

The Run of the Shelves

Books of the Week

[Selected by Edmund Lester Pearson, Editor of Publications, New York Public Library.]

The Stranger. By Arthur Bullard. Macmillan.

A new novel by the author who, as "Albert Edwards," wrote "A Man's World" and "Comrade Yetta."

Swinburne as I Knew Him. By Coulson Kernahan. Lane.

Beginning the process of "unfreezing" Swinburne—strange as it seems that anything glacial should be connected with his name.

The Irish Case, Before the Court of Public Opinion. By P. Whitwell Wilson, American correspondent of the London Daily News. Revell.

Written at the request of Americans, to refute the theory of the Sinn Fein that anything about Ireland by an Englishman is "propaganda," but by a Sinn Feiner becomes "facts."

Simsadus: London; The American Navy in Europe. By John Langdon Leighton. Holt.

"Simsadus" was Admiral Sims's cable address. The book describes our naval participation from the point of view of American naval headquarters.

It would be hard to think of a more appropriate and more interesting special collection of books for a public library than that of New Bedford, which has filled a large number of its shelves with books about whales and the whale fisheries. Books, pamphlets, whalers' log-books, and pictures make up the collection, which is listed and described in a bibliography whose mere items are fascinating to read. There is Lorrin Andrews' treatise (with Hawaiian imprint) entitled "Sabbath Whaling; or, Is it Right to Take Whales on the Sabbath?"—which one may imagine a Yankee skipper answering with, "Yes, provided you take Right whales." There is the "Narrative of the most extraordinary and distressing shipwreck of the whale-ship Essex * * * which was attacked and finally destroyed by a large spermaceti whale in the Pacific ocean," published in 1821. And there is so modern an item as "Whale Meat and Hooverism." The bibliography is illustrated, notably with a half-tone of the fine statue of the Whaleman, which stands before the New Bedford Public Library, with its motto: "A dead whale or a stove boat."

"Talks with T. R." from the diaries of John J. Leary, Jr. (Houghton Mifflin Company) is an unusually interesting book. It is a really valuable book. It is certain to be read; it deserves to be read. But it should certainly not be read alone. The Roosevelt of these papers is real, but partial; he is a reporter's Roosevelt, a Roosevelt cast in type-metal. The Roosevelt of the Autobiography is not this Roosevelt; he is only his brother. Still less is the Roosevelt of the letters to the children Mr. Leary's T. R.; he is only his cousin. It is what we may call without any malice the Cashel Byron attitude of Mr. Roosevelt that is conspicuous in Mr. Leary's pages, and the style is like the splitting of kindling wood. Sometimes a match is put to the kindlings. There is much plain sense and much more plain speaking; the certainty is characteristic, the vigor is stimulating, the sincerity is unquestionable. Mr. Roosevelt copies and enacts nobody else; a cynic might suggest that he sometimes copies or enacts T. R. The author of the book had done well to omit certain virulent assaults on living Americans, notably President Wilson. At the time of utterance these words may have been excusable, but their publication after Mr. Roosevelt's death and before Mr. Wilson's is a matter which even the admirers of Mr. Roosevelt and the adversaries of President Wilson may permit themselves to regret. Allusion is made to the "pseudo-Americanism of Wilson." Wilson is a "selfish, dishonest politician"; he "never had an ideal in his life." "I despise the man, and dislike his policies to the point of hate." The motto "de mortuis nil nisi bonum" would seem to have its correlative, indeed its condition and occasion, in the silent formula, "a mortuis nil nisi bonum." One should not fire from behind a tomb; the shelter is too manifest. What Mr. Roosevelt now feels, if his mind still acts, no one can say. But it is at least permitted to the generous and the loyal to hope that he left vindictiveness on the meaner side of the grave, that he has risen to a point of view from which his charity can include in its enlarging circle all his fellow-citizens, even that citizen in whose hands rests for the moment the pilotage of the Republic.

Professor Horatio S. White, of Harvard, the literary executor of the late Willard Fiske, Librarian of Cornell, is continuing the series of volumes drawn from the latter's posthumous papers. The first of these was "Chess Tales and Chess Miscellanies," which appeared in 1912. The present volume, "The Editor" (Badger), is the first of three to be printed under the general title, "Memorials of Willard Fiske," and is just out. It is made up of selections from Mr. Fiske's editorial work on the Syracuse, N. Y., daily Journal, from 1863 to 1865, and will be followed by "The Traveller" and "The Lecturer," and finally by a biography.

At this moment when the whole process of bookmaking is even more beset with difficulties in France than here, it is most creditable on the part of the Plon-Nourit house to begin a series of cheap but well-printed books whose contents is of more than passing worth. The "Bibliothèque Plon," 16mo, paper-covered volumes of from 200 to 250 pages, began appearing last winter, at the low price of two francs, and fourteen have so far been issued, with two additional volumes each month. Among the authors represented are Paul Bourget; the new academician, Henry Bordeaux; the late Paul Margueritte, Mistral, and Dostoievsky. The two newest volumes are "Le Chèvre d'Or," by Paul Arène, the Provençal poet who died in 1896, a tale of passionate love told with all the verve of a meridional; and "Jeanne d'Arc," one of M. Gabriel Hanotaux's best pot-boiling productions, a condensation and rehash of the octavo and quarto which he published ten years ago through Hachette. If M. Hanotaux was sent last month as a special ambassador to the Jeanne d'Arc canonization ceremonies at Rome, it was largely due to association of his name through these volumes with that of the new saint.

Poe books continue to appear in France. Since we noticed in this column a few weeks ago Fontainas's "Vie d'Edgar Poe," even a more acknowledged specialist, Professor Emile Lauvrière, has come forward with another volume, his third, devoted to "one of the most popular authors of the whole world," as he styles him. "Edgar Poe: Contes et Poésies" (Paris: La Renaissance du Livre) opens with an Introduction which is a résumé of M. Lauvrière's two previous volumes—"Edgar Poe, sa Vie et son Oeuvre" (Paris: Alcan, 1904) and "Edgar Poe" (Paris: Bloud and Gay, 1911), "scientific studies of the poet," as he describes them. The publisher of the present volume also issues a series entitled "Les Cent Chefs-d'œuvre Etrangers," which contains a neat little volume of Poe, some 150 pages of prose and 30 of poetry. While the peculiar aroma of the Tales is fairly well preserved in translation, the same is not true of the poetry, as M. Lauvrière is the first to admit. "To Helen," "Eldorado," and "The Raven" lose half of their indescribable charm in French, and "The Bells" presented such difficulties that M. Lauvrière has left it severely alone.

Sending us his book, Professor Lauvrière gives us these "three chief reasons why Poe exerts such an influence in France":

> The first is that, however morbid he may be, he reasons, and most educated Frenchmen like reasoning. The second lies in the fact that his fantasticality reached us at the very moment when that sort of thing had a vogue in France. The third is because he had a good translator—Baudelaire—who was fascinated by him and had the public attention at that moment. It should be noted, too, that it is the prose of Poe which has exercised influence in France, for his poetry, in my opinion, is untranslatable, the music of words not being transportable into another tongue, especially in the case of a language without tonic accent.

In the Revue des Deux Mondes for March 15, 1920, M. George Lecomte has the following sentence: "Les Associations d'écrivains viennent de la leur

FACTS ABOUT INDUSTRY FOUND BY ECONOMIC RESEARCH
The National Industrial Conference Board
has issued a number of Research Reports on timely questions of vital importance prepared by the Board's Research Staff from facts ascertained by extensive investigation and field work—including:

Experience with Works Councils	$1.50
Wartime Changes in Wages	$1.50
Cost of Living	.75
Experience with Profit-Sharing	$1.00
Hours of Work as Related to Output and Health	$2.00

FOR THE BUSY EXECUTIVE
INDUSTRIAL NEWS SURVEY
A weekly digest of important industrial news
$2.00 a year
Address Dept X for Complete List of Publications
NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD
15 Beacon Street Boston, Mass

The Founding of Boston

IN 1630, John Winthrop, Governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company, leading 700 Pilgrims from England, settled on the north bank of the River Charles. Insufficient water supply compelled a move.

An earlier inhabitant told of Shawmut—Indian for living water—an abundant spring, on the peninsula. There the colony located their new-world Boston.

The National Shawmut Bank is established within a stone's throw of that historic site, now in the heart of America's greatest workshop for shoes, leather, textiles, paper and machinery.

For 300 years ships carrying New England goods have sailed the Seven Seas and brought to our shores the products of foreign lands. Since 1836, the National Shawmut Bank has participated intelligently as bankers to international commerce, with a directorate representing the leading interests of this intensely developed territory.

Accurate, individual service is given to clients everywhere in handling goods, funds and documents. Collections, also up-to-date trade and credit data, are among the facilities offered. Direct connections are maintained with principal domestic and foreign banks.

Special inquiries are invited.

Our booklets, "The Far East", "Acceptances", "Scandinavia" and "The Webb Law" discuss the most satisfactory methods of handling and developing foreign business. Write for copies.

THE NATIONAL SHAWMUT BANK of Boston
Resources over Two Hundred and Fifty Million Dollars

['la' means 'criticism'; 'leur' refers to 'publishers'] rappeler en essayant de provoquer une résurrection de la critique littéraire, ainsi que, sur la proposition de la Société des Gens de Lettres et du Syndicat de la Critique, le Congrès du Livre de 1917 en a solennellement émis le voeu" (page 427). Two points in this remark impress the observant foreigner. The first is the state of French criticism, as it appears even to bodies, to organizations, always far slower than individuals in the perception and reception of ideas. "Résurrection" is a strong word. Its logical antecedent is death. But M. Anatole France is still breathing, still articulate, and, even if the darkest view be sound, if no survivors are discernible, it is certain that in their common departure from the salon of French letters criticism will say politely to M. Anatole France, "After you."

The second point of interest is the nature of the remedy. We have an Association, a Society, a Syndicate, a Congress, banding zealously together for the resuscitation of the art. An American or Briton would feel that the patient—at least the Anglo-Saxon patient—would be more likely to come to in the absence of so many officious nurses to surround his pillow and cut off the air. But France still relies on collective action in the field of letters. The love of revolt, which is characteristic of the period, has not destroyed the faith in discipline, which is characteristic of the race. The French still value authority, and the double occasion which authority gives for the grace of loyalty and the elation of revolt. One of the differentiæ of French criticism is the precision of its attempt to express the reaction of the absolute or general French minds to the French mind in particular (that is, to the book in its hands). In the later nineteenth century, criticism itself was often particular, often adventurous, but, even so, it defined adventure in the sense natural to a people in whom the respect for tradition is compatible with a pretty strong infusion of the contempt for tradition. Possibly the present movement means the recall of criticism to its old centrality. The inference from M. Lecomte's remark would be that the French not only want criticism, but will it, and that the will no less than the want may be powerful in the sustaining or revivifying of the form.

Drama

On the Verge of Literature

Violet Pearn's "Fair" at the Neighborhood Playhouse . . . "Nightshade" at the Garrick Theatre.

VIOLET PEARN'S "Fair," which has held the boards for half-a-dozen week-ends at the Neighborhood Playhouse, is an attempt to depict and to decide the conflict between puritan and epicure in a sombre village on the Cornish edge of Devonshire. Strollers set up a fair with dancing and music in the dreary centre of the protesting little town. A ferment begins in the pleasure-loving heart of the young daughter of the austerest elder of the village, and extends itself to the young minister, who is moved to joy, terror, and bewilderment by the sight of her replenished loveliness. In the critical midnight scene of the second act, he is impelled to take her life as an agent or embodiment of Satan, and, in the recoil from his own violence, is converted to the worship of beauty, and leads her forth in Act III to share with him a new life in the joyousness of unfettered impulse. The play is too slight for its central incident, and its frail and slender fabric can not sustain the formidable weight of an attempt at homicide from religious motives.

It will be seen from the prompt and cheerful outcome that the doubleness of the universe presents no difficulties to Miss Violet Pearn. The universe is perfectly simple. "Then come kiss me, Sweet-and-Twenty," is the sum and kernel of its message. That impulse is both holy and accursed, that restraint is both groveling and noble, that human instinct is profoundly right and profoundly wrong in its interpretation of the needs of the human spirit—these complexities have no disquiets for Miss Pearn. I shall not contest the main thesis, but one little unfairness in the use of the term beauty is worth pointing out. Beauty is related on its upper side to the dignities and sanctities of life, and on its lower side to the sports and gayeties. You may call beauty sacred (Miss Pearn talks of the God of beauty); you may call pleasure beautiful; and in this double turn you have almost consecrated pleasure. This seems the unconscious strategy of Miss Pearn.

Do I lay too much stress on the moral and rational aspect of a simple folk-tale? If so, it is Miss Pearn's own uncurbed didacticism that has invited and countenanced that stress. Miss Pearn's thesis dominates her story exactly as the hated father dominates the young girl in her play; it allows the wild young thing no peace or freedom in the fulfilment of its own impulse. I think it rather unfair in Miss Pearn to pound the desk so much in denunciation of the general unrighteousness of preaching. She is not without talent; she can even stir us for a moment as in the young minister's really penetrating outcry: "O God, dost thou know how hard it is to be a man?" But my judgment of the "Fair" as a whole is that the author has unduly simplified her tale to provide more space for the expounding of an unduly simplified philosophy.

The acting was fair. Miss Alice Lewisohn makes the young girl a sprite, sheer, and absolute sprite, from first to last. This is excusable, but hardly wise. Obedience to the call of the wild would be much less remarkable and therefore much less dramatic in a sprite than in a human being. Mr. Thomas F. Meaney, Jr., made the minister's pietism and his interior conflict imaginable, but did not make real to us his impulse towards beauty, his quest of the gleam. The best acting in the play was supplied by Messrs. S. Philip Mann, Jowan Pherys, and John Roche in the neatly defined and sharply contrasted comedy of the three elders. An arch and deft pantomime ballet called the "Magic Shop" formed an engaging afterpiece to the serious play.

"Nightshade," by an unknown hand, was produced June 7-11, by Mr. Henry Stillman at the Garrick Theatre in special matinees. The performance leaves criticism rather cold to the play and rather friendly to the author. Compact intensities in mutual relations, an air that remains electrical long before it becomes explosive, the power, in Miriam, for instance, to keep a character on the exact boundary between two contrasted attitudes—these traits are palpitant with promise. Even the diction, on which

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street — Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres. — H. W. Shaw
James Dodd, Vice-Pres. — J. A. Flynn
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres. — A. C. Downing, Jr.
Harry Forsyth, Treas. — W. MacNaughten, Assistant Secretaries
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y — E. B. Lewis, Asst. Treas.

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Mrs. Key Cammack..........Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell.........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES

Otto T. Bannard — F. N. Hoffstot
S. Reading Bertron — Buchanan Houston
James A. Blair — Walter Jennings
Mortimer N. Buckner — Darwin P. Kingsley
James C. Colgate — John C. McCall
Alfred A. Cook — Ogden L. Mills
Arthur J. Cumnock — John J. Mitchell
Robert W. de Forest — James Parmelee
John B. Dennis — Henry C. Phipps
Philip T. Dodge — Norman P. Ream
George Doubleday — Dean Sage
Samuel H. Fisher — Joseph J. Slocum
John A. Garver — Myles Tierney
Benjamin S. Guinness — Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

satire has been so quick to fasten, seems to me to preserve its affinities with vigor in the midst of its surrender to absurdity. The difficulties of the play, apart from the unwisdom of this diction, are the unalloyed ugliness of the primary situation, and the fact that the play goes mad—absolutely mad—in the abandonment of its fourth act.

There are seven characters, known only by their Christian names, of whom two are merely furnishings and superfluities. The other five, who occupy the same American farmhouse, are the farm-owner, the wife, the son, the son's sweetheart, later his wife, and the hired man. The circumstance that transmutes this apparently colorless and meaningless group into a storm-centre is the fact that the son's wife has been—very possibly still is—the father's mistress. I think the author is maladroit in the conduct of this situation, where an ingenuous person would have been more skillful. To be naïf up to a certain point, to have a tract of naïveté in one's mind, is very useful even to the possessor of sophistications; it helps him to gauge his auditors. The present author is so indifferent to the ugliness of this fable that he is insensible of its horror, and its horror is the ground of its dramatic force. De Curel, in the portrayal of a like situation in "Les Fossiles," could have instructed him in the advantage of a sensitive treatment of a brutal theme.

We come next to the peculiar dialogue. Every one must concede the perils of a diction which permits observations and retorts like the following to be habitually uttered in an American farmhouse: "Even the blind are not fools"; "Perhaps folly is the greater wisdom." To this aphoristic vein is added the instant and constant passage by metaphor from the material setting of life to its inner significance. The young man finds nightshade in bloom. "Nightshade!" he exclaims, "Stabbing beauty! Stabbing pain!" The process in other forms is by no means unsuited to literature, or even to drama. D'Annunzio teems with it; but perhaps its fitness for D'Annunzio is the measure of its unsuitability to the lips of the American farmer in a prosaic century. Nevertheless, I find the diction often terse and tense under all this incubus of literature, and there are moments, such as Miriam's implacable "Well?" in reply to the young wife's mention of her own death as the sole alternative to another threatening issue, when its suggestiveness is potent. There is life in this diction; there is life in its follies.

Lastly, comes the insensate fourth act. Clive, as we all know, was surprised at his own moderation. The author of "Nightshade" at the end of his third act seems to be alarmed at his own temperance. He plunges into excess less from the love of excess than from the fear of restraint; he adopts violence as a precaution. The mother murders (in effect) the son's wife; the father turns out the mother into the storm; the hired man presumably appropriates the mother; the son fires a gun which crushes the last remnant of life in the young girl as she lies quivering in the father's arms. The strength and interest of all these characters lies in a certain brooding vigilance; when they release themselves, they efface themselves; and the play vanishes in their effacement.

The acting, broadly viewed, was of high quality. Miss Grace Knell made a very attenuated Cora, and Mr. Gerald Hamer was merely adequate as the son. But Mr. Gordon Burby's father was excellent, Mr. Alfred Shirley imparted vividness to the rather impossible hired man, and Miss Content Palaeologue was strong as Miriam, the mother, up to the point when she determined to be powerful. The play lends itself to acting; that is another reason for holding that the future has a place for the author of "Nightshade."

O. W. FIRKINS

Export Credits and European Rehabilitation

SIR GEORGE PAISH, in an interesting article in Ways and Means of May 29, summarizes judiciously the present economic situation of Europe, and its relation to the United States. Still insisting upon the imperative need of participation by America in the economic and financial reconstruction of Europe, he makes no mention of the gigantic credit flotation which he had earlier proposed, and recognizes the limitations of America's ability to aid.

He speaks in a friendly and appreciative way of the work of the Atlantic City Conference called by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States last October, and of the report of the committee of the Chamber there appointed, saying that "the tone and tenor of it is all that could be wished." He sanctions the committee's view that "action by the Government of the United States is prerequisite to practical effort on an extensive scale" and that American investors can not provide the sum needed by Europe so long as American taxes are so heavy, and large American investors have to put their funds into tax-exempt

A Tower of Strength

THE STRENGTH OF THE BANKERS TRUST COMPANY is founded upon the bedrock of character, experience and great financial resources.

For this reason, the Company has come to be regarded as a tower of strength in the financial community. Many important business concerns are looking to it for the service and co-operation obtainable only from an institution of unquestioned dependability, complete equipment and far-reaching banking connections.

BANKERS TRUST COMPANY

Member Federal Reserve System

New York

Resources

Over Four Hundred Million Dollars

securities. He concurs in the view that Europe must return to work, and to the practice of thrift, and must make progress towards the reduction of inflated currency, the balancing of budgets, and political stability, before American investors will have complete faith in European securities. He takes note, too, of extravagance and speculation in the United States, which have limited savings and shortened the supply of domestic capital, leaving inadequate surpluses of capital to export.

Sir George emphasizes again the imminence of the problem. He feels that America can not wait for complete European recovery before extending the credits which the situation demands.

The general problem presented is undoubtedly an acute one. Despite the very extensive discussion and agitation which have gone on since the Armistice, and even before the Armistice, adequate measures have not been devised for supplying Europe with long-term credits for financing the export balance, since the United States Government ceased to do so about the middle of May, 1919. It is true that the exporters themselves, who are most vitally interested in the pecuniary side of the matter, since it is to them that the profits in the export trade immediately accrue, have been able by one or another device to keep going a tremendous flood of exports to Europe. The figures for our monthly balance of trade have run several hundred millions for every month since the Armistice, and the figures for our balance with Europe alone have been even greater than our balance with the world. The investor, able to obtain seven per cent. on safe American securities, has not in general been attracted to the prospects of similar yields, or yields a little higher, on European securities, but the active business man has often been willing to tie up a portion of his working capital in advances to European customers, which run far beyond the ordinary period for commercial credits. The violent breaks in the exchange rates make it clear that not nearly all of the exports to Europe have been financed in this manner, but there is no doubt that a large volume has been.

The United Kingdom, financially strongest of all the countries of Europe, has been aiding the Continent to a great extent since the Armistice. In her dealings with France, Italy, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, European Turkey, and Russia in 1919, she imported goods to the value of only £98,314,000, but exported goods to the value of £351,237,000, showing an export surplus of £252,923,000 for the year. The first three months of 1920 show a similar ratio. This export surplus represents an heroic effort on the part of Great Britain, since Britain's balance of trade with the world as a whole is adverse, and since she has done it in the face of increasing financial strain. It is of course not at all comparable with the excess of exports over imports which the United States has sent to Europe, running far beyond four billions of dollars for the year 1919, but it does mean that an enormous volume of goods has gone from Great Britain to the Continent, which, added to the volume sent from the United States directly, means that Continental Europe has received and is receiving aid from the rest of the world on a grand scale.

Though weaker financially than we are, the British are more capable of engaging in transactions of this kind in proportion to their financial strength. London has for generations specialized in direct trading with the Continent, and has developed agencies which make possible a scattering of risks, so that no one individual may suffer greatly if a particular venture turns out unsuccessfully. Indeed, by the process of distributing risks, diffusing them over the whole market, and combining many promising ventures, the certainty of loss in a portion of the enterprises has been combined with a certainty of gain on the totality of such ventures, in the normal run of London's experience.

If a substantial portion of the Continent revives industrially and financially at a reasonably early date, Britain will enjoy enormous profits from these ventures. In part, her attitude towards the Continent grows out of sympathy for allies and friends in distress, but in very substantial part, in the opinion of many British authorities, it represents also exceedingly good business. The British, aware of the beneficent influences of industry and trade, see no conflict between these two motives, and indeed feel that the best philanthropy is that which involves trading profitable to both sides. To make it possible for friends in distress to do business and to regain financial stability is to protect their pride and independence at the same time that material benefits are conferred upon them.

The great plans for the financial assistance of Europe, through governmental coöperation and through the organization of great placements of security issues with investors, have not materialized. Business enterprise has, in considerable measure, filled in the gap. But this enterprise has lacked certain features which, to many observers, seem necessary for the full rehabilitation of Europe, in that traders, acting without concert in any particular case, will necessarily choose the most profitable opportunities, and so will neglect some of the most necessitous cases. Moreover, individual enterprises, operating without coördination, have been unable to exert the influence which would lead to more careful expenditure, to the imposition of higher taxes, and to balanced budgets. Trade carried on in this manner, moreover, has been in too large a degree a trade in luxuries, and in too small a degree a trade in raw materials and other things necessary to set the whole of industry going in Europe, although raw materials have gone over in very large volume. If some centralized economic control could be established, leading to the full coöperation among all the countries of Europe, the proper distribution of goods, the control of transportation facilities, and the restriction of luxury consumption, the requirements of Europe would be reduced by hundreds of millions of dollars. It is almost more a job of organization and engineering than it is a job of financing.

The problem is far from solved. There is need for rebuilding the world organization which has disintegrated since the Armistice. Nationalistic jealousies have asserted themselves vigorously at a time when there was need to subordinate narrower purposes to a great common emergency. We can not be content, therefore, with the present methods of extending aid to Europe. We can not be confident that they will continue on an adequate scale. We can not be confident that they will get results commensurate with the capital laid out. They must be supplemented by organized activity, and by intergovernmental coöperation. They must not, however, be supplanted. So far as it can safely and effectively be done, aid should be extended on a business basis by business enterprises seeking profits.

The private capital to be secured will probably be, on the whole, the capital of men willing to make ventures, rather than the capital of the investor who seeks absolute security. The best results will probably be obtained by methods which make possible unusual return on venturesome enterprise, rather than by methods which seek merely to give normal return on safe investments.

Conditions abroad show many encouraging signs. Belgium has made very gratifying recovery. British industry has revived splendidly, and the financial courage of the British Treasury in regard to taxation, and the policy of reduction of the public debt, are worthy of the finest traditions of British finance. Italy has been making heroic efforts to balance her budget. In France, and throughout Europe, there are authoritative voices speaking wisely and sanely, and there are patriots working bravely, against great odds of tradition and narrowness of vision, for the public good. But there is still suffering and distress in Europe of an appalling sort, and there are grave industrial and financial difficulties. The world can not wash its hands of the problem. The United States, above all, must recognize and assume her share of the responsibility.

GUY EMERSON

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

Vol. 2, No. 59 New York, Wednesday, June 30, 1920 FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment 661
Editorial Articles:
The Old Familiar Charge 664
The World and the Soothsayers 664
Greeks and Poles 665
Population and Housing 666
Shepherds and Song in the Day's News 667
Big Sinners and Little Ones. By Agnes Repplier 668
The Monroe Doctrine as an Adventure in Foreign Policy. By Elbert J. Benton 670
Jobs for New Brooms. By Edward G. Lowry 672
Correspondence 673
Packing the Books. By Edmund Lester Pearson 675
Book Reviews:
Complexities of the Irish Enigma 676
The Mystery of Jutland 677
Hamilton the Democrat 678
Mission Life at St. Antoine 679
Unhappy Tales 679
The Run of the Shelves 680
Early June. By E. G. H. 683
Drama:
"The Merchant of Venice" at the Playhouse. By O. W. Firkins 684
Educational Section:
Research and Organization. By Arthur Gordon Webster 686
The American Exporter in "Wonderland" 688

WHAT the San Francisco Convention will do about the Presidential nomination is a thing that few persons are rash enough to predict with any confidence. But what it would do if the President's bodily health were on a level with his mental vigor seems plain enough. That there should be any talk at all of a third-term nomination, in view of the manifest uncertainty of Mr. Wilson's health, is the strongest possible testimony to the commanding position he continues to hold in his party. Were it not for that obstacle his renomination would be, so far as one can judge, almost a certainty.

AS it is, he bids fair to dominate the proceedings. Indeed, the character of the Democratic Convention is made about as inevitable by antecedent history as was that of the Republican Convention. It is impossible in a few days' gathering of a thousand delegates to reshape the fundamentals of a situation. There are times when two opposing elements in a party are fairly evenly matched, and when their division is on a definite issue. In that case the issue may be fought out in Convention. The result need not necessarily be a compromise, but may be a decisive victory for one side, in which the other side will acquiesce. At Chicago, no such situation existed. It was certain in advance that the League of Nations issue would be treated in somewhat the manner in which it actually was treated. In like manner, the Democrats are bound to adopt a formula pretty closely approximating to President Wilson's position.

THERE remains nevertheless the question whether the platform will seek to conciliate reservationists by a skillfully elastic phrase. Mr. Wilson, though in practice he has made ratification impossible by his attitude towards reservations, has never flatly declared against all reservations having any substantial quality. It is still within the bounds of possibility that the campaign, instead of intensifying the League issue, may tend to subordinate it. This will be especially likely if the Democrats should adopt a radical plank on labor and Government ownership. On those issues—and the Republican platform has spoken out with great clearness upon them—there are the makings of a genuine fight.

WHATEVER attempts may be made by the Johnson-Borah bitter-enders to give the fight a different turn, says Mr. Taft, the issue that is sure to emerge in the end is this:

"Was Mr. Wilson right in killing the League with the Lodge reservations?"

There is one aspect of this question to which we should like particularly to direct attention, for it has received far less notice than it deserves. Mr. Wilson, in putting through his League programme at Versailles, assumed the responsibility of securing its acceptance on his return. European statesmen would not have entered into the bargain had they not been assured that the fulfilment of it was practically certain. Mr. Wilson unquestionably gave that assurance in good faith. But when he came home he found that his power to carry out his promise was involved in doubt; before long, it became absolutely certain that, unless he made important concessions, he could not possibly get the treaty ratified. In this situation, was he not under a solemn obligation to the nations which had put their trust in him to get this country into the League on the best terms he could obtain?

THE one possible justification for not doing so would have been the unwillingness of the other Powers to accept our coöperation on these terms; but it has long been certain that this obstacle did not exist. On no other basis than his individual opinion or desire, Mr. Wilson has kept this country out of the League into which he had promised his associates at Versailles to put it. He has, to be sure, been playing for what he regards as a big stake—to obtain the League unmodified, or nearly so. But it is a tremendous gamble; and to our mind he had no more right to gamble with the trust he assumed at Versailles than a man has a right to put to the risks of Wall Street speculation a trust fund committed to his care. We should be glad to hear from readers of the Weekly Review on this question.

THOSE who, largely on grounds of propriety, resented Admiral Sims's disclosures and the subsequent naval inquiry will do well to ponder the following facts which the inquiry has brought to light. The Senate passed a resolution, on April 12, 1916, calling on Secretary Daniels for "a communication dated August 3, 1914, from the General Board of the Navy warning the Navy Department of the necessity of bringing the Navy to a state of preparedness." On April 21, 1916, Secretary Daniels declared, in an official reply to the Senate, that the document in question "does not refer to the necessity of bringing the Navy to a state of preparedness." Yet in the first paragraph of its communication the General Board had said: "In view of the immediate danger of a great war in Europe, * * * the General Board earnestly urges that the battleships be brought home, docked and put in perfect readiness"; and in the last sentence had urged: "We should prepare now for the situation which would thus be created." This bare statement of the facts sufficiently reveals Secretary Daniels's confusion and lack of decision in the early stages of the European war; but such disclosures, though shocking, will amount to little unless the result of the investigation is embodied in a comprehensive report.

WHEN the head of one of the biggest department stores in New York is arrested on charges of profiteering; when the warrants allege that a suit bought for $5.50 was offered for sale at $15, one costing $15 at $33.75, etc.; when the special agent in charge of the case states that there are 185 separate counts, alleging profits ranging from 90 to 275 per cent.—we must all sit up and take notice. It is not merely a question of legal guilt or innocence; what the public ought to be able to find out, somehow, some time—what it ought to have been able to find out long before this—is whether these things are typical. Are retail prices of such necessaries as clothing, usually or in any large proportion of cases, of such exorbitant character? It looks much too bad to be true; but what is the truth? So far as the individual case here in question is concerned, the trial will presumably bring out the facts; but what are the facts in general? "Profiteering" has been the word of the day for two years and more, but the country is as much at sea concerning the extent of it as it was at the beginning. In ordinary times, competition can be counted on to keep profits down to a reasonable level; but in times when nobody knows what ought to be regarded as a normal price, the working of competition becomes a very imperfect process. If some part of the vast amount of money expended upon the mechanical piling up of statistical figures had been directed to the task of getting at the homely facts of retail business, we might have been in a position to know something definite about them; and if the situation called for legislative remedy, we might have found something better in that line than a law which once in a while manifests itself by a sensational raid, and the rest of the time does nothing whatsoever.

THE real purpose of Krasin's visit in London and his conversations with Mr. Lloyd George and other Cabinet Ministers seems to have been generally overlooked. The skillful talk about trade with Soviet Russia has successfully concealed the more important pourparlers. Mr. Krasin is neither a fool nor a fanatic. He is perfectly aware that the Soviet Government will not give up any considerable amount of that gold reserve which constitutes its sole means of attaining any financial stability, and he also knows that the stocks of raw materials in possession of the Soviet Government and available for export are so small as to be negligible for purposes of barter. What is it, then, that Mr. Krasin and his associates seek under cover of airy talk about Russian trade? The convinced Communists form but a small percentage of the Soviet authorities to-day, as Mr. Krasin has already pointed out. On the other hand, there has grown up among them a class which they themselves term the "new bourgeoisie." For these people the Bolshevik revolution was a means of attaining power and acquiring property. But their new-found riches are likely to vanish in smoke if something is not done to rescue the economic life of Russia from the desperate position to which the Soviet Administration has brought it. They now believe that the one way out is to secure the aid of foreign capital and enterprise in restoring and reorganizing Russian industries, and they regard Krasin as the Moses to lead them out of the Bolshevik wilderness. Should the British financial groups look favorably upon his proposals, he will naturally ask them to exert pressure upon the British Government to recognize the Soviet Government, and thereby legitimate the proposed transactions. It will be easy for him to suggest further inducements in the way of promises to abstain from revolutionary propaganda and to limit Soviet aggression in the Near and Middle East.

THE Japanese Government appears anxious to come to a settlement with China on the Shantung question, but China refuses to negotiate directly. The Mikado's Government professes to be surprised at this manifest distrust of its honest intentions in the face of repeated declarations which "leave no room for doubt as to the singleness of purpose with which Japan seeks a fair and just settlement of the question." We suspect that it is not the Government's singleness of purpose but the singleness of the Government itself which is in doubt at Peking. There is ample proof of the existence of a military junta, which either dictates to the nominal Government its policy, or thwarts it when independently adopted. Even statesmen who, while out of office, were bitter critics of Japan's Chinese policy, become instruments of that policy themselves when vested with governmental power. Baron Goto, during the administration of the Okuma Ministry, issued for private circulation a pamphlet which exposed the evils of Japanese policy in China. But when, after the fall of the Okuma Government, November, 1916, Baron Goto became a member of the Terauchi Cabinet, no attempt was made at reversing the policy he had condemned. Experimental lessons of this kind must make the Chinese hesitate to believe the Japanese professions of "singleness of purpose." They are given by the nominal Government, but they are discredited by the Government de facto.

"THE accepted explanation of Conkling's enmity for Blaine," writes Chauncey M. Depew in some recent reminiscences, "was Blaine's allusion to him, during a debate in the House, as a turkey cock." Well, the language in which the turkey cock appeared was something more than an allusion; and as for the enmity, it had an earlier origin, which probably no diver among the wrecks of time will ever discover. The episode of the clash is worth recalling; for, though well-nigh forgotten in these days, it bulked big to our fathers of the post-bellum time. Moreover, Blaine's part in it furnishes a classic example of what in those days was regarded as a "crushing reply." The clash happened on a day in 1866, and the scene was the House of Representatives. Conkling had the floor. Blaine interposed. "Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Maine?" asked the Speaker. "No, sir," replied Conkling. "I do not wish to have anything to do with the member from Maine, not even so much as to yield him the floor." When, later, the member from Maine got the floor, this is what he said:

> As to the gentleman's cruel sarcasm, I hope he will not be too severe. The contempt of the large-minded gentleman is so wilting; his haughty disdain and grandiloquent swell, his majestic, super-eminent, overpowering, turkey-gobbler strut, has been so crushing to myself and all the other members of the House that I know it was an act of the greatest temerity for me to venture upon a controversy with him. But, sir, I know who is responsible for all this. I know that within the last five weeks, as members of the House will recollect, an extra strut has characterized the gentleman's bearing. It is not his fault. It is the fault of another. That gifted and satirical writer, Theodore Tilton, of the New York Independent, spent some weeks recently in this city. His letters published in that paper embraced, with many serious statements, a little jocose satire, a part of which was the statement that the mantle of the late Winter Davis had fallen upon the member from New York. He took it seriously, and it has given his strut an additional pomposity. The resemblance is great. It is striking. Hyperion to a satyr, Thersites to Hercules, mud to marble, dunghill to diamond, a singed cat to a Bengal tiger, a whining puppy to a roaring lion. Shade of the mighty Davis! Forgive the almost profanation of that jocose satire.

"Conkling," writes Depew, treating of the year 1880, "was swayed by a perfectly savage hatred of Blaine." We do not wonder.

EVEN the more moderate (or less candid) zealots who move about under the nebulous appellations "radical" and "liberal" are busily engaged in hurling language at one another as to who is who and what is what. The pro-war liberals were and are a poor, timid, and compromising lot, according to the anti-war liberals; while the antis, according to the pros, are an ineffective and uninstructed group of sentimentalists who did not and can not grasp the meaning of realpolitik. To the radicals (the unspecified sort — mere radicals), as well as to the Socialists and the Communists of various groups, both liberal wings are about equal in lack of understanding of fundamental things and in all-round futility. And so they are all talking it out, and the controversial combat thickens. The points at issue are in number as the autumnal leaves along the brooks of Vallombrosa and in variety as the figures in a kaleidoscope. Was the late Randolph Bourne a Liberal? Yes, says Professor Laski in the Freeman, but the wrong kind, because he had an inadequate notion of real liberty. Nothing of the sort, answers a Communist-Socialist correspondent: Bourne was a "creative skeptic," and he had exactly the right notion of liberty. Did Professor John Dewey and the New Republic really bring on America's intervention in the war? There is high authority for the charge, but the matter has not yet been sufficiently threshed out for a verdict. It is easy enough for the radical and anti-war liberal brethren to agree upon the reprehensibility of anything that promoted the war; but to admit so large an effect from so futile an agent as a pro-war liberal goes hard. It is therefore unlikely that the verdict against the defendants will be more severe than that of "accessory before the fact." Ordinary folk can watch the whole combat with serenity. If the controversialists succeed, to even the slightest degree, in clarifying their own minds a social good will have been gained.

RATS, mice, and English sparrows —such are the remnants of a once glorious fauna towards which Mr. Hornaday, of the New York Zoölogical Park, warns us that we are drifting, through lack of adequate measures to check the forces of extermination. One may admit a bit of exaggeration in his words, but as a means of emphasizing the urgency of the case it is pardonable. Mr. Hornaday's pamphlet, "The End of Game and Sport in America?" shows that the bag-limit laws of New York, together with the number of persons authorized to hunt, make legally and arithmetically possible the killing of nearly two and a half billion wild birds and quadrupeds in a single year. In other words, the real restriction is not the legal limit on the amount to be killed at all, but merely man's inability, for various reasons, to use up any considerable portion of the privileges which his hunting license gives. But he can use enough of these lavish concessions to threaten all kinds of game birds and animals with extinction. Mr. Hornaday suggests that all legal bag limits be reduced by one-half, and all open seasons in the same proportion. Furthermore, he would license the individual to hunt only one year out of two, and would raise the license fee to three times its present merely nominal figure. He urges the friends of wild life to use their influence for the public acquisition of marshes, waste woodlands, and mountains as game "sanctuaries," and to encourage the planting of large quantities of berry, nut, and seed bearing bushes and trees, with such annuals as kaffir corn, millet, and sorghum cane, as food for wild birds. One hopes that his pamphlet may have a wide and fruitful reading.

The Old Familiar Charge

THE country is approaching a Presidential campaign for which men who like to know exactly where they stand can have little relish. For even the fresh indications that Mr. Wilson will dictate the Democratic platform give no assurance that the issues will be squarely joined. Over and above the issues will be the personality of the President, about whom even intelligent antagonists can seldom argue with any satisfaction. Those opposed to the President will be told that, whatever the judgment of the present generation, the future will rank him as one of the greatest men of all time. It is indeed a sure sign of Mr. Wilson's capacity for greatness that he has so caught the imagination of many persons, both here and abroad, that they have seen, however vaguely, his vision of a new world order. But this only adds to our present difficulty. Those who have not "seen the light" will be asked to accept too much on faith—which is not the American way.

No amount of reasoning will entirely rid the situation of that difficulty. Yet there may be some advantage in disposing of one argument which is sure to be used insistently against the opponents of the President. They will be called "little Americans." It is high time that they learned how to defend themselves against the charge. The case of Senator Harding himself is instructive. Such a career as his is typically American — humble beginnings ripening into a life of large opportunities. An American he surely is. Is he a "little American"? Much depends upon the year in which he is examined. From the moment the President gave the word, there was no one in the Senate more eager to see the war prosecuted to a decisive conclusion than he. Would anyone in those days have thought it proper to dub him a "little American"? And what shall be said of the Americanism of that host of persons now unfriendly to the President's international programme, who, long before 1917, agitated for our active participation with the Allies?

A mass of nonsense has been uttered at the expense of the "little Americans." A great majority of our citizens have all along been heartily in favor of destroying once and for all the menace of Prussianism, and opposition to the President increased because he seemed to many, in the early years of the war, to be making Germany's case easier than it should have been. To them the President's later advocacy of a League of Nations appeared to be the outcropping of a perfectionist, who could not be supposed to use the new instrument more effectively than he used the position of President in confronting German insults and brutalities. It was prompted, they felt, by an easy confidence in international machinery designed to take the place of the free individual action which, if directed by another hand, would have made our war record a prouder one. They were eager to see the Allies through their difficulty and to help execute the terms of peace. If they could not approve all the clauses of a Covenant the creation of which Europe itself, we now know, would have been glad to postpone until after arranging the peace terms, are they therefore to be called "little Americans"?

We trust that the phrase will be discredited before the campaign proceeds very far. It would merely confuse a valuable issue. For the country wishes by all means to know what the candidates intend to do about Europe. That we must now assume large responsibilities with reference to Europe is certain, and it will not do to trust any half-hearted professions on this important matter. Yet let it be remembered that they are not "big Americans," or big anything else, who, through a vague yearning for a perfect world, or through their implicit confidence in the judgment of one man, shout for the Covenant just as it stands. It is the tough-minded American to whom we must look in this emergency. That many such, while approving the reservations, have for years worked feverishly to relieve Europe's distress is evidence enough that they are neither hard-hearted nor little, Americans.

The World and the Soothsayers

THE British Ambassador, in his address to the Princeton Alumni, drew a picture of the world's state of mind, and of the prospects of the existing economic order, which was calculated to make the young men to whom he was speaking anything but merry. He followed it up, it is true, with the assurance that he was "far from pessimistic," that he believed that "out of this turmoil, this seething and bubbling of new thoughts and new ideas, we may get something a little saner, a little nobler, in our civilization"; but what reason there was for this hope he was apparently content to let his audience guess for themselves. If the existing economic order has proved a ghastly failure, something more is required to warrant a denial of pessimism than a mere vague impression that better things are coming. Sir Auckland Geddes appears to belong to that large company of misty "liberals" who rise superior to their allegiance to the institutions of the past and present, without having gone through that mental travail which is necessary for the formation of a different allegiance to take its place. "The stage is surely set for great changes," he tells us; for millions of working people are saying to themselves, "What is a life worth that at the end leaves us with nothing achieved except having avoided being starved to death, and having produced children who will follow in our path?" And not only is this the case at the present time, but "as this century opened, we had in Europe an order that was obviously nearing its end."

This sort of thing, uttered with portentous solemnity by the representative of the British Empire in our country, is calculated to make a profound impression upon open-minded young men. "Here," they say, "is a man who really knows what is going on, a man who can estimate the gravity of the present, and forecast the development of the future, as we can not. Of course, we all know that this is a time big with important changes; we all know that there is a vast amount of unrest among the working people the world over; but we are apt to imagine that improvement will come without subversion or revolution, and here is a wise man who, though refraining from using these words, is clearly convinced that it is all up with the world as we have known it. We might as well make up our minds that Socialism is upon us, and adjust ourselves to the inevitable."

But let us look at the matter a little more closely. Is there any evidence that Sir Auckland has done any real thinking on the subject, either as to its facts or its philosophy? He does not appear to be a Socialist; on the contrary, apart from its broad vaticinations, his talk sounds like that of any other British or American public man who feels that important economic and social changes are taking place, which it will require great sagacity to make safe and beneficent. The trouble with him, as with so many of our own half-way apostles of a new social order, is that although he presents a state of things so grave that nothing short of Socialism can possibly mend it, he shrinks from accepting the position either of a Socialist or of a pessimist. Things are going to come right somehow; we are going to have omelets without breaking of eggs.

As to his account of facts, it happens that Sir Auckland gives us a very excellent means of judging of the weight to be attached to it. He has made the brilliant discovery that the real cause of the European War was the growth of American population, which had had the effect of making wheat unendurably dear in Germany. Let us hear exactly what Sir Auckland says:

> Believe me, I have gone into this thing fairly carefully, and I think that it is not very difficult to show that the development of your population here was the principal cause in making the European War inevitable.
>
> Germany was being forced into a position with rising food costs—look at the change in the price of wheat in the first ten years of this century—Germany was being forced into a position in which she almost had to fight.

Now there had actually been a considerable rise in the price of wheat in the first ten years of this century; but the price just preceding that time was not a normal one, but that abnormally low price which furnished the foundation for Bryan's whirlwind campaign for free silver in 1896. It happens that the course of wheat prices in Germany was the subject of an elaborate article which appeared in the leading German economic journal, Conrad's Jahrbücher, in 1914. From this it appears that the average price of wheat per hundredweight during the period 1847-70 was 10.95 marks; in the following three decades the average price was 11.43, 8.35, 6.76, respectively, the last figure being for the decade 1891-1900. The average price for 1901-5 was 6.65 marks; for 1906-10, it was 8.02, for the year 1911 it was 7.85 and for 1912 it was 8.38. So it appears that that price of wheat which was so terrible that Germany was driven to fight out of sheer desperation was only 20 or 25 per cent. above the phenomenally low price of 1891-1900, and was decidedly below the prices that had prevailed for half a century preceding that low-price decade.

So far, then, from having "gone into this thing fairly carefully," Sir Auckland has not even the poor support of a little specious bit of statistics to sustain his tremendous conclusion that Germany was in a position "in which she almost had to fight." The idea was in any case so monstrous—the gap so enormous between a high price for wheat and the burning up of the world as a remedy—that we cite the figures not so much to refute what every sensible man ought to recognize at once as an absurdity, as to bring out the irresponsible character of the whole breed of Sir Oracles to whom a time of disturbance like the present opens such abundant opportunities. What destiny has in store for the world is obscure to the rest of us, but it is manifest to them; and most frequently it is the "economic interpretation of history" that gives them the key with which they unlock the secrets of the future. It is an extremely handy instrument, and does completely in a moment what years of study without it would fail to accomplish. But whether the easy-going conclusions to which it gives access are trustworthy or not is another question; and it is a bit of good fortune, therefore, to get an occasional test of the matter when, instead of dipping into the future, the soothsayer ventures with a like jaunty confidence into questions of the past. One such confident dealer in world-horoscopes, Professor Simon N. Patten of the University of Pennsylvania, some years ago put forth the happy-thought discovery that the true cause of the French Revolution was that the industries of France had been ruined by the "industrial revolution" in England; but he happened to overlook the trifling circumstance that in 1789 the "industrial revolution" was still in its embryonic stage, and could not possibly have produced any noteworthy effect on French prosperity. It may be that the existing order of society is on its last legs, but the solemn pronouncements of this type of prophets add nothing whatever to the reasons we may have for thinking so. And men of sense should concern themselves not with fatalistic guesses as to what the future is to be, but with the duty of helping to shape that future according to their own judgment of what is good.

Greeks and Poles

VENIZELOS is bent upon enforcing the Turkish peace treaty without, if need be, the assistance of the Powers. His unexpected arrival at Hythe had, apparently, the twofold object of pressing this offer and of obviating any intentions on the part of certain Powers to temporize with the Turk. The recent agreement between General Gouraud and Mustapha Kemal constitutes a serious menace to the Greeks of Asia Minor, and is likely to be followed by further concessions to the Nationalists by the French, who, in trying to placate the Nationalist leader, may hope to safeguard their interests in Syria and, at the same time, play him against the British. Greek interests, therefore, fall in line with the policy of England, which, having gained control of the Turkish Government in Constantinople, must look upon any compromise with the Nationalists in Anatolia as an attempt to thwart that policy and to neutralize the results it has achieved so far.

There is a striking analogy between the rôle which Venizelos wishes to assign to Greece and that which Poland is now playing under the management of Pilsudski. Russian Bolshevists and Turkish Nationalists are both a menace to Europe and her civilization, and it is with the claim of rendering service to these that both the Polish Republic and the Greek Kingdom are willing to take up arms against their eastern neighbors. The difference is in the response which their sacrifice meets in the west. Pilsudski receives moral and material support from Paris and is praised in the French press for his political foresight and his championship of Western culture; in England public opinion is either cool or indignant at the Polish offensive, which it condemns as a fit of megalomania. But the same French press which considers the Red terror such a menace as to justify the encouragement of Polish expansionism, is stubbornly opposed to strong action being taken against the Bolshevists' Allies in Asia Minor, the Turkish Nationalists under Mustapha Kemal's leadership. Here it is England which favors such action, and the latest reports as to the British rushing their entire Mediterranean fleet to Turkey read like an angry reply to the French armistice with Mustapha Kemal.

It is clear that the policy of neither Power, reacting so differently to the same menace in different parts of the world, is based on any distinctly defined principle. One would think that, if the Bolshevist danger demands the sacrifice of Polish lives and French money, a similar sacrifice on the part of Greece should receive a similar support from France. But jealousy of British power in Asia is stronger with the French than their fear lest the success of Kemal's opposition to the treaty should indirectly benefit his allies in Moscow. As Saladin says in The Talisman, "A wild cat in a chamber is more dangerous than a lion in a distant desert." So to the French the nearer danger of British hegemony in anterior Asia is a greater menace than the far-off one of Soviet Russia getting hold of it.

Thus Venizelos and Pilsudski, united in opposition against a common menace, are divided by the diverging policies of their powerful supporters. It is questionable whether Poland, even with the wholehearted assistance of British opinion and Mr. Lloyd George's Government, could realize her ambitions. The events, so far, seem to justify our apprehension that the danger from abroad would tend to strengthen Lenin's position by rallying all Russian parties round the Government in charge of the country's defense. In Asia Minor the chances are different. Venizelos intends no aggression such as that of Pilsudski. He offers the services of the Greek army only for the protection of the frontiers delimited by the peace treaty against the aggression of Mustapha Kemal, a rebel against his own Government and sovereign. Kemal's defeat is demanded by the safety of Greeks and Armenians, by the prestige of the Powers that drafted the peace treaty which he defies, and by the necessity of stemming the red tide of Bolshevism wherever it rushes across the Russian frontier. Incidentally, the overthrow of Kemal, it is true, would serve to establish British power over a wider area than seems compatible with the French interests. But viewing the situation with an eye to the interests, not only of France, but of the world and its peace, we believe that France, even at the risk of indirectly promoting the interests of England, would serve her own, and those of Europe and Asia, by backing the Greeks rather than the Poles.

The decision taken at Hythe by Lloyd George and Millerand to accept Venizelos' offer is a welcome indication that the French Premier, at any rate, refuses to be responsible for the policy advocated by the Temps, which, to quote Auguste Gauvain's definition in the Journal des Débats, consists in "making things easy for the Turkish Nationalists in order to make things embarrassing for the English."

Population and Housing

NEW YORK'S gigantic size has not made it superior to the kind of mental agitation which American cities of lesser magnitude experience when Uncle Sam's census count fails to come up to their expectations. The outstanding feature of that count, as it stands in the preliminary announcement, is that the population of the Borough of Manhattan fell from 2,331,542 in 1910 to 2,284,103 in 1920, a loss of 47,439. Revision of the census may alter this result; apparently good authorities, basing their conclusions on pertinent considerations, differ in their opinion on the question. But it is safe to say that Manhattan's population either actually declined, or at all events increased very little, during the decade.

This circumstance, taken in conjunction with the acute shortage of housing in Manhattan, suggests an important question bearing upon the shortage of housing in other cities as well as in New York. During the first half of the decade, and more, house-building was going on as usual; and, although there has been in Manhattan a large amount of conversion of dwelling property into business property, it does not seem at all probable that this has been sufficient to more than cancel the addition that has been made to dwelling accommodation during the decade. If this be so, and if the population has either declined or remained stationary, how is the housing shortage to be accounted for? There seems to be but one possible explanation. It is that there are large numbers of families which are now occupying more dwelling space than they did ten years ago—in other words, that the crowding of some people into less space is caused by the expanding of others into more space.

Just how largely this factor actually accounts for the situation in New York, or in any other place, is a question that can be determined only by careful and difficult investigation. But that the factor does enter into the case hardly admits of doubt. The thing is one illustration, and a very important one, of the profound disturbance that is caused by the great and sudden change which has taken place in money valuations. That disturbance is due to the irregularity with which the change has taken place. While wages on the whole have probably risen less than prices, and while most salaries have risen very little, there are many classes of labor whose compensation has advanced much more rapidly than prices have—has trebled or more, while prices have doubled. But house rents were far slower to rise than general prices; it is only within the last year that a very great rise of rents has been general. Now in those circumstances it seems inevitable that many classes of working people should, in the course of the first two or three years of their greatly heightened wages, have availed themselves of the chance to get better dwelling accommodations, at the reasonable prices then still prevailing; and this would have, with the cessation of building, the unescapable consequence of crowding the rest of the wage-earning and salaried class into more restricted quarters. And the same kind of thing must have happened among the well-to-do classes, as between those that found their money incomes increased beyond the average and those that did not.

The point is important in itself; bearing, as it does, both upon the ethics and the economics of the housing question. But it has also a wider interest. For it points towards a feature of the high-price situation in general which has received far too little attention. Tremendous as is the evil that has been wrought by the great fall in the purchasing power of the monetary unit, it is necessary to remember, in the interest of truth, that the high prices which are one man's poison are another man's food. The thing works gross injustice; it ought to be prevented if it can be prevented, cured if there is any good way of curing it; but it should be noted that there are, even in the wage-earning class, large numbers of persons who have been gainers, not losers, by it.

Shepherds and Song in the Day's News

A YOUNG man, Paul Darde—so runs a Paris despatch—who began life as a shepherd in the Cévennes, has won the Prix National for sculpture. In that bit of news there is matter for pleasant reflection which, though it will solve none of the problems that press upon us, may at least force them back to a point from which they can not overwhelm us.

A shepherd, who, while he watched his flock, learned to carve strange little figures in wood! Why not? From oldest times shepherds, when not singing and piping more sweetly than the murmurings of pine, have ever been quaint carvers of dials that they might justly note the passage of quiet hours over grass softer than sleep. One, more fortunate, perhaps had sight of the Great Pan himself at noonday, or of a faun a-crouch, his eye fixed on yonder grove of tamarisks where but lately it marked the gleam of a white shoulder. It was another shepherd who left his father's scanty flock and went forth to slay his tens of thousands and to sing immortally to the praising harp.

A shepherd, too, of the Cévennes! Doubtless of the sunnier slope, the better for flocks, which looks towards the vine and olive of a land which speaks not "oui" or "si," but "oc." There would be needed, one fancies, just that touch of warmth to temper the stern piety of a Camisard ancestry, just that sense of the goodliness of earth to lend body to the mystic ecstacies of the son of a people who numbered themselves also among the prophets. The Gothic face, craggy and bearded, of the young sculptor should lift itself, for a glimpse of the pagan world, to Rome's turbulent, mirthful, sunburnt Provence.

His successful contributions to the Salon, the despatch tells us, are a crouching faun and a snake-locked Medusa. Not a Greek faun, we warrant. The sculptor confesses to being a reader of Dante. Eccovi! Here is a faun that, too, has been in Hell. His smile proves it. It is the smile he wore on the night that the plain folk of the Cévennes did away in the name of the Lord with the Abbé du Chayla who in the Lord's name had persecuted them. He is a faun who has crouched not by rivers of Tempe or of Arcady but by the river of time. And not the placid Greek Medusa, we fancy, imaging in her countenance the stony death which is the instant lot of all who look upon her. Rather, a Gorgo quivering under the sorrows that have been laid upon her, and sensible that if sorrow itself is no less immortal than she, endurance also is not less.

If this is not enough refreshment to have picked up beside the worn and dusty highway of the day's news, observe the item that immediately follows it. Madame Melba, singing near London into a microphone, is heard through the agency of wireless telephone in Rome, Madrid, Berlin, and Stockholm. That is another side of the picture—man through countless generations at work on his theories and devices, testing, discarding, contriving, not knowing exactly what is to come of it all, but finally, by means of it, sending the living voice to earth's uttermost parts. There, too, quite unexpectedly, is the solution of a problem. When it comes finally to a point of conversing with other worlds, what can man possibly say worthy of the vehicle of his own magnificent contrivance? The platitudes of Mayor greeting Mayor across a continent, the dismal facts of our economics, the details of the latest fashionable murder — not these, surely, but the voice of Melba, a language that would be understood in other worlds than ours.

THE WEEKLY REVIEW

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Foreign subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, Ltd., 24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W. C. 2, England.
Copyright, 1920, in the United States of America
Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER
Associate Editors
HARRY MORGAN AYRES O. W. FIRKINS
A. J. BARNOUW W. H. JOHNSON
JEROME LANDFIELD

Big Sinners and Little Ones

IN the years when Mr. Henry Labouchère solaced his combative soul and agitated the British public by touching off explosives in the pages of Truth (a vivacious periodical with a disputable title), it was his especial joy to print in parallel columns a selection from the lists of crimes committed weekly in England, with their curiously ill-adjusted penalties. Fourteen shillings fine for assaulting a wife. Fourteen days' imprisonment for stealing a scrag of mutton. Ten shillings fine for assaulting a policeman. Two months' imprisonment for stealing a pair of boots. Ten shillings fine for knifing a sister-in-law—probably under provocation. Ten shillings fine for sleeping out of doors, in default of a bed to sleep in.

Making due allowance for Mr. Labouchère's incomprehension of the British temperament, its profound distaste for thieving, and easy disregard of a skirmish, he was right in assuming that justice in England "wad thole amends." It is plain that he was puzzled as well as affronted; and we Amerieans can sympathize with his perplexity when we read in one column of our morning paper that a man was arrested, fined, and sent to jail for carrying a flask of whisky; and in another column that a gang of thieves had carted away, without let or hindrance, fourteen barrels of whisky, valued at $21,000, from a bonded warehouse. The extraordinary acuteness of the law in X-raying a citizen's hip pocket, and bringing to light one little flask, contrasts strangely with its extraordinary obtuseness in allowing to malefactors all the leisure and liberty needed for rolling down fourteen barrels from the high racks where they were stored, examining their contents, piling them on a truck, and carrying them peacefully away.

The bulk and weight of merchandise would seem to the uninitiated to be an important factor in its safety; but this is because we picture thieves as subject to intrusion. The burglars who removed from the shelves of a New York dealer twelve hundred silk sweaters, weighing half a ton, and valued at $30,000, were undaunted by the specific gravity of their find. There is something oppressive in the mere thought of half a ton of sweaters, and it must have taken patience and perseverance to purloin them. But as $60,000 worth of silk coats had been stolen from an adjacent building two weeks before, and $35,000 worth of clothing from a building in the rear one week before that, the burglars were probably working along familiar and accustomed lines. With an intelligence almost human, the detectives employed on the case opined that all three burglaries were committed by the same band; but regretted that "in each instance they were so careful about their movements that they did not leave a single clue." One wonders what these annoyed officials expected to find. Visiting cards and telephone numbers to facilitate arrest?

That liquor brought from unregenerate ports to the United States should be discovered and confiscated is natural enough. All the agents have to do is to search every boat that comes along, and sooner or later they will find something. But that two men who distilled a little whisky in the tranquil privacy of a Bronx stable should have been swiftly apprehended, and severely punished, illustrates what we like to call the "Argus eyes" and the "long arm" of the law. Apparently the only safe thing to do with whisky in this country is to steal it. This is so well understood that six million dollars' worth has been unlawfully removed from the guardianship of the Republic.

When booty of lighter weight and higher value is desired, the burglar transforms himself into a "motor bandit," and carries off his prize on sunny days at noon. If he works along the line of least resistance, he is content to smash a jeweler's window glass, take what he wants from the window, step into his confederate's "high-speed" motor, and disappear behind a smoke screen from the gaping crowd in the street. If his confidence and his cupidity run high, he walks with a few well-selected associates into the jeweler's shop, holds up clerks and customers with revolvers, helps himself to whatever is most costly, and retires in good form to the waiting car.

This occurs so often, and with such monotonous sameness, that each new crime reads like a repetition of the old one. I know few things more intelligible or more pitiful than the defiance of a Chicago jeweler, who, when confronted with the customary bandits and the customary revolvers, and bidden to open his safe, answered desperately: "Go ahead and shoot! I've been robbed so often, and lost so much, that I'd just as soon you would." The robbers, so bidden, did shoot; then herded the two clerks into a rear room, emptied the jewel cases into a canvas bag, and left their victim huddled bleeding and unconscious on the floor. God is in his Heaven, without doubt; but all is not right with a world in which such things happen daily.

There is a periodical published weekly in New York called the Jewelers' Circular, which is presumably bought and read by men in that line of business. I picked up a copy for May 19, 1920, expecting to find articles on goldsmith's work and precious stones; instead of which this particular number read like an echo of the Police Gazette. There was first of all a description of a "Burglar-Proof Show Window," protected by two sheets of fine glass with a "pyroxylin plastic sheet" between them, and warranted to give window-smashers "the surprise of their young lives." Next came a long account of the ingenious robbing of Philadelphia jewelers in a Philadelphia hotel by an imitation cripple, who had $35,000 worth of jewels sent to his apartments, and took away all he wanted, after locking up the messenger in a bath-room. This account was hopefully headed, "No Trace of Gem Bandit."

Two pages further on there was an interesting paper on a Jekyll and Hyde chauffeur who ran a respectable car for a respectable family in the daytime, and a bandit car for burglars at night. This was followed by a warning to Chicago and Milwaukee jewelers to be on their guard against a young man of simple and confiding manners who desires to look at unset diamonds for an engagement ring, and who manages to leave a paste substitute for at least one valuable stone. Then came a photograph of Pedro Silva, a young Italian who, with a Mexican accomplice, raided a number of jewelers' shops in the State of Kansas. Then a brief dissertation on some New Jersey safebreakers, an account of a pearl robbery in New Orleans, a diamond robbery in Cincinnati, a diamond and pearl robbery in Kansas City, another in Chicago ("no clue to the robbers"), and last but not least the pleasant tale of the recovery of jewels stolen from Sioux City, because the bandits' car stuck in the mud. All honor to the bad roads of Iowa!

It is a generous showing for a week. When Mr. William E. Johnson, known to newspaper readers as "Pussyfoot" Johnson (a phrase equally offensive to prohibitionists and to cat-lovers), spoke last March in Paris to the French Anti-Alcoholic League, he told his audience that in his arid and admirable land, "The prisons are empty, the banks are full, the people are happy." A terrestrial paradise, not clearly recognizable to those who live in it. If the people are happy, they have a confoundedly uneasy way of manifesting their content. If the banks are full, money is tight. If the prisons are empty, it is partly because minor offenses are less frequent, and partly because major offenders, who ought to be in prison, are at large. The preposterously high rates of burglar insurance point to a state of recognized insecurity. When that oppressed member of the public body known as the tax-payer protests against these rates, he is told that the steady increase of burglary, the value of the goods stolen, and the impossibility of obtaining either protection or restitution, make such insurance the costly thing it is, and may end by making it impossible.

To say that this carnival of crime is attributable to "widespread social conditions" is simple, safe, and unhampered by any promise of betterment. A Tammany administration may account for the lawlessness of New York, but not for the lawlessness of other cities. Mr. Arthur Woods, an able ex-Police-Commissioner of New York, has informed us in the pages of the New York Tribune that "Scientific policing of a city is comparatively a new thing in our American life," and adds that the great Metropolis has given "intensive study" to the needs of every precinct she controls. This sounds hopeful; but the edge is taken off our confidence when we read further on that "there are on an average twenty-five persons a day arrested in New York who are mentally defective." Of course! These are just the people who would be arrested—as easily scooped up as were the drunks and disorderlies of the old bad days, as far removed from the disobliging criminals who carry off a ton and a half of goods, and leave no "clue" behind them.

An anonymous ex-convict, writing recently in the Outlook, regrets that the judges of the criminal courts should so often come to the bench with "blunted ethical perceptions." Curiously enough, this is a phrase which the unenlightened have been wont to apply to wrong-doers. It is not only the men who strip showcases, open safes, hold up paymasters, and shoot the disaffected whose standard of ethics seems imperfect. Eighty-two lynchings in the year 1919 would seem to indicate that trial by jury had grown distasteful to a section of the public. The men who offended the majesty of the law by distilling a few gallons of whisky in a stable were sent—very properly—to prison. The man who offended the majesty of the law by standing up in a Virginia courtroom and saying that he hoped to see the American flag go under, and the red flag float in its stead, had his bond reduced to one-tenth of the original sum, through the courtesy of the Department of Labor in Washington, and was promptly released to do all in his power to lower the Stars and Stripes.

The same leniency was accorded to Robert Minor, who, having striven without much success to undermine the loyalty of the American soldiers at Coblenz, and win them over to Germany and the Spartacists, was freed from the annoyance of military restraint, and suffered to return to the United States, to pursue his labors under more harmonious conditions. The consideration shown to these offenders was in exact proportion to the gravity of their offense.

It is an old story, and far more universal than Mr. Labouchère ever suspected. The most painful problem which confronted us in the great war was the slacker, a very human person, after all, whom we took little trouble to understand. Courage is largely a matter of education, loyalty of tradition. The slacker had, as a rule, neither education nor tradition to help him face the guns. Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori would have meant as little to him in one language as in another. He was simply and honestly afraid; and the accounts he could not help hearing of Germany's ferocity lent anguish to his fear. An inglorious and pitiful figure whose hard fate it was to be asked for greater things than his nature could yield.

For such a culprit, lenity is as reasonable as it is right. But when that arch-slacker Bergdoll, whose name, Grover Cleveland, insults the memory of a great American, illustrated the ease with which wealth evades the law, the scales of justice seemed a bit unbalanced. This young German-American has always entertained a lively contempt for restrictions of any sort. When he drove a car, he drove it recklessly. When he was deprived of his license, he went on driving without one. When he played at aviation, he flew his plane perilously low over the city's roofs. When he refused his service (it wouldn't have been worth much) to his country, he did so defiantly and rejoicingly, sending derisive postals from various States to the disappointed officials of the Draft Board. It was a superlative contempt for authority which induced him to return home after the armistice, and which finally compelled his arrest.

Now why should Mr. Gibboney and Mr. Romig have assured the public that Bergdoll would have been released anyhow as soon as the adjutant-general had reviewed the case; and lamented that the "impatience" of their young friend had made him unwilling to bide a few weeks longer in prison. Apparently it was a question of patience or impatience, of willingness or unwillingness, and the decision was left to the prisoner.

In Mr. Galsworthy's last volume of tales there is a heart-rending sketch of a good, a very good, German in London, who is interned during several years of the war, to the ruin of himself and his family. It is the kind of story which is sure to strike a sympathetic chord in the sentimentalist's heart. The disastrous results of England's long delay in interning her German residents is naturally not alluded to. The inevitable inclusion of the innocent with the guilty in a general internment is dwelt upon with emphasis. Consequently, violence and treachery are allowed to drop out of sight, and censure is reserved for the possible blunder of the well-intentioned.

France's indulgence to the great offender is proved by the clemency accorded to Caillaux, for whom "extenuating circumstances" were discovered, but not divulged, who was held to have served his term while waiting for trial, whose other penalties were too light for consideration, and who is once more at liberty to dishonor his country's name. It took the courage and the noble rage of Clemenceau to compel a prosecution. An acquittal was not possible. But that Caillaux should walk, free and disdainful, over the graves of French soldiers whose work he strove to undo, is an insult to every man who died for France. There was a bitter irony in inviting Mr. Hearst to help welcome our returning troops. Had Caillaux been at large on the Fourteenth of July, he might have occupied a distinguished post at the Fête de la Victoire. Was Benedict Arnold asked to be a guest of honor at the inauguration of Washington?

AGNES REPPLIER

The Monroe Doctrine as an Adventure in Foreign Policy

IN American history every departure in foreign policy from one based upon geographical isolation is an adventure into world politics. Washington laid the basis of the policy of isolation, and for an immediate purpose—to protect the United States from its late enemy, Great Britain, and likewise from its ally, France. His goal was freedom of action and an American character. Jefferson wrote of isolation as an end in itself. He declared in his inaugural that there was enough land within the bounds of the United States, that is east of the Mississippi, for "the thousandth and the thousandth generation." He recommended to Congress the building of a dock where the navy might be "laid up dry and under cover from the sun," and pinned his faith to such peaceful coercion as embargoes. Two wars in rapid succession—that with the Barbary States and that with Great Britain—seemed to indicate that isolation of a nation's life and interests was difficult in the world as it was.

The occasion of the first formal adventure in American history in foreign policy was an aftermath of the Napoleonic wars. The powers of Europe, freed from the menace of Napoleon, turned to rebuilding their fences at home and to shepherding their flocks abroad. Fur traders of Great Britain and Russia and missionaries of Spain, as well as explorers and traders of the United States, were beginning to meet on the Pacific slopes of North America. It was a remote problem for either nation. But the United States, as well as the other Powers, had a Secretary of Foreign Affairs planning for a distant future. In 1818 John Quincy Adams held the British advance into the Oregon country within bounds by the agreement that for the next ten years, at least, there should be joint occupation. The following year a treaty with Spain limited the northward reach of the Spanish claims on the Pacific coast to the forty-second parallel. A treaty of 1824 likewise limited the southward reach of Russia with the parallel which is now the southern boundary of Alaska. Diplomacy was making progress with one world problem—that of the ownership of the Pacific side of North America. Everywhere the rivals to the United States were thinned down to one: Spain in California, England in the Oregon country, and Russia in Alaska, a region in which the United States at the time had about as much interest as a Western farmer has in Uganda or Timbuctu. During the correspondence of Adams with the Russian Government—to be exact, on July 17, 1823—he had asserted "that the American continents were no longer subjects for any new European colonial establishment."

A second problem of world politics emerged in 1822. Rumor ran that a revolution impended in Cuba; in fact, some of the would-be insurgents made advances to the United States for annexation. England, France, and the United States each felt that the control of Cuba would be vital to its interests. England went so far as to send a fleet to the waters of Cuba and Porto Rico for the purpose of guarding its commerce and checkmating annexation by the United States. The move aroused the American Government. Adams sent a letter to the Minister at the court of Spain outlining the policy of the United States in regard to Cuba. That island, he said, is a natural appendage of the United States, bound to become "indispensable to the continuance and the integrity of the Union itself" within half a century, and destined by all the laws of political gravitation to fall to the North American Union in the process of time. In the meantime it was the policy of the United States to favor Spain's retention of both Cuba and Porto Rico. The letter, which bore the date of April 28, 1823, included the significant statement that the United States would not interfere with the dependencies of European Powers in the new world.

The third problem of the United States arose from the rumor that Austria, Russia, Prussia, and France of the Bourbon restoration, all joined together in a sort of league of peace for and by benevolent despots, were to aid Spain in reconquering its Spanish American colonies. The danger was, perhaps, remote, but so far as it was real it threatened the interests of both Great Britain and the United States, and started forces which tended to establish a rapprochement between the two. During the summer and early fall of 1823 Canning for Great Britain and Adams for the United States watched closely the movements of the European allies. The American interest in Chile, Peru, and Argentina about equaled that of to-day in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Serbia—namely, the wish to secure for the small States in South America an opportunity to continue and develop their democratic organization, and beyond this to set up a new world order in the regions which they occupied, an order of peace and self-development. The liberal elements in Great Britain shared this American sentiment. The powerful commercial interests of the kingdom were interested in the retention of the trade relations which they had established with the revolutionary republics. Four times Canning, casting about for an effective policy, suggested in one form or another a joint declaration by the United States and Great Britain against any plan to subjugate for Spain the Hispanic-American Republics. President Monroe's first impulse was to accede to Canning's plan. The ex-Presidents, Jefferson and Madison, were consulted. They, too, favored the entente with Great Britain. They seemed to think such a policy would separate Great Britain entirely from the European coalition and align that Power definitely and finally upon the side of free government. Jefferson recognized that such a course might block the annexation of Cuba by the United States, but he was willing to make the sacrifice for the greater benefits which he saw in the powerful combination with Great Britain in a good cause. Madison wanted coöperation to go further and take the form of intervention in behalf of the liberals in Spain and the Greeks struggling for freedom from Turkey. Many of the leading men of the day, members of Congress like Webster and Clay, elder statesmen like Gallatin, supported intervention in behalf of liberalism everywhere. All the paraphernalia of the American foreign policy—aloofness, isolation, non-entangling alliances which time had gathered—were seemingly to be thrown overboard.

The Secretary of State, who had spent the summer in his New England home, returned to Washington in October to find the new foreign policy taking shape. With the Russian measures for the colonization of the Pacific coast and the British designs on Cuba and the plans of the league for a South American restoration all in mind as the separate moves in world politics, he took the position that the United States ought to act separately "rather than to come in as a cock-boat in the wake of a British man-of-war," to declare its own policy, and thus in effect make of these combined episodes the elements of a popular national foreign policy. "The ground I wish to take," he said, "is that of earnest remonstrance against the interference of European policy by force with South America, but to disclaim all interference on our part with Europe; to make an American cause and adhere inflexibly to that." Such a procedure had the added advantage, no mean one for an out-and-out expansionist like Adams, that it blocked further territorial acquisitions by Great Britain without in the slightest degree embarrassing the expansion of the United States. If it was Canning's double purpose, as some imagine, by an alliance with the United States to save British commerce in Latin America and checkmate the United States in Cuba, Adams had played the game of the diplomat well for a son of the new world.

Monroe accepted the views of his Secretary of State and revised the earlier draft of his message to Congress to include them. The foreign policy of John Quincy Adams became the Monroe Doctrine by full and frank adoption.

The historian gives Monroe's foreign policy a greater unity than it probably had in its author's mind. The message was discursive in form. The parts which told of the measures which had been taken upon foreign policy were scattered throughout the message, in connection with the several subjects under discussion. The combination of these paragraphs into the so-called Monroe Doctrine gives the policy a greater force than it had in the original form. The purpose of the framers is none the less clear and positive—to secure the Americas for the Americans. That the United States was one of the Americas and to be the greatest beneficiary was only incidental. Those that see national selfishness written throughout miss the spirit of the new order which the authors sought to found for the western hemisphere. They proposed to establish the new order by removing from the world Powers the temptation for a war for the division of the Americas. They sought to avoid the nineteenth century counterpart of the colonial French and Indian wars. The clause against further colonization was an announcement that the United States was endeavoring to terminate the rivalry of the nations of Europe in the settlement of the Americas begun with Columbus, Cabot, and Cartier. This meant that the settlement of the wild lands of the Americas was to be left to the nations then claiming them. The clause against intervention of European powers in South American affairs assumed that there was an American system of government essentially different from that of Europe, and announced that the United States would "consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." European Powers with American colonies were assured that the United States had no intention of interfering with them.

One part of the old foreign policy remained, that in regard to Europe:

"not to interfere with the internal concerns of any of its Powers; to consider the Government, de facto, as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every Power, submitting to injuries from none."

The policy of Washington and Jefferson had comprised only the interests of the eastern portion of the North American continent. That of Adams and Monroe included the two Americas; the first had been hardly continental in scope, the second hemispheric. The United States knew neither Asia nor Africa as yet; it would continue to hold aloof from old world politics; it would adventure wholesouled into the politics of the new world. What the adventure meant or might mean men stood ready to foretell. When the popular Speaker of the House of Representatives attempted to place Congress upon record for Monroe's adventure by a resolution of endorsement, he found the Congressmen, mainly on grounds of expediency, unwilling to commit themselves. John Randolph voiced the open opposition. "You will put the peace of the nation into peril," he said, "and for whom? For a people of whom we know almost as little as we do about the Greeks. Can any man in this House say what even is the state of society in Buenos Aires—its moral condition, etc.? Let us adhere to the policy laid down by the second, as well as the first founder of our Republic . . . by him who was the Camillus as well as the Romulus of the infant state: to the policy of peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none; for to entangling alliances we must come if you once embark in such projects as this." At least one Western paper, the Cleveland Herald, thought that the country would be unwisely guided if it should be involved in a war to defend nations "whose claims on us, politically, are limited to our best wishes and sympathies."

Only ignorance of the world as it was could make one say that the new world entered into an era of peace because of the adventure of Monroe. While the American President was leading the United States from what might have become a narrow-visioned isolation, Canning placed the British nation on record. The allied Powers of Europe were given to understand that intervention in Hispanic-American affairs would involve the interests of Great Britain. And history records that no intervention took place in that generation.

ELBERT J. BENTON

Jobs for New Brooms

I DON'T envy the statesman, patriot, or politician, whoever he may be, who comes to our town next March to be President of the United States for four years. I say explicitly four years because all the chances are that he will never serve a second term. He will find a job of house-cleaning facing him which he can not escape. It must be done. It has been put off too long already. It must be a real spring house-cleaning, too; not an ordinary dusting and sweeping. Now, everybody knows how disagreeable that is, how it frazzles nerves, destroys a pleasant routine, and makes for wranglings and janglings. The best that can be said for it is that it is a necessary evil.

If what has to be done in our national household is done, a great many persons will be disturbed and made uncomfortable and unhappy. They will resent it and lay the blame for their trouble on the President who undertakes the rehabilitation and reorganization of all the routine processes and normal necessary functions of day-by-day public business.

The new President will have to work. He won't be able to put in much time at being a great man and having noble sentiments. The time has come to fix the leak in the bathroom that is destroying the library ceiling. That sort of thing won't wait forever. Or, to change the figure, the new President, as the want ads. put it, must not only be a good chauffeur but a competent mechanician.

A blight rests on Washington at this moment. Everybody knows that. All the administrative processes are at the lowest ebb of efficiency. Morale in the departments and other executive establishments is equally low. There is no hope of any recovery or change until a new set of men comes in. The governmental machine will have to run along, as best it may, under its own momentum until next March. As proof of this, just the other day one of the recently inducted Cabinet officers was asked how he liked his new job. He said he thought it might be very interesting if he had anything to do! His mind was simply numbed by the prevalent lethargy. All of his capacities employed to the utmost could only begin to place his department on the plane of efficiency where it should be. It offers almost unlimited opportunities for constructive service that would immediately benefit the condition of all of us. Yet the man who should furnish the springs of action, the motive power, signs his name at the place indicated on routine papers, and deplores that he has nothing to do.

The new President will have to alter all that. He will have to bring a fresh impulse and vitality into the whole executive branch of the Government. He will need to bring to Washington with him as chiefs of executive departments men of enthusiasm, with capacity for hard work and an understanding of the problems and necessities of the great mass of clerks and subordinates who actually carry on, under direction, the work of government. They will find good material here, but at this juncture tired and discouraged and disillusioned. Also these new executives will find drones, and dead wood, and unfit material, the hodgepodge accumulation of years. This will have to be got rid of, and it won't be easy. It will want skill and delicacy plus a certain surgical ruthlessness.

The real construction job will be to reorganize the several departments and executive establishments. They are antiquated. They don't function properly and to the extent of their capacities. As I may phrase it: They don't develop their indicated horse power. All of the departments have grown by accretion and not by an orderly plan. They overlap in their duties and responsibilities. Work is duplicated, which is another way of saying that time and money are wasted. I am never tired of saying that it is your money. The Government never earned a penny. That is not its business. The Government spends its billions every year, but you earn it, and the Government has an infinite capacity for spending. It is the thing it does best. It is silly merely to complain of "Government extravagance" while you do nothing to stop it. It lies within your power.

John Sharp Williams used to say in the old days when he was in the House that the great main difference between serving in the State Legislature and in Congress was that when a member went home from the Legislature he was met at the train by a delegation of his constituents who asked: "Why in Sam Hill did you vote for that big appropriation? Taxes in this State are too high already." But when the members of Congress came home after adjournment the same delegation was at the train to ask: "Why didn't you get a new post office, and a public building at Pineville, and something for the district in the River and Harbor bill?" The poor innocents wanted some "Government money."

But all that is aside from my present contention as to the immediate need of reorganizing and rehabilitating the Government departments. I present a compact bit of testimony from an expert and competent witness, Representative Good, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives:

To-day duplication in the Government service abounds on every hand. For example, eight different departments of the Government with large overhead organizations are engaged in engineering work in navigation, irrigation and drainage; eleven different bureaus are engaged in engineering research; twelve different organizations are engaged in road construction, while twelve with large overhead organizations are engaged in hydraulic construction, and sixteen are engaged in surveying and mapping. Sixteen different bureaus exercise jurisdiction over waterpower development. Nine different organizations are collecting information on the consumption of coal. Forty-two different organizations with overhead expenses are dealing with the question of public health.

The Treasury Department, the War Department, the Interior Department, and the Labor Department each has a bureau dealing with the question of general education. These departments operate independently; instances of coöperation between them are exceptional. Each of these departments is manned at all times with an organization prepared to carry the "peak of the load," and maintains an expensive "ready to serve" personnel. A lack of coöperation in the executive departments necessarily leads to gross extravagance. The system is wrong, and Congress alone can change the system. If it fails to act now and refuses to make the necessary changes in a plan that is admittedly bad, Congress will and should receive the condemnation of the American People.

But Congress has adjourned and has not changed the system. It is not likely that it will undertake it in the brief fag-end of its life next winter. Any real constructive changes and consideration will have to be undertaken by the new President and the new Congress after next March. Congress did pass a budget bill just before it adjourned that might have proved the introductory step to a real budget system, but the President vetoed it because he thought one of its provisions usurped the prerogatives of the Executive. This is one matter than can be remedied next winter after the elections. Whether it will be or not remains to be seen.

As a minority stockholder in the operating company who has had exceptional opportunities to observe, I must report that the Ship of State not only needs a new skipper and a new crew, but when they are in charge, their first duty and necessity will be to put the vessel in dry dock for thorough overhauling and repairs. She is not safe for passengers.

EDWARD G. LOWRY

Washington, D. C.

Correspondence

List to Charles Kingsley

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

Your readers may find in the following poem by Charles Kingsley a stirring message for the present generation.

W. B.

Tenafly, New Jersey, June 11

THE DAY OF THE LORD

The day of the Lord is at hand, at hand:
Its storms roll up the sky:
The nations sleep starving on heaps of gold;
All dreamers toss and sigh.
The night is darkest before the morn;
When the pain is sorest the child is born,
And the day of the Lord at hand.

Gather you, gather you, angels of God—
Freedom, and Mercy, and Truth;
Come! for the earth is grown coward and old,
Come down, and renew us her youth,
Wisdom, Self-sacrifice, Daring, and Love,
Haste to the battle-field, stoop from above,
To the day of the Lord at hand.

Gather you, gather you, hounds of hell—
Famine, and Plague, and War;
Idleness, Bigotry, Cant, and Misrule,
Gather, and fall in the snare!
Hireling and Mammonite, Bigot and Knave,
Crawl to the battle-field, sneak to your grave,
In the day of the Lord at hand.

Who would sit down and sigh for a lost age of gold,
While the Lord of all ages is here?
True hearts will leap up at the trumpet of God,
And those who can suffer, can dare.
Each old age of gold was an iron age too,
And the meekest of saints may find stern work to do
In the day of the Lord at hand.

The Right to Strike

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

Originally the strike was labor's best weapon for self-defence, and this first law of nature has always been recognized as above all customs and all statutes. In self-defence a nation may abrogate a treaty; a municipality may deprive a citizen of his liberty; an individual may commit manslaughter. In self-defence workers have the right to strike. Remove the necessity of self-defence, however, and changed economic and political conditions are fast removing it, and the right to strike is at once limited. Treaty breaking, false imprisonment, murder are crimes recognized by all men; but just what necessity of self-defence justifies beyond all question the calling of a strike is not yet determined. Governor Allen and Mr. Gompers in their recent debate both failed either to help their followers to understand the real point at issue, or to instruct public opinion more justly to discriminate the basic rights involved.

At the conferences held last fall before the strike of the New York drug clerks I listened to long debates that, if they did little else, testified to this confusion of first principles. The duty to the public of the trained pharmacist, practicing his profession under license from the State, and the right of the public to the protection of its health by his properly trained skill, were mixed hopelessly with the individual rights of the clerks and their families and the redress they sought for inadequate pay and very long hours of work. Each side admitted the two contentions of their opponents. Both cited the Boston police strike, which at the time was unsettled, as proof of their better claims. An employing druggist used it in defence of the right of public safety against the right to strike. The union organizer used it to justify any strike called because of intolerable hours and working conditions. He did not, however, convince his hearers, who were too familiar with American city politics to believe that a strike was necessary to wring from the voters fair working hours and decent station houses for the police force. In that strike no question of self-defence was raised in impartial minds. Nevertheless, the plea of self-defence for the Boston police was made by Mr. Gompers himself, and the repeated characterization of strikes as "the last resort" by union leaders is a tacit admission. In many strikes the issues are not sharply defined; but it is increasingly clear that, when the necessity of an appeal to force can not be proved, then the right to strike comes into conflict with other rights.

Intimately connected with the right to strike are the rights of the workers themselves. To deny a worker the right to leave any employment that for any reason whatever is distasteful to him is to establish industrial slavery. To take from a worker that right to accept any employment upon whatever terms he sees fit is but to sanction an industrial tyranny as degrading and as dangerous.

If men, as individuals or as members of an organization, have the right to leave employment, then other men have the right, singly or in a body, to take employment, even upon terms unsatisfactory to others. This is contrary to the theory of the strike held by union leaders. They have always maintained that men leaving work in a body secure by their concerted action an option on their former jobs. Just what proprietary rights are acquired by the seemingly contradictory means of a strike must be reconciled, sooner or later, with the individual rights of both the employers and other workers. This is the very latch-string to the door of the open or the closed shop.

The right to strike often impinges upon property rights. Leaving out of consideration both the willful destruction of property and the breaking of contracts, the mere act of striking, the stopping of production, the closing down of a plant, often involves great financial loss. Property rights are not paramount to human rights; but they are our oldest economic rights upon which, as a foundation, rests our whole economic structure. The right of a man to the fruits of his labor, to possess them for his own use and to dispose of them as he sees fit, so long as he acts within the bounds of law and order, is the foundation of our society, the first cause of all labor in both its broadest and most restricted meanings. The Governor of Kansas and the President of the Federation of Labor would join to defend this right, for much as it has been abused, and sharply as it is criticized to-day, it is still the most eagerly sought right free men possess.

During the past decade the widened scope of the unions and their development into closely controlled national organizations have brought the right to strike into increasingly direct conflict with the rights of the public. Formerly, their domain was confined almost wholly to skilled workers in industrial fields: today, they are steadfastly working to extend their influence over retail trades, over the professions, and among Government employees. A strike that calls out the loom workers in the textile mills of one town is a very different thing from a strike that cuts off the whole nation's coal supply. A demand for ten cents an hour increase in wages made upon a private corporation is not at all the same thing as a threat to the Congress of the United States that it must pass, before a certain fatal hour, a law designed solely for the benefit of railroad employees. The strike is beginning to involve the people at large. The very size and strength of the unions make it impossible for them to employ their strike weapon without hurting the bystander, and self-defence is becoming a prerogative, not of the unions, but of the public.

Nevertheless, the unions continue to brandish their weapon threateningly, and they do not hesitate to wield it ruthlessly. Any suggestion that they disarm in the interest of public safety meets determined opposition. Union leaders oppose compulsory arbitration because it curtails the right to strike. They demand the elimination of the injunction in time of strike on the ground that it nullifies their right to strike. They maintain that the application of anti-Trust laws to labor organization is unjust, because it involves the right to strike. Whether they are appealing to the public, rallying their followers, or trying their case in the courts, they make their stand upon the right to strike.

Definition of this right is obviously the key to the problems of industrial readjustment, and for this reason industrial tribunals whose decisions can establish precedents for testing the right to strike in conflict with other rights are sorely needed to-day. "The State," as Inghram has pointed out, "claims and exercises a controlling and regulating authority over every sphere of social life, including the economic, in order to bring individual action into harmony with the good of the whole." This harmony is not possible until the proper limits are set to conflicting rights that involve all classes of society. In the more restricted field this is even more imperative, and industrial peace depends upon a precise definition of the right to strike.

WILLIAM HAYNES

New York, June 15

Our Dead in France

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

I have no wish to intrude myself into the discussion of a question which is for America wholly a question of national and even of family concern. It is for the parents of the soldiers who died in France, and for them only, to decide whether they shall bring home the bodies of their sons or leave them at rest in the spot where they fell gloriously in support of the common cause.

But there is one remark which perhaps I have the right to make, if only as Chaplain of the American Ambulance at Neuilly where we cared for eight thousand of your wounded (along with fourteen thousand of our own) and where many died in spite of the admirable care of your nurses and doctors: and that is that the graves of all your soldiers, killed on the field of battle or dying in the hospitals, are tended with pious care in every cemetery where they lie. The public authorities have seen to it that these graves were properly arranged and cared for; the women of France cover them with flowers and greenery as if they were those of their own children; priests and ministers of religion hold services there on anniversaries and other days of national observance.

I quite understand that many families would wish to lay their heroes beside their ancestors; and there are some even in France who would prefer it so. But those who leave them with us should know of very truth that they are not, and never will be, in a foreign land. I even venture to think that there is in their fate something even more touching and more glorious.

So, at least, it seemed to your great Theodore Roosevelt, whom I had the honor and the consolation of seeing in New York only two months before his death. Speaking to me of his son Quentin he said: "I have no intention of bringing him home to America; I think that our heroes ought to lie on the field where they fell. But we shall come, his mother and I, to pray at his grave." His mother has come, and alone! She will be able to tell other American mothers what deep and comprehending sympathy is extended in France to the families which have so generously given their sons and who confide them to our care as the most sacred pledges of immortal union between our two peoples.

ABBÉ FELIX KLEIN

Meudon, near Paris, May 17

The Quantity Theory

To the Editors of THE WEEKLY REVIEW:

In a letter in a recent issue of the Weekly Review Mr. Briggs suggested that I blinked the fact that the standard must be a commodity and thus was necessarily affected in its value by its quantity. Perhaps your correspondent is not informed on the literature of the subject, or he would have known that in my "Principles of Money," in Chap. vii, 127 pages were devoted to the "History and Literature of the Quantity Theory." From p. 226 throughout, especial attention was called to the point that a rise of prices due to a fall in the value of the standard was not a case covered by the quantity theory. Of course, the standard is a commodity; it is affected in its value by demand and supply. That is an economic commonplace.

Price is a ratio of exchange between an article and a standard, like gold. A change of price can be caused by influences affecting either gold or the article exchanged for it. Demand and supply chiefly (since with an imperishable commodity like gold cost of production has no immediate effect) regulate the value of gold, so far as causes affecting gold itself are concerned. But demand and supply (as affected quickly and directly by production-costs) operate on the value of any other article. Hence, price in fact is modified by any change in two sets of forces, one on the side of gold, and one on the side of goods. The quantity theorists, however, insist that prices are determined by the amount of money and credit offered against goods brought to market. The fundamental error of the quantity theory, in my judgment, is that it is one-sided, fixing prices only through demand (or purchasing power), wholly disregarding supply and production-costs of the goods in the market. In a former issue of the Weekly Review I tried to point out the fallacy of a theory of prices based only on demand, and ignoring the causes working on supply and supply-costs. In Professor Irving Fisher's formula of the equation of exchange there is no symbol representing production-costs. That such costs do affect prices every day every business man knows without the help of an economist.

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN

E. Jaffrey, N. H., June 16

Packing the Books

We had reached the third and last trunk: I stood up straight to rest my tortured spine and mop my forehead. The heat, this evening, was unspeakable; Peter the parrot, happily recalling his tropic isle, whetted his beak on his cage and gave a ribald laugh. There had been moments since dinner when he was the only one on speaking terms with anybody else. But, with trifling exceptions, Jane and I had come through the ordeal without breaking off diplomatic relations. I had dropped one boot with a thump, and juggled a mid-iron which crashed to the floor. Then I had been caught trying to wrap three tennis balls in a white silk stocking (which was certainly not mine) and had been told that as a trunk-packer I am an obstacle. I believe that Briggs's cartoons of "A Handy Man about the House" are the work of a bitter realist.

A small space remained, before the tray went in. Jane pointed to it, and asked, briefly, "Books"?

"Is that all the room there is left? Then we'll have to take the other bag."

"Nonsense. You can get a dozen books in there. That's all we need: we always take more than we look at."

"Well, maybe a dozen will do—if we can find small ones. It's plain we can not take 'The Home Book of Verse'—though I would like to."

"It's much too large, and heavy. We must have small ones, that we can take on walks with us; and books for me to take over to the tennis court and read aloud, while you are waiting for Jackson to come. He's always late. Besides, small books are best for summer—Stevenson said so."

"It was Dr. Johnson, and it was winter. Otherwise you are right. He said small books are best to carry to the fireside—and I do not believe he meant summer firesides."

"I'm certain it was Stevenson."

"I'll bet you it was Dr. Johnson, and I'll prove it."

So I reached for the last volume of Boswell, and hunted for the reference in the index. But of course I came across the entry "Bagpipes," and could not resist hunting it up, knowing Johnson would have something extra venomous to say about a Scotch institution like bagpipes. That is the trouble with the index to Boswell. Next to the one in Wheatley's edition of Pepys, it is the most distracting in the world. I never pick up either without lapsing into semi-unconsciousness, and returning to earth thirty or forty minutes later, with three volumes in each hand, trying to hold six places open with as many fingers and thumbs, and to run down seven different and fascinating references which have caught my eye. ("Babies" is another interesting entry in Boswell.) Suddenly I became aware that Jane was stuffing some useless clothing into the space for books, and I uttered a howl of protest.

"I thought you had decided not to take any books," she murmured, grief-stricken.

It was necessary for me to placate her, and I did it by producing from behind a row of books a number of little, fat red volumes, comprising some of the less known works of Mr. Trollope. Jane is a nearly demented Trollopian, and this addition to the trunk was to suit her taste, not mine. The day was when I could have bounded the See of Barchester with fair readiness, and described most of the intrigues of that ecclesiastical cock-pit. But Jane has long been graduated from the elementary school, and can talk by the hour of Phineas Finn's parliamentary career, of the Duke of Omnium, of Lady Glencora, Lady Mason, and the rest. She did not at all enjoy hearing somebody remark, airily, that "Cabot Lodge says you have to be middle-aged to read Trollope," as she says that she began to read him at eighteen, and that that was not thousands of years ago. So she fell with cries of joy upon "The Macdermots of Ballycloran" and "The Bertrams" and decided that room could be made in the trunk, after all. I had another diplomatic triumph when I brought out two small volumes of "The Early Diary of Frances Burney"—another of her favorite personages. Then it seemed safe to pander to my own tastes for ancient mysteries and murders long ago. This was "The Riddle of the Ruthvens" by William Roughead—a retelling of old tales of the kind that Stevenson and Andrew Lang loved to hear, of the Gowrie Conspiracy, of old Scotch witchcraft and murder cases. It is a heavy book and probably provoked an extra curse from the men who lifted the trunk. But Mr. Roughead, a sober Scottish lawyer, sound in his learning, orderly in his style, with a nice taste for trials and blood-lettings (as the books which he has edited go to prove) would attract me at any time away from the newspaper stories of murders. This and "Miss Lulu Bett"—so highly recommended—were the only new books we put in.

"Now, for some small ones," said Jane, "for some that we like to read over, and to read aloud. You never will listen to Trollope."

We agreed without difficulty upon Max Beerbohm's "Zuleika Dobson," so that we might revel again in the wonderful proposal of the Duke of Dorset. And we had the book in the Modern Library Series—made for summer and vacation reading. Calverley's "Verses and Fly Leaves" went in by unanimous consent. We hesitated at the Leacock shelf, but chose "Nonsense Novels," and finally decided to take "Arcadian Adventures" as well. I had had an adventure with a Swami recently, at the library, and desired to read about Ram Spudd and the Yahi-Bahi Society once more. Of J. A. Mitchell's we took "The Last American," and of Vielé's, "The Inn of the Silver Moon"—a book for summer reading beyond compare. Too few Americans have had his light touch. Jane put in Lucas's "The Open Road," for its pleasant prose and verse, and I made no objection (for I still felt uneasy about the two pounds of Ruthvens), although I am beginning, professionally, to growl about the endless anthologies. Chambers's novels are not small, but they are light, and we own two written in his golden period of innocence, long before Mr. Hearst put his hands upon him. One of these is little known to folk who think of Mr. Chambers only as the author of his later novels—it is "A King and a Few Dukes." The other, "In Search of the Unknown" is fantastic foolery, admirable for hot weather.

Richard Jefferies's "The Story of My Heart," like all good books, has achieved editions in small size. I have heard it denounced as mawkish, and it is true that the melancholy strain is evident. But it is musical prose, and, like all his books, one to be read in the open air. "Ballades and Rondeaus," edited by Gleeson White—it is the only boon ever conferred upon me by a card catalogue! Once, desiring to write a vilanelle, or maybe a rondeau, for the Harvard "Lampoon," and wondering what such a thing might be like, I went to that dreadful jungle—the catalogue of the library of Harvard College. It directed me to Gleeson White's book, where there is an introduction which describes these verse forms. But I never learned anything from the introduction, for I opened to the contents of the book itself—and what would anyone care for essays upon prosody after that? We put it in, and also "The Crock of Gold," by James Stephens.

The Chief Packer now said that the trunk was too full. But as I had taken "The Crock of Gold" from the shelf the book next to it fell down, as if it wished to go with us. Picking it up I saw that it was Maurice Baring's "Dead Letters," which I have already read four times, and expect and desire to read four times again. It should go to the country with us, it should. Jane said that there was absolutely no room. I suggested that she should take out her parasol, which has pink spots, and is a wicked object in any landscape. I further offered to sacrifice two of her waists, and a roll of something that looked like chiffon. My generosity was received without the least pretence of interest, and in the end I carried "Dead Letters" in my coat pocket.

Edmund Lester Pearson

Book Reviews

Complexities of the Irish Enigma

IRELAND AN ENEMY OF THE ALLIES? (L'Irlande —Ennemie?) Translated from the French of R. C. Escouflaire. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THIS book belongs to a type of literature which has of late just begun to be published, and which aims at supplying a real need. Men who have been exasperated by the disclosure of intrigue four years ago between Dublin and Berlin, by the horrors of Sinn Fein outrage, and by the general intractableness of Irish agitators, are writing their recantation of a sympathy they once professed. They tell us how a fresh survey of the facts has shown them that English misgovernment in Ireland is much overstated, that ancient wrongs long since redressed are being trumpeted as if they were grievances of to-day, and that far less than justice is being done to the honesty of British statesmen. It is much to be desired that some such corrective should be made available, for the propagandists of "Ireland a Nation" are often unfair, and there is widespread delusion about that country's real ground of complaint. Hence one turns with keen interest and expectancy to those writers who confess that they were long misled, and announce that their eyes have now been opened to the truth about Ireland and the Irish.

M. Escouflaire's book begins with the question why Ireland is not on the side of the Allied Powers, and for the answer we are asked to note some psychological peculiarities of the Irish race. It has, like many other peoples, a tragic past, in which it suffered much oppression from a stronger neighbor. But, unlike other peoples, it still lives in that past, refusing under any circumstances and despite the most ample reparation to let bygones be bygones. When we call a thing "ancient history," says M. Escouflaire, we mean that it has lost much of its importance; but in Ireland people mean the opposite. Their persisting demand upon England in the twentieth century is like a proposal that Europe should never have peace until it had "liquidated all the horrors of its past, from Charles the Bold to the Duke of Alva, from the Sicilian Vespers to the Palatinate." Moreover, Ireland has made the unfortunate discovery that she has a gift for international "acting," by which sympathetic emotion may be effectively stirred, and she continues to play this part of the injured innocent with quite undeserved success.

Thus the present book aims at undeceiving the public. M. Escouflaire rewrites Anglo-Irish history, pointing out the allowances which have to be made for some stern measures of long ago, the provocation which Ireland gave, the corresponding sins on her own part which must be included in the account, the fact that effort after effort has been made to heal the sting of old wounds. So far the purpose of his work seems admirable, and it is written with a certain piquancy of style by which interest is held throughout. One must regret, however, that the intention is so seriously marred in the performance, and it is a reviewer's plain duty to tell M. Escouflaire that the task he has set himself is very much beyond his powers of criticism and historical discrimination.

Not much can be hoped from those who approach this difficult subject in so inflamed a mood, and with knowledge so sadly limited. One can, of course, understand the bitterness of a Frenchman whose outlook is determined by the memory of 1916, and by the thought of a Dublin rising so ominously timed to coincide with the desperate crisis of the Allies. But M. Escouflaire professes to be writing history, and he makes the mistake of trying to prove immensely too much. Having begun by accepting the view of anti-British extremists as completely established, he proceeds to the conclusion that it is completely refuted, and the simplicity of mind which made him so easy a victim in the first case has been no less fatal to his judgment in the second. He is aware, indeed, that there are fearful pages in the record of Anglo-Irish government, but he thinks they belong wholly to the period before 1829, and that the events since then, so far as they were directed by English Conservative statesmen, are a long series of acts of generosity by which old grievances should have been quite obliterated for any race that knew what it was to be grateful. For his former vision of the "Martyred Isle" he substitutes the vision of a churlish, petulant "Tragedy Queen," posing before the world with the myth of her wrongs, and meeting every advance by her best-intentioned benefactors in a stubbornly vindictive spirit of revenge.

It is lamentable to find an excellent case given away like this. Sinn Feiners could desire nothing better than that such a book should be accepted as the authoritative manifesto by their opponents. M. Escouflaire's own competence in this field may be judged from a few examples. Froude he thinks falsified history to exalt the Irish race! Whatever other falsifications Froude may have committed, this particular one can not be laid to his charge, as all readers of "The English in Ireland" must be aware. His rhetoric rather suggests at times that of M. Escouflaire himself, as when he sneers at the race which can "bewail its wrongs in wild and weeping eloquence in the ears of mankind." The rebellion of 1798 was, it appears, specially inexcusable, because it came at a moment when the Irish had been "overwhelmed with concessions"; about the claim for parliamentary reform and for Catholic emancipation which had not yet been conceded, and which entered so largely into the motive for rebelling, our critic has nothing to say. We are informed that "since 1829 there has been practically not the slightest inequality, civil or political, between Roman Catholics and Protestants." Whether M. Escouflaire judges it equal treatment that the sole university worthy of the name and lavishly endowed by state funds should have remained for at least half a century a Protestant preserve, whether he thinks it fair that a Protestant State Church should have been maintained by compulsory tribute in a country four-fifths Catholic, whether he finds no hardship in the monopolizing of Crown appointments, civil and judicial, by a Protestant garrison and in the practical penalizing by Crown patronage of those who adhered to the ancient faith, or what dates he has in mind for the Tithe War, the opening of official posts in Trinity College, and the first admission on terms anything like equal of Catholic candidates for public posts—about all this one is left to conjecture. Macaulay, who after all was something of an historian in his leisure time, and who was not quite devoid of British loyalty, summed up the principle of those Conservatives whom M. Escouflaire admires as that of yielding nothing to justice and everything to fear.

But this French critic is so far from the spirit of his own generous nation that such virulence as he can spare from Irish agitators is poured on the head of English Liberals. He seems to have little love for Mr. Lloyd George, and he has an exasperating habit—perhaps borrowed from Thucydides but now largely obsolete—of presenting a statesman's views by writing a speech for him, and declaring that this expresses his attitude "in effect." He is good enough to describe the British Prime Minister as "formerly an intractable Radical, suddenly fired by patriotism," and I venture to think that Mr. Lloyd George would prefer writing his own speeches rather than adopt the whirling words which M. Escouflaire puts into his mouth as an address to the Convention of 1917. No doubt an Englishman, getting up in a hurry an account of party strife at Paris, might have his facts no less obscured, his fictions no less radiant, his whole way of presenting the case no less confused by weak generalities and strong personalities. What, for instance, can any man know about Charles Stewart Parnell who speaks of his great "oratorical triumphs"? But an Englishman would not meddle in this random way with a foreign field. And the present critic at least would be sorry if the eye of a German, at a loss to excuse von Bethmann-Hollweg's phrase about the "scrap of paper," should light upon this Frenchman's apology for the broken Treaty of Limerick: "It is too much to hope that a piece of parchment can prevent the workings of natural and popular reactions, as irresistible as the forces of nature"! It betrays a sad lack of self-criticism in the author that he let this sentiment escape him without noticing its applicability to the Prussian crime against Belgium.

Thus M. Escouflaire's book must be laid down with a sigh of disappointment. It is the sort of work which can help no one, a perfect specimen of how Irish matters should not be discussed, and those most anxious for the object he sets before himself should be the first to repudiate the methods by which he is seeking it. Everywhere his tone is that of an apologist for a super-State, enforcing discipline upon barbarous natives, and to be adored for occasional acts of clemency. We know that tone, and the world will listen to it no longer. The spirit of the new time M. Escouflaire meets with futile vituperation. As he glorifies the House of Lords for its wisdom in checkmating the elective Chamber, as he hurls scurrilous epithets at Cobden and Bright, at Gladstone, and Mr. Asquith, and even Mr. Lloyd George, as he begins by propounding a riddle and leaves us more deeply than ever in the dark about its solution, one hardly knows whether to laugh or cry. Why is the Ireland of 1920 so different from the Ireland of 1914? For answer we get a storm of abuse at the Irish temperament, and a volley of bad names at English statesmen whom the misguided world has somehow come to respect.

There are, it must be confessed, in this book things both true and important, pungently and vividly set forth, which one could have wished to see apart from that setting of sheer nonsense by which truth itself is discredited, and that rancour of intemperateness which M. Escouflaire endeavors to allay but succeeds rather in exemplifying. He obviously thinks that he has done a great deal to expose a fraud, and there are frauds both in the Irish and in the anti-Irish case which need exposure. The present critic hates Sinn Fein and all its works as much as M. Escouflaire can hate them, but he would wish to see it attacked with artillery not so far out of range. The complexities of the Irish enigma still wait for a more delicate hand, a finer historic sense, and a better grasp of the conditions of international friendship.

HERBERT L. STEWART

The Mystery of Jutland

THE BATTLE OF JUTLAND. The Sowing and Reaping of the British Navy. By Commander Carlyon Bellairs, M.P. With maps and diagrams. New York: George H. Doran Company.

BOTH in Germany and in England the battle of Jutland was hailed as a victory. No sensible person long believed either claim. If it were a German success, why had Von Scheer fled to cover? If it were a British victory, how had the British fleet—strong two for one—lost six big cruisers as against a battle cruiser and one pre-dreadnought for Germany? Something was wrong on the face of it: the Germans, for no apparent military reason, had conducted a rash but eminently successful raid, while the British had let slip a supreme chance to destroy the German fleet. Meanwhile the mystery has deepened because the British official accounts—enormous at the first—have subsequently dealt only in general terms, while the official maps have plainly been merest approximations. And Admiral Viscount Jellicoe himself has hardly made the darkness more visible in his elaborate commentary on the battle. It appears that he was baffled by the flight of the Germans and the closing in of night. Against this the well-informed reader will set the facts that after his deployment at 6.16 P. M. there remained three hours of daylight, while his battle line had at least three knots of speed over that of the Germans, not to mention double weight of salvos.

Of this mystery Commander Bellairs offers a very simple explanation. Admiral Jellicoe was repeatedly and grossly unenterprising. Beatty, in his own words, "delivered the German fleet into his jaws," and he hesitated to close them. The facts, according to our author, are as follows: On May 30, 1916, Beatty's three squadrons and Jellicoe's six took the sea to meet the German fleet. From 3.47, May 31, Beatty engaged Admiral Hipper's battle cruisers, and followed him back to Von Scheer's main fleet. Beatty continued the battle cruiser fight for two hours and a half, under frightful punishment, and about 6.16 P. M. moved aside, still hammering the head of the German line, to make place for Jellicoe's fleet. Beatty still fought for nearly three hours more. Jellicoe, as we shall soon see, virtually elected not to fight. Practically all the damage received or inflicted in the battle was incurred or wrought by Beatty or his supporting squadron leaders, Hood and Evans Thomas. Jellicoe's casualties in the twenty-four minutes in which he was partially engaged amounted to one shell hit on the Colossus and the crippling of the Marlborough through a torpedo.

Jellicoe's moves, as analyzed by Commander Bellairs, came to this: (1) Coming down from Scapa, he failed to establish visual links with Beatty, seventy miles ahead, and thus located the enemy only on contact. (2) At 5.30 P. M. he sent Hood with four battle cruisers to the east to cut off possible retreat of the Germans to the Baltic. This was an unimaginative move. Hood's squadron, while far too strong to be detached for mere reconnaissance, was too weak to check the supposed flight. That Hood actually turned up at the head of Beatty's hard-pressed line was due to his splendid initiative and to good luck, with no thanks to the high command. (3) About six, sailing south in five columns of squadrons, Jellicoe sighted the foe on the starboard bow, to the south-west. Instead of making the natural deployment to the right, which would have given him immediate contact with the whole German battle line, he deployed to the left, away from the enemy. The movement, begun at 6.14 or 6.16, was effected in some twenty minutes. Von Scheer, seeing the formidable line stretching five miles ahead of him, turned. Thus only the rear divisions of Jellicoe's fleet were in action. By the time Jellicoe's model single line-of-battle had been formed, the ridiculous situation arose that the British fighting fleet was steaming at 17 knots in the opposite direction from the fleeing Germans. At the very moment of Jellicoe's evasive deployment the Invincible, Defence, and Warrior were done for. An aggressive deployment to the right would presumably have saved them. (4) Jellicoe pursued what had become a retreat for about ten minutes, opening up an additional four miles between himself and the fleeing enemy. (5) After turning south to regain contact, Jellicoe twice turned his whole formation away to avoid feeble destroyer attacks, and at no time increased his speed beyond 18 knots. (6) At 7.32 P. M., Beatty, being still in contact with the enemy, signalled for Jellicoe's leading squadron to join his line and cut off the enemy. Jerrams was not allowed to redeem the day by this correct manœuvre, and the last chance for the great fleet to do its work of annihilation was ignored. (7) Although night found Jellicoe between the enemy and the Bight of Heligoland, with all the advantages of speed on his side, they readily evaded him in the dark and got away home. Such is briefly Commander Bellairs' case against Jellicoe. It looks like a true bill—like a case not for a viscounty, but for a court martial. Captain Persius' language seems both correct and moderate when he writes of "the unskillful handling of the British fleet under Admiral Jellicoe."

It should be said, however, that these charges are made on partial information.

The laymen can readily grasp the difficulty of plotting a battle on the high seas. Ships' clocks differ slightly, vessels are not always correctly identified, bearings are sometimes bad approximations, everything is moving together. Besides, the complete navy account of the battle has not yet appeared. On the other hand, most of the seven specifications above are of too general a sort to be contested as facts, and nearly all are admitted in Viscount Jellicoe's own book. For example, he elaborately defends a deployment which amounted to an evasion, because the obvious deployment to the right and towards the enemy would have involved punishment by destroyer attack and gun fire during the evolution. Against statistical comparisons of broadsides at given theoretical moments—highly fallacious calculations—the observer will set the fact that Jellicoe's destroyers with their heavier guns should handily have looked out for the German torpedo craft, while ship for ship his salvos outweighed the Germans by fifty per cent., and he had about three fighting ships for their two.

Tactically Jellicoe, as our author clearly points out, indulged two fatal misconceptions—first, the oft discredited theory of the rigid, single line-of-battle; second, the illusion that a battle line five miles long can be tactically fought by an Admiral in the centre. Let us recall that twenty minutes after the enemy's smoke appears a modern sea fight will have been finished. That means that the Admiral's plan must be instantaneous, that the details must be left to his squadron leaders, whose minds he must have impressed with his tactical principles and preferences through years of training. Admiral Jellicoe, hesitating before the sweetest sight that ever met a sea fighter's eye, wondering where to place his mathematically correct line, affords a spectacle as pathetically obsolete as the Coliseum. Beatty had the German fleet headed, an ideal situation. Jellicoe had only to deploy towards the foe on Beatty, and within a half hour there would have been no German fleet. But he was not quite clear as to the situation, and the great fleet awaited his signal. Meanwhile the situation was perfectly plain two miles to his right. Had Burney on the Marlborough been permitted a squadron leader's initiative, he would immediately have turned to the right towards the head of the German battle line, and the four other squadrons would have followed his move. Of course, that would have involved risk and certain losses, but the prize was the German fleet. Burney, as things were, merely awaited the signal from the bewildered Admiral on the Iron Duke.

We have been assuming, with our author, that Jellicoe's mission was the destruction of the High Seas Fleet. On the contrary theory, that his mission was to avoid a ding-dong fight, drive the Germans home, and continue to exert "passive pressure" from Scapa, all his moves are entirely logical. On no other supposition can they be justified. We do not know what were his instructions from the Admiralty. We do know that, if Hipper and Von Scheer had been sunk, the clearance of the Baltic offered merely technical difficulties, Russia might have been stiffened, the submarine menace, which within a year was threatening starvation for England, could have been eradicated in a few months. Whoever was responsible, naval history hardly shows a similar example of lost opportunity.

But if Jellicoe was right, then Beatty was entirely wrong. If his mission was not to lead the German fleet to destruction—and so he undoubtedly read his duty—but merely to see that it was frightened back home, then he fought a fight as needless as it was heroic, and recklessly threw away his magnificent battle cruisers. In short, it was absurd to award viscounties to both Jellicoe and Beatty. Both could not be right, and one was unpardonably wrong. Only a court martial could have elicited facts which now remain in considerable obscurity. Meanwhile the presumption is in favor of the Admiral who acted in Nelson's tradition.

Hamilton the Democrat

ALEXANDER HAMILTON. By Henry Jones Ford. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

SIR OLIVER LODGE and others versed in such matters believe, as we understand, that the shades of the departed can not communicate with earth otherwise than through mediums. Few of these gifted ladies have time to keep up with current biographical and historical literature, and the great who have passed hence do not know of the efforts of succeeding generations to pay them a tribute of gratitude which their own either altogether withheld or grudgingly gave. If the spirit of Alexander Hamilton could read what Professor Ford says about him, he might feel that atonement had been made for much that he suffered in the flesh from the tongues and pens of Monroe, Giles, Freneau, and others of their way of thinking.

This, the latest of his biographers, numbers him "among the greatest statesmen the world has produced." Well-informed foreigners like Talleyrand in his own era, and Oliver in ours, have so ranked him. In this country, Federalists and those who sympathize with the Federalist tradition, have left little unsaid in praise of what he was and of what he did.

The biographer, we believe, has always belonged to the party first organized by Jefferson, but for all that, he finds himself in sympathy with much of Hamilton's teachings. In one of the most striking portions of his book, he points out that Hamilton was far more of a democrat than were many of his political opponents, founders and leaders as they were of the party which since the close of their era has called itself Democratic. As late as 1830, Madison and Monroe, in the Constitutional Convention of Virginia, united with Marshall, in maintaining property qualifications for voting, although more than forty years before, Hamilton had favored the election of the Federal House of Representatives by universal manhood suffrage.

Hamilton's wish for a strong executive, with an absolute veto over Congressional action, and with the right to appoint State Executives, may have in it something of appeal to the writer of that "Life of President Wilson" which four years ago was used as a campaign biography. He believes Hamilton's constitutional idea to have been "plenary power in the administration, subject to direct and continuous accountability to the people, maintained by a representative assembly, broadly democratic in its character," while Jefferson wished that the "powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others." If he is right, it seems that in the Presidential campaign upon which the country is now entering, those who think themselves to be followers of Hamilton will be inclined to preach the Jeffersonian doctrine, while the defense of many of President Wilson's actions will lead the loyal members of his party to champion Hamilton's views, whether they be aware of it or not.

How Hamilton's plan would have worked, no one can with certainty say. Although the Presidency is without some of the far-reaching powers he wished it to have, its real influence has been steadily growing, while that of Congress has been shrinking. Professor Ford thinks that it is quite possible that under such a Constitution as Hamilton planned the real weight of Congress would have been greater than it now is. It would almost certainly have had a far firmer hold upon the imagination and affection of the people, and in a democracy that counts for much.

It must be borne in mind that Hamilton expected that the principal officers of the executive administration would draft the legislation they thought expedient, and would in person explain and defend it on the floor of each of the Houses. If throughout our history this practice had been actually followed, Professor Ford thinks Congress would be more rather than less powerful to-day.

Such a method of legislating would have been more dramatic and therefore far more likely to attract and hold public attention. The rejection of an important ministerial measure would have been a political event of the first order. The Cabinet officer responsible for it might not usually have lost his place, for the Constitution carefully guards the Presidential independence, but it is certain that the heads of the great executive departments under such a system would necessarily have had to be chosen with an eye to their ability to get on with Congress. The possession of a mind which would go along with that of the President might have been a less important qualification.

The precedent which has ever since excluded Cabinet ministers from direct participation with Congress in the consideration of legislation was made by the First Congress. In coming to its decision, the House followed the lead of Madison. Professor Ford suspects that he was anxious to keep Hamilton from the floor, because he feared that the eloquent and persuasive Secretary of the Treasury might favor the location of the capital on the Susquehanna or the Delaware, rather than on the Potomac. If so, great consequences flowed from a petty cause.

Most students of Hamilton will agree with the author in thinking that the years of his life of least worth either to his country or to his fame were those which followed the accession of Adams to the Presidency, although not all would agree that they deserved the full measure of condemnation here visited upon them. The fact is, under our system of government, things are likely to work badly whenever an influential section of the party in power, consciously or even unconsciously, looks for leadership to some other than its President. Experience has shown this to be almost equally true, whether the occupant of the White House be somewhat vain and altogether peppery, like the elder Adams, amiable if perchance a trifle weak, like Buchanan, or modest and good natured, like Taft, and whether the unofficial leader be a Hamilton, a Douglas, or a Roosevelt.

Such difficulties are by no means unknown even under a parliamentary government of the British type, but there they are usually, although of course not always, speedily adjusted by the simple expedient of calling the real head of the party to office. Over here we have no such easy way of setting things right, and, upon each of the three occasions referred to, party disruption and loss of power was the consequence—in the first instance, forever; in the second, for nearly a quarter of a century, and in the third, for at least two Presidential terms.

JOHN C. ROSE

Mission Life at St. Antoine

LE PETIT NORD, OR ANNALS OF A LABRADOR HARBOUR. By Anne Grenfell and Katie Spalding. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

THE headquarters of Dr. Grenfell's medical mission in Labrador is at St. Antoine, situated far up on the eastern side of the long tongue of Newfoundland which runs to the north. Among the other institutions which have grown up on that bleak spot is an orphanage for children who would otherwise be utterly destitute. An English lady, Miss Spalding, who came out to take charge of it, wrote letters home to a friend in Scotland. Those letters, together with some of Mrs. Grenfell's, have been printed to form these annals. They present a very vivid, unpretending picture of things as they really are in this work, viewed by a capable, energetic, and humorous temperament.

Hardships not a few were this lady's lot before she ever reached her station—seasickness, bad food, cold, wet, loss of luggage, expectorating men on board a crowded little steamer, loneliness, homesickness. Of all of these she makes light, but they must have been real enough. Her post in the orphanage was no bed of roses. Winter lasts nine months. In blizzards, the thermometer falls to thirty below, and the snow sifts in through every crack and crevice of the orphanage, in spite of double windows. A fire may be burning briskly in the kitchen range, and the water in the kettle frozen. The mere mending and darning for a family of three dozen sturdy children is a sufficient task. Looking after them when the whole family comes down with measles would seem to be beyond any one woman's strength. Christianity and a strong sense of humor carry her through. Both were sorely tried, however, when a bale of clothing donated by kind friends at home was found to consist of muslin blouses and old ladies' bonnets.

The need of such a mission must be apparent to all. Miss Spalding draws an unflattering picture of the local conditions. "There is no education worthy of the name, in many places no schools at all, and in other places half-educated teachers eking out a miserable existence on a mere pittance. This is chiefly due to the antediluvian custom of dividing the Government educational grant on a denominational basis. A large proportion of the people can neither read nor write. There are no roads; no means of communication, no doctors or hospitals (save the mission ones), no opportunities for improvement, no industrial work, practically no domestic animals, and on Labrador, taxation without representation! There is only one hospital provided by the Government for the whole of this island, and that one is at St. John's, which is inaccessible to these northern people for the greater part of the year."

Like every other visitor to these shores, Miss Spalding is impressed with the truly Christian, boundless charity of the very poor. She instances an old blind Frenchman incapable of supporting himself. "The neighbors vie with each other by helping him. One day a load of wood will find its way to his door. The next a few fresh 'turr,' a very 'fishy' sea auk, are left ever so quietly within his woodshed—and so it goes. It is a constant marvel to me that these people, who live so perilously near the margin of want, are always so eager to share up."

The Doctor himself has provided the book with a series of pen-and-ink drawings, the humorous intention of which is more commendable than the technique. The frontispiece shows a steamer wallowing in tremendous seas. It might serve as an illustration for "The Descent Into the Maelstrom"; but surely no steamer could have carried so much sail in such stress of weather.

ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN

Unhappy Tales

MAUREEN. By Patrick MacGill. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.
HARVEST. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

"Maureen" is another chapter in the plaintive tale of Ireland as told by her sons of this generation: the tale of Kathleen ni Houlihan, beautiful and adored, embodiment of an Ireland that might be or might have been; and the tale of a dull and sordid peasantry, with generous impulses but mean thoughts, ridden by the gombeen man and the parish priest: not, Kathleen or no Kathleen, the stuff of which a free people is to be made. Such is the effect of the testimony of these young Irish poets and novelists. Their passionate love for Erin is worship of a mystical queen: a worship disturbed and distracted by the sight of the unseemly drab they have to live with. Often, as in the recent "Clanking of Chains" of Brinsley MacNamara, this contrast is the overt theme of the story teller. With Patrick MacGill, as a rule, his persons keep the foreground, and their story embodies rather than merely illustrates the tragi-comic fate of his land. The portrait of Maureen dominates this book, though there is so much else in it.

Maureen is part of the price of a decent girl's momentary weakness. In the little parish of Dungarrow that price must be paid in full; though a broadhearted parish priest (for whom we are grateful) tempers the wind as he may. Mother and daughter are devoted to each other. The mother dies when Maureen has come to full maidenhood. There is a tiny property for her, but she now feels the odium of her birth and wishes to leave Dungarrow. Love in the person of the manly Cathal Cassidy is at her feet; but she thinks herself not good enough. After some uneasy experiences at service "beyont the mountains," she returns to Dungarrow; and love and happiness seem to be near when a brutal fate, working equally through her Irish innocence and the Irish villainy of the unspeakable Columb Ruagh, smears her out of innocence and life together, as a careless hand crushes an insect on a window pane. Ireland is left, the Ireland of fine dreams and of squalid Dungarrow, to produce other Cathals and Columbs and Maureens, fated to mutual destruction, while time endures. . . . In a way Maureen may be taken as a symbolic Kathleen, the hapless soul of that uneasy land; but she may better stand as a human portrait of appealing reality. Cathal and his fellow Sinn Feiners may drill and plot and make their ill-judged demonstrations for a free Ireland. It is in the body of Maureen that the Ireland of to-day has its being and, perhaps, fulfills its sad destiny.

For me there is less health and more melodrama in Mrs. Ward's latest and last novel, "Harvest." This also is the story of a woman's hapless fate; but while Maureen in her simple dignity is a tragic figure, Rachel Henderson, when all is said a feeble soul in a splendid body, never really rises above pathos. You may fall in love with her, but she is not lovable; you may credit her with good qualities, but they are not summed up in character. To give the story in bare outline is to suggest a scenario for the movies. Ingenue marries gentleman villain, discovers his true character, rebels, is abused, escapes, gets a divorce. This takes place in Canada. She goes back home under her maiden name, becomes a wartime woman farmer, prospers, loves again, is about to be happy; when re-enter villain, hard up, heartless, blackmails her, she pays him five hundred pounds to keep away. She has told her soldier-lover, Ellesborough, of her former marriage. But she has not told him "all"; namely, that in the confusion and distress of her first divorced days she has been the temporary, quite temporary, mistress of a second man. The villain knows all, and knows or suspects that Ellesborough is ignorant. After bribing him, Rachel realizes her impossible position, with an early war-wedding in sight; writes a letter to Ellesborough telling him "all"; Ellesborough gulps again, and flies to take her in his arms; where she is shot to death by the opium-crazed and half-jealous husband. The author appears to have a suspicion that this may be as good a solution as can be hoped for in the circumstances: "Had it been after all 'deliverance' for Rachel from this 'troublesome world,' and the temptations that surround those who are not strong enough for the wrestle that Fate sets them—that a God appoints them?" But the truth is that, save in our acceptance of that glamour of physical health and beauty with which her creator strives to invest her, there is little in this Rachel to engage us deeply. She is a quite ordinary weak young woman with, for all we know, extraordinary looks, who tries to dodge the consequences of her weakness, finally confesses, and is forgiven; also shot, which doesn't matter much, one way or the other. Single-hearted Maureen rather than the muddled Rachel inspires in us the deeper pity and terror which alone may ennoble our delving into the mysteries of passion and of death. I for one should be unhappy if it were necessary for me to remember Mrs. Ward by this book.

H. W. Boynton

The Run of the Shelves

Books of the Week

[Selected by Edmund Lester Pearson, Editor of Publications, New York Public Library.]

Life of Lord Kitchener, by Sir George Arthur. Macmillan.

In three volumes. The size is justified in the biography of a man of action, whose career is so recent as to leave plentiful material. Presumably authentic, and intensely interesting.

The Peace Conference Day by Day, by Charles T. Thompson. Brentano.

The author was Superintendent of the Foreign Service of the Associated Press in Paris. It is a diary, beginning with President Wilson's arrival in France.

Follow the Little Pictures, by Alan Graham. Little, Brown.

A novel of mystery and buried treasure for the lovers of puzzles.

"I DON'T like it," said an Anglican clergyman concerning the Salvation Army, "but between you and me, I think God likes it."

So will many readers feel about "The Life of General William Booth," by Harold Begbie (Macmillan), those at least who are not in complete sympathy with "old fashioned" evangelical religion—and it is safe to say that there are fewer now than there were fifty years ago who look to the Blood of the Lamb for cleansing from sin, in whose thought hell stands as something more shrivelingly real than the colored lights of pulpit dramatics. A liberal in religion, especially if he be somewhat fastidious in his tastes, will feel in reading the first part of this biography a somewhat forced sympathy. We know that the Salvation Army does almost literally a world of good, and we always drop our quarters into the tambourine when it jingles under our noses, but we do not propose to make ourselves uncomfortable about it. To any except the elemental mind (for which it was planned), its crudity has no appeal until it becomes monumental. So in the first part of the biography the reader is oppressed by an atmosphere like that of Zion Chapel in Browning's "Christmas Eve," distracted by it so that he misses the very beauty he is seeking, that of a completely unselfish spirit.

"Historians of the nineteenth century," says Mr. Begbie, "will probably pay some attention to the architecture of Nonconformity—this deliberate effort of the religious conscience to do without aids, this evident suspicion and dislike of beauty, this rather hard and insensible insistence on utility. . . . More than a touch of the Puritan is in this early Victorian architecture of Nonconformity." It is the architecture of Booth's own spirit. He was, we are told, "not greatly concerned with nature, and perhaps even less with literature and art," he "resolutely turned his back upon science, and, like St. Paul, determined to know nothing but Christ, and Him crucified." It was a narrow channel, but its narrowness gave the spirit half its force. At first the force was not great, but it was absolutely unquenchable; its flow was ceaseless, and to dam it back was only to lend it power. It has carried its priesthood and ablution to almost every earthly shore, and incidentally it carried William Booth from behind the counter of a pawnbroker's shop into the palaces of kings. It is the type of the Puritan spirit in its intensity in all things, in the conviction of religious truth, the indefatigable zeal for proselyting, the will never to submit but to do good to everybody whether anybody wants it or not. In its minor aspects it commands only annoyance. If it is misguided it is disastrous—"Lord, do Thou guide us aright," says the Puritan prayer, "for Thou knowest that whether we be right or wrong we be very determined." Only when it is successful, when it moves a Crusade, plants a continent, abolishes slavery, does it command admiration. At the end of Mr. Begbie's two volumes one is left in no doubt that General Booth was successful. The conviction might have been obtained with fewer words; for the general reader there are rather too many "interesting cases" of conversion described in the more or less technical diction of revivalism, too much journalism in the way of press clippings and tributes from royalty. But the record as a whole is an inspiring one of heroic achievement against heavy odds, and the portrait is successfully drawn, for through details that might tend to obscure it the figure shines clearly of the man of intense spirit, of uncompromising sincerity (no one can doubt it now), undiminishing sensibility and sympathy, and large vision of his chosen task.

The personality of the author of "Democracy" and "Passion"—the latter was reviewed in one of our recent issues—is as interesting as his novels. Shaw Desmond is an Irishman on his father's side. His mother is an Englishwoman, who comes of a French Huguenot family—La Fontaine. He was originally in "big business," and at twenty-three—he is now forty-three—was secretary to, and, later, director in, five or six limited liability companies in London. He writes in a private letter:

> I always really hated business but wanted to "make good" and get as soon as possible to my real work—writing, which I began in 1912, and public speaking. I lived the first ten years of my life in Ireland and still think it "God's country," with America a good second. I can say without affectation that I love America and her people, and am one of those who believe that she is not primarily a money-getter—the common superstition—nor boasting. The only Americans who boast that I have met are those living in Europe. I have great hopes for her future in art; and the reading quality of the American public is some sixty or seventy per cent. above that of England—why I do not know—so that my stories, which some of the best critics on this side have said are unique in their way, stand a poor chance of recognition here. I have begun on some plays, one of which—"My Country"—will, I hope, soon be performed here by the People's Theatre Society upon the executive of which I am. I may add that "Passion," like all my books, is "a story without a plot." People call them novels—a detestable word.

Mr. Desmond wrote for many years for the leading European newspapers, reviews, etc.; stood for Parliament as an Independent Socialist against Cabinet Minister John Burns in the 1910 election and "got badly beaten after six days give and take."

Mr. Desmond has lectured in many countries, meeting with special success during the war in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. He speaks Danish fluently, having lived in Copenhagen for a long time and being married to the Danish writer Karen Ewald, daughter of the late Carl Ewald, the novelist and poet. In fact his first book—"Fru Danmark" (Mother Denmark)—appeared in 1917 in Danish and came out later in English as "The Soul of Denmark." We may add that the American public will soon be able to judge of Mr. Desmond's ability as a lecturer, as he is to make a tour in this country in the autumn, beginning at New York.

From the window of your room in the Hotel d'Angleterre at Rouen, you look

(Continued on page 682)

NEW MACMILLAN BOOKS

NOW AT YOUR BOOKSELLERS!

THE WIND BETWEEN THE WORLDS

By ALICE BROWN

A swiftly moving plot and dramatic action evolves against the background of automatic writing and communication with the dead. A timely novel of extraordinary interest in which the crisp realities of daily experience play against the dubious discoveries of a pseudo scientist.

American Guide Book to France and Its Battlefields $3.50

By Lieut.-Col. E. B. Garey, A. E. F.; Lieut.-Col. O. O. Ellis, A. E. F.; Lieut.-Col. R. V. D. Magoffin, O. R. C.

With a foreword by Major-General Leonard Wood

A new and practical guide book, giving especial attention to the battlefields of the Great War, and thoroughly dependable in matters of civil and military history.

The Human Factor in Industry

By Lee K. Frankel, Ph.D.

Third Vice-President of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

AND

Alexander Fleisher, Ph.D.

Assistant Secretary of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

A keen and comprehensive analysis of personnel work in industry from the standpoint of better coöperation between employer and employee. A book of distinct practical value to the business man as well as the general public.

Helping Men Own Farms

By Elwood Mead $2.25

An authoritative survey of government aid in land settlement, discussing the history of past attempts in this country and in Europe, with especial reference to present conditions.

Bluestone

By Marguerite Wilkinson $1.50

A series of remarkable poems written with freedom, passion and beauty. One of the most original productions of the recent poetic renaissance.

Marion Frear's Summer

By Margaret Ashmun $1.75

An exceedingly amusing book for girls by the author of the famous Isabel Carleton series.

Occasional Papers and Addresses of an American Lawyer

By Henry W. Taft $2.50

A timely volume containing brilliantly written and carefully thought out conclusions on the most important national and political questions now agitating the public mind.

A Service of Love in War Time

By Rufus M. Jones $2.50

An inspiring interpretation and history of the work of the American Friends during the war in rebuilding homes, reviving agriculture, reconstructing devastated areas and saving the lives of children.

The Religious Consciousness

By James Bissett Pratt $4.00

A thorough and comprehensive analysis of the religious consciousness from the standpoint of an unbiased observer who is closely acquainted with the entire literature of the subject.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, Publishers NEW YORK

(Continued from page 681)
down on the deck of a slender little steamer at its dock in the Seine. It is there in the evening, but when you open the shutters after your breakfast in bed it is gone. Thereafter it lingers in your mind, and whenever you think of it you wish you had cut loose from your carefully planned itinerary and taken that little boat down the Seine to Havre. If you missed the journey when you were there, you may take it, turned end for end, between the covers of Anna Bowman Dodd's "Up the Seine to the Battlefields" (Harpers). It is a rather sentimental little journey. Episodes are of the slenderest; emotional contracts are light. Placid shores, dim rich cities, ancient villages, drift by in tones a trifle too pale, dimmed rather than enriched by the atmosphere through which Mrs. Dodd shows them. They gain, however, by the historical background against which here and there they are sketched, the flight of royalty deposed, the funeral barge of the exiled Emperor, the storied towers of Jumièges, the death of the Conqueror. Unfortunately Mrs. Dodd's style is too hasty—at points it is positively slipshod—to carry the finer effects that would make for complete success in such work as this. But the book is enticing for its review of the little French towns, churches, towers, and abbeys, the love of which is now so widespread in the United States. And reading it makes you certain of one thing, when next you are at Havre or Rouen nothing earthly shall prevent you from taking that little boat on the Seine.

The Columbia University Press is responsible for the American edition of the "English-Speaking Brotherhood and the League of Nations," by Sir Charles Walston (emendation for Waldstein). This work is partly a re-issue of an earlier book, the "Expansion of Western Ideals and the World's Peace," published in 1899, partly a sheaf of lectures and articles of very recent date, among which "Nationality and Hyphenism" and the "Next War, Wilsonism and Anti-Wilsonism" are the most conspicuous. Sir Charles is coolly, soberly, even-temperedly, but resolutely bent on the abolition of war by some form of international concert. He is, in a word, the prose idealist, a man much more likely to serve us in our present straits than the prose realist or the poetic idealist. What he wants, however, is not a League of Nations so called, but a Supernational Court backed by Power. But his Court remains rather indistinct, and the armies that enforce its decisions are phantomlike. This is a criticism, not of his plan, but of his exposition, and his allotment of four pages to so incidental and inessential a point as the employment of Latin as an international tongue makes one rather impatient of his meagreness on larger matters. Sir Charles is a zealous advocate of a closer bond between Great Britain and the United States. Up to the present hour the world, in his judgment, has been saved by the leadership of Great Britain. Between this moment and the establishment of a Supernational Court it is to be saved by the concerted leadership of Great Britain and America.

There is a steadying influence, for all but the craziest minds, in the contemplation of the experiments and failures of the past. There rise in these as in a mirror the Utopian visions of our own day; but we see, too, the plunge into reality, the maddened conflict to carry through, the crash and the chaos. And then we see the same old human nature calmly resurgent, a little dishevelled for a time; but unshaken. The pity is that those who need the lesson can not see it; they are sure that they have found the pinch of difference needed to make the prescription a success for the admittedly sick world. Yet such simple, direct, short statements as Ameen Rihani's "Descent of Bolshevism" (Boston, Stratford Co.) may reach some who would never look at formal histories. It is built on pungent axioms of the marketplace, and its sketches of previous Bolshevist dreamers and their uprisings, all of the nearer East except that of the European Illuminati of the eighteenth century, are not obscured by details or historic dubitations. He tells his stories roundly and underlines his morals blackly; but his essential facts are sound.

It is evident that the Indian stories of "F. W. Bain" are filled, for many people, with a very subtle and hardly describable attraction. It is almost the physical and yet ethereal attraction of a perfume; and on perfumes, still less than on tastes, can there be disputing. Perfumes, too, are on the border line of the sensuous and the sensual; few have in them the clean, free breath of moorland winds, and they pass rapidly into the intoxicating miasmas of the hothouse. So it is in these stories, with their mingling of realism and the fairy tale, of human passions and oriental lay-figures. The last, which has just appeared, "The Substance of a Dream" (Putnam), will please those whom the others have pleased. It is very feminine; sensuous to the point of orgies of kissing; sensual with soul-huntings and languors and faintings; fleshly in artistic ecstasies; and psychological in imaginative suggestion. Its "fabula" is evidently Indian; its mise-en-scène shows good knowledge of Indian mythology; but its human characters are not convincingly oriental and their motives are sicklied over with western mysticism and questionings. As for the author—aut femina aut diabola! She knows too much about women and, still more, thinks too meanly of them—is too unfair to them—to be aught else herself. As Southey's sturdy English nature stood out from and over his "Kehama," so here—the very woman. Hers, too, is a western nature with western yearnings, guessings, graspings, but bound, too, with western inhibitions. No Oriental would have stopped and found heaven where it is found for a moment here; Orientals are of a more natural mind and more direct.

It is in its cities that a country's intellectual life flourishes. To be deprived of them means to lose the nurseries of national culture. That is the sad plight to which Hungary is reduced by the terms of the peace treaty. To Rumania, to Jugoslavia, to Czechoslovakia she has to cede a number of towns of purely or preponderantly Hungarian populations, such as Komarom, the native town of the novelist Jokai, Kassa, sacred to the memory of Prince Rakoczy; Presburg, where the Hungarian Kings were crowned; Szabadka, Nagyvarad, Temesvar, Klausenburg, are all lost to the country and to Hungarian literature, as a ban is laid on the import of Magyar books. The sale of the published output is thus restricted to Budapest and to the countryside, where the demand for books is limited. The Hungarian people are, apparently, in danger of intellectual starvation.

International Minds and the Search for the Restful

By GUSTAV POLLAK

Author of "Fifty Years of American Idealism," "The Hygiene of the Soul," etc.

A series of essays just issued on the importance of preserving an international point of view in literature. Among the subjects treated are:

Literature and Patriotism; Goethe's Universal Interests; Grillparzer's Originality; Sainte-Beuve's Unique Position; Lowell: Patriot and Cosmopolitan; Permanent Literary Standards; Feuchtersleben the Philosopher, etc.

Price $1.50, postage 8 cents

At all bookstores and

THE NATION PRESS, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET,
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Early June

NOW is the season of perfumes. In the country the clover; in the city, roses, honeysuckle, syringa; and in one's garden all of these with the peonies and iris.

The breeze as it comes from the southward smells as if on its way it had gathered the sweetness of millions of flowers and borne it northward as promise of beauty to follow.

Come open my east porch door with me to-morrow morning when the shadows are long and every grass blade holds a dew-drop, and be greeted by the fragrance of the Trier rose that is climbing up the side of the portal, and you will stand still with me just smelling. The warming sun, opening the coming buds, seems to draw out every whiff of sweetness and offer it to greet the morning. Or shall we go out the west door into the honeysuckle, or the front door to the south, where comes the evasive yet penetrating fragrance of the Russian olive mingled with syringa?

Everywhere the birds are singing. The sun shines through the iris border, turning blue lavenders to pinks and purples to glowing wine, red like the red of old stained glass.

East of the garden itself the syringa hedge is flooding the surrounding air with an almost overpowering sweetness. The colors, the freshness, the fragrance are intoxicating. One's artist soul gazes spellbound from fluted petal to sunlit green. Flower colors against the sunlight! See where the light passing through a petal is reflected and reflected back and forth until the whole flower head seems to glow as with an inward light of its own, as if a bit of sun were there imprisoned in its heart. The color of reflected shadows, true shadows, sunlight itself, defy the palette and enthrall the eye. The beauty is bewildering, confusing, almost crushing. Do you feel a little dazed by such superlatives? This is what I would convey to you, something penetrating, saturating, almost overpowering.

It seems as if the weather man felt that heaven was getting too near earth, and that something must be done to keep us from being too happy; so he always arranges that the opening of the peonies shall be the signal for showers. As the clouds gather and darken, we rush from the house to pick the half open buds to save them from such desecration. One gathers and gathers until the house will hold no more, and every guest is impressed into taking away an armful to preserve us from suffocation by sweetness. Still one carefully scans the border o'er and o'er to see if more may not be planted somewhere.

Have you ever smelt miles and miles

(Continued on page 684)

To understand and discuss intelligently this vital question you, as an American citizen and voter, should read

THE

PEACE CONFERENCE DAY-BY-DAY

A Presidential Pilgrimage

Leading to the Discovery of Europe

By CHARLES T. THOMPSON

Superintendent of the Associated Press Foreign Service

With an Introductory Letter By

COL. E. M. HOUSE

It is a day-by-day chronicle of just what occurred, with all the sidelights; what the leading figures in that memorable assemblage said and did; the fine play of intrigue and statesmanship; the dramatic incidents; the secret conclaves and understandings; the rise and fall of the Fourteen Points; the shattering of high ideals; the battle of Covenant versus Alliance; the struggle for the Spoils of War; the matching of wits between Europe and America in the greatest diplomatic game of all time. It is the truth at last.

At all bookstores $2.50, postage extra

Publishers BRENTANO'S 5th Ave. & 27th St. NEW YORK

The Wisdom and Purpose of American Liberalism

THE NEW FRONTIER

BY GUY EMERSON

A sane, penetrating study of the elements which make Americanism a reality and a powerful force in the world. It discusses the frontier origin of the American tradition and points out the present day need for liberalism rather than radicalism or conservatism. Mr. Emerson presents his ideas in this book with freshness, vitality and a fine sense of the actual and of the possible.

The author believes that the present tendencies toward unrest cannot be combatted by suppression, but must be met by a definite effort to stimulate constructively American loyalty and cooperation through education in the fundamentals of Americanism. He applies his theory to specific problems such as the industrial problem, the political problem, and the machinery of publicity.

$2.00 At All Bookstores

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY

19 West 44th Street - - New York City

(Continued from page 683)

of clover? Pink clover, standing tall, ready to cut, and the low white clover growing in the pastures? That is the way the country smells now, alternating with the newly mown alfalfa lying loose, not piled up with its white hats on to protect it from the showers. The wheat is so tall one can no longer see its combings and some of it is heading. The corn runs a thread of green along the furrows or radiates off in perfect geometrical lines opposite one's eyes as one drives by.

Everywhere the green this year is superbly dense and dark. The elms along the streams can hardly hold their plumes of leaves, they are so heavy, and everywhere the growth is lush and rank. The wheat against the purple black or cultivated corn fields, the corduroy of the potatoes, the pastures, and the oats change and glow under the passing cloud shadows; the near hedgerow stands out against the distant blues, the patchwork of the fields upon the receding ridge; all is so varied, so abundant, one feels the electricity of growth. It is so vast, so strong, so rich, so very beautiful. A mound of honeysuckle on a farmer's gate post reminds one that the city, too, is sweet with fragrance on almost every wall and portico.

At this season I can not understand why every one does not have a garden. What are moles, caterpillars, and the persistent aphis when such as this may be produced? Should we become too happy, too stodgy, complacent, self-satisfied if none of these had been put here for our tormenting? I suppose so, I fear that an all-wise Providence knew what must be done to keep us growing on the way to heaven. Probably without them we should sit all day agaze, sometimes thinking, but more often just "a-settin'."

No gardener out here can just "set"; victory is only to the vigilant and valiant. Between the weather, the wild young rodents that stalk above and scramble below ground, the world of fliers and crawlers, one has plenty of occupation. When I once was told that the mole was more prolific than the guinea pig, for a moment I almost gave up gardening. But my sporting instinct to win out came to my aid.

Our gardening has peculiar exhilarations about it unknown in the East because it is yearly so varied. When we have a warm, moist spring, like life in a greenhouse, poppies think they are hollyhocks and hollyhocks aspire to emulate the tower of Babel, with similarly disastrous results. Sometimes one's border plants become "masses," and sometimes one's masses become handsome sticks of witheredness. It is never monotonous.

I once grew a little neat sunflower four feet high with small flowers on the end of every branch and I thought what a nice hedge it would make between me and my neighbor. I planted it. That year we had a wet season, and my hedge grew eleven feet tall with wild arms sticking out in every direction, the flowers at their ends looking about the size of buttons. I had forgotten that the year before it had not rained much from May to August. And one year my annual poppies lived through the winter and came to bloom in May along with all the blue pinks of the peonies, sweet william, and spice pinks. It was perfectly magnificent, but it was not just what I had intended. Of course, in June I had nothing, but no one could say I had not had poppies. I fastened my eyes on the hollyhocks, which had grown twice the height of any proper hollyhock, and felt as if giants were standing all round the yard daring me to murmur a single word about the poppies.

We do not have the gardens of Europe, the neatness produced by the middle-aged, trained gardener, the cut hedges, the grass paths, not a hair ever out of line. No, we certainly do not. If we did, we should not be true to our souls, which express themselves in gardens just as well as in rooms. Besides, we have not gardened as long as we have without learning that many things can be done but that some are impossible. The great force that grows the food to feed the world is not to be held down inside a garden bed. When it feels the urge, it pushes all man-puny forces aside and thrusts up fierce green arms into the sun. One is awed, almost terrified, to see the resistless strength with which it goes about its business.

Our gardens are like our cities and our lives. Full of beauty, full of promise, but incomplete, irregular. They lure, they baffle, but still they beckon. What one creates one loves, the force to grow more beauty lies at hand; it is for us to choose whether weeds or flowers shall be the output. It calls, and more and more are answering.

E. G. H.

FACTS ABOUT INDUSTRY FOUND BY ECONOMIC RESEARCH
The National Industrial Conference Board
has issued a number of Research Reports on timely questions of vital importance prepared by the Board's Research Staff from facts ascertained by extensive investigation and field work—including:
Experience with Works Councils $1.50
Wartime Changes in Wages . $1.50
Cost of Living 75
Experience with Profit-Sharing $1.00
Hours of Work as Related to Output and Health . . $1.00
FOR THE BUSY EXECUTIVE
INDUSTRIAL NEWS SURVEY
A weekly digest of important industrial news
$2.00 a year
Address Dept X for Complete List of Publications
NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD
15 Beacon Street Boston, Mass

Drama

"The Merchant of Venice" at the Playhouse

"THE Merchant of Venice" took its place among the prophylactics of cancer when the generosity of many theatrical people gave a benefit to the American Society for the prevention of that disease on the evening of June 10th at the Playhouse. The American Society slipped a pamphlet into each programme, in which, with great frankness on ugly symptoms and great emphasis on tiny ones, it gave us all to understand that cancer was hardly farther from us than Shylock's knife from Antonio's breast. "You must prepare your bosom for the knife" said the American Society, in effect, to us. Now I respect the Society and I would certainly rather forward than retard its propaganda; but they had offered me in exchange for good money a good time, and I had, and still have, a slight sense of a wrong in the discovery of a death's head in the golden casket.

The performance, in spite of certain roughnesses which leisure or repetition would have planed away, was an agreeable one. In one major point it was more agreeable and very probably more Elizabethan than the accepted high-class representation of the drama. The modern Shylock has outgrown or overgrown the play. He would subdue, dominate, and darken the entire action, if the play, like Jessica, did not evade his mastery by an escape to Belmont where it recovers its spirits in the gayety of Portia. But the Shylock of Mr. Edmund Waldman is a mild Shylock. The make-up is more sordid than terrible; it is the face one might expect to find behind the curtain at the entrance of an Italian cathedral or on the lowest step of the stairway leading to the "Elevated" in New York. He is an unpleasantness rather than a horror in the play. We trust our Shakespeare, and we are quite assured that this land rat or water rat, whichever he may be, will not be suffered finally to have his evil way with well-dressed and handsome people.

The performance, accordingly, undergoes a kind of release, it resumes its native elasticity. The Shakespearean Venice asserts its spell—that magical Venice, in which the merchandise is silks and spices, and the merchants are dreamers, and the spendthrifts poets and philosophers, and the serving-maids ladies, and the ladies (anticipating our own time) doctors, and the roysterers gentlemen, in which the talk shines with rings and jewels, and fortunes come and go with the lightsomeness of cavaliers. The minor parts fell in with this impression. The Bassanio was rich voiced, the Lorenzo was very handsome, the Jessica was delicately right, the Launcelot was crisp in resilience, the Gratiano abounded—somewhat overbounded—in torpedoes, and the Duke was perfect in a straitened part.

Miss Laura Walker made a somewhat unequal Portia. Neither her face nor her voice is markedly expressive. On the other hand, there was a freedom—sometimes a felicity—in her action which seemed to overflow and break down the limits of the personality suggested by the face and voice. In the trial scene she was really good. She attempted no more masculinity than a clever woman could easily and evenly compass, and her adherence to this form of masculinity was faithful. Miss Walker takes her acting seriously enough to know that Portia, too, would take Portia's acting seriously, that she would not allow the woman to become visible through the transparencies of the boy.

There is one point in the handling of the fifth act which lures me into incidental criticism. It is a criticism of the current practice rather than of the Playhouse actors, for whose adhesion to that practice in a single night's benefit performance no excuse is required. The fifth act in "The Merchant of Venice" is an idyl. Now if an idyl is indigestible at eleven P. M.—an hour at which digestion, physical or mental, is rebellious—let us frankly and curtly stop the play with Act IV. But if we dare the idyl, let us not flee from our own valor by playing it at a quickstep through which its suave and sumptuous grace is snatched from the pursuing ear and eye. "The Merchant of Venice" will not bear the spur. It is leisurely everywhere, even in the tense court scene it is deliberate. It is stately in its very joyousness; its relation to "Twelfth Night" or "As You Like It" is precisely like that of Portia to Viola or Rosalind, an equal merriment reposing on a larger dignity. That dignity is lost when the play scampers and scurries through an unceremonious fifth act to a precipitate end.

O. W. Firkins

BY TWO OF THE AMERICAN DELEGATES

SOME PROBLEMS OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE

By

CHARLES HOMER HASKINS

Chief of the Division of Western Europe of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace

AND

ROBERT HOWARD LORD

Chief of the Russian-Polish Division

viii + 310 pages 6 maps Price, $3.00

In the main this volume gives a rapid survey of the principal elements in the territorial settlement of Europe, which Charles Seignobos has called "the most reasonable part of the work of the Conference." At the same time, however, attention is given to economic conditions and to questions which affect the League of Nations, and there is a graphic description of the tasks and methods of the Conference. The authors, as two of the most important advisers of the gathering, had the advantage of first-hand acquaintance with their subject.

Secret Treaties of Austria-Hungary, 1879-1914

Vol. I: Texts of the Treaties and Agreements

Edited by Alfred F. Pribram, of the University of Vienna; American edition by Archibald Cary Coolidge, of Harvard University. 326 pages. $2.50

"Absolutely indispensable to any student of history."—Glasgow Herald.

"An interesting and important collection."—American Historical Review.

Three Peace Congresses of the 19th Century; Claimants to Constantinople

By Charles Downer Hazen, William Roscoe Thayer, Robert Howard Lord, and Archibald Cary Coolidge.

93 pages. $1.00

Four essays on the Congresses of Vienna, Paris, and Berlin, and on the question of Constantinople, all throwing much light on the Paris Conference of 1919.

To be found at all bookshops

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

10 Randall Hall, Cambridge, Mass. 19 East 47th St., New York City

EDUCATIONAL SECTION

Research and Organization

I HAVE read Dr. James Rowland Angell's very interesting article on "Organization in Scientific Research" in the Weekly Review. Will you permit me, as one vitally interested in this important subject, to offer a few observations thereon?

The National Research Council originated in the fertile brain of Dr. George L. Hale, the very eminent astrophysicist and the foreign secretary of the National Academy of Sciences. The writer was present at the meeting of the National Academy at which Dr. Hale unfolded his idea, and has been familiar with the history of the National Research Council from the start.

Undoubtedly a certain amount of organization is a good thing. Dr. Hale came to this idea after a very considerable experience with the organization of astrophysics. Astronomy, or astrophysics is a science very well adapted for coöperative organization. The sky presents itself to us in the form of a spherical surface, every portion of which is geometrically similar to every other portion of the same size. I can see the North Star, but I can not see the southern stars. How natural it is, therefore, if we wish to make a photographic map of the heavens, to divide up the whole celestial sphere into regions, of course not of equal differences in declination and right ascension, but into regions of equal area, and distribute them among the observatories of the world that have telescopes of a standard size and can take photographs that can afterwards be aggregated into a great star map. Nothing simpler, or more proper. Also, the determination of stellar spectra may be organized in the same way.

The late Professor Pickering of Harvard was an eminent exponent of coöperation. He was very largely interested in the photometry of the stars. In fact, he once said in the presence of the writer, during a meeting of the Rumford Committee of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in Boston, that he had just made his millionth setting of his photometer on stars. I thought at the time that this was an admirable example of how not to do it, inasmuch as, after the first few thousand settings, the thing might easily have been hired out to an inferior man leaving Professor Pickering free to do the thinking part for other people. However, he did enough planning, so we will let that go. His plan was to get the Rumford Committee to allocate funds for the construction of a number of his photometers, which were then distributed to observatories where there was a person who could make the observations and a telescope that the photometer could be placed upon. In this way a large amount of coöperative research was carried out.

Another example is the International Geodetic Union. It is very obvious that if the shape and properties of the earth are to be determined this must be done by coöperation between observers who are widely distributed over the surface of the earth. In the same category are observations of the tides, and all observations which are secular in their nature; I mean by that, which have to be waited for and which can not be caused to reproduce themselves in the laboratory or at the volition of any of the observers. No scientific King Knut can cause the tide to answer to the request, "Please repeat that last experiment." There is nothing to do but to wait for to-morrow's tide, next year's tide, the tide of next century. Tidal work then is an admirable example adapted for coöperation, not only simultaneously in space, but posteriorly in time.

The subject of hygiene and medicine, as mentioned by Dr. Angell, is also an excellent example. During war all sorts of research must be done on the hurry-up plan, which is best promoted by coöperation more or less military in nature. In time of peace, however, things are far otherwise. Many of the branches of science are not very well adapted to the coöperative method, carried out on a large scale. To be sure, one of the most successful undertakings of this sort was that carried out by M. Solvay, the great Belgian chemist, who, a few years before the war, had the very ingenious and generous idea of inviting a certain limited number of the élite physicists of the various countries of Europe to meet in Brussels, where he entertained them in a hotel hired by himself for the purpose, and got them to discuss the most important physical questions of the hour. The two reports of this Conférence Solvay form a monument to this kind of coöperation. No doubt something of this sort is contemplated by the National Research Council.

However, research in general, though it is not, as is truly maintained by Dr. Angell, like the production of poetry, sculpture or painting, is somewhat similar. It depends upon the creation of ideas in the mind of the person interested in research, as I regret to say it is commonly called. This is the most fundamental step, the conception. Practically, however, of still more importance to the public is the birth. For this purpose a certain amount of preparation is necessary, and a competent medical operator.

Now, to speak very personally, I do not want any organization of research to tell me what to do. Although I am an elderly man, I have ideas enough to keep me going for the next twenty years. There is not much danger of my treading on other people's toes, for I know who is who and what he is doing, and he also knows what I am doing. My method of research is very simple. I divide all problems up into two classes, those that I think I might possibly solve and those that I am very sure I never could. I think it better business to devote my entire attentions to problems of the first class. Further than that I do not impose any limitations, nor do I wish any imposed.

I happen to have worked for twenty years on the subject of sound, which I think constitutes me the senior in this country. I am, however, equally interested in electricity, on which I have written a book, or on ballistics, in connection with which I have founded a new laboratory, or any other subject of physics, theoretical or experimental. As a matter of fact, I have been put upon a number of committees of the National Research Council, and I have recently returned from a meeting of the Committee on Sound. There were six of us, and when I went into the meeting I stated that I should not agree to be bound by the vote of the caucus, and I presumed that the net result would be that we should all go home and go to work on those subjects which God had given us the ability to work upon. I was put upon a half dozen sub-committees, and in due time I shall hand in my report. We had a very good time and increased the respect and admiration that we had for each other and that we shall continue to have. Quite a sum of money was used up in getting us to the place of meeting and back again. All this is very good. But the prime need of everyone of us is more brains, more hands, and more money.

In the experience of thirty years of research at a single institution, which I believe is longer than that of Dr. Angell (I said an elder soldier, not a better), I spent nearly twenty of it without any assistant whatever. Then I had an assistant. He was not, as I hoped, a Ph. D., but he was a candidate for it, and one of the best assistants that I ever saw. From that time to this I have been very fortunate in the quality of my assistants, although they have generally been only graduate students. Last year in my ballistic institute, by various pickings and stealings, I managed to get five assistants. This year I am reduced to half an assistant, and I see no probability of getting any more.

I am informed that the National Research Council has seven million dollars. Shall I get any of this? I think not. One million is to be used for a monumental administration building, as in the case of the Carnegie Institute of Washington. The rest will be used to pay for the red tape which will bind up the various packages containing the wisdom of the authorities of the National Research Council. Perhaps it won't. I don't know. This is my opinion.

I have experienced in my day three Great Illusions. They have been in connection with the fantasy that any of the money coming from a great American millionaire could do me any good. When the Carnegie Institution of Washington was founded nearly twenty years ago, I thought I might get an assistant and was so indiscreet as to say to a few of my friends, "Now things will be easy for me." Not a cent. The money was all gone in the establishment of great research undertakings, like Professor Hale's Mount Wilson Solar Observatory, Professor Bauer's Magnetic Survey of the Earth, the Laboratory of Genetics of Professor Davenport, and Professor Benedict's Nutrition Laboratory. These are all first-class, and I have nothing to say against them. That does not change the fact that the money did not do me any good. Second, the Carnegie Foundation for the improvement of something or other, which promised us all pensions. That has been so lied about, and so many great discoveries have been propounded showing pensions to be entirely useless, that I have long given up the expectation of getting anything whatever from this. Probably no money would be given to a person that could be so insulting in his remarks. And now the National Research Council with the money that comes from I do not know where.

I belong to the only trade that has not met with the general advance in wages in this country. My salary is the same that it has been for seven or eight or nine years, and I never expect to have it any greater. However, I have dabbled a little in commerce and found out what my brain is worth. It is worth exactly one hundred dollars a day or more, for this is what I get, or, if it is less than a day, at the rate of twenty-five dollars an hour.

Now I do not care in the least for practical applications of science. I am much more interested in Einstein's principle of relativity and Maxwell's differential equations than I am in wireless telegraphs, automobiles, aeroplanes, or anything of the sort. Nevertheless, if people will come and thrust their dirty money into my hands, my hand by a very natural reaction closes upon it. One hundred dollars, multiplied by three hundred working days, is thirty thousand dollars, I believe. Can anybody tell why I should work for ten per cent. of this sum or thereabouts? Yes, I can. The reason is because I like it, because there is a fascination about the struggle with nature, the wresting of her secrets in the laboratory, and the wringing from them by the process of higher mathematics differential equations from data obtained experimentally. This is what I love. Every scientist worthy the name loves it. For that he is willing to starve his wife and children (my children are all grown up and married, or self-supporting, so that they are not starving very much), and bear the odium of his neighbors for a cruel or incapable husband and father. It is rather tough, but he does it.

In conclusion, I should like to make a reply to a statement often made by these millionaire foundations that it is not expedient to cut their millionaire endowments up into small grants. My answer in a general denial. I know better. I have been for twenty-five years a member of the Rumford Committee of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences which appropriates about two thousand dollars in small grants, of which Dr. Hale in his salad days had a good many. We always get extremely good results. The administration of red tape is nil. I am also one of the trustees of the Bache fund of the National Academy of Sciences. These two funds are the largest of the smaller funds for research in the country; the results are the same. The trustees seldom meet; they correspond. In a committee of this sort it is unnecessary to have huge files of questionnaires and punch machines by which you will find who will do this thing or the other. One of the committee usually knows the man; or if he doesn't, he takes the recommendation of somebody that does know him. A little conversation or one or two letters suffice to determine whether the research is worth encouragement, and the appropriation is made or refused. Uniformly the results are good. To tell me that the Carnegie Institution of Washington could not discover people proper to give grants of $500, $1,000, or $2,000 to is an absolute admission of incompetency. The same with the National Research Council.

I maintain that the greatest part of research will always be done by the universities, and that any plan that neglects them will involve a miscarriage. The contact with young men, enthusiastic disciples, will always be a great stimulus to the researcher, and there is no teacher so good as the one who is himself engaged in scientific creation.

If any of the things which I have stated above are not facts, or if any person does not think they are facts, let him speak, for him have I offended.

ARTHUR GORDON WEBSTER
Clark University

Lippincott Books

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR

THE EASTERN QUESTION AND ITS SOLUTION

By MORRIS JASTROW, JR., PH.D., LL.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50 net.

This is the book of the hour on one of the most absorbing problems before the Allies at this time. Professor Jastrow is an authority on the ancient and modern East. His discussion of the question is timely. He shows the reason for the failure of the European policies, and gives an illuminating survey of the present situation.

THE BOOK OF COURAGE

By JOHN T. FARIS. $1.50 net.

This is a dynamic book. It stirs one to action. The advice is practical. The many story illustrations apt and to the point. The author shows truly how courage is an essence of life itself.

THE WORKER AND HIS WORK

Compiled by STELLA S. CENTER. 12 illustrations. $2.00 net.

The romance, the wonder, the social significance of modern work is told in a series of remarkable stories by Arnold Bennett, Maurice Maeterlinck, Eden Phillpotts, Angela Morgan, H. G. Wells, Henry van Dyke and others. Illustrated with reproductions of famous paintings and sculptures.

KING JOHN

Edited by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, JR., A.B., Litt.D.

The Nineteenth Volume in

A NEW VARIORIUM EDITION OF THE WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Edited by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, Ph.D., LL.D., Litt.D., and HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, JR., A.B., Litt.D. Royal octavo, gilt top, uncut edges, cloth, $6.00 net per volume. Half morocco, $9.00 net per volume.

"The most scholarly edition of Shakespeare that the world has ever seen. It is not only the best edition, it is indispensable."—William Lyon Phelps Lampson, Professor of English Literature, Yale University.

THE ORIENT IN BIBLE TIMES

By ELIHU GRANT. Illustrated, $2.50 net.

A fascinating volume, presenting a wonderful and historically accurate panorama of the Oriental world—its peoples, civilization and history during Bible times. This work is very complete and comprehensive.

A HISTORY OF THE THEATRE IN AMERICA

By ARTHUR HORNBLOW, Editor of "The Theatre Magazine." 190 rare and unusual illustrations from many sources. Two handsome octavo volumes, $10.00 net.

"This book should be indispensable for a hundred years to come."—New York Nation.

The only complete History of the American stage from its beginning to the present time. A more fascinating story has never been told.

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

J. B. LIPPINCOTT CO.
PHILADELPHIA

"The Natural History of the Child," by Dr. Courtenay Dunn (Lane), is not a work of science, nor of pseudo-science, but the commonplace-book of a Cornish physician, himself the father of seven children, in which are set down jottings culled from much curious reading. From Democritus, Jr., if Melancholy had not marked him for her own and if he had inhabited the outskirts of a nursery, instead of being a solitary scholar of Christ Church, something in this vein might have been looked for. A reader of antiquarian bent, who is at the same time not troubled by the absence of references, may reasonably expect to pick up a nugget or two of forgotten lore.

Successful cultivation of flowers is so much a matter of local conditions that only long experience discloses how much of the fair promise held forth by the books and catalogues is capable of realization. Next to one's own experience the best thing is one's neighbors', and it is the wisdom of the Garden Community of Kansas City, Missouri, which Mrs. Massey Holmes has condensed and organized in a little pamphlet called "Flower Garden Guide." Every neighborhood where flowers are grown should collaborate in a study of this kind, together with a survey of its resources in wild flowers and shrubs that are susceptible of domestication.

THE NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY

Main Office 26 Broad Street | Fifth Avenue Office Fifth Ave. and 57th St.
NEW YORK

Capital $3,000,000
Surplus and Profits $11,000,000

Designated Depositary in Bankruptcy and of Court and Trust Funds

OTTO T. BANNARD, Chairman of the Board
MORTIMER N. BUCKNER, President

F. J. Horne, Vice-Pres.
James Dodd, Vice-Pres.
H. W. Morse, V.-Pres.
Harry Forsyth, Treas.
Boyd G. Curts, Sec'y
E. B. Lewis,
W. J. Birdsall,
Assistant Treasurers

H. W. Shaw
A. C. Downing, Jr.
W. MacNaughten,
L. Bradford
S. B. Silleck
I. LeR. Bennett
Wm. H. Taft, 2nd,
Assistant Secretaries

FIFTH AVENUE OFFICE
Charles E. Haydock, Vice-President and Manager
Joseph A. Flynn..............Assistant Secretary
Mrs. Key Cammack..............Assistant Secretary
Russell V. Worstell..........Assistant Secretary

TRUSTEES
Otto T. Bannard
S. Reading Bertron
James A. Blair
Mortimer N. Buckner
James C. Colgate
Alfred A. Cook
Arthur J. Cumnock
Robert W. de Forest
John B. Dennis
Philip T. Dodge
George Doubleday
Samuel H. Fisher
John A. Garver
Benjamin S. Guinness
F. N. Hoffstot
Buchanan Houston
Percy H. Jennings
Walter Jennings
Darwin P. Kingsley
John C. McCall
Ogden L. Mills
John J. Mitchell
James Parmelee
Henry C. Phipps
Norman P. Ream
Dean Sage
Joseph J. Slocum
Myles Tierney
Clarence M. Woolley

Members of the New York Clearing House Association and of the Federal Reserve System

The American Exporter in "Wonderland"

"IF it takes seven years to make a tailor," said the Mockturtle to Alice, "how long does it take to make an American exporter?" or might very well have said, for to-day the question of American exporting, particularly to Latin-America, is very much a "Wonderland."

Not long ago, in a very prosperous country on the River Plate, a big wholesale importer ordered from an American house a large consignment of men's thin summer undershirts to be delivered early in October for the summer trade. The goods were then sold for future delivery to the retailers throughout the Republic. October came and with it a consignment of the heaviest type of woolen underwear. The customers of the wholesale house protested. Summer goods was what they wanted. And a lawsuit was instituted against the importer which forced him to make heavy payments for non-delivery. Protests were made in turn to the exporter with no satisfactory results. It is understood, however, that the junior clerk, in full charge of the export department of this important business house, when preparing the order for shipment was heard to remark, "These boobs in South America don't know nothing. Summer undershirts in October! Send 'em heavy woolens, Jim!"

And when the Latin-American merchant who was forced to the United States for his market during the war tells you, "The Americans, Señor, are not a serious business people," what can you reply?

It is just that which will decide our future in the Latin-American trade. Seriousness—seriousness in our canvassing for orders—our promises for delivery at a fixed time—our packing, and, above all, the sending to the customer the article he wants and not what we want to send him.

For the last two decades the advice and warning given to American merchants by those who have traveled and lived in Latin-America has been the same—packing, delivery on time, and goods of absolutely the same quality as the sample or the description. The advice is as good to-day as it ever was, yet in twenty years we have given no sign of acting upon it.

We may easily plead that economic conditions in the United States have not forced us to seek foreign markets. We have not had the same inducements to engage in South American trade as the British and Germans, whose factories needed the outlet of foreign markets and whose intelligent, industrious younger sons had to seek their fortunes abroad. This is an easy way to confess and obtain absolution for our sins of the past—but the economic conditions of ten years ago exist no longer and we must seek our place in the export trade of the world. Have we taken this into consideration? Are we prepared? Are we trying to enter the field seriously?

England and Germany in 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918 could not supply the South and Central American markets. Goods they must have—such goods as they could obtain. Who could supply them? The United States, and so we started to send south what we wanted and in our own way. And the importer had to be satisfied.

In South America to-day, one sees shop windows full of American products. We have become a manufacturing and exporting nation to our Latin-American neighbors. But a year has passed and more since the armistice. War is forgotten on the other side of the Atlantic by the producers and exporters, and British and German goods, with the old easily moving machinery of sales and delivery, are rapidly finding their way into the windows. Can we compete? Can we increase as an exporting nation? The odds are against us and we must meet the situation face to face and play the same serious, careful game as our able competitors. We must have learned something during these last four years—our own economic necessity, for foreign trade must be something real to us by this time.

We can certainly hold our own if we follow such simple rules as these:

1. The placing at the head of our export departments of men who have, besides known business qualifications, some geographical knowledge and a commercial knowledge of Spanish and Portuguese, and who are willing to learn foreign trade conditions.

2. The preparation of catalogues in Spanish and Portuguese which can be read by the customer.

3. The packing of goods to meet the geographical and other needs of the country of import—not difficult, with care and study of conditions.

4. The sending of salesmen who know the country into which they are to go.

5. Refraining from making fine promises as to dates of delivery and character of goods until the exporter is sure that he can carry them out.

6. The supplying of goods exactly as ordered—not sending "any old thing which is good enough for them."

By following these suggestions, and only in this way, can the American exporter take and keep his proper place in the keen competition which is now coming. In this way alone will he be able to have it said of him, "Señor, the American is a serious man of business."